EDITORIAL

This volume of the Encyclopaedia covers a wide range of entries on books and authors, besides studies in some major literary genres, movements and trends—genres (or sub-genres) like Novel, Prose, Poetry, Poetics and Prosody: movements like Realism, Renaissance and Romanticism: trends like Patriotism and Progressivism. A general topic like Printing and Publishing, a sub-form of literature like Pen-Portraits, and philosophical systems like Nyaya and Samkhya also appear in the volume. Broad surveys of genres or pointed studies of movements, trends and schools of thought have been retained even at the risk of a certain overlapping of material found in entries on books and authors, since they offer a historical and literary perspective for the broad spectrum of Indian literature covering some 4000 years of growth and development. A certain degree of repetition, it was felt, could do little harm in a reference work of this nature meant as much for non-specialised readers as for the educated and scholarly ones. A cultural tradition like ours, so rich and varied and yet with an essential unity at the core, is indeed 'a collaboratively sustained reality', to borrow a phrase from F.R. Leavis, in the way exemplified by our languages.

This Encyclopaedia is the first serious attempt of its kind in the country which aims at providing the reader, within the compass of some five volumes, a perception of Indian literature in twenty-five languages, including Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha—languages no longer in use. A work of this magnitude, undertaken for the first time, involves many limitations of which we are fully conscious, though we would not like to make them an excuse for our weaknesses. Since the publication of the first volume of the Encyclopaedia in 1987, we have received a good deal of feedback from various quarters, some of it balanced and sympathetic, some sharply critical of the deficiencies. We are grateful for all sensitive review of the work and would bear it in mind while revising and updating the volumes in the next edition. In fact, in this volume itself we have tried to organise the material with greater precision and accuracy, reducing details to coherent order, though without infringing too far on the basic character of the entries.

The quality of an encyclopaedia depends on many factors; editing is only one of them, of crucial importance certainly. Effective coordination between the central editorial unit and language advisers-cum-editors spread all over the country, response from contributors, availability of expertise, and a reasonable time frame for the preparation of a volume are some other factors which go into the making of a standard work of reference. Our attempt has been to commission entries from the ablest scholars in each field of specialisation in the country, but sometimes their contributions do not reach us on schedule, or do not come at all, resulting in improvised attempts at the last hour. Equally important is the task of maintaining balanced proportions between the different items—entries on books, authors and general topics—written by a large number of contributors in diverse languages. Many writers from different parts of India have worked with us in this endeavour, and differences in conception and approach, perhaps, cannot always be resolved in order to allow everything to fall into a pattern.

All important entries missing in the first four volumes for one reason or another will be duly accommodated in the addenda of the last volume—hopefully the next one—together with necessary cross-references and indices. Let me also add that the views and opinions expressed by the contributors in this volume do not necessarily represent those of the Akademi.

As we complete this volume, let me address this to ourselves. An encyclopaedia of literature, more so a foundational work like ours, is perhaps only a partially achieved reality as it is ever in the process of growing and becoming—an ideal that must, in Tagore's words, compel tireless striving, on our part, to stretch its arms towards perfection.

Now a word of appreciation and gratitude. Professor Amaresh Datta, former Chief Editor, retired in the middle of February 1990. During his six years of tenure, the Encyclopaedia Unit was greatly energised, leading to the publication of the first three volumes, and we would like to express our sense of appreciation for his dedicated work. The Unit is grateful to members of the Steering Committee, particularly Dr B.K. Bhattacharya, President, Professor Gangadhar Gadgil, Vice-President, and Professor Indra Nath Choudhuri, Secretary, for their constant encouragement and understanding. And, finally, for editorial assistance and warmth of cooperation I must express my gratitude to my colleagues on the editorial team, Sri Jagdish Chandra Arora, Dr Sudha Gopalakrishnan, Sri Param Abichandani, Mrs Arundhati Deosthale, Dr Shankar Basu, Sri K.C. Dutt and Mrs Yashodhara Mishra.

NOTE ON ENTRIES

Entries in this volume of the Encyclopaedia have been grouped under three categories—books, authors, and general topics (genres, movements, trends, etc.) following the pattern set, more or less, by the earlier volumes. The entries have been arranged alphabetically and organised word by word, except in cases where a languagewise listing had to be made, especially for subject and genre entries, e.g.

Novel (Assamese), Novel (Bengali), Novel (Dogri), Novel (English), etc.;
Romanticism (Assamese), Romanticism (Bengali), Romanticism (Dogri), etc.

In case of entries on modern writers, the international practice of listing them with surnames first has been followed, though there are some exceptions to the rule:

The older writers, usually up to the early nineteenth century, have been entered under their first names, e.g. Nilakantha Dikshita, Parashuram Devacharaya, Rupa Gosvamin.

Authors, widely known by their pen-names or adopted names, have been entered under their pseudonyms, e.g. Agyeya, Ghalib, Mir, Nirala, Premchand.

Kannada, Malayalam, Tamil and Telugu writers have been listed under their own names in keeping with the South Indian practice, except in cases where the last part of the name is used specifically as a surname.

Examples:
Parameswara Iyer, Ulloor S. (Own name in italics here)
Parameswaran Nair, P.K. (Own name in italics here)
Gokak, Vinayak Krishna ('Gokak' used as surname)
Iyengar, K.R. Srinivasa ('Iyengar' used as surname)

Manipuri writers have been entered under their forenames, as suggested by the language editor.

Women writers have been listed under the first part of their names, though in a couple of cases we have entered them otherwise. For example, Amrita Pritam, who somehow missed the entry in Volume I, has been accommodated under 'Pritam' in this volume.

NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

In consonance with the practice adopted in the first three volumes of the Encyclopaedia, we have retained the conventional spellings of Indian words while transcribing them into English. Since there are regional variations in the transliteration of the words, reliance on them has led to certain anomalies, e.g. 'ee' and 'i', 'oo' and 'u', and the three sibilants (dental, palatal and cerebral) have become interchangeable. Since diacritical marks have not been used, nor a sound transliteration scheme evolved, it was considered advisable not to interfere with the regional modes of spelling. As a result, variant regional spellings, such as Sarma and Sharma, Siva and Shiva, Jain and Jaina, Namboothiri and Nambuthiri or Namputhiri, Sankara and Shankar have been accepted, though in a few cases of variant spellings we have tried to achieve some measure of uniformity for the sake of convenience—but even here our endeavour has been not to take liberty with the names (or surnames) as spelt by the writers themselves. We have, therefore, accepted both Patnaik and Pattanayak, Rath and Ratha, Roy and Ray, Parik/Parikh and Parekh; we have tried to arrange the entries under these and such other surnames in clusters, close to each other, providing cross-references as far as possible for ready check up.

Please note that only the names of books, journals and magazines have been given in italics; other Indian words have been allowed to run into the text, though the first time they appear in an entry they are put within inverted commas or they begin just with the first letter capitalised. Some words, like rasa, alamkara, bhakti, purana, may perhaps, owing to the frequency of their use, be considered part of international idiom.

A chart of transliteration of Roman alphabet is given separately for general guidance.

NAVARATRI (Kannada) is a collection of verse narratives by Masti Venkatesa Iyengar, Kannada poet, novelist, short-story writer, dramatist and critic. It was published in five parts between 1944 and 1953. 'Navaratri', which means 'nine nights', refers to Dasara. The collection has a frame in the princely state of Mysore. Dasara is celebrated with rare eclat and draws visitors from all over the world. Several friends meet in Mysore at the time of Dasara; every evening one of them narrates a story and another offers comments. The poet, who is Ramu in the poem, is to record the narration and the comments. There is an introduction of about a thousand and two hundred lines in which the narrator makes obeisance to all the great story-tellers of all ages and times. He then introduces the narrators—sixteen in number. This part of the poem is a splendid portrait gallery. Of the nineteen stories in the collection some are mythological or historical. There is one lovely story which skilfully employs the supernatural, another is a folk-tale, and a third portrays the greatness of the Agadi Sadhu who lived in the earlier part of the century. A few are slight pieces.

There is rich variety in the collection. It opens with 'Yadurayavijaya', a historical tale narrating how Yadurayа (the founder of the royal dynasty of Mysore) and his brother rescued the princess of Mysore from the clutches of a loutish chieftain. The very next story 'Samadhiya satva', by contrast, blends humour with seriousness; it is the story of a man who is by no means a villain but comes to deceive people by building a tomb for his beloved donkey; people come to worship imagining that some great man's body lies there. 'Sojigada holalu' narrates an experience with such consummate skill that one does not know where the natural ends and the supernatural begins. 'Ramapriya udanta' is the tale of a much respected monarch who seems to have all that the heart seeks, but who grows tired of the pomp and artificiality of court-life and goes away to a forest to live with a maiden. Yet another poem tells of the martyrdom of a rustic woman for the welfare of her village.

There is an admirable variety of tone and attitude in these narrations. The narrators are of different temperaments and pursue different professions. 'Siddhara kinnari' narrates a mystic experience. The commentaries are stimulating and new interpretations are suggested. It is interesting to compare one's own response with that of the commentator. Masti is the father of the Kannada short story. The collection shows ripeness blended with narrative skill and fine sense of humour. He is at his best in stories like 'Samadhiya satva' and 'Sojigada holalu'. The impostor in the former is as much a deliberate impostor as a victim of circumstance; indeed, at times he merely yields to the pressure of events. The story also offers an interesting study of his mind. 'Sojigada holalu' narrates how a ruined city awakens and throbs with life for a few hours for a youthful doctor, but so exquisitely is the story narrated that everything can be explained away as the hallucination of an opium-influenced youth. The narratives are in the simple, clear style of Masti; his vocabulary and imagery are limited in comparison with those of some of the poets of his age, and the range of emotions is also limited. But the narration is characterized by ripeness and informed by a humane outlook and delight in the goodness and nobility of the human heart. A story like 'Ramapriya udanta' reveals his broad-mindedness and understanding.

The one factor that may limit the achievement is that the world of the poems is entirely an elitist world. The range of experiences and the attitudes, therefore, become limited. But the reader who concedes this limitation will find here interest in human nature, maturity, a kindly and healthy sense of humour and delightful narration. Masti belongs to the first generation of writers of the Renaissance Age; he is in many ways a pioneer. He is one of the earliest masters of verse narration, and he is one of the first, if not the first, to use blank verse. Navaratri is the work of a poet who has explored the possibilities of narrative verse. His blank verse has flexibility, lucidity and an easy flow.

NAVARE, S.N. (Marathi; b. 1927) is known popularly as 'Shanna'. He is a short story writer, a dramatist and a novelist. He took his degree in science and worked with the government for some years. He started writing seriously around 1952. He has 17 collections of short stories to his credit, amongst which Tila ughad, Jatra, Shahani sakal, Bhandar, Zopala, Anawar (1984) and Ekmek (1985) are famous. Some of his short stories have been broadcast from All India Radio, Bombay. He has written five novels, namely Surung, Attahas, Sanwad, No problem and Diwasen diwas. He has been fairly popular as a dramatist too. His plays, like his short stories, are based on social themes related particularly to middle classes. In all he has written 22 plays, some of which are Man pakharu pakharu, Dhummas, Dhukyat haravali waat, Sur rahu de, Surung and Gulam. He has written eight one-act plays, two of which have been telecast from Bombay T.V. His collection of essays is called Kavadse. These are miscellaneous essays written in an impressionistic style.

Navare's contribution to literature though not acknowledged as innovative is significant in terms of its popularity.

NAVATATTVAPRAKARNA (Prakrit) is a small Shvetambara Jain tract on nine fundamental verities (navatattva), written by Devagupta (11th century) in fourteen crabbed Prakrit verses. Faith in the nine verities is considered the right faith which is held as the seed of liberation. One who knows the nine verities has the right faith, but even he who does not know them but has a tendency to put faith in what is preached by a Jina has the right faith. The nine verities are: Jiva (soul), Ajiva (non-soul), Punya (spiritual merit), Papa (spiritual demerit), Asrava (karmic influx), Bandha (karmic bondage), Samvara (stoppage of karmic influx), Nirjara (dissociation of karmas) and Moksha (salvation).

Verities of punya, papa, asrava, samvara and nirjara are enumerated. Moksha is a pure spiritual state characterised by the absence of karma. At the end two well-established lists of points for investigating the nature of a liberated soul are given. The work is important for its focus on truth and its nine aspects.

NAVAZ RATANPURI (Kashmiri; b. 1926), real name Ghulam Mohi-ud-Din, was born in a poor Syed family at Ratanpur. He did not receive any formal education and learnt Arabic and Persian on his own. Navaz faced the life of poverty and misfortune in his early childhood. His poetry fully depicts his personal agonies and despairs. Navaz has written in the tradition of the early love-lyricists and sufi poets. His poetry is known for its musical quality and felicity of diction. His small collections of poems are Sozi-i-dil (The heart aches), Gul-i-rehan (A fragrant flower), Lola tab (The pangs of love) and Mizrab (Music).

NAVEN LOK (Punjabi) is a collection of short stories by Kulwant Singh Virk (b. 1920) published in 1967, which earned him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968. The short stories in the book portray the changes that have taken place in the Punjabi society during the past few decades. Important among these stories are 'Sheranjan' (Tigresses), depicting young women cycling from town to teach in the villages, free from fear of molestation, 'Namaskar' (Homage) about a young woman doctor going to work in a rural dispensary and 'Naven lok' portraying a landlady talking freely with prospective tenants. The stories mark a change in old themes like the break-up of the old feudal society in Punjab as dealt with by Virk in his earlier stories.

'NAVIN' BALAKRISHA SHARMA (Hindi; b. 1897, d. 1960) was born in a poor family of the devout followers of Vallabhacharya in the village of Bhayana, Madhya Pradesh, and matriculated from Ujjain in 1917. At the Lucknow conference of the Indian National Congress in 1916, he came in contact with Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Maithilisharan Gupta and Ganeshshankar Vidyarthi. He was deeply influenced by them, particularly by Vidyarthi, and became one of his close associates.

For further studies he went to Kanpur where he came in close contact with a large number of freedom fighters, and was inspired by them. He was imprisoned several times; once in 1921-22, twice during 1930, and again in 1932. In jail, he came in contact, among others, with Jawaharlal Nehru. He started and completed in jail his epic, Urmila. The poem is divided into six cantos and runs into 619 pages. His maiden publication was the short story, 'Santu', which appeared in Saraswati in 1917. The following year, his first poem was published.

Navin is regarded as a poet in the Romantic tradition. He published five collections of poems: Kumkum (1939), Apalak (1951), Rashmi-rekha ((1951), Kwasi (1952) and Vinoba stawan (1954). These collections contain his lyrical poems in rhymed verse. They are written in Khari boli with occasional traces of Braj bhasha. His poems deal with patriotic, romantic and erotic themes. He wrote a large number of poems, many of which remained unpublished during his life-time. His editorials written for Pratap, the influential daily published at Kanpur by G.S. Vidyarthi, are famous for their revolutionary spirit as well as their excellent prose. He was a member of the Constituent Assembly, and from 1947 till his death in 1960 remained a member of Parliament.

NAVTEJ SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1924, d. 1981) was the son of the well-known Punjabi writer, Gurbakhsh Singh. He did his M.A. in Psychology, and started his career as a political journalist and remained so till his death. He was co-editor of the journal Prit lari and took over its complete charge as editor after the death of his father.

Navtej travelled extensively, mainly to the Soviet Union, and thus widened the range of his literary pursuits. The Punjab government recognised his services and honoured him with the Shiromani Patrakar Award.

There are six collections of short stories to the credit of Navtej. The combination of the mental and the physical states of mind is a conspicuous quality of his short stories. His love for the masses is conveyed in his stories with delicate poetic touches. His characters seem to be always struggling with the base and artificial values of life in society.

His short story collections include: Desh vapsi (Return home), Navin ruti (The new season), Basmati di mahak (Fragrance of Basmati), Chanan di bij (Seeds of light), Navtej Singh dian chonvian kahanian (selected stories) and Sab ton vada khazana (The greatest treasure). Apart from these collections, a collection of his essays Meri dharti, mere log (My land, my people) was greatly appreciated.

Ph.M.

NAYACHANDRA (Prakrit and Apabhramsha; 15th century) composed two works, Hammira-kavya, and the Sattaka, Rambhamanjari. Hammira-kavya is a poem of great historical interest, for it celebrates the heroic deeds mainly of Hammira and incidentally of his predecessors. Hammira distinguished himself in the war with the Moslems headed by Alauddin. After a grim and fierce battle with the enemy he died in the battlefield in 1301. Nayachandra's Rambhamanjari is incomplete, as it contains only three Yavanikantaras and not four as required in a Sattaka. This Sattaka play celebrates the wedding of King Jaitrachandra (also known as Jaya or Jayantachandra) with Rambhamanjari, daughter of king Madanavarman, and the love dalliance of the wedded couple.

From the details of the spiritual genealogy given by Nayachandra we learn that he was a Jain monk who belonged to Krishnagaccha. He was a pupil of Prasannachandra and grand-pupil of Jayasimhasuri who wrote the works, Nyayasara-tika, a new grammar, and a kavya called Kumarapalacharita in ten cantos. Nayachandra calls himself a successor of Jayasimhasuri on poetic merits. He was a skilled poet in six languages. He styles himself as a second Amarachandra, the celebrated author of Padmanandamahakavya (13th century). He claims that his poetry possesses both the 'lalitya' (grace) of Amarchandra and the 'vakrima' (obliquity) of Shriharsha. Although a Jain, his mangala verses in the Hammira-kavya are applicable to both Jain and Hindu deities, and the Nandi of Rambhamanjari invokes Vishnu as Varaha.

V.M.K.

NAYADHAMMAKAHAO (Prakrit and Apabhramsha). In the canonical tradition of Jaina literature eleven angas (sacred books) are prominent. Among them the sixth one is Nayadhammakahao (NDK). The Sanskrit version of NDK is Jnatadharmakatha (JDK). The commentators of this canon have clarified that Jnatadharmakatha tells religious stories through examples and precedents. 'Jnata' was the name of the race of Lord Mahavira, and hence he was known as Jnataputra (Nayaputta), son of Jnata. Therefore, some scholars are of the view that since the book contains religious stories about Lord Mahavira, it is called Nayadharmakahao. But it could have been named Nayadharmakahao because the subject and the presentation of the book are example-dominated.

This canon is in two volumes. The first volume consists of 21 chapters containing original stories. Most of the tales are type-stories, explaining some parables.

Volume II is a complete contrast to Volume I in both form and content. It has ten parts, having 206 small chapters. The story of the goddess Kali has some significance. The stories of NDK are in prose. Its language is Ardhamagadhi Prakrit. On the basis of its subject-matter, prose style and language, one may say that it was compiled around 100 B.C. So far as we know, Nayadharmakahao was published first in 1881 at Leipzig. Since then there have been several editions. The book has been translated into Sanskrit, Gujarati, Hindi and other languages also. Its English and German translations have also been published

The stories represent the narrative literature of India. It contains a variety of narrations. The story of Megha Kumar inspires us because of its brilliant characterization. The story of Dhana, a sarthavah, and Vijay, a thief, are symbolic stories. The story of Nanda Manikar presents the finest example of social service. The story of Rohini stresses the importance of diligence in which a wealthy merchant places the entire management of his large household in the hands of his fourth daughter-in-law because she is diligent and wise.

Nayadharmakahao can be called a representative book of animal stories also. We find here elephant, horse rabbit, tortoise, peacock, frog, jackal, etc. presented as characters. One story deals with the out break of fire in a forest. All the animals and birds assembled in a field for shelter. The place was so crowded that a rabbit could not find any room for itself. An elephant, called Meruprabha, accidentally lifted one of his legs to scratch his body. The rabbit got into the spot vacated by the elephant's foot. When the elephant saw this, he kept his leg raised so as not to hurt the rabbit. After three days the fire was extinguished and all the animals left the field, but the elephant died of pain in his leg. There is hardly a parallel to this story in world literature which teaches us a lesson in self-sacrifice and non-violence.

In this book there are lively stories which uphold the glory and sacrifice of women as well. We learn from the story of princess Malli that she was as beautiful as she was wise. She restrained the kings of different states from the path of violence, and diverted their minds from worldly attachment to spiritual practice. Winternitz rightly says about this book, "Side by side with legends and parables of this nature, we also encounter regular novels, tales of travellers' adventures, mariners' fairy-tales, robber-tales and the like, in which the parable only appears in the form of a moral, clumsily tacked on to the end." Nayadharmakahao is an important work not only from the point of view of rhetoric or narrative literature, but also because it throws light on contemporary society and the arts and architecture of ancient India.

P.S.J.

NAYAK, AMRUT KESHAV (Gujarati, b. 1877, d. 1907) was a writer and an actor. His contribution to the theatre in the last decade of the nineteenth and the first decade of the twentieth century was significant. He was born in the community of Torgalas, which is famous for its close association with Bhavai—a folk drama of Gujarat. He was initially associated with the Urdu theatre of the Parsis, and though his mother tongue was Gujarati he earned a high reputation as a Urdu drama actor. The plays in which he acted were adaptations from the plays of Shakespeare, Moliere and other well-known dramatists of the West. He played various male and female roles. He was associated with two Urdu dramatic companies, Alfred Theatrical Company and Madan Theatres Ltd. Then he switched on to the Gujarati theatrical company, called Deshi Natak Samaj. There he played leading male and female roles. He was also a melodious singer and his songs became very popular.

He wrote a novel, M.A. banake kyon meri mitti kharab ki (Why did you spoil my life by making me do my M.A.). It is a satire on the system of education of the time which alienates a person from his clan, because an inflated ego is generated in him leading him to think of himself as superior to all those around him. The novel was a posthumous publication, and it ran into several editions. The novel is autobiographical in style; the hero does not get a job and is looked down upon by common people. He narrates the story of his life in such a manner that he immediately wins the sympathy of the readers.

C.M.

NAYAK, BINODCHANDRA (Oriya; b. 1919) is one of the eminent and popular Oriya poets and also an educationist. He did his M.A. in English language and literature from Patna University and also in Oriya language and literature from Utkal University. He taught Oriya in different colleges and worked for many years as Secretary of the Orissa Sahitya Academy, the Orissa Sangeet Natak Academy and the Orissa Lalit Kala Academy. He is now Principal of Brajrajnagar N.A.C. College in the district of Sambalpur in Orissa.

He is predominantly a romantic poet. He is an erudite scholar and has a broad outlook. He uses images of distant lands and people, which are unique in modern Oriya poetry. His style, though ornate, is lucid and spontaneous. He writes mainly free verse. His prose-poems are rich in their suggestiveness. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1970 for his collection of poems, Sarisrupa (The reptiles). Among his other collections are Haimanti (Early winter, 1933), Nilachandrara upatyaka (The valley of the blue moon, 1951), Nandadevi (1960), Sata tarara dipa (The lamp of seven stars, 1961), Ilabritta (1970), Pohala dwipara upakatha (The episode of the coral island, 1973) and Anya eka asarpi (Another gold coin, 1977). Some of his selected poems have been published in Hindi, Bengali, Assamese and English translations. His only verse-drama Chandra o tara (The moon and the stars, 1950) is a fine piece of work. He has also tried his hand at writing some literary essays and criticism.

NAYAK, CHHOTUBHAI RANCHODAJI (Gujarati; b. 1913, d. 1976), a Persian scholar, was born at Paradi in South Gujarat. He took his M.A. degree in Persian in 1937 from the M.S. University, Baroda. He wrote his Ph.D. dissertation on 'Abdur Rahim Khane-e-Khanan and His Literary Circle'. In 1964 he was appointed Reader in the University of Gujarat. He was honoured by the Government of India for his researches in Persian.

He mainly concentrated on the influence of Persian language and literature on Gujarati, and his book Gujarati par Arabi Farsini asar (1954-1955), which is in two parts, is considered a standard book on the subject. He also catalogued Persian and Arabic manuscripts in the library of Gujarat Vidyasabha, Ahmedabad. His book, Sufimat (1959), is also well-known. He edited a dictionary of common Persian words in Gujarati.

work Janapada swarupa. A master of lively, lucid and persuasive prose, he has a lovely collection of essays woven round a little child, Namma maneya deepa, to his credit as well as collections of reflective essays. He has made a name as a columnist and his contributions have been brought out in a book form.

As Director of the Institute of Kannada Studies, Nayak steered several important projects, including the Kannada vishwakosha (Kannada encyclopaedia). He was President of the Karnataka Sahitya Academy and a member of the Executive Committee of the Sahitya Akademi; he has also been associated with several institutions like the National Book Trust and the Bharatiya Jnanpith. He has received the State Award and the Karnataka Sahtiya Academy Award for his services to Kannada. His works in Kannada include—Stories, sketches and essays: Balnotagalu, Haavu mathu Hennu, Namma Maneya Deepa, Soolangi; Literary criticism and literary essays: Janapada swarupa, Sahitya sallapa, Samputa, Sampada, Stavana, Sandarbha, Sankeerna, Sanchaya, Sangraha, Sameekshe, Samvada, Smarana; Reflective prose: Sallapa, Samparka, Samprata, Samvahana; Children's literature: Gurudeva Rabindraru Muhammad Paighambar; Biography: Rabindranath Thakur. His English works are Kannada: Literary and Colloquial and Kannada Literature: A Decade. Nayak received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1989) for his work Samprati.

NAYAK, RAMCHANDRA SHANKAR (Konkani; b. 1893, d. 1960) was a playwright. He obtained his Diploma of Escola Normal from Teachers' Training College (1912) and was appointed teacher in the same college (1922), and later a Sub-Inspector of primary schools (1923). He presided over the first Goa Marathi Educational Conference (1934). He was appointed Member of the Legislative Council (1934), Director of Teachers' Training College (1956), and honoured with the title 'Cavalheiro da Ordam da instrucao' (Knight of the Order of Education) in 1959 by the Portuguese Government in appreciation of his contribution in the field of education. He wrote in Portuguese, Marathi and Konkani. His Konkani one-act plays are extremely popular. They are Chavthicho chandra (Ganesh chaturthi moon, 1935), Raibarayali vhhaddik (Matchmaker's marriage, 1937), Damu kurado (1948), Ek hazar ani teis (One thousand and twenty-three, 1955), Ekaparas'ek hatti (One more obstinate than the other, 1956), Sonudadalo sounsar (Sonudada's family life, 1956), and Mhazo sargar aslolo gharkar (My late husband, 1956). Of these only the first two are original, while the others are skilful adaptations from Portuguese and German. He also adapted into Konkani Molière's Le Tartuffe as Mharaz (staged in 1961). Bhurgyamlo ved (Folk-tales for children, 1948) is a delightful collection of Goan tales. His dialogues are crisp and telling. He has a rare sense of humour and can invent a plot with skill.

D.K.S.

NAYAKA (Sanskrit) i.e. the hero (protagonist) is the principal male character of a play (or any literary piece). Literally, the 'leader' (from the Sanskrit root ni 'to lead') of the dramatis personae, the pivot of the actional-emotional-and plot structure of a play, he obtains, that is to say, he has a 'right' (adhikara) to the 'fruit' (phala; e.g. the heroine, if the play is erotic; victory, if heroic) of the principal action; hence, he is adhikarin, and the plot of the principal action is adhikarika vastu. It is his 'permanent mental state' (sthayibhava) that is sought to be depicted and developed in a play to the state of rasa. Conversely, he himself also can become the alambana vibhava i.e. determinant cause for the arousal of the sthayibhava either of the heroine or of the antagonist; therefore, he is the most important, the central character, of a play.

He, therefore, is supposed to possess the best of the human qualities such as shobha (handsomeness), likeability, vilasa (gracefulness of deportment), madhurya (sweetness), gambhirya (sobriety), dhairya (steadfastness), tejas (brilliance), lalitya (softness), audarya (magnanimity); also qualities like generosity, piety, aristocracy, valour, wisdom, cleverness, self-confidence, taste for arts, youthfulness, tact, enthusiasm, etc.

Nayaka is one of the three characteristics demarcating the type of the classical play, the other two being vastu (plot) and rasa. Thus, a nataka has a renowned and novel hero of Kshatriya class, prakarana has a minister or a merchant or a brahmin for hero; ihamriga has one divine hero, whereas samavakara has 12 haughty divine males. Dima also has 16 renowned and magnanimous heroes. Vyayoga may have a divine character or a king as hero. Anka has ordinary persons, vithi has one or two actors, all heroes; the comic-type prahasana may have a sage, an ascetic or a brahmin, while bawdy bhana has Vita (a romantic, gay, bastard, parasite) as hero. The heroes thus cover a wide range of social strata from gods and kings to commoners. Vitas, ascetics and others are accommodated in different types of the plays in accordance with their social contexts.

The classification of nayaka into uttama (noble), madhyama (commoner) and adhama (low) or into sattvika, rajasa and tamasa is based on their nature. A fourfold classification into dhirodatta, dhiroddhata, dhiralalita and dhira-prashanta is the standard one accepted unanimously by all classical works of Sanskrit dramaturgy and is more fundamental, being based on the hero's general disposition and his acquittal towards the situations, revealing his inclinations in his speech, actions, thoughts and emotions. Bhoja even connects these with the four ends of life, viz. dharma, artha, kama and moksha respectively.

Another classification is according to the hero's attitude towards the heroine in the erotic plays as anukula (agreeable), faithful or monogamous, dakshina (clever) in discreetly and decently managing more than one affair, shatha (unfaithful and deceitful) or dhrishtha (openly and boldly unfaithful). The last three types were also quite familiar in a society which accepted polygamy as common, particularly in the royal and elite circles, without raising an eyebrow. An erotic hero may either be a pati a (husband), or an upapati (paramour) or a vaishika (one visiting many harlots).

Upanayaka is the hero of the subsidiary episode (pataka) like Aryaka in Mrichchhakatika. When he is also a friend and assistant of the hero (but not vidushaka, 'jester') he is called pithamarda, such as Makaranda in Malatimadhava.

Pratinayaka is the antagonist, like Ravana in Mahaviracharita or Shakara in Mrichchhakatika.

NAYAKA RAGHUNATHA (Telugu; b. 1575, d. 1630) was an eminent Telugu King-poet. A profound scholar and powerful poet, both in Telugu and in Sanskrit, he was a great patron of arts and letters. For composing Parijatapaharana kavya extempore in six hours, he was honoured by his father, Achyuta Nayaka, with Kanakabhisheka (a bath of gold) in his early days. He held his court in Vijaya Vilasa which he built in the memory of his great victory at Topur in 1616. Author of two treatises on music in Sanskrit, he invented a vina, called Raghunatha vina, after him. His extant works are Valmiki charitram, Nalacharitram, Raghunatha Ramayanam and Savitri.

NAYAKABHUDAYA (Telugu). The word 'abhyudaya' means progress, birth, prosperity, etc. in Sanskrit. Now-a-days, in Telugu, it signifies progress in the Marxist sense only. Though there have been kavyas whose names end in 'abhyudaya', like Yadavabhyudaya of Vedanta Desika, or Achyutabhyudaya of Rajanatha Dindima, depicting the fortunes of a clan or a hero, the credit for introducing such kavyas into Telugu goes to Raghunatha Nayaka of Tanjore. Ayyalaraju's Ramabhyudaya was there, no doubt, before him, but it was only a translation of the Sanskrit work of that name by Saluva Narasimha. Achyutabhyudaya written in dwipada metre by him in honour of his own father was the real trend-setter. The term Nayakabhyudaya means a poetic biography of a Nayaka king. These kavyas are to be treated as a sub-class among 'abhyudaya kavyas' that flooded the 18th century and later literature. Raghunathabhyudaya written in couplets by Vijayaraghava Nayaka in honour of his father in couplets and Vijayaraghavanayakabhyudaya of Mannaru Deva belong to this class. Of these Raghunathabhyudaya alone survives, though not in full, and throws a lot of light on the manners and morals of those days.

NAYAKUMARACHARIU or NAGAKUMARACHARITAM (Apabhramsha) is a biographical work of the tenth century relating to Nagakumara, recognised by the Jain tradition as one of the 24 cupids. He is said to have obtained his personal charm and heroism by observing a fast in his previous birth. The book is composed by Pushpadanta, a Digambara Jain monk, in the Apabhramsha language. It has 9 'sandhis' (cantos) each having, on an average, 15 'kadavakas' (paragraphs or units), consisting of 10 to 15 verses each. 'Alillaha', 'pajjhatika', 'padakulaka', 'dvipadi', 'chaupaia', etc., are the main metres employed in it.

The story moves in the feudalistic atmosphere of overlordship, vassalry, polygamy, battles for territorial extension, and martial as well as marital alliances.

King Jayandhara with his queen Vishalanetra and son Shridhara rules at Kanakapura (Magadha). Once he happens to see the portrait of princess Prithvidevi of Girinagar, gets enamoured of her beauty and marries her. She gives birth to a male child. On an occasion of Jina-worship the child slips down from the hands of the nurse into a temple-well. But, as if by a miracle, the child is held back by a Nagaraja (serpent), who adopts him, brings him up, and trains him in statecraft. So he is named Nagakumara, and later entrusted back to his father. He wins the hearts of Kinnari and Manohari, two lute players, and marries them. Vishalanetra grows jealous of Prithvidevi and Nagakumara. She tries to humiliate them, but does not succeed in her plans. On one occasion the king seizes all the ornaments of Prithvidevi due to Vishalanetra's effrontery, but Nagakumara proves his skill in the game of dice and secures their release. He further shows his skill in subduing a turbulent horse and a wild elephant. Shridhara becomes jealous of the increasing prowess of Nagakumara. He finds his chances of kingship jeopardised, and plans to kill Nagakumara with the help of hirelings, but he is unsuccessful. To avoid fratricidal war Nagakumara leaves the country on the advice of his father.

He moves from place to place all over Bharatadesha, helps kings, chieftains and Vidyadharas, and emerges as a saviour. He rescues princesses who are forcibly confined by despotic rulers and wins their hearts, and vanquishes some others by playing tabor and lute, and finally he marries them all. He acquires knowledge from a Vidyadhara chief and a deity. Various chieftains accept him as their master. He restores ancient kingdoms to the princes in exile and subdues tyrant rulers. Finally, he goes to Tribhuvanatilaka-nagar and marries princess Lakshmimati who wins his deepest love. On enquiry from a monk he is told that his unbounded love for her was due to the fact that in his previous life too she was his wife and that he had successfully performed the fast of Shrutapanchami in that life.

Ultimately, minister Nayandhara comes from Kanakpura, takes Nagakumara home where he is crowned by his father. After enjoying worldly pleasures for a long time he takes to asceticism and attains salvation.

The poet portrays the patience, loyalty, courage and valour of the hero. He successfully handles the narrative with poetic descriptions, and delineates the sentiment of heroism nourished and augmented by erotic sentiments. The sentiment of the marvellous is not lacking due to miracles, and finally the story ends in quietude. For poetic embellishment the poet has drawn upon many sources: the Aryan mythology, history, his own observation of nature and human experience. The work shows elegance and ornamentation and is full of alliterations, striking similes and metaphors, puns and paronomasias, as well as delightful conceits. Being a Jain work, it also contains discourses on the tenets of Jainism. There are references and comments on various Hindu and Buddhist schools and doctrines too.

Various works on this theme are available in classical languages, modern vernaculars and the Dravidian languages.

NAYANMARS (Tamil), 63 in number, are the distinguished devotees of Lord Shiva in the Tamil canon. Their stories and miracles and the great glory of Shiva form the subject-matter of the Periyapuranam by Sekkilar of the 12th century.

Along with Sekkilar's Periyapuranam, the poetic rhapsodies of some of these 63 saints are collected together an referred to as 12 Tirumurais. The first three of the Nayanmars—Tirugnanasambandar, Appar and Sundarar—are the authors of the first seven books of Tirumurai, collectively known as 'Devaram'. Manikkavachagar is responsible for two celebrated works in the Tirumurai: Tiruvachakam, an eloquent praise of Shiva in lyrical terms, and Tirukkovaiyar, a long mystical song. Apart from these four who are great contributors to the Tamil Shaiva tradition, later books of the Tirumarai contain Tirumandiram, a considerably mystifying but expressive book of poems and the songs of Karaikkal Ammaiyar, a notable woman poet of the tradition. Sekkilar who compiled these eleven Tirumurais added his own composition about the lives and legends connected with the 63 Nayanmars, placing it at the end of the Tirumurais as the twelvth book, finalising the Shaiva tradition in the Tamil country.

Neither the Periyapuranam of Sekkilar nor the Tirumurais are conceived in a chronological order. They were brought together somehow and were codified. Thus Manikkavachagar, whose two works find a place in the eighth Tirumurai, was considerably older than the three Devaram hymnists and perhaps even a better poet from certain points of view. Tirumular, apart from belonging to the Shaiva tradition, is said to have started the 'siddha' tradition, and he is as considerable a poet as Manikkavachagar. It is not necessary to name all the sixty-three saints, but we can rapidly go over the lives through legends attached to them.

The Shaivite and Vaishnavite devotional cults took shape and substance during the period when the great temples of South India were rising all over the land, under the patronage of the Chola, Pandya and Pallava kings. Most of these Nayanmars have historical associations; some of them were ministers or captains of armies under their rulers or persons who converted a local ruler from his predilection for Buddhism or Jainism. Though legends have grown around them, they are not mere figures of legend but real living persons. Taking them in the order in which the Tirumurais present them, some of the salient features of their lives and times could be set forth as follows, but the most notable point is that they lived to the greater glory of Shiva.

Tabulating the Tirumurais by their author-poets, we have Tirugnanasambandar as the author of the first three Tirumurais; Tirunavukkarasar as the author of the next three. Sundarar's hymns are contained in the seventh Tirumurai. The eighth consists of Manikkavachagar's Tiruvachakam and Tirukkovaiyar. The ninth Tirumurai consists of various poems of Sundarar and others. The tenth Tirumurai consists of Tirumular's Tirumandiram. The eleventh Tirumurai consists of Karaikkal Ammaiyar's poems as well as of some others. The twelfth and final Tirumurai consists of Sekkilar's Periyapuranam.

Sekkilar's service lay in bringing together a collective tradition of Shaivite hymns that made the future course of Shaivism in Tamilnadu possible. Like the Devaram and Tiruvachakam poets, he had a considerable following and many of the stories and legends he recorded inspired the lives of generations of men.

Now for the authors of the hymns, and the hymns themselves. Tirugnanasambandar was the child-saint of the tradition. His pilgrimage seems to have started almost at the stage of infancy. Legend credits him with having been carried from place to place by his father on his shoulders. Wherever he went, he is said to have performed miracles. He is said to have lived only for sixteen years. But within these sixteen years, he is said to have sung 16,000 sequences of ten verses each, of which only 384 sequences have survived. By general consensus he is said to have belonged to the middle of the seventh century.

The time of Tirunavukkarasar was a generation before Tirugnanasambandar, perhaps the first quarter of the seventh century. His life, too, is associated with many miracles and with many temples and shrines. Tradition credits him with having composed 4900 hymn sequences, of which only 312 are extant today.

Sundarar, the third of the trio of Devaram, came a century later, towards the end of the eighth century. He is said to have sung by tradition 38,000 hymns of which only 100 are available today.

Manikkavachagar, before he became a wandering Shaiva saint, seems to have been the minister of a Pandya king. Considerably more of a poet than the previous three and no less a devotee, Manikkavachagar is not credited with an unbelievable number of hymns—his total output is a modest 656 verses in Tiruvachakam under 51 headings and 400 verses in Tirukkovaiyar. He belonged to an age prior to the other three poets, though his date is not yet fully established.

The ninth Tirumurai consists of nine poets, including Sendan, Karurthevar and others. But the tenth Tirumurai contains the work of Tirumular who is said to start the Siddha tradition in Tamil. Terse in expression, often mystical and metaphysical, Tirumular is, along with Manikkavachagar and Ilanko Adigal, one of the great poets of the Tamil tradition. His book as we have it consists of more than 3000 verses, but he claims to have written verses at the rate of one a year, living for three thousand years. He is placed somewhere in time between the author of Tiruvachakam and the three authors of the Devaram—perhaps the later part of the sixth century. A great saint-poet, he sang:

> "Seek a Guru who will remove your blindness;
> If you do not have a guru who will remove your blindness.
> You will be like the blind being led by the blind
> Till both fall into the pit with no redemption."

Tirumular touches rare psychological depths in his poems, but unfortunately in a number of his poems he succeeds in concealing his meaning, being inclined to tantra and siddha lore.

The eleventh Tirumurai consists of forty texts attributed to over twelve poets who are named. But the most outstanding of the poets included in this Tirumurai is Karaikkal Ammaiyar, the only woman poet of the early Shaiva tradition. Her output is small, consisting of only 143 poems but they are consistently of a great poetic quality, thus earning for her a place beside the great poets of the Tamil tradition. Addressing the divine dancer, she says:

> If you lift up your head the sky will be rent;
> If you move your legs the dimensions will yield;
> If you stretch your arms the boundaries will vanish.
> Oh dance with discretion; you occupy a stage much too small.

Karaikkal Ammaiyar was slightly anterior to Tirugnanasambandar in time; perhaps she lived in the early seventh century or late sixth century.

Now we come to the originator of the Tirumurai idea, the perpetuation of the Shaiva tradition in 63 Nayanmars–Sekkilar himself. He was very much of a historical person and his life is more or less well recorded, for he was a minister in the court of Kulotunga Chola who ruled from 1123 to 1148. He codified the Shaiva traditional works and composed his own magnum opus in Chidambaram, though he was inclined to think of another Shiva temple, that at Tiruvarur, as the centre of the world. Though he sang equally of all the 63 Nayanmars, his hero was undoubtedly Tirugnanasambandar about whom he gave many historical details which help to fix his date. His Periyapuranam has been for over eight centuries a source book of inspiration for the devout—not only for religious but for artistic expression in song, drama and other forms of literature. Tirunilakantar, Ilamaiyakkinar, Nandanar, Siruthondar and other saints—in fact, almost all of them are household names in Tamilnadu. Both in codifying the previous devotional output and in adding to it by his Periyapuranam, Sekkilar did a yeoman's service to the cause of Shiva devotion.

One of the characteristics of devotional literature as it was taking shape among the Tamils was the view that not only devotion to Lord Shiva was important but that devotion should be shown to the recognisable devotees of Lord Shiva. It is in this sense that the idea of the Nayanmars found a place in the worship of the people. Some of them were great poets; a few were given to acts of devotion only and did not at all compose poems; but all of them were distinguished by their devotion. By singing of them at length, Sekkilar gave them a permanent place in the Shiva pantheon of the Tamils and in the memory of the people. It generated a living creed, a religion of faith that was as powerful as the faith in Lord Shiva himself. And this was the single-handed creation of Sekkilar who, by all accounts, was a successful minister of a successful ruler of the land.

Numerous are the editions of the Devaram, and the South India Shaiva Siddhanta Printing Works Ltd., Madras, has kept most of the works in circulation and print for well over half a century now.

NAYAR, S.K. (Malayalam; b. 1917, d. 1987) was a Malayalam scholar and professor. After taking his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees from Madras University, he worked as a lecturer in various colleges. In 1947, he became Reader in Malayalam in Madras University where, in 1952, he became Head of the Department of Malayalam. After retiring from Madras University he became a Visiting Professor in the Malayalam Department of Kerala University during the year 1981-82. He has written more than thirty books. His field of specialization is Kathakali. He is known mainly as critic and translator. Keralattile natoti natakangal, Samskarakedaram, Narmasallapam, Vicharamanjari, Bhashavrittamanjari and Ayyappan are some of his important works.

NAYASENA (Kannada; b. 12th century) was a noted poet who lived in Mulugunda area in Karnataka. He was a Jaina monk. He composed his Dharmamrita in 1112. This poem, in the form of 'champu', occupies an outstanding place in the history of Kannada literature.

Dharmamrita unfolds itself through fourteen 'ashvasas', each narrating a story. In other words, it is a compilation of fourteen stories aiming at bringing out the significance of Jainism. Each story unfolds a principle of that religion.

In general, champu compositions are complex in structure and only the elite readers are able to appreciate the niceties of such poems. But Dharmamrita has the common man in view and speaks out in as simple terms as possible. Native Kannada words are abundant throughout the poem, seldom giving any scope to the Sanskrit vocabulary. Even when Sanskrit is brought into use, care is taken to make it palatable for all categories of readers. Nayasena vigorously protests against the admixture of Sanskrit and Kannada words. We may quote his own way of prohibiting such use: "To say anything in Sanskrit, let it be in Sanskrit only, but Sanskrit should not be brought in while using pure Kannada, for then it would be like mixing 'ghee' with oil." This protest is of historical importance in Kannada literature.

Nayasena's art of narrating stories is rather interesting. He copiously makes use of popular proverbs and idioms. His art provides us with bountiful picturesque descriptions drawn from contemporary life. This gives somewhat a folk-character to the poem, though it is in conventional champu. Nayasena seems to be fond of illustrating things with a number of similes. His poem is an outstanding example of 'malopama', i.e. a string of similes.

The poet is well-known for his witty and satirical expressions as well. He often ridicules the Vedic religion. However, his derision is more amusing than offending.

The 12th century is an important phase in Kannada literature. It was during those days that the Virashaiva saints brought in a fresh outlook on religion and society, which was reflected in literature also. Nayasena's work seems to have anticipated that revolution. His contribution towards the development of Kannada prose is also remarkable.

NAYASUNDAR, VACHAK (Gujarati; 16th-17th century), a disciple of Bhanumerugani, who was himself a disciple of the Jain monk, Dhanratnasuri of Vadtapgachchha, was a composer of many 'rāsas' and 'stories'.

Among his works, mention may be made of Yashodhar nrup chopai (1562), Roopkunwar ras (1581), Shatrunjayatirthoddhar ras (1582), Prabhavati ras (1584), Sursundari ras (1590), Nala-Damayanti ras (1609), Girnar uddhar ras, Sheel shiksha (1613). All these are rās compositions based on either religious or historical characters or even on imaginary characters. Besides them, he also wrote Atmapratibodh stavan kavya in 83 stanzas, Shankheshwar-Parshwanath-stavan (1600), Shantinath stavan in 64 stanzas, Simandhar Jin stavan in 35 stanzas (1629) and Sthulibhadra stavan in 21 stanzas.

Nayasundar occupies an important place as an author of ras compositions in medieval Gujarati literature. The Nala-Damayanti ras, with 2400 stanzas and based on the Sanskrit epic Nalayan by Manikyadevsuri, is considered significant. In this ras, the narrative is presented in a very effective manner through description. There are also intermittent translations of epigrams and maxims from Sanskrit, Prakrit, Hindi and Persian, which reflect the writer's profound knowledge of many languages. The profusion of figures of speech in descriptions and an easy flow of language characterize his poetic genius. Roopchandkunwar ras is based on folklore. The narrative is divided into six parts, and is an independent creation of the writer, though many of its episodes are borrowed from other stories prevalent in those days. Many plots and sub-plots are interwoven here, and miracles have a free play besides erotic descriptions.

NAZIM, ABDUL AHAD (Kashmiri; b. 1807, d. 1865), also known as Waiz Shah Nur-ud-Din, was a famous Kashmiri poet. He was born in Pir and Waiz (preachers of Islam) family. He was buried near the gate of the tomb of Baba Nasib-ud-Din Ghazi. He was taught Persian according to the educational system prevailing at that time. He composed a number of ghazals, naats (poems written in praise of Prophet Muhammad), satire and masnavi. His style of ghazals is lucid and romantic. The main themes of his ghazals are love and beauty. Although a very small number of his naats have come down to us, these are very popular with the Kashmiri Muslims. His masnavi (Zynularab) is a translation of 'Hikayat-i-Rabiya, daughter of kind Kab', taken from the book Ilahinama (Book of Allah) written by Farid-ud-Din Attar (1119-1229). It is a love story of one Zynularab (Rabiya) and Yaktash, a servant of her brother, Harith. After Harith comes to know of their love affair, he kills Yaktash. Nazim is the second satirist after Maqbul Shah Kralwari (1820-1876), but his language falls short of the norms of decency. He does not spare even his relatives and friends in his satirical verses.

G.N.N.

NAZIR A'ḥMAD (Urdu; b. 1836, d. 1912), one of the masters of Urdu prose, was born in a small village, Rehar, in the district of Bijnor in Uttar Pradesh. His father, Maulvi Saadat Ali, belonged to a learned and religious family. After having his first lessons in Persian and Arabic from his father, Nazir went to Delhi and was offered a scholarship in Delhi College, one of the first educational institutions established by the British in north India. Nazir Ahmad completed his education from this college.

He started his career as a teacher in Punjab, but was soon promoted to the post of Deputy Inspector of Schools and was posted at Kanpur. During this period, the first War of Independence in 1857 broke out. He left Kanpur and joined his family in Delhi. Throughout this troubled period, he lived in Delhi. After the restoration of peace, he again took up his job as Deputy Inspector of Schools in Allahabad. He had already learned English and had started translating English books into Urdu which included The Income Tax Act and The Indian Penal Code. His superiors, who were Englishmen, were impressed by his talent and ability. Soon he was appointed a Tahsildar and then in 1863 a Deputy Collector. His reputation as a writer spread to other regions also. In 1877, the Nizam government of Hyderabad offered him a prestigious post in the revenue department in Hyderabad. In this new job also he acquitted himself with distinction. He died in Delhi.

Nazir Ahmad was a master story-teller. He was the first to introduce realistic fiction in Urdu. Muhammad Sadiq writes about his early works: "Before Nazir Ahmad there had been no novels as such in Urdu." The first English story which had definite influence on him was 'The history of Sandford and Merton' by Thomas Day, and his Binatun nash is modelled on it. The plot of Taubatun nasuh (a novel) is taken from Defoe's Family Instructor, Part I.

He wrote several novels in social reform series. The first of the series was Miratul urus (The bride's mirror) published in 1869. The other important ones were Fasanai Mubtala (The story of Mubtala, 1885), Ibnul waqt (The time server, 1888), Ayama (1891) and Royae sadiqa (The dream with truth, 1894). Many of his novels, such as Miratul urus and Taubatun nasuh, were translated into Gujarati and Hindi. Apart from his contribution as a novelist, the credit of translating The Holy Quran in idiomatic and simple Urdu also goes to Nazir Ahmed.

Q.R.

NAZIR AKBARABADI (Hindi/Urdu/b; 1735, d. 1830) was a people's poet in the real sense of the term. He was a typical product of his age—the age of synthesis, of unity of thought between Hindu and Islamic mysticism. He was influenced by Sufism and the Bhakti movement. He was a poet in the mould of Kabir and Nanak. He also wrote ghazals, but is best known for his lyrics. His love of the common people inspired him. By exploring new fields of thrill in the everyday life of the masses, he blazed a new trail of writing in contemporary poetry. His early experiences in life led him to believe that demagogy, which passed for skilled poetry, was beyond the comprehension of common man. He was content to write about the joys and sorrows of everyday life, and this trait made him greatly popular with the people. This trait of Akbarabadi can also be seen abundantly in all his works both in Hindi and in Urdu; the two languages can make equal claim on him. He knew eight languages and was fond of calligraphy. He was a modest man. Writing about himself, he said he was 'a poor teacher... some mastery of Persian... writing poetry a hobby'.

According to the famous French Orientalist, Garcin de Tassy, the first collection of Nazir Akbarabadi's poems was published in the Devanagari script in 1820. The book was of 42 pages and the portrait of the poet was printed on the title page.

Nazir wrote about mundane subjects and was a secular poet. He was a lyricist and a keen poet of nature, but more than that he was a poet of man, deeply touched by the life around him. In his Muflisi ka falsafa (Philosophy of poverty), he displays an understanding of the economic system that governed the then society. He was a champion of the down-trodden and advocated their case forcefully through his poems. And in this he was a revolutionary.

His Indianness and his love of mother earth are reflected in a number of his lyrics and in his knowledge and understanding of the folklore. He wrote, indeed, about earthy things and was a harbinger of fresh air in Hindi poetry.

A number of his poems such as 'Banjaranama', 'Rotinama', 'Admi nama', and his lyrics on Holi, Diwali etc. became a rage with minstrels and mendicants, who travelled far and wide and sang them to the people.

(Urdu). Eminent poet, Wali Muhammad Nazir Akbarabadi was born in Delhi and was the 13th child of his father, Muhammad Faruq, who was married to the daughter of Nawab Sultan Khan, Qaladar of Agra. After the attacks of Nadir Shah and Ahmad Shah Abdali on Delhi, the family migrated to Agra and settled there near Nuri Darwaza. Nazir was married to a grand-daughter of a military officer from Delhi where he settled down in Mohalla Tajganj. Throughout his life, he was a private tutor by profession, and despite tempting offers from the courts of Bharatpur and Lucknow, he refused to leave Agra, where he served as tutor of the children of Nawab Muhammad Ali Khan, the Bhau Qaladar of Agra, and the six children of Raja Bilas Rai. He lived to the ripe age of 95 years and died in Agra.

Nazir Akbarabadi was a unique poet in more than one respect. He was never associated with any royal court. He stayed away from major centres of Urdu poetry and patronage at that time. He freely mingled with the common people and wrote compact poems on themes connected with their daily life. He adopted radiant common sense as the sheet anchor of his philosophy of life and did not don the mantle of a preacher or a mystic.

Though Nazir wrote innumerable ghazals and compiled his Diwan, his main poetic contribution lies elsewhere. He was one of the few poets who wrote compact poems on various themes taken from life. His poems composed in the form of four, six or eight-line stanza patterns are noteworthy not only because of their thematic uniformity, but also for their deep involvement in the life around.

Nazir was the first real democrat of Urdu poetry. Deeply immersed in the life of the people, he identified himself with them so completely that the topics of their interest, similes and metaphors of their liking and the experiences of their everyday life found spontaneous expression in his poems. He was inspired by objects like bread, earthen utensils, paisa, and themes like poverty, old age, death, childhood, scenes of rainy season, winter and the mystery of life.

Being a thoroughly gregarious soul, he enjoyed life without losing sight of its toil and trouble. He took delight in joining the masses in all the festivals and meals, and wrote poems with lilting tunes on Holi, Diwali, Shab-i-barat, Baldeoji ka mela, the festival of swimming in the river Jamuna at Agra, eulogised Guru Nanak Dev, Lord Krishna, and paid homage to Hazrat Salim Chishti. He loved to be with his people and shared their joys and sorrows with the abandon of a poet and the philosophic insight of a savant.

Every aspect of the plebeian life interested him. He composed for the ordinary hawkers of the market and the sellers of water-melons and cucumbers. He wrote inspiring poems on the moving caravan of the 'banjaras' and saw in it the embodiment of human life and its transitoriness. He enjoyed life as it was, with its limitations and pitfalls, even the hurricane which took off in its swing the thatched roof of a mud hut, or the plight of the person who slipped on a muddy pathway in the rainy season.

Life for him was a spectacle which unfolded to the beholder the secrets of the universe. He was no philosopher to sit in judgement over the erring mortals or to deliberate upon the happenings of this planet, but was quite content to ponder like a common man on the mysteries of life as revealed through its varied phenomena.

He truly belonged to the tradition of poets like Kabir and Guru Nanak with, of course, the difference that he preached no new religion. His poetry is, in fact, free from any religious overtone, and emits secular aroma. He is a poet of home truths—simple, common, ordinary. He preaches no philosophy but depicts only a panorama of robust common-sense view of contemporary realities.

Nazir is, therefore, a poet different from the rest of his tribe. His poems give him a distinctive identity of being the first truly plebeian poet who sang of love and humanity in a simple, lucid, unorthodox style, and his poetry enriched Urdu literature with the wealth of a new and wider sensibility.

NAZKI, GHULAM RASUL (Kashmiri; b. 1909) had some modest schooling and worked as a teacher with the Department of Education. Subsequently he did his 'Munshi Aalim' and 'Adibi Kamil', after which he graduated in English. He edited the monthly Taelimi jadid published by the Department of Education for some time, and in 1948 left the Department and joined the All India Radio from where he retired as a Programme Executive. After his retirement, he was appointed editor of the Kashmiri weekly, Chaman, published by the Field Survey Organisation. Nazki is equally proficient in Persian and Urdu, besides his mother tongue. He wrote poetry of considerable merit in Urdu, and in 1953 shifted over to his mother tongue which he found apt and most congenial for the expression of his themes. He was a great admirer of the famous Urdu poet, Allama Iqbal, whose influence he always acknowledged. He wrote in all the established forms of Kashmiri poetry, but his most favourite form was 'rubai'. He was the first Kashmiri poet to adopt the classical genre of Persian poetry for the depiction of Kashmiri sensibility. The first collection of his rubais was entitled Namrudnama (1964). Nazki was a moralist and a passionate lover of Prophet Muhammad.

He published a collection of his Urdu poetry and also wrote a book in Persian on the famous Kashmiri poet, Gani Kashmiri. He was awarded the 'Robe of Honour' in 1924 by the Jammu and Kashmir Government.

NAZM (Kashmiri) is a word of Arabic orgin and appeared in Kashmiri literature as a poetic term, denoting a particular form of poetry, in the third decade of the 20th century, but the tradition of such compositions is almost six hundred years old in the Kashmiri language.

Nund Rishi (1377-1441) is the father of 'nazm' in Kashmiri. Most of his vatsuns have unity of thought-content and can be termed as the earliest specimens of nazm without any hesitation. Such vatsuns include the following poems which were deciphered four years back: 'Bar Khudaya pap nivar' (Great God, relieve me of the burden of misdeeds), 'Asal Hindu ta Mussalaman tana hekhna takia' (It is of no use to be a Hindu or Mussalman if one fails to understand the essence of reality), 'Tithuy mia var dito deva' (God! bestow on me such spiritual attainments), 'Yus kari gongul ta suy kari krav' (That man alone will reap who will till the land).

The nazms of Nund Rishi are no doubt an expression of his spiritual quest, but at the same time his compositions reflect the prevailing conditions of his times.

It is Prakash Ram (1819-1877) who attracts attention after Nund Rishi. Some of his compositions can be described as nazm. Of all his songs of this kind, the one composed to praise the advent of spring is marvellous in its diction and metaphor and rich in the quality of its music.

Two poems of Rehman Dar (d. 1897), namely 'Sheshi rang' (Six phases) and 'Manch tuller' (Honey-bee) are worthy of our notice. 'Sheshi rang' in particular is a nazm of great poetic value. In this poem the poet describes with skill the six phases of his spiritual journey. This poem ranks with the best compositions in Kashmiri poetry.

Through Parmananda (1791-1879) nazm became the vehicle of philosophical pondering and yogic experience. In his long poem 'Radha suyamvara', he proved himself to be a meritorious master of description. His remarkable poems include 'Amarnath yatra', 'Karma bhumika', 'Kulta t'say' and 'Sahaz vichari'.

Some of the compositions of Krishna Razdan (1850-1926) can be classed as perfect nazms. His poem 'Dal ma hosha' is a descriptive poem of merit and will always be remembered for its poetic grace and musical quality.

Abdul Ahad 'Azad' (1903-1948) and Ghulam Ahmad 'Mahjoor' (1885-1952) can be said to be the forerunners of real nazm in Kashmiri.

Azad in particular made nazm his vehicle of expression. He was the first poet who understood the potentiality of nazm. He is, in fact, a harbinger of a new trend in Kashmiri poetry. 'Dariyav' (The river), 'Panchadhar' (The cascade), 'Vanachyar' (Pine tree), 'Shama' (The lamp) are some of his notable poems. His poem 'Dariyav' is a work of great merit and is the best descriptive poem in Kashmiri literature.

Mahjoor, too, composed some nazms of merit. In his nazms we see stress on music rather than on thought 'Sonth' (Spring), 'Aazadi' (Freedom), 'Lukachar' (Childhood) and 'Shirwaniun khwab' (The dream of Shirwani) are some of his representative poems.

Nazms continued to be composed in traditional style up to 1947 when under the influence of the Progressive movement and the impact of Western literature, nazm took a new turn. Blank verse and free verse were introduced and nazm was freed from the inhibitions of tradition.

Dinanath 'Nadim' (1916-1988) brought new patterns in nazm. Nadim is the first poet to exploit the potential of nazm to every possible extent. He made new experiments in this field and influenced two generations of Kashmiri poets with his poetic vigour and calibre. His epoch-making poetic genius will be remembered for his nazm alone.

A. Rehman 'Rahi' (b. 1926) is another poet of repute in the field of nazm. He is a poet of modern sensibility, though in the earlier phase of his career he followed a progressive trend.

Other important contributors to the treasure of Kashmiri nazm include Abdul Sattar Ranjore (b. 1917), Ghulam Nabi Firaq (b. 1922), Arjandev 'Majbur' (b. 1922), Amin Kamil (b. 1924), Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' (b. 1934), Shiaz Muzaffar 'Azim' (b. 1935), Chamanlal 'Chaman' (b. 1936), Ghulam Nabi 'Khayal' (b. 1936), Makhanlal 'Kanwal' (b. 1936), Motilal 'Saqi' (1936), Muhammad Ahsan 'Ahsan' (b. 1937), Ayub 'Betab' (b. 1939), Rasul Pompur (b. 1940), Mohi-ud-Din Gauhar (b. 1941), A.G. 'Nadin' (b. 1942) and Aajar (b. 1946).

NAZM (SINDHI) — NECTAR IN A SIEVE

NAZM (Sindhi). The word 'nazm' is originally an Arabic word which literally means 'order, arrangement; string of pearls or beads'. Hence, in the literary parlour, it generally means 'a metrical composition, verse, poem', because in this form of composition, words are arranged according to various rules of metres. In this sense, it is an antonym of prose ('nasr'). The word 'nazm' in Sindhi is also used in its restricted meaning when it denotes a particular form of poetry written on one theme. The subject-matter in nazm presents an integrated picture and develops continuously in successive stanzas. Thus, from the thematic point of view, it is contradictory to the 'ghazal' form of poetry, which contains different thoughts in its stanzas. It is due to this fact that nazm always has a title denoting its central theme. Prosodically, there is no difference between nazm and ghazal, although the former has shown development of some new forms, mainly on account of the Western influence. There is no restriction to the length of nazm. It varies from two or three stanzas to more than a hundred stanzas.

In the later half of the 19th century, when Sindhi poetry was highly influenced by Persian poetry in content as well as in form, Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929) was, perhaps, the first poet to introduce nazm in Sindhi. He translated a number of English poems in Sindhi nazm following Persian prosody. During the early decades of the present century, Kishinchand Tirthdas Khatri 'Bevas' (1885-1947) composed many melodious short nazms on various socio-political topics and patriotic themes. He was followed by many young poets, such as Hundraj Dukhayal, Hari Dilgir and Ram Panjwani. During the forties, young progressive poets like Sheikh Ayaz, Sheikh Abdul Razaq 'Raz', Narayan 'Shyam' and Sugan Ahuja came in the field and contributed significantly to the growth of Sindhi nazm by introducing new themes, new poetic imagery and new techniques in form and rhythmic patterns. After Independence in India, the poets who contributed to the growth of nazm in Sindhi are Harumal Sadarangani 'Khadim', Arjun Mirchandani 'Shad', Arjun 'Hasid', M. Kamal, Khialdas Begwani 'Fani', Krishan 'Rahi', Ishwar 'Anchal' and Govardhan 'Bharati'.

Main types of nazm noticed in Sindhi are as follows:

(1) Metrical poems composed according to the rules of Persian prosody, containing one particular theme. (e.g., qasida, masnavi, qita, tarkib-band). It strictly follows prescribed patterns of metres, rhymes, stanzas, lines in each stanza and ending words in each line.

(2) A poem following the form and the prosodic rules of ghazal and having a single theme with its logical development and a title suggesting the central idea of the poem.

(3) 'Be-qaafiya' nazm: It has a metrical pattern, but no rhyme. It does not have a prescribed number of lines in each stanza. It is generally similar to blank verse in English.

(4) Azad nazm: It is similar to free verse in English. It has rhythmic pattern in each line created by metre which is not the same in each line. Lines may be small or long necessary for forceful expression of thought or emotion. It is not necessary to maintain rhyme-pattern in lines. Thus the poet has the freedom of using metre and rhyme.

(5) 'Nasriya' nazm (prose-poem): It is essentially a prose composition, having sentences at many places, but no metrical pattern. It is also called 'nazmano nasr (poetic-prose) in Sindhi. Rabindranath Tagore's work, Gardener, has been translated into Sindhi poetic prose by Mangharam Malkani (entitled Prit ja gita) and by Lalchand Jagtiani (entitled Sada gulab). In azad nazm and nasriya nazm, even though there is no binding of metre or rhyme, the success of the poet mainly depends upon selection and proper usage of words required for an effective expression of thought. It is through an assonance and internal rhythm of words appropriately associated with patterns of thought-content that the poet creates melodious impact in his composition.

In post-Independence India, Narayan 'Shyam' (1922-1989) occupies the first place among Sindhi poets due to his melodious nazm-poems and other forms of poetry. Depiction of nature, scenes from daily life, introduction of new techniques of expression, creation of melodious effect through proper selection of sweet words and extraordinary poetic imagery, are some of the main characteristics noticed in Narayan Shyam's poetry. He has ten collections of poems to his credit, some of which like Rupamaya (1955), Maak-bhina raabela (1964) and Aac-hhinde laj'a maran (1972) contain his nazm-poems.

M.K.J.

NECTAR IN A SIEVE (English), a novel by Kamala Markandaya first published in 1924 by John Day, London, has been included in Signet Classics (tenth printing, 1975) and has become almost a modern classic of Indo-English fiction. 'Author of the finest novel by an Indian I have ever read', wrote Orville Prescott in the New York Times, a view reflecting rather exaggerated praise. However, Nectar in a Sieve is an authentic story of Rukmani, a south Indian peasant woman, her deep love for her husband Nathan, and her trials and tribulations in rural India and its shifting society. The title, derived from Coleridge, 'work without hope draws nectar in a sieve/ And hope without an object cannot live' provides a meaningful metaphor to Rukmani's and Nathan's life experiences. Rukmani narrates her life-story beginning with her marriage to Nathan and her personal and familial difficulties are closely associated with agrarian and social problems. Rukmani and Nathan are tenants who till the land, but had no occasion to see the Zamindar. They only deal with Sivaji who is a humane person. Rukmani and Nathan get their daughter, Ira, married, and the problem of dowry of one hundred rupees troubles their minds. 'Nature is like a wild animal', says Rukmani, and, in consequence, 'the paddy was completely destroyed'. Ira is brought back home by her husband who says, 'she is a barren woman'. Rukmani's cup of misery slowly collects the drops of her daily misfortune. Their sons, Arjun and Thambi, help Nathan on the farm one day each week, the rest of the days they work at the tannery. The sons are attracted to the opportunity of working on tea plantations in Ceylon and they leave, bidding their parents a touching farewell. Rukmani's and Nathan's lives alternate between hope and fear, the twin forces that dominate the life of an Indian peasant. Ira sells her body to maintain herself and her parents. They move to the city, which rejects them. They work at a stone quarry and are robbed of their belongings in a temple. Nathan dies on his way back to the temple from the quarry. Rukmani is left with no option but to return to the village. Selvam, her adopted son, receives her. 'Thank God', he says, 'Are you all right?' But the memory of Nathan continues to vex Rukmani: 'The days went by, Nathan no longer beside me; no more. Ashes and dust, scattered to the winds, moistened by the rain, unrecognisable'.

Nectar in a Sieve is a realistic, down-to-earth, touching story of Rukmani and Nathan, and through them, of the trials of Indian peasantry. It may be compared with Venkataramani's Murugan the Tiller or even with Pearl Buck's novel, The Good Earth. It unfolds Rukmani's sufferings and sacrifice, but her heart is of gold. As the novel ends, we find Pulli and Ira trying to rebuild their fortunes out of the ashes of the old. Rukmani captures our heart by her courage and sacrifice, pain and isolation. She is a truly remarkable narrator-heroine of one of Markandaya's finest novels.

NEERAJ, GOPALDAS (Hindi; b. 1925). Born as Gopaldas Saksena in village Puravali, district Etawah, in Uttar Pradesh, he shed his surname with his advent on the stage of poetry and came to be known only as Neeraj. He lost his father at a very early age and had to struggle in life until he got a lecturer's secure job at Dharma Samaj College, Aligarh.

Significantly, Neeraj acquired reputation through the medium of poetic cencerts a la Bachchan on account of his husky, well-tuned voice, and he betrayed Bachchan's influence, especially that of Nisha nimantran, on his early poetic compositions. Although he published his first collection of poems in 1944 with a foreword by Babu Gulabrai, a well-known critic, he came into his own with the publication of his third book, Vibhavari. Since then he continues to be by far the most popular stage poet. His recitations have a touch of magic and he holds vast audiences spell-bound with his earthy imagery and day-to-day experiences communicated through an unembellished language.

The development process of Neeraj's poetry may well be divided into four stages. In stage one the main theme of his poetry was that of personal misery and gloom which attracted him towards the beautiful on the one hand and the disenchanted on the other. The second stage commences with the poems of Vibhavari, when he seems to develop a life-view of his own. He is now enamoured of beauty, love, and death. With stage three a new trend sets in with the lyrics of Prangit, especially in the later half of his collection. He is now drawn to the fourth essential truth—the truth of material life, of 'bread'. This stage of his poetic composition is naturally more realistic, inspired as it is by a sense of realisation of human misery spread all around.

His Do git, viz, 'mrityu git' (song of death) and 'jivan git' (song of life), represents, in fact, the two essential extremities of life and death. In 'jivan git' he propounds the eternity of life, but in 'mrityu git' he satirises the quest for eternity and portrays the agony of a dying man in a realistic manner.

It may be said to the credit of Neeraj that he never committed himself to any particular doctrine so as to be drawn away from the expression of his life-experience. He has not bartered his integrity for anything. On this point he expresses himself very lucidly in the following couplet:

Tum likho har bat chahe jis tarah chaho
Kavya ko par vad ka kangan na banane do

Amongst Neeraj's major collections of lyrics, apart from a critical assessment of Pant's poetry, the following may be mentioned: Sangharsh (1944), Antardhvani (1946), Vibhavari (1951), Prangit (1954), Likh likh bhejat pati (1956), Dard diya hai (1956), Badar baras gayo (1958), Nadi kinare (1958), Do git (1958), Asavari (1958), Git bhi agit bhi (1963), Phir deep jalega (1970).

Neeraj devoted almost a decade of his later poetic phase to the writing of film songs where he imparted a literary touch to them and established himself as a very successful lyricist in an industry that has no use for literary or poetic merits of songs. Later, he retired from there on his own, and now spends a quiet life at Aligarh.

After his education, he returned to India in 1912 to become an Advocate of Allahabad High Court. He was inspired by Gandhi's courageous example of leading 2,500

Indian labourers in a march from Natal to Transvaal in a non-violent protest against the South African Government in 1913, and in 1916 first met Gandhi at the Lucknow Congress, and was thereafter increasingly drawn into the Nationalist Movement. Imprisoned nine times, he served the longest term of 1041 days during 1942-45.

An artist and an intellectual, drawn to politics, he declared very early: 'I fear I am an ineffective politician at any time and I have no taste whatever for the variety of politics that has lately developed. That is my weakness.' Even if he had not become a political leader, it is arguable that Nehru would have been remembered for his Autobiography, Glimpses of World History and The Discovery of India.

His discovery of the real India, which is the central theme of his writings, and a powerful motivation behind his extensive travels throughout India and overseas, seems to have started in May 1920 when 200 peasants, who had gathered on the banks of the Yamuna in Allahabad, urged him to help them in their fight against landlords. Nehru's stay in the village brought home to him the reality of the other India: 'A new picture of India seemed to rise before me, naked, starving, crushed and utterly miserable. And their faith in us, casual visitors from a distant city, embarrassed me and filled me with a new responsibility that frightened me.'

In his agnostic sensibility, three strands, literature, history and science, are intertwined. While moved by legend and myth (see his invocation of the Ganges in his Will), he offers a rationalistic and not a religious or metaphysical view of India's past and present, or of the point where her past and her present intersect to illumine the future possibility. 'I cannot', he says in The Discovery of India, 'write about the present so long as I am not free to experience it through action.' And yet, paradoxically, most of his writing—Autobiography, Glimpses of World History and The Discovery of India—was done when the 'passage of the mind is all the easier in prison where action is denied and we become slaves to the routine of jail-life.'

Conscious of the ambiguous legacy of history (he cites Nietzsche's remark that 'Not only the wisdom of centuries—also their madness breaketh out in us'), and living a life of 'an alternation of huge crowds and intensive activity and loneliness', he sought fulfilment in a life of action and impersonal causes. As a humanist, he combined an abiding love of nature (in his writings perhaps the best passages are those which describe his reactions to nature), animals, and children with an unshakeable commitment to the higher causes such as an internationalism which grows 'out of national cultures and can only flourish... on the basis of freedom and equality', and to progress and economic prosperity which embraced all sections of society.

As an individual, he sought to live a unified life of thought and action, in which, like the Renaissance man, he could 'balance all'. He quotes with approval Tagore's remark that for our perfection we have to be 'vitally savage and mentally civilized'. Dr S. Radhakrishnan rightly described him as a 'Protean character', and Dr M.N. Roy remarked that Nehru gave 'his most impulsive reactions a rational background'.

Nehru's views on language are of a far-reaching significance. He perceived Hindustani as 'the common language of India' and felt that we should 'encourage' it 'to adapt and assimilate many words from English and other foreign languages', so that we can 'develop a middle language', as opposed to the too Sanskritized and the too Persianized extremes. Though he felt that the notion of English becoming the lingua franca of India had 'no relation to the problems of mass education and culture', we must continue the knowledge of English because it is the most widely used important world language. However, to this end he thought it 'desirable for us to undertake the teaching of Basic English on an extensive scale rather than Standard English, which can be left to specialists and particular students'. Nehru's views on the question of language, especially the use of Basic English are neither adequately thought out nor entirely tenable, but they reflect a concern with education in relation to the instruction of the young and to every aspect of life.

However, his own handling of the English language is so exemplary that some critics have remarked that, while Nehru's writings such as Glimpses of World History and The Discovery of India may not be 'better history' (in the sense of being scholarly, which inadequacy Nehru himself recognizes), they are certainly 'better English'. 'If in the future some Indian children are to learn English they will do well to insist that they are taught from these Glimpses rather than from Macaulay or from Gibbon'.

It is perhaps a personal or poetic vision of history, which distinguished Nehru as a writer. During his stay in various prisons between 1930 and 1933, he had written to Indira, his daughter, a series of letters to help her with her education; these were later published as Glimpses of World History. The epistolary style certainly gives it an air of 'intimate touches'. And Autobiography naturally has the format of a personal and family history. And so has The Discovery of India the excitement of a personal quest for meaning. But while Nehru can evoke the rise and fall of empires, the changing moods of nature, the slow impact of religion and ritual, the awakening of political consciousness, the unchanging assimilative and tolerant spirit of India, we don't get, even in his letters, a peep into the uncharted territory of his subconscious, as we do, for example, in Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth. This is possibly because his public face we already know and the larger aspirations attendant upon it loom larged on the page, inevitably.

One may say of Nehru what Eliot said of Yeats: that Nehru, the man and writer, is a part of the consciousness of his age and that the age, certainly the Indian phase, cannot be understood without him. Whether it is personal incidents or national history and its traumas and triumphs, whether it is temperamental and ideological differences with an admiration for leaders such as Gandhiji or the exciting discovery of the quintessential India, the writer in Nehru, notwithstanding his outstanding literary facility and poetic insights, is almost always monitored by Nehru the historian: unsentimental, rational and detached.

NEMADE, BHALACHANDRA (Marathi; b. 1938) was born at Sangvi, district Jalgaon (Maharashtra). He did his M.A in Linguistics from Pune University in 1961, and from Bombay University in 1964, offering English literature as a special subject. For his Ph. D degree he worked on the 'Stylistic study of the 19th century Marathi prose'. He taught English at Ahmednagar, Dhulia and Aurangabad during 1965-71, and then joined the School of Oriental and African Studies (London) for a year. At present he is teaching in the Department of English, Marathavada University, Aurangabad.

Nemade is a conscientious writer with strong intellectual convictions and values, and adheres to them without any regard for popularity. He was an active participant in the 'Little Magazine' movement which played an active part in the post-independence development of Marathi literature. He edited its magazine, Vacha, with some of his writer-friends. His article, 'Halli lekhakacha lekhakarava ka hoto?' (Why a poseur turns into a 'writer' these days?) was a strong attack on the so called pompous writers, exposing them in their true colour.

He reflects in his work modern life with strong moral overtones. With the publication of his first novel, Kosala, in 1963, he opened a new vista for Marathi fiction. This novel created a stormy controversy in the literary circles. This was altogether a new type of writing which in the beginning baffled both the readers and the critics. It is, however, accepted as a modern classic. Now he has launched upon a fiction quartet. Three of them are Bidhara (1975), Jarila (1977) and Jhula (1979), and the fourth is yet to be published. With these novels he attempts to re-create the massive, picturesque tradition of the 19th century fiction, trying to cross the various levels of contemporary life and reach the core of existential problems. The hero of the novels, Changadev Patil, experiences this contemporary life where exploitation is not only monetary, but at the very core existence. As a writer, Nemade confronts this situation without being sentimental. There is also an attempt at depicting the young man seeking to discover his emotional and cultural identity. The hero of Kosala, Panduranga Sangavikar, pokes fun at absurdity around him, but Changadev Patil of these novels accepts this absurdity believing that he must live and create in it. The quest of Changadev is representative of today's sensitive intellectual young man facing complexities of life. Nemade is not cynical because behind the mask of fun, he makes a serious attempt to redefine human values.

Besides his novels, a collection of his poems, Melody, was published in 1970. Some of these poems were translated into Hindi and English. Sahitya Akademi has published his book Tukaram: Life and Work. A part of Kosala, translated into English, has been published in Indian Writing Today (Penguin) and in the latest special issue of Europe on Indian literature. Extracts from Jarila are also published in Vagartha. Nemade is not only a writer but also a major critic who insists on moral commitment, on the sense of time and values, and on Indianness instead of a blind imitation of the Western trends in literature. He has written about this in his article 'A New Morality in Modern Marathi Fiction' published in Vagartha, and in a long interview to Samaja prabodhana patrika (Marathi). In him we see modernism reconciled to Orientalism through his concern with and interest in the great tradition of Mahanubhava and the Varakari cult in Maharashtra. He has actively contributed to various literary seminars. At present he is a member of the National Book Trust, New Delhi, and the Maharashtra Sahitya Sanskriti Mandal.

NEMICHANDRA (Kannada; b. 12th century) is the author of two works, namely Lilavati prabandham and Neminathapuranam, popularly known as Ardhanemipuranam. Both are rendered in champu style, the first in fourteen ashvasas with 1985 stanzas and the second being an incomplete work in eight ashvasas with 900 stanzas. Both the works have been equally successful in contributing to the fame of the poet.

Nothing much is authentically known about the personal life of the poet. He expresses his reverence for Samantabhadra, Akalankadeva and a host of others in the beginning of his works. But no mention is made by Nemichandra about any other earlier poet of the language. He enjoyed two popular titles 'Kavirajakunjara' and 'Chaturbhashakavichakravarti' and was also adorned with several titles like 'Kavirajamalla', 'Kalakanta', 'Shringarakaragriha' and so on. Many of these titles have been used by the poet himself.

It seems that Nemichandra wrote Lilavati under the patronage of Lakshmidhara I of the Rattas during 1188-92, and Neminathapuram at the instance of Sajjevalla Padmanabha, a minister of the Hoysala king Ballala II (1173-1220) during 1192-1200, from which it can be rightly said that he lived around 1190.

Nemichandra's art of poetry has won great appreciation from many of the later poets. Janna, Nagavarma II, Parshva, Kamalabhava, Bahubalipandita, Madhura, Mangarasa and some of the poets who lived during 13th-16th centuries have whole-heartedly paid their glowing tributes to the poet. Madhura (15th c) even goes to the extent of extolling him along with Janna (13th c) as the most eminent among the poets of the age. Many of his stanzas quoted in several works on grammar and poetics and in anthologies show that he was one of the outstanding poets of his time.

Nemichandra's Lilavati is an imaginary narrative poem. The structure of the narrative seems to have the influence of Subandhu, Bana, Rajashekhara and others who have similar poems to their credit in Sanskrit. The poet is also clearly under the influence of Pampa, Ranna, Nagavarma I and several others. Of course, we find here and there in Nemichandra some of the changes and additions in accordance with the norms and requirements of Jainism.

Prince Kandarpadeva of Banavasi and Princess Lilavati of Kusumapura see each other in a dream and fall in love. They set out to fulfil their cherished desire of meeting each other. While dealing with this plot, ending in the fulfilment of their aspirations, the poet makes use of ample opportunities for the expression of shringara, especially during the events of their seeing each other for the first time, their union, marriage, separation, reunion and so on. While depicting this sentiment the poetry is sensuous and expressive. However, since such works are rare in Kannada literature and also as the readers, in general, show interest in such romantic and passionate narratives, the poem deserves a place in Kannada literature.

Neminathapuranam is the other poem written by Nemichandra. The plot is about the cycle of births and five 'Kalyanas' of the 22nd tirthankara. We also find as a special feature the Jain version of the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata combined with the story of Neminatha. The work, being incomplete, starts with the early cycles of the birth of the tirthankara and ends with the slaying of Kamsa, an episode from the Bhagavata. The work seems to be indebted to Gunabhadra's Uttarapurana and a few of the Nemi stories in Sanskrit and Prakrit as well. The poet has appropriately incorporated certain relevant changes and modifications while rendering the story into Kannada. For example, the narrative in indebted to the Vishnupurana and the Bhagavata of the Vedic tradition for the Krishna legend. The poet is well-versed in the art of addition, deletion, amplification and other aspects of poetic craft and his work furnishes several examples in this regard. Certain touching events of the poem include some incidents of the early cycles of the birth of Nemi Bali-Vamana episode, the slaying of Kamsa and Chanura. It is here that the poet wins the appreciation of the readers with his superb imagination, scheme of events, characterisation, expression of poetic flavour and mastery in the art of composition.

Nemichandra's vocabulary is incomparable for its astounding variety and range and for the expressiveness of the Kannada language itself, and even to this day it proves to be a challenge to Kannada scholars.

NEMICHANDRA (Prakrit), the author of Dravyasamgaraha, Gommatasara, Labdhisara, Ksapanasara and Trilokasara, revered by Chamundaraya, the minister and General of the Gang king Rachamalla (A.D. 976-985), at whose instance Gommatasara was composed, belonged to the Deshiya Gana. He was given the epithet 'Saiddhantika-sarvabhauma'. He has mentioned that Ajitasena was the spiritual preceptor of Chamundaraya. Again, in Gommatasara we have a mention of several sages to whom Nemichandra makes obeisance as his preceptors. These sages are Abhayanandi, Indranandi, Viranandi and Kanakanandi.

NEMINAHACHARIYA (Apabhramsha) is an epic on the life of Neminatha, written by Haribhadrasuri at Anahillapura (Gujarat) in 1160 at the request of Prithvipala, a minister of Kumarapala, the Chalukya ruler of Gujarat. Nemi or Aristanemi was the twenty-second Tirthankara, and a cousin of Krishna according to Jain mythology. There are several works on the life of Nemi in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha, both preceding and following Neminahachariya. Svayambhu's enormous epic in Apabhramsha, Ritthanemichariya preceded Neminahachariya by more than 250 years. Usually the biographical account of Nemi contains the lives of Vasudeva and Krishna.

The Neminahachariya gives the traditional account of Nemi's life in 3338 verses, including the story of his eight previous births. Although it is a long poem with a puranic theme, it has neither 'Sandhibandha' nor structural divisions. Its sections indicate the divisions of the subject-matter according to five human births of the hero, and the secondary narratives connected with them. Accordingly, the sections are: Dhana, Chitragati (with Sanatkumaracharita), Aparajita, Sankha (with the tale of Ratisundari and Mahaviracharita), Nemi (with Harivamsha, Vasudevacharita and Krishnacharita). The actual life-story of Neminath from his birth to Nirvana occupies only one-ninth of the whole poem.

The style of the Neminahachariya is eminently poetic. There is little narration as such. Description and rhetoric elaboration are the chief means of achieving literary effect and charm. The principal metre of the epic is radda, though the poet has occasionally used other metres also. For instance, the tale of Ratisundari is in gatha metre and is written in the Prakrit language.

Haribhadra handles the complicated radda metre with skill and felicity. He concentrates more on rendering scenes and emotions than on displaying erudition. The life-account of Sanatkumara, an independent theme incorporated by Haribhadra in Neminahachariya, is an outstanding illustration. Actually it is a poetic recast of Sanatkumara-charita given in Prakrit Gathas in his Mallinathacharita.

Neminahachariya is the only available Apabhramsha puranic epic which is not composed in the Sandhi form. It is also the only epic extant which employs radda as its principal metre. Haribhadra appears to follow the literary tradition of an Apabhramsha poet, Govinda, who preceded him by about three hundred years and is known only through occasional citations in Svayambhucchanda of Svayambhu.

The Apabhramsha of Neminahachariya is characterized by several regional words, illustrations and expressions, and as such it is important for a study of the beginnings of languages like Gujarati and Rajasthani.

NEOG, DIMBESHWAR (Assamese; b. 1899, d. 1966), notable literary historian and poet, was born in a village called Kamarphadia in the suburb of Sibsagar in Assam. This historical environment of Sibsagar greatly inspired the young mind of the poet-critic when he was a teen-aged boy. He describes his native village in one of his poems 'Mor gao' (My village) as a miniature world. He had his early education in the village school and later studied science at Cotton College in Gauhati from where he did his B. Sc.. Neog then became a science teacher in a school, and later he obtained B.T. and M.A. degrees.

While Dimbeshwar had been a student of Sibsagar Government High School, he came in contact with Phanidhar Chaliha, whose patriotism and strength of character inspired the young mind of the budding poet. He exhibited his poetic talent in the school magazines and local cultural functions. In Cotton College he became the editor of Milan (Union), the literary mouthpiece of All Assam Students' Union (Asam Chhatra Sammelan), which he raised to the status of a standard literary magazine in the early years of the twenties. Some of his early poems were published in Milan which firmly established him as a poet of the younger generation. He also served for some time as a sub-editor of the Assamese weekly, Asamiya, towards the end of the twenties and also edited the literary mouthpiece of Asam Sahitya Sabha, Sahitya sabha patrika, for several years (1933-1944).

Dimbeshwar was a great admirer of Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Lakshminath Bezbarua and received considerable impetus from their writings. He married Ajalitara, a daughter of Benudhar Rajkhowa. His wife, herself a writer for children, died several years before him.

Dimbeshwar was a poet, a literary critic of eminence and one of the foremost literary historians of Assam. His poetical works, viz., Malika (1922), Thupitara (1925), Malati (1927), Indradhanu (1929), Mukuta (1931), Thapana (1946), Asama (1947), Bichitra (1948) and a few other collections reveal him as a poet of love, youth and patriotism. Some of his poems like 'Sapatmukta', 'Mor gao', 'Swargapuri' and 'Buranji-lekhak' are gems of poetry. In later life he wrote some works of literary criticism as Asamiya sahityar jilingani (A glimpse of Assamese literature, 1938) and Asamiya sahityar jeuti (The light of Assamese literature, 1951). Besides them, he wrote the history of Assamese literature in both English and Assamese. Neog also published two collections of Assamese folksongs, Bhogjara (1928) and Akul pathik. He also wrote a few works on Assam Vaishnavism including an exhaustive biography of Shankaradeva.

NEOG, MAHESHWAR (Assamese; b. 1918), scholar, antiquarian, literary critic and poet, was born at the village of Kamarphadia attached to the present Sibsagar town. His father Manikchandra Neog, was a Post Master in the local post office. Maheshwar Neog had his early education at Sibsagar, North Lakhimpur and Jorhat. Later he went to Cotton College, Gauhati, from where he did his B.A. with a second class Honours in English. He took his M.A. degree in Assamese as a private student in 1947 from Calcutta University securing a first class. Before this, he had served as a school teacher for a few years. In 1945 he was appointed Office Secretary of Gauhati University Trust Fund. When Gauhati University was established in 1948, he was appointed a lecturer in Assamese. Later he became Professor and Head of the Assamese Department. He retired in 1978 and went to Punjabi University, Patiala, as Shankaradeva Professor for research in Assam Vaishnavism.

Maheshwar Neog is a poet, a literary critic of repute, and an indefatigable researcher in the field of Assamese literature and culture. He has edited a few early Assamese manuscripts including the voluminous 18th century prose work, Kathagurucharita, which recounts the lives of the Vaishnavite saints of Assam. Neog has also edited Srihasta-muktavali, a Sanskrit work on dance, composed by Sabhankara Kavi with an Assamese rendering done by one Suchanda Ojha of the eighteenth century. Neog has also done considerable research in Bargit in collaboration with musicologists to standardise the tunes of the devotional lyrics. His work on the Sattriya dance and rhythm, Sattriya nritya aru sattriya nrityar tal, written in collaboration with the late musician Kesav Changkakati is an important contribution in the field of musical study in Assam. Another noteworthy contribution of Neog to the antiquarian research is Prachya shasanavali, a collection of medieval inscriptions from the thirteenth century onwards, which he, on the basis of the works of his predecessors working in the same field, edited with English translations.

Two collections of his poems, Muchafirkhana (Inn, 1971) and Sancharini dipashikha (Moving flame, 1978) are steeped in nostalgia and bespeak of his imaginative insight. He wrote three works of literary criticism, Asamiya prem-gatha (1958), Adhunik Asamiya sahitya (1965) and Asamiya sahityar ruparekha (1962), the last one being an outline of the history of Assamese literature. His works in English include Shankaradeva and His Predecessors (1953), Shankaradeva and His Times (1965), Rhythms in the Vaishnava Music of Assam (1960) and Shankaradeva (1967).

Besides the above works, he published a number of papers in both English and Assamese on various aspects of Assam's culture and literature. He was elected President of the forty-first annual session of the Assam Sahitya Sabha. He edited the journal of Gauhati University for several years, and Ramdhenu, a monthly magazine, in the early fifties. He has a few more edited works to his credit. He is a member of the General Council of Sahitya Akademi.

NEPALI, GOPALSINGH (Hindi; b. 1911, d. 1963), originally called Gopal Bahadur Singh, hailed from a Gorakha family settled in Betiah, Bihar. His early education was perfunctory and cut short in 1932 when he was not sent up for the Matriculation Examination. However, he showed an aptitude for writing poetry at an early age. He began composing poems when he was hardly fifteen. 'Hari ghas', 'Pipal', and 'Bharat gagan ke jagmag sitare' are some of his early poems.

In 1932 he was invited to recite his poems at an All-India Kavi Sammelan, organised by Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Kashi, to felicitate Acharya Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, and later at 'Dwivedi Mela', Prayag. Attracted by his poetic power, Dularelal Bhargav, editor of Sudha, invited him to join his editorial board of whch Nirala was also a member. The early poems of Nepali are collected in Umang (1933), which has a preface from Sumitranandan Pant. His second publication was Panchhi (1934), a miniature epic. His other collections of poems are Ragini (1935), Nilima (1941), Panchami (1942), Navin (1944) and Himalaya ne pukara (1963).

Nepali served on the editorial staff of several magazines one after the other: Chitrapat (a film magazine from Delhi), Ratlam Times, Yogi. In 1944 he joined Filmistan, a famous film company of Bombay, as a song writer. For nineteen years he wrote film songs which gained a distinct literary flavour from him. Towards the end of 1962 when India was attacked by China, Nepali left the film world, and began writing and reciting patriotic songs to rouse national feelings amongst the common men. In this very process he died on the railway platform of Bhagalpur at the age of 51.

Nepali was a poet of the Chhayavad school, and will be remembered best for his literary songs. Nature and love are the main concerns of his poetry, but he is nonetheless a significant poet of patriotic feelings. In Panchhi, we have a tale of the eternal love of two souls. His love songs are a source of great delight. Among his patriotic songs, 'Bhai bahan', 'Nilima', 'Vishal Bharat', 'Navin', 'Naya sansar' are the best remembered pieces.

NETUNALVATAI (Tamil), a poem by Nakkirar in 188 lines, is one of the best poetic pieces of the Sangam period. Literally, the word, 'netunalvatai', means 'long and good wind'. 'Vatai', by metonymy, denotes cold season. This season appears long to the heroine of the poem as she is bewailing the absence of her lord who is away in the battlefield. The season appears good to the hero as it is suitable for war. The personality of the hero faced with a challenge is set off against that of the heroine pining for love.

The poem begins with a description of Nature during the rains brought in by the north wind. The earth is cold. The distressed shepherds let loose their cattle to graze on unknown pastures. Birds, beasts, men, all suffer from cold that bites into their bodies. When the scene shifts to the city, we find people huddled together in their houses, but there are stout guards, care-free and drunken, wandering about the streets. And there are gay women unmindful of cold.

The poem includes both the akam and the puram elements as is the case with Mullaippattu and Pattinappalai, the other works in the anthology, Pattuppattu. The wife of a warrior, probably the queen of a Pandya king, is lying on her exquisite bed pining for her lord who has gone off to fight a battle. She has put away her ornaments and dress. Her maids try to console her that the king will return soon from war, while in the far-off camp the king is absorbed in thoughts of war or looking after the wounded soldiers.

The popularity of the poem is largely due to the arresting description of the cold season with wealth of details which cannot easily be surpassed. The description of the palace too is delightful. The picture of the king inspecting the camp is a splendid piece of painting in words. Apart from beautiful pictorial descriptions, we have some realistic details also which throw light on the social life of the ancient Tamils.

There is no hyperbole in the poem; simple similes produce an artistic effect. The stem of an areca palm is compared to an emerald neck, and a street is likened to a river. Such details in the poem contribute to its appeal and richness.

NIAZ FATEHPURI (Urdu; b.1882, d.1966) was born at Fatehpur Hasva in Uttar Pradesh. He was educated at Madrasa Islamia, Fatehpur, Madrasa Alia, Rampur, and Nadwatul Ulema, Lucknow. He resigned his post in 1902 as a police Sub-Inspector after working in this capacity for a couple of years. Thereafter he worked in different posts till 1921. He started editing and publishing his famous monthly journal, Nigar, which served as a mirror to the literary scene in Uttar Pradesh till his migration to Pakistan in the early sixties.

His fiction consists of seven collections, besides many short stories published in the Nigar. Although at a later stage he wrote a few stories attacking religious hypocrisy and fanaticism and there is evidence to show how his desire grew to reform the society through short stories, his literary romanticism was too rank to permit him to tread the paths of reality freely.

Since the publication of his first story, 'Ek Parsi dosheeza ko dekh kar' (Having seen a Parsi girl) in 1910, most of his stories have revealed an imaginative preoccupation with things unworldly. Such writings can perhaps be regarded more as pieces of poetic prose than as short stories which are normally pregnant with happenings. Wherever he chooses to bring in events, as in 'Cupid aur Psyche' (Cupid and Psyche), abstract ideas make their sneaky appearance and over-crowd the events, with the result that they are prevented from proceeding further.

By the early forties, Niaz Fatehpuri had already switched over to philosophy and criticism, for the true features of the short story having been identified with those of Premchand by now, he could not but feel the futility of his wanderings in imaginative wilderness.

NIBANDHMALA (Marathi) was a sort of a periodical published by Vishnu Krishna Chiplunkar from 1874 to 1881 containing essays written by him, and it is regarded as a landmark in the history of Marathi journalism and literature.

Nibandhmala performed a great historical task in awakening the nationalistic spirit of the people. Its severe criticism of the British government and the Christian missionaries proved to be very effective. It also played an important role in the revival of Marathi literature and language. Besides the essay, which was the main feature of the periodical, there were epigrams, humorous episodes in the lives of great persons, new information, poetry and letters from people. A typical Chiplunkar essay began with a Sanskrit epigram, followed by the introduction of the subject and the main argument which was substantiated with proper evidence. Defence of the argument was always vigorous and the attack on the rival party usually severe. Undue preoccupation with traditionalism at times made him attack the reformist institutions. Whatever the topic might be, his prose attracted the attention of his readers because of its uncanny logic and polemical vigour. His embellished prose received wide applause, but thinkers like Vithal Ramaji Shinde blamed him for his undue use of Sanskrit words and his Anglo-Sanskrit syntax that had an air of artificiality. But Nibandhmala deserves a word of praise for pioneering the literary forms like biography, light essay and anecdote. Chiplunkar's prose style shows a considerable influence on the latter-day prose writers.

NIDDESA (Pali) is the eleventh section of Khuddaka-nikaya of Sutta-pitaka, the second major book of the Buddhist canon. It purports to be a commentary on parts of Suttanipata, the fifth section of the same pitaka. Niddesa is in two parts: Mahaniddesa, the commentary on the atthaka-vagga and Chullaniddesa, the commentary on the Parayana-vagga and the Khaggavisana-sutta of Uragavagga.

The pattern of the commentary is very similar to that found in Vinaya-pitaka. It consists in giving a series of synonyms. Exegetical passages are also found here. Various readings too are noted, e.g., givanto ti, givanto kujjanto, nadanto, saddam karonto athava kati kitthaka kivataka kivabahuka. On the Khaggavisana-sutta, it is said: 'Yatha khaggassa nama visanam ekam hoti adutiyam, evam eva paccheka-sambuddho takkappo tassadiso tappatibhago.' When passages are repeated, they are repeated in full, and no technique is adopted for their abbreviation.

Because of the expository nature of the text, it is a source of information not only on philosophical and religious aspects, but also on society in general. For example, we read that there are four kinds of friends: nati-bandhava, gotta-bandhava, manta-bandhava and sippa-bandhava. There are four kinds of slaves: anto-jatako daso, dhana-kkitako daso, samam va..., akamako va... Writing about Vivata-chakkhu, it is said there are five kinds of visions: Mamsa-chakkhu, dibba-chakkhu, panna-chakkhu, buddha-chakku and samanta-chakkhu.

Niddesa is attributed to Sariputta. Three different interpretations are given of Sariputta's own words compiled in Suttanipata, but this need not come in the way of his authorship. However, the entire Niddesa could not be that old. In its present form, it was included in the Canon before the Third Council of the Sangha. Niddesa refers to the canonical collection of the Jatakas. Dipavamsa informs us that Niddesa was among the books rejected by the Second Council. Saddhammappajjotika, a commentary on Niddesa, ascribes it to Upasena.

NIHALDE SULTAN (Rajasthani) is a folk-epic beautifully recited by bards, especially the jogis, followers of the Nath cult. Though prominently known as a love story, it has fifty-two episodes or 'Pawadas' (strange and heroic feats) as known in common parlance. It is widely popular in Shekhawati (Sikar, Jhunjhunu and Churu districts of Rajasthan) where the jogis, playing on their 'sarangis', are found in plenty. Kanhaiyalal Sahal was the first scholar who had the text copied. A short translation into Hindi prose done by him, was also published by him. It is a powerful poem depicting folk-culture in its real form. Scholars are of the opinion that it contains seeds of various genres, such as novel, drama, etc.

The basic story in brief is as follows: Sultan, son of King Manipal of Kichalagarh, is exiled for a period of twelve years while he is still in his early youth. Guru Gorakhnath blesses him with a boon of fifty-two glorious feats of bravery. Prince Kamadhajrao of Idarkot accepts him as his adopted son. He contracts a love marriage with Princess Nihalade of Kelagadh. Enraged at the rude behaviour of his adopting mother, the wife of Prince Kamadhajarao, he proceeds to Narwargarh where Prince Dholsingh pays him full respect and the Prince's wife, Maru, treats him as her brother. The term of exile over, Sultan proceeds to his homeland along with his wife Nihalde. He is enthroned in his ancestral state. As promise-bound, he then visits his 'sister' Maru to perform the traditional ceremony of 'Bhat'. He rules for a considerably long period as a just and popular king.

The story in brief is only that much, but the subsidiary episodes are very many, which fit beautifully in the main structure of the plot. That is why the poem is treated as an epic. It is rather a cultural history of folk-life. There are social customs, religious faiths, do's and don'ts of life, economic conditions, society and its frame-work, moral values, etc. nicely depicted in a completely non-partisan and frank manner. This epic shows folk-life and its kaleidoscopic culture in such a natural and vivid manner that one is thoroughly spellbound. Though the story is mainly related to the higher order of society in medieval times and is more concerned with princes, princesses, feudal lords, etc., the rhythm of folk-life is prominently orchestrated in it.

From the view-point of motifs, it is an exceptionally rich epic, though these motifs have not been studied closely so far. A folk-epic is basically a descriptive and narrative epic, and Nihalde Sultan is no exception. But here we find vivid characterization and depiction of natural beauty also. Besides, it reflects the ethos and moral values of its time. The dialogues are simple and artless. The sentiments of love and separation are beautifully depicted. The epic reads like a fascinating novel.

NIJAGUNASHIVAYOGI (Kannada; b. 15th century) is a Virashaiva philosopher-poet. The exact date of his birth or death is not known. His native place is Chilakawadi near Kollegal. He was the ruler of a small kingdom renouncing which later he did penance at a temple on a nearby mountain called Shambhulingabetta. He was an inspired composer and singer of devotional songs. He wrote in both Kannada and Sanskrit. His Kannada works are: Kaivalyapaddhati, Puratanara trividhi, Vivekachintamani, Anubhavasara, Paramartha prakashike, Paramanubhava bodhe and Paramartha gite. Unfortunately his Sanskrit works Atmatarkachintamani and Darshanasara are not available. His contribution to Virashaiva religion, philosophy and literature is considerable. His works are regarded as veritable shastras.

Among his works, Kaivalyapaddhati is a collection of devotional songs and lyrics, classified under five sthalas: Shivakarunya, Jivasambodhane, Nitikriyachara, Pratipadana, Yogapratipadana and Jnanapratipadana. Puratanara trividhi is another collection of devotional songs which consists of tripadis dealing with the lives of Puratanas. Vivekachinatamani, the earliest encycolopaedia in Kannada is the best of all Nijagunashivayogi's works. It was tranlsated into Marathi by Shantalingashivayogi in the 16th century, into Tamil by Shivaprakasha Swami in the 17th century, and into Sanskrit by Lingaraja in the 18th century. Anubhavasara is a collection of tripadis devoted to the study of philosophy (Vedanta). Virashaivas regularly recite these songs. Paramartha prakashike is a translation of Channasadashivayogi's Shivayoga pradeepike into Sanskrit. It has been further translated into Telugu under the title Shivayogasaramu. Paramanubhava bodhe, which is in the sangatya metre, is yet another book of songs in the form of a dialogue between Yajnavalkya and Maitreyi. Paramartha gite is a translation of Yogavashishtha into Sanskrit. It is also in the form of a dialogue between a teacher and a student.

NIJAM (Telugu) is a play written by Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastri, well-known short-story writer, novelist and playwright. He wrote 'Vishadam' and 'Tiraskriti', two playlets, and Nijam (Truth), a successful play on the stage. Nijam can be adjudged as one of the best social plays in Telugu. It won the praise of both the scholars and the laymen.

The inequalities of our society inspired Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastri to write Nijam. He is an advocate by profession. He came across several innocent people who were languishing in jails for no fault of theirs and for their uncommitted crimes. In the introduction to the play, the writer pities the innocent people who cannot shield themselves from the clutches of the judiciary. He is disgusted with the whole judicial system. He says that corruption in law courts is rampant. But the leaders, the religious people, all profess that all is well with the world. Sastry craves for justice for the poor people.

Nijam is a lengthy play in five acts. It can be reduced to four acts according to the suggestions made by the author. There are about fifteen characters in the play.

Satyam, Madhu and Krishna, three students studying in the university, go on a picnic with their friend Sundaram, an officer in the army. Sundaram is the son of an MP, Sarvabhowma Rao.

Sarvabhowma Rao is rich, powerful and selfish. Once he saved a poor girl, Sushila, from hunger and poverty and gave her shelter. He seduced her with his riches and kept her as his concubine. Sushila is trapped by one young man, Somasundara Rao, with his handsome appearance and antics. Somasundara Rao is a vagabond, a pick-pocket and a small 'goonda'. He meets Sushila in Sarvabhowma Rao's house and requests her to come away with him. He promises her that he will marry her. Sarvabhowma Rao catches him as a criminal in his house and sends him to the police station.

In the picnic Sundaram kills Satyam in a drunken, emotional quarrel. Madhu and Krishna go to Sarvabhowma Rao's house and beg him to save them from the court case.

Sarvabhowma Rao plots very cunningly to save his son and punish Somasundara Rao for loving his concubine, Sushila. He changes the prosecution case with the help of the police. He involves Somasundara in the murder plot instead of his son Sundaram. He manipulates the trial in a clever way and shatters the defence of Somasundara Rao and his counsel.

Somasundara Rao asks the jailor, jail wardens, the jail doctor and others to promise him that they will stand for the truth, and for nothing but the truth. Nobody comes forward. He goes to the gallows without regrets.

Viswanatha Sastry describes the educational system in the universities, and justice at police stations and in law courts. He blames society for serving the rich man's needs. He portrays the so-called members of parliament and other public figures as monsters.

Viswanatha Sastry believes in armed struggle against the establishment. He wrote Nijam symbolically to say that the armed revolt is inevitable in the present-day circumstances.

By any standard, Nijam is an outstanding social play due to its theme, technique and purport.

NILA AMBER, KALE BADAL (Dogri). After Kole diyan likran and Rochak kahaniyan, Nila amber, kale badal (1967) is Narender Khajuria's latest collection of short stories in Dogri. Narender had surprised the Dogri readers with his very first collection, Kole diyan likran. The stories, though many of them structurally weak or loose, were interesting none the less. Rochak kahaniyan, the second collection, was a book for children. It is, however, in the stories of Nila amber, kale badal that Narender's art matures. He acquires technical skill and gains in confidence in handling complex characters and situations. Not that every story in this collection is technically good or artistically satisfying but, on the whole, the stories reveal a surer craftsmanship. Theme-wise, some of them, as 'Painchhi partoye par', deal with nostalgic situations. Others like 'Natak da ant' and 'Ma tu lori ga' are instinct with patriotic fervour. At times, a story like 'Kavita da ant' is weak thematically, notwithstanding its satire on pseudo-poets or pseudo-litterateurs who sacrifice art to commercialism.

Over the years, Narender developed a keen interest in probing the minds of his characters, so that we see them not only doing a particular action but know also why they are doing it. He also became sharply aware of the changing social environment and the conflict between the old values and the new ideas. This is evident from such stories as 'Sach jehra trame par nein lakhoa', 'Apna apna dharam', 'Dhuyen ala andar' and 'Saddro dai'. Narender exhibits great social realism and depicts situations which have a capacity to move the readers by their human tragedy or irony or even satire as in 'Ik pattar pattjhar da', 'Inami kahani', 'Ik samhal' and 'Kavita da ant'. Many of these stories are specimens of good craftsmanship. They are also rich in characterisation. Saddro, Kastu, Premu of 'Inami Kahani', Nani of 'Ik samhal', and the narrator of 'Ik pattar pattjhar da' and 'Kavita da ant' are drawn with care. In the last two stories he makes use of symbolism also and exposes the exploitation of art and letters by philistines.

The greatest strength of Narender in this collection of stories is his language. After Bhagwatprasad Sathe, it was he who fully exploited the resources of Dogri. His language is conversational and idiomatic; the speech comes naturally to his characters. There is ease and grace, a verbal quality which indicates a rich texture of language and a complete mastery over the medium. This mastery, however, prompts the writer at times to play with words and dazzle the readers with his verbal jugglery, a weakness which may be seen, for example, in 'Dhaundiyan kandhan' or 'Kavita da ant'.

Because of its deep humanism, strong characterisation, good craftsmanship and remarkable command of language, Nila ambar, kale badal is an outstanding contribution to Dogri literature, and it won the writer the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1970.

NILA SAILA (Oriya; 1968) is a historical novel by Surendra Mahanty written against the political-cultural background of the eighteenth century Orissa. It describes the tear-soaked history of the Oriya region striving to maintain its religious identity against the repeated Mughal attacks. Lord Jagannath, the presiding deity of the Oriyas, was the source of their political unity and the traditional symbol of their religious consciousness. Ramachandra Deba, king of Khurdha, makes a diplomatic attempt to save the images of the gods from humiliation by marrying Rijia, sister of Taki Khan, the shrewd Mughal agent in Orissa. He is hated and humiliated as a renegade. Yet the king succeeds in transporting the image of Lord Jagannath stealthily to the lonely island in the Chilika lake. The unflinching loyalty of millions of people to their Lord, the hypocrisy of Benu Bhramarabara and the ceaseless struggle of the king present a chequered history of this nation. The use of Urdu and archaic words and faithful adherence to historical details augment the unique appeal of the novel. Nila saila received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1969.

NILAKANTHA DIKSHITA (Sanskrit; b. 17th century) was a famous Sanskrit poet-scholar of the well-known Dikshita family. He is the author of many works. He was also known as Ayya Dikshita and was a protege of Tirumala Nayaka of Kerala. Son of Narayana and Bhumidevi, and grandson of Achchana Dikshita, the younger brother of the famous Appayya Dikshita, he had great respect for Appayya and called him an incarnation of Shiva. He studied under Venkateshvara-makhin. An erudite scholar of grammar and mimamsa, he wrote learned commentaries like Kaiyata-vyakhyana and Tantra-siddhanta-dipika. His mastery over the Shrikantha school of Shaiva philosophy can be seen in his Shiva-tattva-rahasya. His great devotion to Shiva prompted him to compose many works like Nilakantha-vijaya-champu (based on the story of the mythical churning of ocean), Shivalilarnava (a mahakavya describing in 22 cantos the 64 feats of Lord Sundaranatha, a form of Shiva worshipped at Madurai). Gangavatarana (describing in 8 cantos the famous legendary descent of the divine Ganges), and a small hymn, Ananda-nagara-stava, in praise of Goddess Minakshi, the consort of Lord Sundaranatha. He also wrote some small poems entitled Kalvidambana, Sabha-ranjana, Shanta-vilasa, Anyapadeshashataka, Vairagya-shataka, etc. He also wrote a play, Nalacharita-nataka, in 7 acts on the theme of the life of the legendary king, Nala, and also probably a one-act play, Kalyanasaugandhika, of the Vyayoga type describing the meeting of Bhima and Hanuman. He was a poet of high sentiments, natural diction and fanciful imagination.

NILAKANTHA PAKHIR KHONJE (Bengali) is a novel by Atin Banerjee. It was first serialized in a weekly magazine and later in 1971 published in two volumes. It is the first part of what is known as the Sona trilogy. The other two parts are Alaukik jalajan and Ishwarer bagan, each in two volumes. Nilakantha pakhir khonje covers the story of Sona's childhood in the village of Rainadi in East Bengal up to the time of the partition of India when he leaves his home and finds a job on a ship. Alaukik jalajan deals with the part of his life he spent on the seas. Ishwarer bagan deals with a still later phase of his life spent in a city. In the first, Nature plays a dominant role. In the second, the seas form the backdrop. In the third, the hard realities of a city loom large. Nilakantha pakhir khonje does not lend itself to summarizing, first, because it is not a simple narrative of events. Events related are not as important as the thoughts and feelings which either lead to them or are occasioned by them. Thus beneath the surface structure of events there is a deeper texture woven out of thoughts, musings and feelings: of love and loyalty, of hatred and jealousy, of hunger and lust, of wonder and curiosity, of fear and horror, of hopes and despair, of zeal and weariness—in a word, all those elements of the mind which make human life what it is. Secondly, the novel seeks to draw the picture of a village community in its entirety at one point of time in order to show how it is torn apart and destroyed at another point of time. The focus, therefore, constantly shifts from this scene to that making a linear reconstruction impossible.

Sona or Atish Dipankar Bhowmik, a grandson of a respected well-to-do old man named Mahendranath, is the hero of the trilogy. But in Nilakantha pakhir khonje he is not the central figure, the author's intention being to picture him only as an integral part of the world he lives in. Every person or child is as important a part of this world as Sona. Together they make the village what it is. This village of Rainadi is like any other village in the East Bengal of the 1940s. It stands first of all for hunger and depravity, and this is epitomized in the tragic, almost grotesque story of Jalali and her death. It stands for deprivation epitomized in the story of Jotan and Malati. It stands for lust, nymphomania, malice and greed epitomized in the story of Akaluddin, Phelu, Hajisaheb and Annubegum. It stands for a shattered dream epitomized in the story of Manindranath, Pauline and Badabau. It stands for love epitomized in the story of Samu, Malati and Ranjit, of Fatima and Sona. It stands for loyalty epitomized in the character of Isham. These are all more or less different stories, but they are interconnected and told as parts of the story of the village itself.

The sense of security and stability in the village springs from the perennial goodness that is in man: the goodness which fosters mutual good will and love. But Nilakantha pakhir khonje seeks to catch this village of Rainadi at a time when it is being taken unawares by history. It is the time when independent India and Pakistan are being born, but this consummation is to be effected only by tearing apart this village and thousands of other villages like it. Distant rumblings are heard and the tremor is felt, but the villagers still hope that the storm will pass without harming them.

Meanwhile, life goes on through each day as each day brings some new woes or some new cause for joy. But the storm gathers thick and hovers over the village and the villagers slowly become apprehensive of an impending doom. There are fewer causes for joy now and more for sorrow. The cracks in the age-old bond between the Hindus and the Muslims, who have been part of this village for ages, now look like gaping wounds which cannot be healed. There is still that old good will in all its manifestations because there is the conviction that this wound has been inflicted from outside, that the fabric has been torn by an ill wind that has blown from somewhere beyond the village. But there is also the realization that things will not be the same again, that the basic tenets of the life of a community have been questioned and then thrown to the winds.

So when India and Pakistan find their independence, millions of people, little Sona one of them, leave their hearth and home in quest of a new home which can offer them the same sense of security and stability, a home which they can love and which will love them. Sona is almost jubilant when he thinks of the sacrifice he has made for his new country. He dreams of the day when he will reach his new home where people will point their fingers at him and say, "This boy has made a sacrifice. He has given up his dear home for our freedom. He can have whatever he needs. Let us give him everything."

But in his new home Sona starves. His close-knit family breaks apart and out of desperation he leaves the shore of his new country and sails away into the unknown seas, the seas which are no one's home, no one's country.

Nilkantha pakhir khonje is an epic of our time. It is one of the best novels—and they are few in number—written in Bengali since 1947. And it is one novel which deals with a catastrophe which took Bengal unawares and rocked her social, economic and political life to its foundation.

NILAKANTHA PILLAI, KARUR (Malayalam; b. 1898, d. 1974). Born at Ettumanoor and son of Palampatathil Nilakantha Pillai and Karur Kunhili Amma, Nilakantha Pillai was a master of the new short story that began its brilliant course in the 1930s and achieved great heights in the next twenty years. He was in Government service as a school teacher. Karur, together with twelve writers, founded the Sahitya Pravarthaka Cooperative Society at Kottayam in 1945 and was its secretary till 1965.

Karur was a humanist to the core and in his hands the Malayalam short story acquired variety and richness. Concerned with the crude realities of life, he depicted the common people, especially the teachers, with much warmth and candour. The bulk of the raw material of his stories is drawn from village life.

On the whole Karur has written about 200 short stories. His first collection of stories Karur kathakal was published in 1945. Then followed Melvilasam (1945), Smarakam (1946), Kochanujathi (1946), Astrologer (1947), Iruttil (1947), Thuppukaran (1948), Puvanpazham (1949), Minkari (1950), Thekkupattu (1951), Karayikkunna chiri (1954), Ampalaparampil (1955), Grihanayika (1956), Pishachinte kuppayam (1959), Oru piti mannu (1960), Kathakautukam (1962), Marappavakal (1963), Pattu kathakal (1966), Mothiram (1968), Sahayattil charatuntu (1970) and other collections.

The stories of Karur are tinged with his own experience of life, but are told with remarkable detachment. He is not excited when he tells a story, nor does he seek to persuade his readers. His stories about the episodes in the life of a school teacher like himself are marked by selective realism and poignant pathos. The story of the teacher in 'Pothichchoru' (Lunch packet) is an example. In it a poor teacher who could not make both ends meet with the meagre amount paid by the school manager steals and eats the lunch of a student of the second standard. In the story, 'Sar vandanam' (Good morning, sir), a teacher who did not get his only good dhoti and shirt washed in time appears with clothes borrowed from another teacher at the time of the annual school inspection.

Karur is not a critic of the social order, nor is he concerned with the human psyche, but his tales are none the less human and realistic. It is indeed a curious assortment of personae and pictures intensely human and unquestionably authentic. There are no elaborate plots in his stories, but even the slightest of his episodes is adequate for the portrayal of man's conflict with the relentless environment. It is this humanism which distinguishes his stories from those of other writers.

M.P. Paul has hailed Karur's 'Chekuthan' (Devil) as one of the best ten short stories in Malayalam. It is the story of an innocent girl being delivered to a cruel man for money to save her family from hunger and to cure the illness of her father. 'Aranjanam' (Silver ornament for the hip) is the story of a rikshawalla, Velu by name, whose sorrow knew no bounds because of his inability to give an aranjanam to his child. The stories of the postman, Sankara Pillai, in 'Thiruvatira', who takes ten rupees from the money order for a poor woman, and of the police constable, in 'Ezhunnallath duty', who had to be on duty in spite of his wife who was in labour and his son suffering from fever, are very touching.

Karur has a genuine sense of humour. Even when he uses satire he has his sympathy in the right quarters, in the right proportion. The moralising strain is completely muted in his best stories, such as 'Marappavakal' (Wooden dolls), 'Puvanpazham' (The plantain fruit) and 'Mothiram' (The ring). 'Marappavakal' is the story of a simple, pleasant and smart girl, Nalini, who answers the questions of the census enumerator. From the answers of Nalini the author discloses her story. The theme of 'Puvanpazham' is based on the inexplicable and unidentified emotion of a young and beautiful Nambudiri woman (see had lost her husband and only child) towards the young author.

'Iruttil' (In darkness), 'Melvilasam' (The address), 'Grihanayika' (The house-wife), 'Oru piti mannu' (A handful of earth), 'Uthuppante kinar' (The well dug by Uthupan), 'Vallakkaran' (The ferry-man), 'Lubdhan' (The Miser), 'Chutalathengu' (The coconut palm in the crematory), and 'Changathimar' (The friends) are stories that explain the objective outlook of Karur and also his skill in moulding characters.

Karur has made significant contribution also to children's literature. Some of his stories such as 'Anchu kadalas' and 'Anakkaran' are specially written for children.

Karur has also written two novels, Hari and Gouri (both published in 1967) and a one-act play, Appuppan (The grand-father, 1945). Kathayalla (1951) is a collection of his articles on literature.

NILKANTH, MAHIPATRAM RUPARAM (Gujarati; b. 1829, d. 1891) was a Gujarati writer, educator and social reformer. He studied in Elphinstone School, Bombay and later worked there as a teacher.

In 1860, the then Bombay Presidency Government sent him to England to study the English educational system. Thus Mahipatram became the first Gujarati in his time to 'cross the seas' and invited the wrath of his caste which excommunicated him for seven years. He wrote Inglandani musaphari (1864) which is one of the first few travelogues in Gujarati.

Mahipatram's Sasuvahuni ladai (1866) is considered by some critics the first Gujarati novel. But it is a routine tale of quarrels between a mother-in-law and a daughter-in-law and lacks literary merit. Subsiquently Mahipatram published two historical novels, Vanaraja carado and Sadharo Jesanga.

His biographies of two leading social reformers of his time, Karasanadasa Mulajinum charitra (1878) and Durgaram Mancharam Mahetajinum charitra (1893), are amongst the first few biographies written in Gujarati.

Mahipatram's lasting contribution to Gujarati literature is his Bhavaisangraha which preserves some elements of 'Bhavai', the folk literature of Gujarati.

D.B.M.

NILKANTH, RAMANBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1868, d. 1928) was a dramatist, humorist, essayist, fiction writer, critic and poet. He inherited literary qualities from his father, Mahipatram, himself a creative writer. He studied English literature at Elphinstone College, Bombay, where the poetic theories of Wordsworth made a lasting impression on his mind, helping him shape his poetic concepts. While at college he delivered a lecture under the auspices of the Elphinstone Gujarati Sabha on the 'Birth of poetry and its form.'

His father was a leading social reformer, and he belonged to the 'Prathana Samaj' sect which was the western wing of Raja Rammohan Roy's Brahmo Samaj. Ramanbhai inherited from his father the zeal for propagating the principles of the sect through his writings, literary, social and religious. Soon after graduation he joined as an Editor of a fortnighty magazine, Jnansudha, (Nectar of knowledge) run by Prathana Samaj, and he worked there for twenty-one years. Most of his writings were first published in it. After working for some time as a sub-judge in a court, he plunged headlong into public life and was elected President of Ahmedabad Municipality, Chairman of Prathana Samaj and President of Gujarati Literary Conference. He was a leader of the reformist movement in Gujarat. His pen-name was Makarand. He published Raino paruat (Mountain out of a molehill, 1914), dramatic version of a story in folk drama, 'Bhavai'; Bhadrambhadra (1900), a humorous novel with satire on religious fanaticism; Hasyamandir, a treatise on humour; Kavita ane sahitya (Poetry and literature) in four volumes and Dharma ane samaj (Religion and society) in two volumes. Every work of his bears the stamp of his individuality. He also wrote a few poems and short stories. Raino parvat is a folk story, but Ramanbhai found some events in the story which were not congenial to his Prathana Samajist ideology. The hero of the folk story, Rai, whose real name is Jagdeep, poses as Sitalsingh, the former ruler of the state, and becomes the king of the state which in fact belonged to his father. This leads him to usurp Sitalsingh's wife. The moralist in the author disapproves of it and makes him marry the hero to Vinavati, daughter of Sitalsingh and a child widow, thereby propagating widow remarriage. He uses the medium of drama thus to spread his reformist ideas. His play combines some elements of Sanskrit and Western drama. The seven acts of the drama, the songs in between the dialogues, the use of 'Pathaka' and 'Vidushaka' are on the pattern of Sanskrit drama, while characterisation and the internal conflicts of Jalaka (mother of Rai) are based on the pattern of the Shakespearian drama. The drama has been written keeping in view its stageworthiness. It is a representative work of the well-developed drama of the age.

Bhadramabadra is a novel which was serialised in Ramanbhai's fortnightly, Jnansudha, and was published in book form in 1900. It is a humorous novel attacking orthodoxy in the light of modern reforms. The characters of the novel are caricatures. Ramanbhai ridicules those who blindly follow outdated religious practices, who refuse to change with the times, and who use highly Sanskritised language. Some of the characters who are made objects of ridicule were easily recognisable as his contemporaries belonging to the opposite school. Though the society is totally changed today, the humour in the novel has an everlasting appeal.

Hasyamandir (House of humour) is a collection of his essays in a humorous vein, which has witty dialogues and incidents. The essays on humour are a specimen of the scholarship of the author. It is the first treatise on humour in which he deals with different types of humour in oriental and occidental regions.

Ramanbhai contributed also to the development of short stories in Gujarati literature. His first story 'Bomiyane didheli bulthap' (Guide misguided) which was published in 1896 is based on a story by Mark Twain. It is a humorous sketch of the row between the guide and the traveller. He also wrote detective stories in the style of Arthur Conan Doyle. His two short stories of this type, 'Chaturmukh' (Four faces) and 'Buttadar bandh' (Spotted garment) were published in 1919. These are the first detective short stories in Gujarati. Taranun Abhignana (Tara's recognition) is a short story in which a couple gets separated owing to some misunderstanding and reunites after repentance. His another short story, 'Chhithi' (Letter), published in Gunsundai in 1929, makes fun of people who are obsessed with a recommendation letter for different purposes. Thus his contribution to the field of short stories, though not prolific in character, opened a new vista for short story writers.

About 34 poems of Ramanbhai were published in the fourth volume of Kavita ane sahitya (Poetry and literature). His poems are about devotion and love. His poems, though not anything profound, speak of his love of God.

His love poems sing of the joys of union and the pangs of separation.

His contribution to the field of literary criticism is rich. He wrote about 35 articles on poetics and a few book reviews. He considers subjective poetry superior to objective poetry, and lyrical poetry superior to descriptive or narrative poetry. He is one of the best critics in Gujarati literature who extensively discusses the nature of poetry and gives ample illustrations from contemporary poems to substantiate his theories. His arguments are logical and convincing. The clarity of his thought is evident throughout the discussion. His study of European poetics is deeper and wider than his study of Indian poetics. He tried to introduce European poetics in Gujarati in a systematic way.

NILKANTH, VIDYABEN (Gujarati; b. 1876, d. 1958) was an essayist, who contributed personal essays in a light, humorous style. Humour in her essays arises out of the commonplace and day-to-day incidents. At times she wrote in a satirical vein. Some of these essays have been included in Hasyamandir, a collection of essays by Ramanbhai Nilkanth, her husband.

Vidyaben was born at Ahmedabad in 1876. She was the first woman graduate in Gujarat (1901), and set a trend of higher education for women.

She started writing essays and biographical articles for the journal, Jnansudha, in 1896. Foram (1955) is a collection of her biographical articles. She has to her credit collections of articles Grihadeepika (1931), Narikunj (1956) and Jnansudha (1957). Her style is serene and classical. Her other works include Sudhahasini (1907), translation of Romesh Chunder Dutt's The Lake of Palms, and Hindustanma strionu sthana (1915), a translation of Women in India by the Maharani of Baroda. She wrote the biography of Prof. Karve which was published in 1916.

She was associated with a number of institutions working for social welfare and education. From 1928 she worked as Secretary of the Gujarat Vernacular Society (now Gujarat Vidyasabha, a leading Gujarati institute). She was President of the Gujarat Sahitya Sabha from 1947 to 1958. For her social service she was awarded M.B.E. (1918) and 'Kaisare Hind' (1926) by the British Government.

An.D.

NILKANTH, VINODINI (Gujarati; b. 1907, d. 1987). Vinodini's contribution to Gujarati short-story writing has been remarkable and substantial. Her first published work, Rasadwara (1928), is a collection of personal essays which she wrote in her teens.

She did her B.A. in 1928 and then proceeded to the University of Michigan, U.S.A., for further studies. From there she obtained her M.A. Her chosen vocation was teaching at the school and college level. She was associated with social institutions, especially those dealing with the problems of women. She was a member of the Executive Committee of Gujarati Vidyasabha.

Aarasi-ni-bhitar-ma (1942), Karpasi ane biji vartao (1951), Dil dariav-na moti (1958) and Anguli-no sparsh (1965) are the well-known collections of her short stories. Her penetration and deep understanding of human mind, particularly a woman's mind, are revealed in many of them. Dil dariav-na moti got the Gujarat Sahitya Sabha award and Anguli-no sparsh the Gujarat Government award. Kadalivan (1946), her novel, is also noteworthy. Her Parajit purvagraha (1959) is a translation of Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice, and Sukh-ni siddhi, a translation of Bertrand Russell's Conquest of Happiness. Nijananda is yet another collection of her essays.

From 1949, she contributed a column 'Ghar ghar-ni

jyoti' to a daily, Gujarat Samachar, which became very popular. Her journalistic writings as a columnist have been published in five volumes. The last one Ghar diwdi (1987) was published posthumously.

NILAMANI, VIDYARATNA (Oriya; b. 1867, d. 1923), started his career as a teacher in a primary school and then worked in the courts of some kings and zamindars. The ruler of Bamanda and Baramba conferred on him the title, Vidyaratna. He was a zealous social worker and wherever he lived he took the initiative to form different organisations in order to reform and uplift society. He was one of those who initiated the Utkal Sammilani which in 1903 pledged to work for the unification of the Oriya-speaking areas. He edited Sambalpur hitayisini, which played a crucial role in rejuvenating Oriya literature. Among the other journals he edited were Pragabandhu, Utkal madhupa, Gangam guna darpana and Utkal dipika. Nilamani was also the author of many books. They are Kanya bikraya, Samaja kalanka, Jivha sukha o jivan and Prabada pushpanjali. He also wrote some essays. Nilamani was one of the creators of modern Oriya literature and a great exponent of Orissan culture.

NILDARPAN (Bengali) is a tragedy in five acts by Dinabandhu Mitra (1830-1873). It was published in 1860 in Dacca where it was first staged. Later in 1872 the National Theatre in Calcutta was inaugurated with a performance of this play. In 1873, Girishchandra Ghose, the famous actor, staged it in the Town Hall. It was one of the most popular plays of the time and was enacted several times until 1908 when it was declared seditious.

The play deals with the atrocities and repression which went with indigo cultivation in the coutryside of Bengal in the middle of the nineteenth century. Dinabandhu Mitra had travelled in the countryside and had seen the avarice and cruelty of the British indigo planters and the sufferings of the peasants, the farmers and the landowners. The planters treated the native peasants as beasts of burden, forced them to plant indigo instead of paddy, tortured them when they refused, burnt their houses and took away their women. The situation was all the more helpless as the planters were in league with the police and often with the magistrates. Dinabandhu was deeply moved. He felt called upon to protest and to build up public opinion against the indigo-planters. He did so with this play which Bankimchandra Chatterjee aptly compared with Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, published eight years earlier in 1852.

The play is divided into five acts each consisting of several scenes. It mainly centres round the two families of Golakchandra Basu and Sadhucharan, his ryot. Golakchandra Basu is a well-to-do farmer of the village Swarpur. Sabitri is his wife. They have two sons, Nabinmadhab and Bindumadhab. Both of them are married. Nabinmadhab lives in the village and Bindumadhab lives in Calcutta. The first act opens with a conversation between Golak Basu and Sadhucharan. Golakchandra is distressed because the indigo planters have demanded twenty acres of his land and have threatened to cultivate indigo on the banks of his household pond. Sadhucharan advises him to leave the village, but Golakchandra is too attached to his ancestral home to do so. Nabinmadhab meets the planter, Wood, and tries to persuade him to have mercy, but fails. Meanwhile, an officer sent by Wood forcibly marks three acres of Sadhucharan's land for the cultivation of indigo. Raicharan, Sadhucharan's younger brother, mildly protests—and for this offence both the brothers are whipped. Nabinmadhab pleads for them but this only invites abusive words from Wood and a threat of whipping. The act ends with a domestic scene in the house of Golak Basu.

The second act reveals the conspiracy of the planters to put Golak Basu in jail. They torture Torap and some other peasants to persuade them to give false evidence against him. There is a hint in this act that Kshetramani, the pregnant but beautiful daughter of Sadhucharan, has attracted the notice of a younger partner of the plantation, who wants to abduct her.

The third act acquaints us with Nabinmadhab's helpless condition and his futile attempt to save his father from the clutches of the indigo planters. Meanwhile, Kshetramani is abducted. But she is narrowly saved from being raped as Nabinmadhab along with Torap bursts in and rescues her. This act also informs us that Golakchandra Basu has been arrested on false charges and Nabinmadhab has gone to Indrabad to secure his father's acquittal.

The fourth act has a tragic beginning. The magistrate, who is a friend of Wood, sentences Golak Basu to imprisonment. Galak Basu begins fasting in jail and, after three days, hangs himself. The story moves fast after this. Nabinmadhab decides to leave the village after his father's obsequies are completed. He goes to Wood to request him to put off the planting of indigo on the banks of his household pond until the completion of those rites. But Wood kicks him. In fury Nabinmadhab strikes Wood but is immediately surrounded by the planter's men. He receives a fatal injury on head and is carried back home dying.

Misfortune dogs the house of Sadhucharan also. Kshetramani, who has escaped from being raped, suffers a shock and dies. When Nabinmadhab is brought back home, Sabitri, his mother, who has already been in a state of shock since her husband's unnatural death, loses sanity and in insane fury, strangles Saralata, Bindumadhab's wife. She soon regains her senses, realises her folly and out of shock, dies. The play ends with Bindumadhab lamenting over the death of his father, mother, brother and wife.

The story is more sensational and pathetic than tragic. Evidently the dramatist had a limited objective to project the sufferings of helpless peasants and to mould public opinion against the planters. The plot and characters are only a means to that end. This explains why there is no central character in the play. Dinabandhu was trying to project a real situation as realistically as he could. This was at a time when naturalism was a far cry and poets and dramatists were rather pre-occupied with heroic themes than with contemporary social problems. This play, with its bold naturalistic portrayal of real people, was a complete departure from the accepted literary norms and became instantly popular.

It is not that all the characters in the play are well-drawn. Dinabandhu seems more at home in his portrayal of the peasants or of the people of the lower stratum. For instance, Aduri or Torap appears more authentic than Nabinmadhab or Sabitri. He is completely free from affectation when he portrays a peasant and can use forceful language with a local flavour. Many characters of the upper classes, on the other hand, speak an affected circumlocutory language, and inasmuch as they do so they suffer from a lack of animation.

NIMBARKA (Sanskrit), also known as Nimbaditya or Niyamananda, is the founder of a distinct Vaishnavite sect, called 'Sanakadi' or 'Hamsa'. Though an attempt was made to identify him with Bhaskara, a reputed philosopher and commentator on the Brahmasutra of the 9th or the 10th century A.D., it is now commonly accepted that he lived either in the 12th or the 13th century. His life is shrouded in supernatural mysteries and he is said to be the incarnation of Vishnu's 'chakra' (disc). In any case he flourished at a time when various cults and sects were coalescing in the Vishnu-Krishna complex of worship. The members of the sect founded by him worship Krishna and his consort, Radha.

It is believed that Nimbarka composed several treatises of which, however, only seven are now available. They are (i) Vedantaparijatasaurabha (commentary on the Brahmasutra) (ii) Vedanta Kamadhenu or Siddhantaratna or Dashashloki; (iii) Mantrarahasyashodashi; (iv) Prapannakalpavalli (v) Radhashtakam (vi) Krishnashtakam and (vii) Pratahsmaranastotram. Besides these seven, the names of three other books may be given on the strength of extraneous references. Purushottama Acharya refers to a book named Sadacharaprakasha, a treatise called Prapattichintamani, and a monograph called Gitavakyartha. Besides, according to his sect's tradition, Nimbarka had to his credit another huge work called Rahasyamimamsa of which the above-mentioned Mantrarahasyashodashi and Prapannakalpavalli constituted two volumes, while the remaining volumes have been lost. It is also conjectured that Nimbarka wrote two separate commentaries on the Upanishads and the Bhagavatapurana.

Dashashloki (i.e. Siddhantaratna or Vedantakamadhenu) is a brief dogmatic work, but one can have enough information from it on the basic doctrines of the sect. We find that Nimbarka's philosophy was, to a great extent, based on that of Ramanuja. Both of them shared the fundamental belief that though the creator and the created souls are distinct, they are essentially one with what is Omnipresent and Omnipotent. This is the notion of 'Dvaitadvaita'. Besides, both Ramanuja and Nimbarka put emphasis on devotion to Krishna as a path of reaching the ultimate goal of liberation from the cycle of rebirth. In Nimbarka's conception, devotion is total surrender because there is no other way to be blessed with divine grace, without which no liberation is possible.

It has to be specially noted that, unlike Ramanuja, Nimbarka does not blend philosophy with religion. Thus, in Vedantaparijatasaurabha, his commentary on Brahmasutra and also his best work when he takes up his subject from the standpoint of philosophy, he takes much care to address 'Brahman' as 'Paramatman' or 'Purushottama' only in a very restricted sense. But when he discusses it from the viewpoint of his own sectarian theology, 'Brahman' comes to be equated with Brahmanic Vishnu, Krishna, etc. At any rate, he sought to extend and develop the doctrines of Ramanuja by allowing a semi-independent position to the individual soul and the inanimate universe.

Nimbarka thinks that Jiva and Jagat are distinct from Brahman only in the limited sense of their evolution from his force (Shakti). Both of them exist in the Supreme Soul in a subtle form which assumes a gross physical frame in the mundane world of phenomena. But they always remain essentially united with the Supreme Soul and no detachment is ever possible. Thus it is rightly said that Nimbarka's doctrines have combined the Vedantic monism with a modified pluralism. As we have already stated, only a true devotee is believed to be qualified for divine grace.

In short, Nimbarka basically subscribes to the three cardinal principles of Vedantic monism, viz., Brahman or Supreme Self, Chit or Jiva or individual soul, and Achit or inanimate. The inanimate objects are again threefold: (a) those which originated from 'prakriti', (b) those which did not originate from it, and (3) time. When the controlling mechanism of prakriti is relaxed by divine grace, the Jiva is able to discover its true nature and the final as well as complete separation is attained. According to Nimbarka, Brahman is All-powerful and thus the sole creator, nourisher and destroyer of this universe. He is the supreme administrator of this mundane world. Here one may as well find the echo of Upanishadic conceptions: 'bhayadasya agnistapati bhayattapati suryah', 'mahad bhayam vajramudyatam', 'etasyava aksharasya prasasane gargi suryachandramasau bidhratau tisthatah', etc. However, it is obvious that Nimbarka's God is not simply terrible. He is also infinitely beautiful, blissful and merciful. Though all the Vedantic schools have generally accepted Brahman as terrible and delightful, they differ in determining as to which one is more prominent. Ramanuja and Madhva emphasise the former aspect while Nimbarka and Vallabha the latter.

Nimbarka's 'svabhavika dvaitadvaitavada' is basically inclined towards bringing about a synthesis between the conceptions of difference and non-difference, Vishnu, innate purity and extrinsic rituals, knowledge and devotion on the planes of philosophy, theology, ethics and practical religion respectively. The philosophical literature of Sanakadi sect, established by Nimbarka, was further enriched by some of his illustrious successors.

NINDA KAVITAKAL (Malayalam), a collection of poems by N.V. Krishna Warrier, was first published in 1948. The publication of this collection marked the dawn of a new era in Malayalam poetry.

Romanticism, with its exuberance of sentimentalism, had reached such a dangerously unhealthy stage that a major treatment was inevitable to regain the verve and vigour of poetry. It was Krishna Warrior's pen that carried out this operation successfully. Through his conscientious efforts, he led Malayalam poetry back from the unreal and imaginary world of romanticism to its own domain of natural simplicity and broad reality. His insight into life was novel. He adopted new technique, new language and new style. This, quite naturally, inaugurated a new revolution in Malayalam poetry.

Ninda kavitakal (Long poems) contains six long narrative poems. The first, 'Oru pazhaya pattu' (An old song) deals with the story of a tribal youth who questioned the age-old customs and practices in society and laid the foundation of a cultural revolution. On a dark night the tribesmen, with their king and his young beautiful daughter, reach the temple of Goddess Kali on the seven hills for the usual worship of giving in sacrifice one among them, to be selected by the Goddess herself. An unseen calamity in nature was taking shape. Earthquake and land-slide were impending. In the tumultous atmosphere, the king's daughter was declared selected and she was about to be sacrificed. An adventurous tribal youth jumps forward, thundering:

> To Goddess, or anybody, whoever that be.
> He, who touches the King's own pet
> Who is to see her sixteen yet,
> Will, doubtless be to my sword a prey.

He turned and kicked at the image of Kali. The earth quaked, lightning flashed, thunder roared, and in the ensuing landslide everything was completely destroyed. The superstitious may consider the tragedy a punishment by Kali. But the disturbance in nature had started earlier and the finale was just a coincidence. A primitive heart will attribute every natural calamity to the influence of some wrathful gods. When superstition wields power and is the agent for punishment, the innocent suffer and the tragedy leaves behind a deep impression of their pathetic plight.

'Anakkaran' (Mahout) is the next poem which reveals the deep and intricate psychology of human heart. Here we find a realistic picture of an anti-social element the society fears and hates. In this tragedy the poet criticises indirectly the unthinking and unfeeling society that does not bother about the circumstances which created him.

The next poem 'Teevandiyile pattu' (A song in the train) deals with the romantic love of a wandering snake-charmer for the charming daughter of a millionaire-merchant. The Rameshwar beach is the setting. The poet here throws the enchanting flute of romanticism into the fire and sends back Malayalam poetry to its natural dwelling of realism and folk-lore. The inevitability of man's duties leads him to unavoidable self-torture. He is cursed to burn all his desires in the sacred fire of duty. The insight into human psychology is the essence of the poem.

'Engineer', the next poem, tells the story of an engineer, an Englishman, in charge of the construction of a bridge, who laughs at the suggestion that the bridge will become stable only if it is fixed in human blood. But fate has it that the foundation stone is fixed in the blood of the engineer himself. A youngster shoots the engineer while the latter is inspecting the base of the bridge, because the engineer violated his sweet-heart.

'Alexis Punnyavalan' (Saint Alexis) and 'Madirasiyil oru ratri' (A night in Madras) are the two remaining poems. It was the time when the poets glorified spiritual love to such an extent as to negate worldly life. With his profound scientific realism, Krishna Warrier wanted to attack this. The tender-hearted, religious-minded Alexis, tormented by Oedipus complex, leaves his house on the very day of his marriage, wanders in different places seeking peace and doing long penance.

In 'Madirasiyil oru ratri' we experience the boiling sarcasm and biting satire of the poet with all its pinch and peel. A pre-Independence poem, it clearly speaks of the pathetic conditions of the Indians under foreign yoke and also of the natural, uncontrollable feelings of the common men then.

Ninda kavitakal gave a shock-treatment and awoke Malayalam poetry from its lethargy, using a language, rhythm and style akin to folk-songs and suited to the poet's themes. That is why he is described as 'the conscience of the time'. A poet according to him should be both a seer and a creator and Ninda kavitakal and his subsequent poems clearly prove him to be both.

NINGOMBAM, IBOBI SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1921), a notable playwright, actor and teacher of Manipuri, read only up to the 8th standard and became a teacher at a primary school. He worked in several schools and retired as Head Pandit. He is well-read in Bengali, Sanskrit and Hindi. Ramayana sheireng (The Ramayana in verse), Mahabharata sheireng (The Mahabharata in verse), Sati mari (Four satis), a poetic composition Punshi akhomba (a collection of biographies), Meghnadbadh kavya (a translation from Bengali of Michael Madhusudan Datta's Meghanadbadh kavya), Natya amasung mancha, (a book on the theatre and the stage), Ram rajya (a play) and Karnagi mama amasung karanagi aroiba yahip (Mother of Karna and the last sleep of Karna) are some of his important works. The last mentioned won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983. A noted writer of radio-plays, he wrote Nupigi michangda Gandhari (Gandhari on the side of woman), Nupida langjaba Kichak (Kichak who wronged a woman), Ekalabya, Subhadra huba (The abduction of Subhadra), Gandharina Srikrishnada shap tuba (Gandhari's curse on Srikrishna), Manipurda Babhrubadhan tuba (The defeat of Babhrubahan in Manipur), Karnagi dan (The gift of Karna) and Sati Sabya. Singh's language is evocative and rich. He is also interested in painting and music. From his early years his eyesight has been bad and now he is completely blind. He has to take the help of others to write. He received the State Government Award for the best teacher in 1974, and the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad honoured him with the title of 'Sahitya Bhusan' in 1981.

NINGTHOUROL LAMBUBA (Manipuri; 17th century) is a chronicle in ancient Meitei script containing accounts of tours, expeditions, etc. made by the kings of Manipur. It also contains several other anecdotes and descriptions of incidents. These accounts were maintained by Pandits in the royal palace of Manipur. The entries go back as early as A.D. 33 when Pakhangba ascended the throne of Manipur. The book gives accounts of invasions by kings of Manipur on the neighbouring countries, their encounters with foreign powers, and tours they made to several parts of their country for administrative purposes and for pleasure. In several entries comments on the character and conduct of kings and accounts of the activities of certain queens also figure. Though this book records several important incidents and events, it does not mention the year of the recording or the time when the individual kings flourished. It contains accounts of important socio-cultural and religious events and anecdotes to which several place names owe their origin. A comparative study of Ningthourol lambuba and Cheitharol kumbaba is useful in understanding the history, society, culture and religion of the people of Manipur in different periods of time.

It is evident from the use of relatively new words in the entries related to ancient times, and from the reference to later anecdotes, incidents and names of kings in the entries pertaining to earlier kings, that the book was composed at a later period of time. The cumbrous, pedantic style and the longwinded sentences such as the book exhibits were popular towards the later part of the 17th century. They indicate that Ningthourol lambuba must have been written towards the later part of the 17th century.

NIRALA KI SAHITYA SADHANA (Hindi) is a stupendous work by Ramvilas Sharma in three volumes published in 1969, 1972 and 1976 respectively. Ramvilas and Nirala have had a long personal intimacy with each other, and therefore it was possible for Ramvilas to offer such a thorough and penetrating study of one of the greatest and most creative writers of our times.

The first volume of this magnum opus is a biographical study of Nirala the man, his social setting, and the makings of a great poet. The story begins with an account of Garhkota, the family background of Nirala, and the sturdy people of Baisawada with their faith in Hanuman and Tulsi's Ramayan, their hardihood and caste parochialism. Suraj Kumar Tewari, son of Jamadar Ram Sahay Tewari and grandson of Sidhari Pandit of Maheshadal (Bengal), comes of this background. He changes his name to Suryakant Tripathi and later to Nirala. He loses his mother in early childhood and is brought up under the stern discipline of his father. Ramvilas examines Nirala's early life in the light of the poet's own testimony about himself as revealed in his letters and memoirs, and references in contemporary journals. The biographical study thus acquires a ring of authenticity, and we see Nirala's struggle in life and the growth of his mind and art. Incidentally, this was the period in his life when his literary output was at its best, and he gave us such works as Sarojsmriti, Tulsidas and Ram ki shakti puja. Ramvilas writes with feeling and insight, and he gives us not only the history of a man but through him he re-creates the history of a whole literary epoch.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The second volume of the book is an evaluation of Nirala's total literary output. Ramvilas has tried to analyse Nirala's writings in the light of Lenin's theory of inner contradictions, and he brings out many contradictions inherent in the thoughts, experiences, and art of Nirala. He observes that Nirala himself had a rare gift of perceiving them. Ramvilas, in fact, characterizes 'Chhayavad' itself as a literature of inner contradictions in modern Indian culture.

Ramvilas stresses further that except Premchand no Hindi writer brings into focus the anti-feudal aspects of Indian revolution as powerfully as Nirala does. His humanism is part of his revolutionary idealism. He is not only a poet of beauty but also of sorrow and suffering. His later poems are resonant with the still, sad music of humanity. The two volumes establish Nirala as the most outstanding poet of Hindi after Tulsidas.

The third volume consists of Nirala's correspondence—letters by him as well as those written to him—and comments on the published letters by Nirala himself. The data given ought to enlarge our understanding of the life of Nirala and the creative processes of his mind and art. The book won Ramvilas Sharma the Sahitya Akademi award for 1970.

'NIRALA', SURYAKANT TRIPATHI (Hindi; b. 1896, d. 1961) was one of the three greatest poets belonging to the Chhayavad era of Hindi poetry. He was born as Surajkumar Tewari in a Kanyakubja Brahmin family of Uttar Pradesh, but changed his name to Suryakant Tripathi, and later, in 1923, he took the pseudonym Nirala. Formally, he studied only up to Matriculation, but acquired a good knowledge of Hindi, Bengali, Sanskrit and English on his own. By the time he was 20 he lost almost all his dear ones and was left alone to fend for himself, his four orphaned nephews and his motherless son and daughter. All his life, he had to roam from one place to another in his struggle for surivival. The earlier part of his life was spent in Bengal, and as such he came under the influence of two cultural waves, one led by Rabindranath Tagore and the other by Swami Vivekananda. These influences, along with his own deep roots in native tradition and culture, are evident in his earlier collections of poems, Anamika (The nameless one, 1923), Parimal (Fragrance, 1930), Gitika (Songs, 1936), and the second edition of Anamika (1938), which was actually a new collection with entirely different poems. Nirala took the themes of his poems from various sources—Puranas, history, religion, nature, contemporary social and political questions, and above all his own imagination.

A new aesthetic sense, a love of nature, an attraction towards the mystical and the abstract, an insistence on the personal view-point, and a certain freedom of form and content in writing, were some of the dominant characteristics of Chhayavad, qualities reflected in the poems of Nirala. Braving all opposition and ridicule, he was a pioneer in the use of blank verse in his poems and thus asserted his freedom from the bondage of rhymed metres. His conception of beauty is earthy, but at the same time it transcends the limits of flesh as seen in his poems 'Juhi ki kali', 'Preyasi' and 'Rekha'. In his mystic poems like 'Tum aur main' and 'Payala' the influence of Vedantic thought is clearly visible. The themes of Rama ki shakti puja and Tulsidas (1938) are mythological and historical respectively, but their treatment endows them with an epic grandeur. In his nature poems, Nirala gives beautiful word pictures, mainly of clouds and spring. In Gitika as well as in his later collections, Anima (1943), Apara (1946), Archana (1950), Aradhana (1953) and Git-gunj (1954) philosophy gives way to devotion and resignation. Long before progressivism was accepted as a trend in literature, Nirala had written poems like 'Bhikshuk', 'Bahu', 'Deen', and 'Vah todti patthar', which were full of sympathy for the oppressed. In Kukurmutta (The mushroom, 1942) and Naye patte (New leaves, 1946) this sympathy comes to the forefront. In the poems of these volumes, Nirala makes humorous or sarcastic attacks on rich exploiters, self-styled progressives, smug intellectuals, etc. His language and style also undergo a radical change, and the Sanskritized diction of his earlier poems gives way to a racy, earthy colloquialism of the man in the street.

Nirala has used various metres and verse-forms in his poems. In Bela (1943) he tried his hand at ghazal also. His language and ideas, at places, have been thought of as incoherent but, on the whole, he has a remarkable command of languge and matches it exquisitely with rich ideas.

Known mainly as a poet, Nirala was a prolific prose writer also. He wrote quite a few novels: Apsara (1931), Alaka (1933), Nirupama (1936), Prabhavati (1936), Choti ki pakar (1947) and Kale karname (1950). Sarkar ki ankhen and Chameli (incomplete) were left unpublished. His Kulli bhat (1939) and Billesur bakariha (1941) are regarded by some as novels, but in fact they belong to the category of reminiscent sketches rather than novels. Nirala's stories were published in five collections: Lily (1933), Sakhi (1935), Sukul ki bibi (1941), Chaturi chamar (1945) and Devi (1948). These collections also contain some real life-sketches. His essays on literary as well as socio-political topics are found in four collections: Praban- dha padma (1934), Prabandha pratima (1940), Chabuk (1950) and Chayan (1957). Besides some of the essays in these collections, Ravindra kavita kanan (1928) and Pant aur Pallav (1949) are works of literary criticism. Nirala had also written three plays, Samaj, Shakuntala and Usha-Aniruddha, which remained unpublished. Besides creative literature, Nirala had written lives of great puranic and historical figures of India like Dhruva, Rana Pratap, Ramakrishna Paramahamsa, and Vivekananda. He wrote a commentary on Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas and translated a part of the Manas in Khari boli. He also wrote an abridged version of the Mahabharata. Among his translations, he reproduced the teachings of Ramakrishna and Vivekananda in Hindi; translated some Vedic literature and Vatsyayana's Kamasutra from Sanskrit and eleven novels of Bankimchandra, and Rajayoga of Vivekananda from Bengali. Like Tagore's and Jaishankar Prasad's, Nirala's genius found its expression in various forms and fields.

NIRANJANA (Kannada; b. 1924), whose real name is Kulukunda Sivarav, is a Kannada novelist, short story writer and journalist, normally associated with the progressive movement in Kannada literature, which flourished during the mid decades of the present century. The rebellion against social injustice and religious hegemony—an ever-present theme in his works—had its mainsprint in the turbulent years of his early adolescence. This was given a firm theoretical framework after his introduction to Marxism. He is one of the very few writers in Kannada with a background of active participation in the leftist underground movement. He was a member of the Communist Party of India till the early fifties. Now he leads a life confined to intellectual activities, owing to physical constraints.

His major novels include Vimochane (Deliverance, 1953), Rangammana Vathara (1954), Banasankari (1954), Chirasmarane (Eternal memory, 1955), Swami Aparampara (1963) and Mrityunjaya (1976). Many of them are translated into various Indian and foreign languages. Chirasmarane and Mrityunjaya are his most celebrated novels. The former is based on the real life incidents that took place in Kayyur, a village in Kerala. It is a poignant account of the birth and growth of class consciousness among the peasants of an illiterate community. The martyrdom of the heroes is depicted in moving terms. In Mrityunjaya he has portrayed the saga of a peasant rebellion in ancient Egypt. Svami Aparampara and Kalyana Svami are attempts to capture the spirit of nationalistic struggles in a feudal set-up.

His characters are vibrant with life, though they run to types—black and white characters, representing good and evil. His style is extremely lucid and emotional. He avoids being melodramatic when writing at his best. The upsurge of the modern movement has hindered the proper evaluation of his works.

He is a journalist of long standing. He has served in editorial posts of various magazines, e.g., Rashtrabandhu (1941-43), Prajamata, (1945) and Janashakti (1947-49). He was the Bangalore correspondent of INFA during 1964-68.

He edited Jnana gangotri, a mammoth seven-volume encyclopaedia for youngsters. He has also edited Vishwa katha kosha, a twenty-five volume venture containing translations of stories from all over the world.

He has translated a number of Russian classics into Kannada, notably those of Maxim Gorky and Anton Chekhov. The Karnataka University conferred on him the degree of D. Litt. (honoris causa) in 1990.

NIRANJANA, ANUPAMA (Kannada; b. 1934) is a leading novelist of multifarious talents in Kannada literature. Her prolific pen so far has produced 45 works on diverse themes. Anupama received her M.B.B.S. degree in 1956 from Mysore Medical College. She was married to Niranjana, a renowned novelist and a progressive writer. Anupama Niranjana has 20 novels to her credit. The major ones are Ele, Madhavi, and Ghosh. Ele deals with the struggles and aspirations of a weaving community in a little town. The story of Madhavi is woven round a puranic tale, describing the exploitation of women even in the Mahabharata period, while Ghosh depicts the struggle between a dictator and ordinary people.

Anupama has widely contributed to children's literature. Dinakkondu kathe is a collection of 365 stories taken from the puranas, Panchatantra and Indian folk tales. She has so far published eight collections of short stories. Among them Pushpak and Onduginiya kathe are worth mentioning. Her major works have been translated into most of the South Indian languages.

Being a doctor by profession, Anupama has blended her medical knowledge with literature. As a result she has composed eight books of great use for the common people in their day-to-day life. Tayi-magu covers the problem arising during pregnancy and childbirth.

Dampatya dipika is a very useful guide to married couples. Arogya bhagyakke vyayam and Shaishavada dipika are other works which have enjoyed popularity among the Kannada reading public.

The novelist availed herself of her visits to America and Europe in her two well-known travelogues, Sneha yatre and Angaiyalli euro America. These books are remarkable for their graphic descriptions of foreign countries.

Nenapu sihi kahi, an autobiography of the writer, won her the Tirumalamba National Award in 1987. She is also the recipient of three more awards, viz., Karnataka Sahitya Academy Award in 1978, Soviet Land-Nehru Award in 1978 and Karnataka Rajyotsava Award in 1981.

Anupama Niranjana had the honour of presiding over Mahila Sammelan at Kasargod and Mahila Goshti of Kannada Sahitya Sammelan in Bombay.

NIRANJANI, HARIDAS (Hindi; b. 1455, d. 1543). The Niranjani sect of Rajasthan is one of the major branches of the Nirgun school of devotion. Its founder, Haridas Niranjani, is also known as Haridas of Didwana. He was born in the village of Kaprod, near Didwana in Rajasthan. 'Davistanul Mahahib' describes him as a Jat belonging to the group of Benidas Sankhla, but the Niranjani saints describe him as Sankhla Rajput.

Haridas was a boy of violent temper, but divine inspiration brought about a sudden change in his life. The scriptures of the sect attribute this transformation to the influence of Gorakhnath. He went through a course of rigorous ascetic discipline and in due course rose to be a propounder of the Niranjani sect of worship. Absolute Brahm is Niranjan; He is the Nirakar (formless) Ram, and His worship is the be-all and end-all of being.

To disseminate his teachings, he travelled far and wide, and preached devotion to the 'Nirguna' Lord. A devotee of his sect, Raghunathdas, in his Parichayi, gives a versified account of his ramblings and miracles. He initiated 52 disciples and appointed 11 mahants.

We find references to 47 works by Haridas Niranjani but only some of them are available. His poetic compositions have a rich range and variety. Tuned to various ragas and raginis, 182 of his padas, 109 kundaliyas, 304 sakhis, 8 rekhtas, 12 karkhas, 3 artis and 4 shlokas are extant. His compositions have an unmistakable touch of Rajasthani that approximates to Khariboli.

Vi.S.

NIRANT (Gujarati; b. 1770, d. 1846). In his early life he was a great devotee of Krishna and wrote love songs about Radha and Krishna, but later in life he turned to monism.

In his poems we find a happy blending of devotional and philosophical doctrines. He has written lyrics in several metres like Sakhi, Kundalia, Jhulana, Chhapa, and Kafis. He has also made use of the several poetic forms in vogue at the time, such as 'var' (days), 'tithi' (dates) and 'mahina' (months). In his mahina he writes about the pangs of love Radha and Gopis suffer from on their separation from Krishna. The pangs increase month by month reaching the climax in the eleventh month. In the twelfth month Krishna arrives and the poem ends with the note of a happy union. In his philosophical poems he explains the doctrine of monism and abstract questions regarding soul, nature and Brahm. His significant contribution lies in his use of the letter-form in poetry, a form exploited convincingly for the exposition of the doctrine of non-dualism.

NIRDOSH, BANSILAL WALI (Kashmiri; b. 1928) is a short story writer and playwright. As a writer, he was influenced by his writer-reformist father, Tirth Kashmiri, and Dinanath 'Nadim', an eminent poet. He joined the 'National Conference Civilian Militia' after matriculating in 1945. He could not continue his college education. He left for Amritsar in search of livelihood. He had to work there as a rickshaw-puller, a newspaper vendor and a clerk in Sher-i-Bharat (ed. Gurdayal Singh Dhillon). Later, he worked on the staff of Naya zamana (Jalandhar) and lived in a commune along with Fikr Taunsvi, Makhmur Jalandhari and others. He wrote his first Urdu short story 'Aur kishti bahti rahi' (And the boat kept drifting) while working with Naya zamana. On his return in 1950, he worked as sub-editor of Khidmat, attended cultural conferences and meetings, and remained its Minutes Secretary till 1957. His prominent stories of this period are 'Khaj' (The rash) and 'Totaram ki vapsi' (The return of Totaram). He wrote his first Kashmiri short story, 'Sruk' (The complex), for All India Radio, Srinagar, as a script writer where he continues working even now as News Producer. His first short story collection, Bal marayo (O' I die, 1961), awarded by the Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy, is marked by deep observation and lively narration. Adam chhu yithay badnam (Man is no sinner, 1963) depicts human situation in the face of cruel destiny. Girdab (The whirlpool, 1973) brought him the State Academy Award in 1974, and the novel Akh daur (An epoch, 1974) is well-known for its detailed description of the feudal times during which the unwary people of the valley suffered. Nirdosh absorbed the influence of Premchand, Gorky and Dostoevsky through the study of these authors during his school days. He tried to initiate himself into the socialist ideology, but not finding himself 'truly and sufficiently dedicated' delinked himself from it. His short stories and radio plays, one of which, viz. 'Dan thar' (The pomegranate bough, 1976), was awarded a prize in the All India Radio play competition, display not only his distinct insight into the complex family relationships, but also a marked imprint of Maupassant and Gogol on his works.

aminations. His first story was published in 1937. Since then he has written more than 200 stories, published in several magazines and journals. He was editor of Maya from 1936 to 1940, and then the first editor of Manohar kahaniyan. Later, he joined the staff of the Sanskrit University of Varanasi.

Nirgun brings out in his stories the varied aspects of middle-class life and its weal and woe. Though his art is rooted in piety, he gives us an insight into complex human situations involving man's degeneration. His emphasis is on the essential goodness of human soul. This explains the popularity of his stories such as 'Chhota Doctor', 'Savan', 'Bahuji' and 'Jindagi'.

His characters may break down in their struggle of life, but they keep their sensibility and values intact. This is both his forte and his weakness. In spite of his traditional, style he has always sought new areas of sensibility.

Though Nirgun has written novels and poems also, his real strength lies in the realm of short stories. Many of his stories have been broadcast. Till date, seventeen collections of his short stories, including one in Russian translation, and four of his novels have been published. Many of them have won awards. His important collections of stories are Chhaya, Purti, Bahuji, Do kinare, Kaccha dhaga, Teela, Khoja, Pyar ke bhukhe, Tute sapne. Jindagi Lajavanti, Meri priya kahaniyan, Dayare, Darungi nahin, Katha sarita and Chhota Doctor. His two novels are Ye galiyan ye raste and Ek tha rajkumar.

NIRGUNA (Maithili) is a kind of tragic song prevalent in classical as well as folk literature. It has a definite theme and music of its own. It may be an elegy or a death song. It is generally sung by the followers of Kabir and the Nirankari cult, especially on the occasion of death and during the 'shraddha' ceremony. Whenever an ascetic, mendicant or saint dies, the group recitation of Nirguna is a must. It may also be sung at the end of a group kirtan or bhajan. The group recitation is generally accompanied by an orchestra, consisting of mridanga, jhal, majira, ektara, orini, etc. Now-a-days harmonium is also allowed. It is sung in chorus as well as solo. Generally the Gundaria mendicants of the Gorakh panth sing it on sarangi.

The theme of the Nirguna is spiritual and mystical. Transitoriness of body, inevitability of death, illusoriness of the world, eternity of soul and Brahm, etc. are the subject of the Nirguna songs. They encourage man to liberate himself from the bondage of worldly attachment and attain the status of Brahm. As a Nirguna song pertains to death, it engenders 'karuna bhava', but before the 'karuna' sentiment matures, it evokes 'shanta bhava', the feeling of harmony and poise. Some songs of Vidyapati effecting 'shanta rasa' may be regarded as Nirguna poems. In the Maithili dramas of Nepal a few songs of 'shanta rasa', called 'shariratha gita', were considered a must. As the subject-matter of 'shariratha gita' is identical with that of Nirguna, the former comes within the category of the latter. The influence of Kabir is manifest in Nirguna. Most of the Nirguna songs show Kabir's style of paradoxical sayings. Some of the Maithili Nirguna songs sung by the Kabir sect bear the name of Kabir as their author. Probably, they were interpolations, the songs having been composed by Maithili poets themselves.

A number of such Nirguna songs also bear the names of Dharmadas, Ramrupadas, Apuchhadas, Tulsidas, Surdas, etc. The famous Maithili saints, Saheb Ramdas and Lakshminath Gossain, have also composed a number of Nirguna songs. Some of the songs of Kavishwar Chanda Jha also come in this category. The music and tune of Niguna generally resemble those of 'samadauni' and 'udasi'. Some are sung in the tune of 'sohar', 'lagani' and 'barahmasa'.

NIRMALDAS FATEHCHAND (Sindhi; b. 1866, d. 1940) was born at Hyderabad in a family of educationists. Because of the family background, he imbibed all that was best in Hindu and Muslim culture. He was a great scholar of Sanskrit as well as Persian and Arabic, and a man of mystic leanings. In fact, he lived and moved like a true Sufi, absolutely non-attached to worldly affairs and was least interested in the mundane existence. Very often he was found in Muslim gatherings, especially during Muharrum, dressed in black. Even by Muslim scholars he was loved and adored. To a query as to why being a Hindu, he chose to be associated with Islamic discourses and disputations, he is reported to have responded in a typically mystic manner, 'The fundamental truth enshrined in all religions is the same. Is there any Hindu Truth, or Muslim or Parsi or Christian or Sikh Truth?' He was also deeply imbued with Hindu philosophical ideas and was reverentially devoted to Hindu seers and saints.

Because of his unquestioned linguistic mastery, the Government solicited his services as a censor during the First World War. In his literary magazine, Aina (Mirror), he published his own translation of some portions of Firdausi's Shahnama; this was in the beginning of the present century. His poems also used to appear in the D.J. Sind College miscellany. Only scholars deeply immersed in Sanskrit and Perso-Arabic vocabulary and phraseology can comprehend and grasp the import of his compositions, especially the prose.

Nirmaldas has left at least two fine works for us: Sarojini (1914) and Dalurai ji nagri (1944). The latter is one of the most erudite works in Sindhi, though consisting of only 84 pages, followed by three pages of quatrains and fifteen pages of glossary. Conscious of the profundity of his style, the learned seer had perhaps himself realised the imperativeness of glossary, without which young scholars would indeed have found themselves quite at sea. His style presents an astonishing harmony of Sanskrit, Persian and Arabic expressions.

It is in Dalurai ji nagri that Nirmaldas has revealed himself as a master of inimitable prose. His depiction of the paradise-like beauty of the palace and its gardens is in a style which is a literary marvel and which any scholarly writer may well emulate and envy.

NIRVANALILAVATIKATHA (Prakrit) was composed by Jineshvarasuri some time between 1025 and 1038 at the village of Ashapalli in Rajasthan. It contained some 18000 couplets, but the original text is not available. Dhaneshvarasuri, a Prakrit poet, has referred to it in his book Surasundarichariyam (1038) and has commended its beautiful rhymes, delightful descriptions of nature and appropriate figures, rhetoric and prosody.

The abridged translation of Nirvanalilavatikatha was done by Jinaratnasuri in 1284 under the title, Lilavatikathasara. It is still unpublished, but the manuscript is available in the manuscript library of Jaisalmer. The abridged translation preserves the gist of Nirvanalilavatikatha. It is divided into 21 chapters (utsahas) having 5350 stanzas. In was composed at Jabalipattan (Jalore, Rajasthan). According to this work, the subject-matter of the Prakrit book is as follows:

The king of Rajgiri, Sangharaja, and his queen, Lilavati, asked Jain Acharya Vijaysena about the events of their previous lives. The Acharya gave them the stories of King Vijayasena of Koshambi, his minister Jayashasana, priest Sura, chief trader of the town Puranda, and Sarthavaha Dhan. All these five persons were friends. The ill effects of violence and anger, falsehood and pride, theft and deceit, sensualism and lust, possession and greed are vividly described in this work. Hearing this story, Sangharaja, Lilavati and all others accepted the life of asceticism, and ultimately attained salvation (Nirvana). Perhaps, for this reason this story has been named Nirvanalilavatikatha.

As the original text of Nirvanalilavatikatha is not available, it is difficult to say anything about its literary value but its subject is quite interesting. It is full of the stories of previous lives, as is common in Prakrit narratives, and is written in a didactic style. We may compare the book with Kuvalayamalakaha of Uddyotanasuri also, but we can assess it adequetely only when we have the original Prakrit text with us, along with the abridged Sanskrit translation by Jinaratnasuri.

P.S.J.

NIRYUKTIS (Prakrit) are the oldest commentaries on the Jain canonical texts. They are aimed at removing doubts about the meaning of words used in the teachings of Lord Mahavira. Generally, they are in the form of mnemonic verses. Niryuktis by Bhadrabahu II (approx. 6th c.) on the following canonical texts are the oldest commentaries available: Avashyka, Dashavaikalika, Uttaradhyanani, Achara, Sutrakrita, Dashashruta, Kalpa (Brihatkalpa) and Vyavahara. Two more Niryuktis, Suryaprajnapi and Rishbhashitani are also ascribed to him, but they are not available.

The Niryukti, known as Oha or Ogha, is a part of Avashyakaniryukti, while Pinda is a part of Acharaniryukti. Since new discussions were included in them with the passage of time, they were given the status of independent texts. The Niryuktis on Brihatkalpa and Vyavahara are mixed with bhasyas and it is difficult to separate them, though the commentators of the bhasyas have tried to isolate some verses.

The Niryukti on Avashyaka is the oldest and has passed through many stages of development. At first it might have dealt with the six chapters of Avashyakasutra. In the beginning we have the discussion of Nandi, i.e., the five types of knowledge and the life of Mahavira, and then we are given the Jain Universal History also dealing with the life of 63 great men, which may be a later addition. The commentators recognise 257 verses as Mulabhasya.

The above mentioned Niryuktis were composed one after the other. If some thing is discussed in a previous Niryukti, it is not discussed again but only referred to. All the Niryuktis are documented, but Avashyaka Niryukti is the one which has bhasya, churni, and so many Sanskrit commentaries which show its importance in Jain literature. It has become a source book for a study of many traditional ideas which are found here for the first time. Apart from their significance as commentaries in view of the method employed therein, their contribution to Indian lexicography is also important.

Not much is known about the life of Bhadrabahu II, but tradition holds him as a brother of Varahamihira. He is said to have had a good knowledge of Astanganimitta and Mantravidya. He was also the author of Uvasaggahara. From Nisitha bhasya and its churni we learn that even before Bhadrabahu II there was Govinda Vachaka's Niryukti, though it is not available now. But it is possible that some of the gathas from Govinda Vachaka's Niryukti may have been included in the Niryuktis of Bhadrabahu II.

The details furnished in the Niryuktis are a source of many independent works of narrative literature in Prakrit and Sanskrit.

NISANI (Rajasthani) is a metre based on vowel marks. The term is believed to have been derived from the Persian word 'nisani', meaning a token of memory or a memorial. The metre, perhaps, originated in Punjabi, since the language of most of the nisanis carries a deep imprint of the Punjabi language. The very first writing in nisani was adopted by the Dhadis, the Muslim minstrels who once moved about frequently in Punjab and Rajasthan for the purpose of entertaining people with their songs and creative writings. Viramayan, the earliest known work in nisani metre, was composed by Dhadhi Bahadar. Thereafter, the metre was adopted by the charanas and others who took a fancy for it, finding it easier for narrative purposes. Normally, the metre consists of vowel marks of thirteen and ten in each line, but there are more variations found in a number of compositions where the vowel marks range between twenty-one and sixty-four. The treatises on prosody have classified the forms of nisani variously. Kavi Manch has given twelve forms in his Raghunath rupak, while Kishana Adha has enumerated fifteen in Raghuvar jasprakasha. These are 1. Garbhit nisani, 2. Dumala jangadi, 3. Dutiya dumila, 4. Suddha nisani jangadi, 5. Nisani maru, 6. Nisani var, 7. Nisani hansgat tatha rupmala, 8. Jhingar nisani, 9. Nisani sihatap, 10. Dutiya sihachali nisani, 11. Nisani sirkhuli, 12. Ghagghar nisani, 13. Dutiya ghagghar nisani, 14. Paidi nisani, 15. Machatathal tatha sohani nisani. This classification is mainly based on rhyming terminations and pauses on vovel marks. The total number of lines also range between ten to sixteen in a stanza. There is a natural flow in the whole stanza which makes the description of an event or feeling much impressive. Virmayan by Dhadhi Bahadar and Vivek var nisani by Gadan Keshodas are two of the most prominent nisani works.

NISAR AHMED, K.S. (Kannada; b. 1936), a noted Kannada poet and translator, became famous with the publication of his book of poems, Manasu Gandhi bazaru (1957). Since then, he has been in the forefront of the third generation of Kannada 'Navodaya' poetry. His poetry registered a new sensibility with the publication of Sanje aidara mele and Nenemba parakiya in the early seventies. The poems in these volumes reflect deep meditation about life as also the tranquillity of the Malnad region. The poems of this period reveal a craftsmanship akin to that of Navya school, which was then dominant. Ahmed's poetry mainly embraces the human environment as felt and seen in the life all around. Another aspect of his personality displayed for the first time in the poem, 'Amma ashara nanu', becomes authentic by its Muslim background. While in most of his poems he could not escape the Hindu milieu, in recent poems like 'Rangoli mathu maga' the two religious sensibilities are juxtaposed. In recent collections, Swayam seveya giligalu and Anamika anglaru there is an influence of Pablo Neruda. Ahmed's poetry is delightful with its skilful craftmanship. His poetry has been translated into a number of Indian and foreign languages. An acknowledged representative of the period when the Navya school flourished and then suffered its decline, he is also the first poet to have exploited the cassette culture and reached the common man through his beautiful lyrics. He has written a few critical essays and a monograph on Pablo Neruda. His translations of A Mid-summer Night's Dream and Othello were put on the boards and were well received. Ahmed presided over the Poets Meet held to mark the Diamond jubilee of Kannada Sahitya Parishat. He was awarded State honour on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee Celebration of the formation of Karnataka. He was President of the Karnataka Sahitya Academy (1984-1987). At present, he is Head of the Geology Department, Government Science College, Bangalore.

His Other Works: include—Poetry: Nenedavara manadalli, Sumuburta, Sanjeaidara mele, Nanemba parakiya, Ayda kavitegalu, Nityotsava (Lyrics); Essays: Idu bari bedagalle anna, Bari maryadastaretr. Children's Literature: Hakkigalu, Khanijagalu mathu shilegalu, Putta Santanu mattu kalegalu.

NISARGA (Kannada) is a novel by Mirji Anna Rao published in 1945. Though his first, it is, in the opinion of many critics, his best novel. It is a strikingly realistic novel. It tells the love-story of Ananta and Tara, ending in the death of both. While the early readers of the novel were moved by the tragic love-story, later readers have considered it somewhat sentimental but have admired the recreation of the rural life in the novel. The locale is a village in the northern part of Belgaum district. The novel recreates the life of the Jain community with its rites and rituals, its restrictions on women, and its values. The use of the dialect in the novel drew attention at once; the dialect is a part of the world it creates.

NISHITH (Gujarati) is Umashankar Joshi's third collection of poems published in 1939, which won him the coveted Jnanpith Award (1968). Setting forth at twenty in the 'realms of gold' with 'the auspicious word' coming from 'afar/echoing in the still silent domes of centuries', the poet, at seventy, arrives at the shore of silence saying, 'wait a bit/silence alone has the last word'. It is this silence, the silence of the music of the spheres, that envelopes Umashankar's finest poetry. Amidst the eternal music of infinite silences the title poem 'Nishith', an ode to the spirit of mid-night, seems to have been conceived. The awesome portrait of the night as a cosmic dancer on the stage of the world, under the moonlit and starlit dome, grows into a huge metaphor. The poet has, indeed, come of age and left behind, if not altogether abandoned, loud declamations of the poetry of protest in Gangotri and romantic exuberance in Vishwashanti. He remains for ever a romantic, but his poetic sensibility, the impact of Gandhi, and the idealistic temper of the 1930s inculcated in him a profound concern for a living reality, even though it might mean artistic compromise as in 'Nishith', presenting a decline from the heights of aesthetic joy to the bleak reality of the endless night of slavery. The cosmic dancer who sows 'in the clay of human consciousness/the seeds of dreams unique' is invoked as the 'conjurer of dawn' to awaken the nation from long slumber. The ode is not free from Shelleyan images and is symbolical in more than one way. It illustrates the nexus between tradition and individual talent in Umashankar who can, with ease and facility, combine the 'Vedic incantation' of classical Sanskrit metres with the mechanical rhythm of a late-night electric train. Rhythm is the poet's forte, and it greatly heightens the poem's audio-visual appeal. For sheer creative energy and flight of imagination 'Nishith' does not have many rivals in contemporary poetry. Central to our understanding of Nishith and its poet is 'Atmana khander' (Soul in ruins), the sonnet sequence, revealing a most fascinating poetic process of transforming a view of life into a vision of life, as the poetry turns increasingly more and more inward. It mirrors

> The vast territories of time and space
> Stretching boundlessly far and wide;
> But minus me—the cipher.

Here we see the romantic ego of a dreamer who dreams of conquering like Alexander but, as the poem progresses, comes to terms with reality. It is a journey from innocence to experience, illusion to actuality, art to life, but not without the ache of modernity. The poem inheres eternal themes like love, death and time. If 'Nishith' betrays Shelleyan influence, here we have echoes of Eliot: 'The moments present are sustained by the moments past/And the moments dead are alive in moments present.'

Love, truth and beauty are the terms that recur in Nishith with extraordinary frequency: 'After drinking deep in bueauty/The fountain of love will spontaneously sing.' Thus he writes in 'Nakhi lake', suggesting an unmistakable romantic approach to the poetic process. Thematically, the poet might be susceptible to Eliot or Pound, but unlike them he cannot be anti-romantic. His love poetry amply bears this out; but unlike a typical romantic poet, he does not let himself go. His love is restrained and dignified, yet it has some tender and memorable moments:

> How easily is the human heart broken?
> With words partly spoken
> And short silences.

His 'Virat pranay' (Cosmic love) is remarkable in the sense that love to Umashankar is not merely an affair to store on a shelf. It is, however, in his songs, some of which will live as long as people in Gujarat sing, that the poet seems to be in his true elements. Traditional folk tunes and images impart to the songs a rare distinction in modern poetry. 'Sabarno Gothiyo' (River's Comrade) is one of the finest Gujarati songs. The slow collapse of agricultural civilization and the rise of industry with its attendant evils have uprooted many a son of the soil. The protagonist leaves the idyllic countryside and comes to the city only to be alienated and ruined. His sole companion is the river he intimately knows and which he entreats to convey the tidings to hills and birds back home:

> But the river trembled a bit and ran;
> Dear me, do rivers ever return?
> The hills stood firm far off aloof
> And the cuckoos too lingered behind.

Umashankar's is the poetry not merely of evolutionary poetic consciousness but also of quest:

> We woke up the sleeping stream
> And asked for a song:
> We sought the song everywhere...

He fails to find it, but does not lose faith. He ends the book, singing:

> Leave not the song unsung half way O dear,
> Leave not the song unsung!

In new poetry, observes Umashankar in his preface to Nishith, the accent is on the essence, for 'in the passage of time the newness will fade away, but the poetic essence alone will be a sustaining lifeline.' Happily, even though there is tension between his poetic theory and practice, there is absolutely none between newness and poetry in Nishith, 'for that alone is beautiful which is every moment new.'

NISKULANANDA (Gujarati; b. 1766, d. 1848) was a monk of the Swaminarayan sect. He wrote Bhaktachintamani which depicts Sahjanand Swami, the founder of the Swaminarayan sect, as the manifestation of God. The book reveals the spiritual powers of the Swami. In his Dhirajakhyan he shows through illustrations from the lives of such mythological characters as Prahlad, Dhruv and Ranitdev how God, 'before accepting a devotee', puts him to various tests. In Bhaktinidhi (Treasure of devotion) he explains the importance of the path of devotion, and in Snehagit (Song of love) he depicts the love episodes of Krishna, Radha and the Gopis. Hundreds of his padas are very popular. His famous pada telling the devotees that 'Renunciation does not last unless backed by genuine aversion to sensuous pleasures' is sung widely by travelling mendicants. He is best known for padas which show the way to spiritual uplift.

NITI-KAVYA (Sanskrit) is a heterogeneous composition, consisting of a series of verses detached from each other, expressing in a felicitous diction and in a variety of melodious metres, the sorrows and joys of life, follies of men, wiles of women, right mode of life, futility of pomp and power, ethical and didactic maxims, proverbial philosophy, worldly behaviours, practical wisdom, etc., which spring from an intimate observation of men, manners and nature. Niti-kavya, thus, touches almost every sphere of human life and is conspicuous by creating a beautiful image through the help of simile or some natural phenomenon and crystallising it into epigrams. The didactic element running through the entire Sanskrit literature–the epics, prose novels, dramas, puranas, fables, etc.–comes directly to the surface in the niti-kavyas and distinguishes it from other literature.

The rudiments of niti-kavya can be traced to the Shunahshepa legend in the Aitareya Brahmana and in the Upanishadic literature wherein we come across epigrammatic stanzas bristling with morality and vanity of earthly pleasures. From the very early times, epigrams have been current in literary circles. They were collected in the form of 'shataka' (hundred) in due course of time. Some poets themselves composed shatakas, while others compiled them. The line of distinction between self-composition and compilation is not maintained in the shatakas. The shataka ascribed to one poet may not, thus, be his entire composition and there may occur interpolations of stanzas composed by others. Accordingly, in the shatakas we may notice a collector being an inventor or an inventor being a collector. For example, the niti-kavyas ascribed to Chanakya, the celebrated author of the Arthashastra, such as Chanakya-shataka, Chanakya-nitidarpana, etc. may not all be his own composition. In order to lend a stamp of authority to the works, they might have been associated with the name of Chanakya, while the composer of stanzas might have been some one else. Accordingly, in the niti-shatakas the identity of the original author is eclipsed. After Chanakya, Vararuchi, Ghatakarpara and Vetala Bhatta are believed to be the creators of niti-shatakas. Their works are, respectively, Niti-ratna, Niti-sara and Niti-pradipa. Among the most famous pieces of niti-kavya is the Niti-shataka attributed to Bhartrihari, which, on account of originality of thought and expression, stands unique among niti-shatakas. His other works on similar lines are the Vairagya-shataka and the Shringara-shataka. Bhartrihari has been a controversial personality and it has not yet been decided whether the poet Bhartrihari and the noted grammarian Bhartrihari were the same person. According to M. Winternitz, Bhartrihari is the first Indian poet to have become known to Europe. The Dutch Calvinist Missionary, Abraham Roger, translated his verses in the book, De Open Deuretot Het Verborgen Heydendom, published in Leiden in 1651. Bhartrihari cast a tremendous influence on the subsequent niti-kavya writers, but none surpassed him in skill since they moved only within the orbit of his model. A verse given below demonstrates the poetic skill of Bhartrihari:

Chhinnopi rohati taruh kshinopyupachiyate chandrah
Iti vimrishantah santah na vipluta loke

(The roots of a tree, even after its fall, may sprout again.
The moon, reduced to half, becomes full again. Similarly noble persons remain steady whether in trouble or in sorrow.)

After Bhartrihari we have Bhallata-shataka of the Kashmiri poet, Bhallata, who flourished under King Shamkaravarman (A.D. 883-902). The printed text of the poem contains 108 stanzas in a variety of lyrical metres. The work like other shatakas suffers from tampering and interpolation as one of Anandavardhana's verses is found in it. It is a pleasant poem on morals and is often quoted by Abhinavagupta, Kshemendra and Mammata. Another poet from Kashmir, known as Shihana, composed Shanti-shataka on the lines of the Vairagya-shataka of Bhartrihari and borrowed profusely from him. A great majority of his verses are found in anthologies like Sadukti-karnamrita. Another Kashmiri poet, one Shambhu, composed Anyoktimuktalata-shataka under King Harsha of Kashmir (1089-1101) in 108 stanzas which is not of much importance. Kusumadeva wrote Drishtanta-shataka which is named so as it illustrates each maxim by an example. Other works of less interest are the Bhava-shataka of Nagaraja and the Upadesha-shataka of Gumani. In the 17th century the noted scholar Panditaraja Jagnnatha composed Bhaminivilasa which, though an erotic poem, also contains some gnomic sayings. Shankaracharya is also said to be the author of Shata-shloki, a didactic poem containing 101 stanzas in which the teaching of Vedanta is preached in poetic language. The Chataka-shataka of an unknown author is an instructive ornate poem which is partly lyrical and partly didactic. To an unknown Bhatta Urvidhara are attributed some verses of gnomic character. Later, the scope of gnomic poetry widened and poems were composed on philosophical and erotic topics as well as on the style and pattern of gnomic poetry. Among them the famous works are the Kuttanimata of Damodaragupta, the Samaya-matrika of Kshemendra and the Mugdhopadesha of Jalhana.

There is a continuity of shataka literature and even in modern times beautiful shatakas are composed in which great events and lives of great men are narrated with poetic fervour along with gnomic spirit.

NITICHANDRIKA (Telugu). The author of this great prose work in Telugu is Paravastu Chinnayasuri (1806-1862), one of the greatest Telugu pandits of Andhra. Nitichandrika is a collection of stories (fables) knit together, based on the stories of Panchatantra and Hitopadesha. In the preface to this work the author conveys his intention to write four parts, viz. Mitralabhamu; Mitrabhedamu, Sandhi and Vigrahamu. But the later two parts, i.e. Sandhi and Vigrahamu, could not be completed before his death.

From the inception of the University of Madras in 1853, Paravastu Chinnayasuri took over charge as the first Head Telugu Master. On the eve of that honourable occasion he wrote his Nitichandrika and dedicated it to the then Vice-Chancellor of the University of Madras, Arbuthnot.

This prose work is the first of its kind which starts with such conventions as obeisance to God (Mangalam), praising the previous poets of eminence (Adi kavi stuti), wish of the poet in writing the work (Pragnadikamu), and then the commencement of the story (Katha parambhamu).

The story it deals with is as follows:

On the banks of river Ganga, there exists the city named Pataliputra. The ruler of this city is king Sudarshana. One day when he was in the company of some pandits, one among them recited the following poem:

palusandiyamulu dolachunu
velayindhu nagocharartha vignanamu loo kula kakshi shastra meyyadi yalavada devvaniki vaade yandhudu jagatin, (Nitichandrika)

(The shastras are not only the eye-openers of all the doubts of human beings but also make the unseen glitter. He who does not have that sight is the real blind person in this world).

When he recited this poem casually, the king thought of his sons who were wasting their precious time in meaningless gossip. The king, with the desire to educate his children, makes an appeal to the pandits—'Is there any person who can teach ethics to my sons who are uneducated?' Then the reply comes at once from a pandit, viz., Vishnu Sharma, who accepts the challenge and asserts that he can educate them within six months. Vishnu Sharma takes them to a place and thereafter he commences these moral stories one by one.

Nitichandrika consists of two parts, viz Mitralabhamu (Gains of friendship) and Mitrabhedamu (Differences in friendship). The parts consist of thirteen main stories and four minor ones. All the stories convey the philosophy of life, tinged with humour and satire. They are told through the characters of birds and animals.

Each and every story consists of many morals. The author wrote this prose work as an example for his later grammatical work Balavyakaranamu in Telugu. In the preface to Nitichandrika, the author says, "The students who read this work completely will achieve command over Telugu and will master the doctrines of morals".

Though Chinnayasuri adopts classical language in this prose work, still it is musical and pleasing to the ear. His fascinating style is enjoyable even though the classical language may be replaced by the spoken.

This prose work from its emergence till today rules over other prose-works, and it is a torch-bearer for later prose writers. Some of his contemporary writers were writing in colloquial language. Since the appearance of Nitichandrika by Chinnayasuri in 1853, classical Telugu was adopted by almost all scholars, especially by the Telugu pandits employed in high schools and colleges. It is not an exaggeration to say that Chinnayasuri became a model for prose-writing. Though Chinnayasuri evolved a standard prose-style which could be used for text-books, the later writers criticised his style as an artificial one. Despite this criticism Chinnayasuri is still remembered for his Nitichandrika which was a trend-setter in prose-writing.

collections of his short stories. Ilisha amagi mahao won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1974. Sandhya thaomeigi meiri is a translation from Bengali of Tarun Bhaduri's Sandhyadwiper shikha. Sovietki leibakta (In the land of the Soviets) is a travelogue which relates his experiences in the Soviet Union. His short stories are sentimental and melodramatic, and have an overdose of sensationalism. Sometimes he writes in a dialect of Manipuri which does not conform to the standard language. He received the Soviet Land-Nehru Award in 1977. He was the editor of Ima and Panjen, both quarterly journals, now defunct, and of Wakhal, a quarterly journal of the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti.

NONGTHOMBAM SRI BIREN (Manipuri; b. 1946) is a pioneer young poet of contemporary Manipuri literature. He passed the B.A. examination of Gauhati University in 1965 and joined the D.M. College of Arts and Commerce at Imphal where he works as a Senior Demonstrator teaching Manipuri language and literature. Leichillakki thaja (Moon behind the cloud), a collection of short stories, was published in 1967. Tollaba shadugi wakhal (Thought of the wretched animal), a collection of poems, was published in 1970. These poems are thematically, conceptually and linguistically unconventional. The book won him the Manipur State Kala Akademi Award in 1973. Hallakpa (The return), a short play, was published in 1973. A second collection of poems, Masina imphalgi warini (This is the story of Imphal), was published in 1978 and it contains poems occasioned by the evils of the prevailing social system, corruption in public life and the ugly facets of urban life. These poems are written in a language which is on the verge of obscenity and in a style which is pronouncedly modern. He is the founder Secretary of the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti, Imphal. He edited Wakhal and Sahitya, both quarterly journals. He was also one of the editors of Parishadki Manipuri sheireng lairik, an anthology of modern Manipuri verse. He is regarded as a leading contemporary young poet, who, with his unconventional themes and sometimes audaciously obscene language, represents the mood of the young Manipuri poets of the late sixties and seventies.

NOORNAMA (Kashmiri) is a verse-collection of Sheikh Noor-ud-Din Wali (1377-1441), commonly known as Nund Rishi, the great patron-saint of Kashmir. The book has been edited by Muhammad Amin Kamil (b. 1924). This verse anthology was for the first time published by Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages, Srinagar, in 1965, more than five hundred years after the death of the saint.

Before the publication of Noornama, some shruks (shruk is the Kashmiri form of Sanskrit shloka) of the Rishi were published from Srinagar in mid-forties in seven booklets of 32 pages each; but these booklets seemed to serve no purpose, for the unknown compiler of the booklets did not edit them in a systematic manner. No effort has been made to decipher the composition correctly. No source books have been consulted. The compiler has simply drawn upon the oral tradition and has collected the compositions from the professional reciters. For this matter Noornama is the first serious attempt at preparing a research-based compilation of the verses of Sheikh Noor-ud-Din, or Sheikh-ul-Aalm as he is referred to with reverance.

Noornama, in fact, is the original name of one of the Rishinamas of Baba Kamal of Chari Sharif, which was written about one hundred and fifty years back. This Rishinama is available only in a manuscript form. The manuscript is the first comprehensive collection of Nund Rishi's verses. In addition to this, the manuscript under reference is a compendium of events and episodes concerning the life of the saint, his disciples and the Muslim Rishi Order of Kashmir, which is an indigenous Sufi Order, deriving inspiration from Islam and other faiths of the land. Baba Kamal's Noornama contains the maximum number of saint-compositions. It contains some poems of Zain-ud-Din also. The learned author of this manuscript has devoted the last chapter of his book to Lal Ded in which he has given her biographical details and some of her 'Vakhs'.

The author of earlier Noornama has not referred to his sources anywhere in the book, but certain details in the manuscripts make us believe that, besides oral tradition, some other reliable sources had been at his disposal. At certain places Baba Kamal writes that the 'Mhamaskrti kalam (poetry loaded with Sanskrit words) is not understandable and I leave it alone'. Such references are an evidence to support the conjecture that he had some source material available which is not traceable now. Without some basic material it seems impossible to write a book of this nature in which dates, events, months and days have been recorded with firm conviction and authenticity. The linguistic analysis of saint-poetry included in this manuscript makes one conclude that some shruks attributed to the poet are only interpolations. It is highly probable that during the two centuries, i.e. after the Rishi's death till the first Rishinama of Baba Nasib-ud-Din (d. 1638) was recorded, the process of collection of material on the Rishi went on, certain facts faded out while others gained greater emphasis or fresh admittance, a sizeable number of verses got distorted while a few fake ones got roped in. Certain portions of the book are hagiographic in the treatment of the subject, but the importance of the book cannot be ignored, especially in the absence of another book of this kind. Baba Kamal was himself a descendant of Junid Rishi (seventh in succession). In this way he was directly connected with the Rishi doctrine and the Rishi Order of Kashmir. This evidence affixes another stamp of reliability on his book. In the absence of this Rishinama, the compilation of any anthology of Nund Rishi's compositions would not have been possible. Baba Khalil, the junior contemporary of Baba Kamal, has freely borrowed from him and as such he cannot be assigned an independent status.

Baba Khalil's Rishinama is the re-drafted version of Baba Kamal's Rishinama with slight changes here and there. The earliest Rishinama of Baba Nasib-ud-din Ghazi is more concerned with biographical details of Rishis and contains a negligible number of shruks of Nund Rishi.

The learned compiler of Noornama has most probably borrowed the name of this anthology from Baba Kamal's Rishinama, which he seems to have partially studied during the compilation of this book.

The title of Baba Kamal's manuscript, Noornama, is justified because it covers the whole range of multifarious activities of the great saint, while Noornama edited by Amin Kamal, the verse anthology of Nund Rishi, covers only one of the many aspects of his noble life.

The first edition of Noornama is spread over 304 pages, containing 275 shruks according to the numbering of the compiler. The compiler has written a comprehensive foreword to the volume in which he has discussed various aspects of the poetry of Nund Rishi and certain aspects of the Muslim Rishi Order of Kashmir.

The second paperback edition of the book appeared in 1968, in which no addition or alteration was made by the compiler. At present both the editions are out of print.

In the historical perspective, Noornama has an assured place in the history of Kashmiri literature. All the Rishinamas (books on Rishi Order of Kashmir) were not available to the compiler, Kamil. He had, therefore, to bank upon the scanty material at his disposal. The learned compiler gathered and deciphered the shruks of Nund Rishi from old Persian moth-eaten Rishinama and succeeded to a large extent in deciphering the shruks correctly. Kashmiri written in Persian script, particularly the old Kashmiri, is very difficult to read, because Persian script lacks the capacity to communicate with accuracy the intricate vowel sounds peculiar to Kashmiri.

Kamil no doubt left a good number of Nund Rishi's compositions out of the ken of his research, but in this he has an excuse that all the relevant source material was not available to him. He has, however, not been able to understand some of the words and phrases in the shruks of the saint; this may be due to the fact that the compiler had no knowledge of Sanskrit. However, the fact is that Noornama served as a stimulus to future research on the poetry of Sheikh Noor-ud-Din and resulted in the compilation of Kulliyat-i-Sheikh-ul-Aalm (ed. Motilal Saqi') in two volumes and published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages, Srinagar in 1980 and 1981.

There are some gross drawbacks in Noornama which cannot be ignored or overlooked. Some of the vakhs of Lal Ded have been assigned to Sheikh-ul-Alam without any justification. Although such vakhs categorically belong to Lal Ded on the basis of Baskara's compilation of Lal Vakhs, Baba Kamal and Baba Khalil's Rishinama and Nund Rishi's verse collection by Mir Abdullah. The inner evidence of these vakhs also proves that these are the compositions of Lal Ded. The very first shruk which appears on the 37th page of Noornama is a 'Lal Vakh'.

Some of the continuous poems of the poet have been divided in separate shruks in Noornama. Such poems can be classed as 'Vatsuns', because all such poems have a refrain which is repeated at the end of every stanza. The poems such as these include 'Kar bandan toshi khudiy', 'Bar khudiaya paph navar', 'Chuham chetas meharbana', 'Ti thuy mievar dito deva', 'Suyyia dapizi ta Mussalman', 'Krood no Mussalmans', and 'Ho zuva payas peata'.

It has wrongly been stated in the foreword that Nund Rishi's wife Zaid Ded was from Sagam. She was in fact from Dada Sara (Tral) which is supported by the evidence in a shruk attributed to Zaid Ded in Rishinama.

It can safely be said that Noornama constitutes the ground-work for deciphering the poetry of Sheikh-ul-Aalm.

NOTUN IHUDI (Bengali; 1956) is a play by Salil Sen. It alludes to the exodus of the Israelites in quest of the promised land and their perilous journey under the leadership of Moses, and unfolds poignantly the agony, the suffering and the humiliation involved in the exodus of the Bengalis from East Bengal in the wake of the partition of India. These unfortunate people suddenly lost their homes and hearths and set out in search of a new homeland:they set out with hopes and dreams, but at the end of their journey their hopes disappeared and the dreams turned into nightmares. At the end they were not the same men again, for they had seen the worst of men—the treachery, the cunning, the cruelty and the indignity. They emerge as social rebels, vowing to change the social order and to restore to man his dignity and his right. This is the theme or the message of the play.

The story centres round the family of a Pundit who used to teach Sanskrit in a primary school. He sells his house for a petty amount of money and sets out. The money is quickly spent as the man has to support a family of five persons which includes his wife, two sons and a daughter. Dukihya, the eldest son, is half-witted. He slips into the gang of some pickpockets and becomes an addict to narcotic drugs. Mohan, the younger son, gets a job in a mill but he is upbraided for this by Mahendra, a political activist who has connections with the labour movement. Mohan defends himself saying that he cannot afford to be moralist as his father is dying, his brother has fallen in the clutches of pickpockets, his sister is in rags and his mother is pining away. The story moves on and at the end, Puni, the daughter of the Pundit, unable to bear the hardship any more, goes away with Jatin, a depraved man, who works for the lascivious rich. The Pundit dies. From Pakistan comes his gratuity, but Mohan refuses to accept it. It is Mahendra who spells out the future programme: they must punish the cruel people responsible for their misery. They must work for a society in which there will be no class and no exploitation.

NOVEL (Assamese). The first experiments in the novel -form in Assamese were made by the Western missionaries for evangelical purposes from the fifties to the seventies of the nineteenth century. But all of them were translations either from English or from Bengali. None of these attempts, however, could succeed from the point of view of art. The same thing can be said of the two attempts made by two Hindu natives in the seventies and the eighties, Hemchandra Barua and Padmavati Devi Phukanani, though both these writers showed a zeal for social reform.

It is really in the last decade of the nineteenth century that proper Assamese novels came to be written. The authors were Padmanath Gohain Barua, Lakshminath Bezbaroa and Rajanikanta Bardoloi. In Gohain Barua's Bhanumati (1891) we see for the first time the uneasy course of unfulfilled mundane love. Whereas Gohain Barua and Bezbaroa wrote social novels set against a historical background, Rajani Bardoloi's first novel Miri-jivari (The Miri maid, 1894) was a regional novel depicting the life and society of the Miching tribe of Assam. With this work in which the author for the first time handled plot and portrayed characters with some amount of success, the Assamese novel gained its footing. As Bardoloi, after sixteen years, went over from this regional novel to the history of Assam, he established himself as a master novelist. Of his historical novels, Manomati (1901) is the best. As we come from the twenties to the thirties of this century, we notice a new trend. This trend was initiated by Dandinath Kalita with his socio-political novel, Sadhana (1928). We see in this novel the reflection of the Gandhian ideal of social reconstruction of the time. Another novelist to take up the contemporary issue of the Gandhian social and political ideal was Daibachandra Talukdar. His first and the best novel, Apurna (Unfulfilled, 1931), carries Kalita's Gandhian theme farther and reflects the non-violent freedom movement also along with the movement for social reconstruction.

In the works of Birinchikumar Barua, the Assamese novel sees its fruition. In his two novels he explores the depths of the human heart and gives a highly satisfactory expression to the traditionally rural Assamese mind and ideal ravaged by the onslaught of time that brought in urbanization. It was he who, for the first time, successfully internalized the action of the Assamese novel. Barua wrote his first novel, Jivanar batat (On the road of life, 1945), under the pen-name of Bina Barua and his second and last novel, Seuji patar kahini (Story of the green leaves, 1958), under the pen-name of Rasna Barua.

Barua, whose novels came out after the War, was in spirit a pre-War novelist. The period after the Second World War was the beginning of the Modern Age in Assamese literature. The disillusionment caused by the War and the bitter fruits of freedom gained newly with so much of hope marked this period. Besides, there were new experiments in technique borrowed from the West, exploration of the mind in terms of Freudian psychology and treatment of philosophical and political themes as in the contemporary Western novels. Thus the Modern Age came with Prafulla Dutta Goswami's two novels. His second novel, Kencha patar kampani (Quivering of the green leaves, 1952), is one of the few good and very significant novels in the language. Here Goswami eschews events of public significance for the building up of his plots and uses events of private significance, bidding good-bye in the process to the practice of telling a story like the Western 'moderns'.

Though a contemporary of Goswami, Syed Abdul Malik chose to remain traditional in technique. He is generally romantic in spirit, though like Goswami, he, too, takes on a leftist attitude in some of his novels with his sympathy for the downtrodden. With his romantic tone, sympathy for the exploited and his language which has a magic touch, Malik achieves spectacular result in some of his novels like Aghari atmar kahini (The story of a bohemian soul, 1969) where he portrays the decadent Assamese middle class.

Birendra Kumar Bhattacharyya is a political novelist with socialist ideas. The struggle for freedom (Mrityunjay, 1970) and the injustice the natives suffered at the hands of the British capitalists (Pratipad, 1970) are two of his themes. His Iyaruingam (The Government of the people, 1960), based on the Naga political situation in the pre-Independence period, showed very effectively and in a prophetic manner how the forces of violence which seemed to win at the time would ultimately be defeated and the Gandhian trend of non-violence and Indian nationalist attitude would win.

Homen Borgohain is another major novelist who, from his early phase of reflecting contemporary western ideas about sex, psychology and existence, has moved over to the contemporary Indian social, economic and political problems. His most outstanding novel, Pita-putra (Father and son, 1975), reflects the gap between the pre-Independence generation of people and its counterpart in the post-Independence period and the conflict between the two which destroys the values of the earlier generation. Padma Barkataki is another novelist who, as a social realist, ruthlessly criticises the urban middle class and lays bare their vices.

Against Borgohain and Barkataki's realistic novels we have two other novelists in this period whose themes create atmospheres which in spite of their day-to-day reality are rather poetic. They are Navakanta Baruah and Pasupati Bharadwaj (pseudonym of Umakanta Sarma). Baruah's first novel Kapilipariya sadhu (A tale of the two banks of the Kapili, 1954), which is a regional novel with all the reflections of a particular region of Assam, reads actually like a poem. So does his second novel, Kakadeutar had (The bones of our forefathers, 1972), which is a historical novel. Bharadwaj's Uranta meghar chan (Shadows of the flying clouds, 1960) and Chimchangar duti par (The two banks of the river Chimchang, 1964) deal with themes of low life that have a high emotional appeal. He generally philosophises over human foibles, and thus raises the apparently low human experiences to higher levels.

The post-War period has a few other novelists of distinction like Jogesh Das, Medini Chaudhuri, Rohini Kakati, Chandraprasad Saikia, Debendranath Acharyya and Amulya Barua. Jogesh Das's Dawar aru nai (Clouds no more, 1955) depicts the crisis in the moral and economic aspects of the Assamese life during the Second World War, while Medini Chaudhuri's Banduka-behar (1976) is a biographical-historical novel depicting a phase of life of the sixteenth century Vaishnavite preacher and writer, Madhavadeva.

NOVEL (Bengali). The Bengali novel was born under the influence of English historical romances and sketches of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Moreover, some historical works written by Englishmen in India (like Tod's Annals of Rajasthan) and by some Bengali writers writing in English (like S.C. Dutta's The Tales of Yore) inspired some Bengali fiction writers early in the second half of the last century. Domestic tales like Chandramukhir upakhyan by Lalbehari Dey and Phulmani-o-karunar bibaran by Mullens, and historical romances like Aitihasik upanyas by Bhudev Mukherjee were the forerunners of the new genre. Alaler gharer dulal of Pearychand Mitra, the first original treatment of contemporary life and manners in a picaresque fashion and Hutom penchar naksa of Kaliprasanna Singha—a collection of satirical sketches dealing with the depravity of the new rich–paved the way for writing novels.

Bankimchandra Chatterjee's romances, Durgeshnandini, Kapalkundala, Mrinalini, Chandrashekhar, Rajani, Rajsimha, to name only a few, provided the first taste of good fiction. A representative of the rising middle class, Bankim cherished an idealism of complete manhood and imposed it upon his fictional heroes. His two social novels, Bishabriksha and Krishnakanter wil, also showed both his skill and orthodox moral view. Among his last three novels, Anandamath inspired people to fight for political liberation.

Bankimchandra's power of story-telling and colourful characterisation, his deep insight into man's mind and the skill with which he dramatises in his novels the conflict between idealism and carnal desires, inspired a band of novelists to write after his model. Pratapchandra Ghose, Rameshchandra Dutta, Haraprasad Sastri, Taraknath Ganguli, Indranath Banerjee, Troilokyanath Mukherjee and Jogendrachandra Basu followed more or less in the wake of Bankim. Only the last three impressed the readers with some satirical novels.

Rabindranath Tagore, too, tried his hand at this genre after Bankim's historical romances. He wrote Bauthakuranir hat and Rajarshi on the same model, but in Chokher bali he gave the genre an inward turning as was seen in contemporary Western psychological novel. In Gora, his longest novel, the problems of the individual, the society and the state are deftly analysed on an epic scale. Chaturanga and Ghare baire both, in their own way, deal with what Doris Lessing calls the 'inner space' of man. Jogajog evinced the conflict between class-characters through conjugal life. Shesher kavita is a peculiar blend of poetry and prose sparkling with wit. Among his later novels, Char adhyay, which is an assessment of the terrorist attitude, excels more in artistry than in vitality.

Tagore's novels, brilliant in artistic skill, attracted only a few readers of delicate taste. But novelists close to Tagore, like Prabhatkumar Mukherjee and Shrischandra Majumdar, bewitched the general readers with domestic novels of simple charm and interesting situations. Some young novelists headed by Manilal Ganguli centred round the old monthly, Bharati, infusing some fresh blood into the genre. Saurindramohan Mukherjee, Charuchandra Banerjee and others were in this group and they engrossed the readers with simple and sentimental stories with their stress, sometimes, on the sex. Some other novelists, connected with this group, included Nirupama Devi, Surendranath Ganguli and Upendranath Ganguli. They excelled in romance and tragedy of love and marriage in the humdrum domestic life. Saratchandra Chatterjee was their undoubted leader. Leading the life of a tramp like Gorky, Saratchandra survived the influence of his predecessors and developed a style of his own. His instant fame with his simple and dramatically charming short novels like Baradidi, Debdas, Parinita, Birajbau and Pallisamaj proved the artist's basic sincerity. In his longer novels—

Charitrahin, Grihadaha and Sheshprashna—he lost that magic touch but still retained a profound sympathy for the suffering human heart. His political novel, Pather dabi, roused the emotions of the terrorists, but he came back to his own field of domestic novel with Bipradas. Though critical, he never flouted the accepted morals of our society.

After the war, a group of young writers emerged with a new but limited dimension of realism about the city life which was attracting people from the villages and the suburbs.This realistic force gathered momentum, especially from writers of three magazines—Kallol, Kali-kalam and Pragati. Nareshchandra Sengupta of the Bharati-group was the inspiration of these writers with his Subha, Shashthi and Paper chap, all dealing with sex and criminology. The significant novels of this group included Gokul Nag's Pathik, Sailajananda Mukherjee's Sholoana, Jagadish Gupta's Asadhu siddhartha, Premendra Mitra's Pank, Achintya Sengupta's Bede, Probodh Sanyal's Madhyabitta and Buddhadev Bose's Sara. Sex psychosis of the abnormal, grim reality, crisis of identity —all these characterised the fiction of this group. But still, the realistic thrust ultimately gave way to romantic outbursts which became more distinct in Pather panchali by Bibhutibhusan Banerjee who came with the ignis fatuus of our rural-turned-urban Bengalees. Bibhutibhusan Mukherjee's Ranu series, Kedar Banerjee's Koshthir phalaphal and others and Banaphul's Sthabar, Jangam, Ratri, etc. also support this contention. Regional experiences found their best expressions in Saroj Banerjee's Natun phasal and in Tarashankar Banerjee's Kavi, Ganadevata and Hansulibanker upakatha. The intellectual strain was taken up by Dilipkumar Roy, Anndashankar Ray and others, and Dhurjatiprasad Mukherjee and Gopal Haldar turned to the stream-of-consciousness method. Manik Banerjee, a Freudian-turned-Marxist, introduced scientific realism in Padmanadir majhi and Putulnacher itikatha and went further over to an objective study of the class-conflict in his later novels. As against Manik's realism, the then Kallolian realism seemed somewhat moony.

During and after the Second World War, as the socio-economic conditions worsened rapidly, a new group of novelists, namely, Subodh Ghose, Jyotirindra Nandi, Narayan Ganguli, Narendranath Mitra and Satinath Bhaduri, depicted the society as a mass of bruises—full of class-competitions, political in-fights, refugee problems, exploitations by the businessmen and the terrible deterioration of values of the middle class and the agricultural and industrial labour classes. Satinath Bhaduri's Jagari and Dhonraicharitmanas, Gopal Haldar's Upapanchasher path, Sanjay Bhattacharyya's Srishti, Narendranath Mitra's Chenamahal, Jarasandha's Lauha-kapat and Gunamay Manna's Junapur stil certainly extended the theme and variety of the story-telling technique. Historical and domestic romances were attempted by Saradindu Banerjee, Pramathanath Bisi, Ashapurna Devi, Bimal Mitra, Mahashveta Devi and others. Regional novels like Jal jangal by Manoj Basu, Char kasem by Amarendra Ghosh, Ganga by Samaresh Basu, Purba Parvati by Prafulla Ray touched new horizons.

Independence brought with it the partition of Bengal followed by constant influx of refugees, failure of the food-rationing system, terrible unemployment, confused educational policy, political frictions, foreign aggressions, emergence and failure of ultra-leftism, and finally the ultimate victory of the leftist-moderates after the fall of the Congress in 1977. All this led to the emergence of the modern alienated protagonist with an existentialistic attitude or a typical awareness of the absurd. Shymal Ganguli's Brihannala, Bimal Kar's Aparahna, Asamay and Jadu bansa, Samaresh Basu's Bibar, Prajapati, Manush, and Samkat, Santosh Kumar Ghose's Jal dao, Samay amar samay, Shes namashkar, Ramapada Choudhury's Ekhani, Shankar's Simabaddha, Atin Banerjee's Nilkantha pakhir khonje, Sunil Ganguli's Arjun, Mati Nandi's Baranda, Sirsendu Mukherjee's Ghunpoka, Debesh Roy's Jajati and Manush khun kare keno are some of the significant novels of this confusing period. But it is not everywhere that one finds such a sense of desperation. Narayan Ganguli's Kacher dorja, Tritiya nayan and Sunil Ganguli's Arjun show us the way out to a new social order.

NOVEL (Dogri) is a very recent phenomenon, the first three Dogri novels having appeared almost simultaneously in 1960. They are Dharan te dhuran by Madan Mohan Sharma, Shano by Narendar Khajuria, and Har, beri te pattan by Ved Rahi, the first attempts at novel writing by three young men who had just established themselves as successful writers of Dogri short story dealing with the problems of contemporary Dogra society. These novels are more like long short stories and amateurish experiments in the genre than well-made novels. It took ten years for the fourth Dogri novel to be published, Phull bina dali (1970), by Srivatsa 'Vikal', a good piece of fiction in the same reformist mould, but with a much better structure and a surer handling of the Dogri rural social scene. It got the Sahitya Akademi award, 1972. The next two novels, Jis aillai nehra peyi gaya by Pishorilal Gupta and Badsis by Shakuntala Sharma Benipur, both published in 1972, are again amateurish attempts at novel writing and artistically unsatisfying. Again there was a gap of four years before two more novels appeared in 1976 which carried the Dogri novel forward. Chanani de chor by Thakar Punchhi is an abridged version of an Urdu novel Vadiyar aur virane by a successful and popular Urdu writer, and Sanjhi dharati bakhale mahnu by Narsinghdev Jamwal is a very satisfying original novel with a broad canvass, dealing with the subject of the partition of the country, its effects on the lives of people and capturing beautifully an important segment of Dogra community with its customs, values and beliefs and the new changes overtaking it. This novel got the Sahitya Akademi award for 1978. The year 1978 was good for the Dogri novel, when Ved Rahi and Omprakash Sharma 'Sarathi' came out with two novels each. Ved Rahi's Darer and Trutti di dor show the influence of the film media which the author chose as his profession. Sarathi's novels, Treh samundar di and Nanga rukh brought a whiff of fresh air in Dogri fiction. The latter novel in particular breaks new ground in Dogri fiction by its style and the newness of its subject-matter that deals with the churning of both the city and the consciousness of the citizen who is alienated from his environment and neighbours. The year 1980 marked another milestone in the march of the Dogri novel with the publication of Deshbandhu Dogra Nutan's Qaidi—an indepth study of the Dogra rural society and a powerful indictment of a decadent, male-dominated caste and superstition-ridden society with its corrupt police and jail administration. Both Nanga rukh (1978) and Qaidi (1980) were picked out for the Sahitya Akademi awards for 1979 and 1982. Sarathi has three more novels, Resham de kire, Makan and Patthar te rang, while Nutan has added one more novel, Pyoke bhejo, to Dogri fiction. A few more novels have been written since then, some published and some lying unpublished, but none approaches the high watermark in Dogri fiction reached by the works of Sarathi and Nutan.

NOVEL (English). The novel in India is generally believed to be a legacy of the British rule and an indirect result of the educated Indian's exposure to English literature. Yet when the new genre got naturalized in India in the second half of the 19th century, its vehicle was not English but the Indian languages. By the end of the nineteenth century the novel was a recognised and popular literary form in almost all the major languages of India. Some novels were also written in English, but these were done by isolated individuals here and there. The Indian novel in English did not become a significant literary activity until the thirties of the present century.

The reasons for this delay may be sought in the literary and social factors of the time. Narrative literature of various indigenous kinds—puranic stories, gatha, mangal kavya, daastan, kissa, etc.— existed in profusion in the Indian languages, and it was easy for these languages to incorporate into their existing modes a new kind of narrative which became available to them through English education. The western novel with its defining characteristics of realism, individualism, and a sense of history mingled with the pre-novel traditions of story-telling in India, and the result was a fictional upsurge in the Indian languages. In the nineteenth century sporadic attempts to write novels in English involved writing in a language that had not yet taken roots in the Indian soil. Even if some poetry could be written by Indians in the nineteenth century in a borrowed Victorian idiom, the emergence of a genuine novel presupposed an involvement with Indian reality and an understanding of the historical and cultural context of the time. There was a lack of such direct involvement in the early generations of English educated Indians. Those in whom this involvement was most vitally present took to creative writing in their own languages or to nonfictive English writing in newspapers for social and political regeneration of the country.

Among the early novels in English, mention must be made of Rajmohan's Wife (1864) by Bankim Chandra Chatterjee, who, after this false start, switched over completely to writing in Bengali. Rev. Lal Behari Dey wrote a fictionalised account in English of the life of the Bengali peasants called Govinda Samanta (1874), and Sochee Chunder Dutt made a similar attempt in The Young Zamindar (1885).

As we move to the twentieth century, K.S. Venkataramani's Murugan the Tiller (1927) and Kandan the Patriot (1934) give indications of the direction the Indian novel in English was going to take. The nineteen-thirties was the seminal period in which three major novelists appeared, all of whom have been active and vigorous for nearly five decades since then. Together the three of them (Mulk Raj Anand b. 1905, R.K. Narayan b. 1907 and Raja Rao b. 1909) launched the Indian novel in English. Although they were not part of a conscious literary movement, they happened to publish their early works almost simultaneously—Anand's Coolie (1933), Untouchable (1935) and Two Leaves and a Bud (1937); Narayan's Swami and Friends (1935) and The Bachelor (1937); and Rao's Kanthapura (1938). In these novels were prefigured some of the thematic and technical concerns of the subsequent decades of the Indian novel in English. Anand focussed his attention on the social and economic exploitation in Indian society. Raja Rao used as his material the national struggle for freedom that was sweeping the country and he used a technique by which this contemporary movement became mythicized. Narayan's novels concentrated on the ordinary events of middle-class life, and Malgudi, the imaginary small town-locale of these novels, later developed into a micro-image of one kind of Indian reality made well-known and permanent through Narayan's subsequent work.

The differences between these writers on the one hand and the occasional novelist in English of the previous generations on the other were two-fold. These writers had a seriousness of purpose and they were firmly rooted to the Indian situation. None of them were blindly following any English model either in language or in form, but they were all confidently trying to use the English language and the novelistic form to suit their own individual purposes. Raja Rao in his foreword to Kanthapura summarised the three major issues that the Indian novelist in English would have to specially consider—form, language and narrative tradition. Narayan, seemingly the least self-conscious of the three, has proved to be the most abiding, bringing out in his mild novels the essence of an India that is characterised by tolerance, continuity and stability.

The struggle for political freedom and its double-edged climax in the Independence and the partition of the country was an important all-pervasive experience in the first half of the twentieth century. Scores of novels written during that period or afterwards continue to be concerned with the different facets of this experience. Mulk Raj Anand's trilogy, The Village (1939), Across Black Waters, (1940) and The Sword and the Sickle (1942), Khwaja Ahmad Abbas's Inquilab (1955), Manohar Malgonkar's Bend In The Ganges (1964), Khushwant Singh's Train to Pakistan (1956), Nayantara Sahgal's A Time to be Happy (1958), and Chaman Nahal's Azadi (1975) are all examples of this. Novels in the Indian languages also testify to an intense concern with this experience, but this theme was of special significance to the Indian novelist in English because it traversed boundaries of language and community and made an all-India readership possible, establishing Indian novels in English as an integral part of Indian literature. Even after Independence was achieved, the concern with the political situation in the country and the interaction between an individual's destiny and the larger political and social forces continue to be of some interest to the Indian novelist (e.g. Nayantara Sahgal, Manohar Malgonkar, Kamala Markandaya and Bhabani Bhattacharya).

Another recurrent concern (again with an All-India implication) of the Indian novelist in English is the inexorable process of change that India is undergoing from being a traditional agrarian society to a modern agro-industrial society. Mulk Raj Anand's trilogy and his novel The Big Heart present the disintegration of the old order in a comprehensive manner. Many novelists have studied this change on a smaller scale in the transformation or disintegration of a large joint family into its nuclear units. Menon Marath (Wounds of Spring, 1961) described this change in terms of a large matriarchal Nair family in Kerala; Venu Chitale (In Transit, 1950) wrote of an orthodox Brahman household in Pune; Attia Hosain (Sunlight on a Broken Column, 1961) depicted a traditional Muslim family in Lucknow. Despite geographical or cultural differences, the mutation within a family works in a recognisably similar way all over India. The same change has been studied on a broader scale in the context of a whole village or a town by K. Nagarajan (Chronicles of Kedaram, 1961), Bhabani Bhattacharya (A Goddess Named Gold, 1960) and Kamala Markandaya (Nectar in a Sieve, 1954). Even in the highly poetic and imaginative novels of Sudhin Ghose (b. 1899) one notices a sense of changing times. In his tetralogy (And Gazelles Leaping, 1949, Cradle of the Clouds, 1951, The Vermilion Boat, 1953 and The Flame of the Forest, 1955, the pastoral childhood world of the first volume gives way to the agrarian realities of the second; in the third and the fourth volumes the scene shifts from the rural area to the urban and mercenary background of Calcutta, suggesting fragmentation and decay.

The attitude towards change differs considerably, some novelists accepting it with despair and resignation, others with hope and promise of a better future. But hardly has anyone been able to overlook the rapid social changes taking place in the twentieth-century India—except perhaps Narayan whose Malgudi seems to be one point of stability where change is seen as marginal, and continuity as the essence.

Social tension sometimes manifests itself in the Indian novel in English in a struggle between the right of an individual to assert his choice and the demands of a rigidly hierarchical society. A number of novels deal with this conflict either centrally or peripherally, e.g. B. Rajan's The Dark Dancer (1959), Kamala Markandaya's Some Inner Fury (1955), Santha Rama Rau's Remember the House (1956). The problem of self and society is handled in these novels in a realistic framework, but Raja Rao in his outstanding work The Serpent and The Rope (1960) gives metaphysical and metaphoric dimensions to the question of reality and self. At one level it can be read as the confrontation of two cultures, at another it can be seen as a philosophical investigation into what it means to be an Indian. Modes other than realism have been employed also by G.V. Desani (b. 1909), Sudhin Ghose and M. Anantanarayanan. Desani wrote only one novel All About H. Hatterr (1948), whose comic verbal vitality, irreverence, the clowning stance and allegorical overtones have prevented it from being dated. Sudhin Ghose's novels trace the growth and maturity of a boy in a lyrical manner rich with fantasy and folklore. Anantanarayanan's only novel The Silver Pilgrimage (1961) is the account of a journey where the past and the present, the comic and the serious, the east and the west, co-exist.

Of the novelists who came into maturity in the sixties and the seventies the two most important names are Anita Desai (b. 1937) and Arun Joshi (b. 1939). Both are intensely concerned with the individual in all his complexity and both seem to shy away from the more obvious 'Indian' problems and their predictable solutions. Anita Desai's six novels (Cry, the Peacock, 1963, Voices in the City, 1965, Bye-bye Blackbird, 1971, Where shall we go this Summer, 1975, Fire on the Mountain, 1977 and Clear Light of Day, 1980) are varied in theme and technique, but the two common characteristics found in all of them are a taut, highly charged language with intricate nuances, and the presence of individuals who are very private, intensely introspective, and lonely. Arun Joshi's four novels (The Foreigner, 1968, The Strange Case of Billy Biswas, 1971, The Apprentice, 1974, and The Last Labyrinth, 1980) although very different in scope and intention, still seem to deal with one basic theme: the quest for authentic values in an inauthentic society.

The novels written in English continue to be numerically insignificant in comparison to the novels written in the Indian languages, although they tend to get an importance disproportionate to their actual worth because of their availability to a wider cross-section of readership in India and abroad. But among the Indian novels in English that have appeared in the last decade or so, some are worth serious critical notice and all of them seem to share a healthy unconcern for 'Indianness' which weighed down their predecessors. They seem neither concerned about the possible western audience nor about the fact that English is a foreign language. One will have to wait a few years to assess the exact impact of these new writers. But there is one novelist in whose case this critical caution seems unnecessary. The publication of Mid-night's Children (1980) by Salman Rushdie may well be the most important event in this area in recent years. This novel proves beyond doubt what has gradually begun to be evident that language is merely a tool and a novel is to be judged by what the novelist creates with it. The Indian novel in English thus has to be seen as part of the larger phenomenon called the Indian Novel.

NOVEL (Gujarati). The Gujarati word for 'novel' is 'naval katha' which has been derived from the English word, indicating that the genre was imported from the West. Mahipatram's (1829-1891) Sasuvahuni ladai (1862) is considered by some to be the first novel in Gujarati. It deals with the atrocity of a mother-in-law and the plight of the daughter-in-law. It has all the limitations of a maiden attempt—the plot is weak, the characters are static and there is a lot of repetition. The first proper novel according to some is Karan ghelo (1866) by Nand Shanker (1825-1905). It is also the first historical novel. The writer was asked by his superior officer to write a novel on the model of Sir Walter Scott's works, and so the writer had before him a clear conception of the novel form. Karan ghelo is based on the life of the last Rajput king of Gujarat, Karan, who abducted his minister's wife and was ruined. It has many limitations and drawbacks, yet, it could inspire young writers and became very popular, because it was able to initiate a new genre. For some time it was believed that the plot of a novel should be historical and so many historical novels were written on its model. Its impact was such that even Mahipatram wrote two historical novels, Vanraj chavdo and Sadhra gesang.

Saraswatichandra was the first epic-novel, which can be called a masterpiece, written by Govardhanram Tripathi (1855-1907). It is a novel in four parts. The book took fourteen years to be completed. It deals with all the social problems of the time, with the main plot are woven many a sub plot and discussions on a wide range of subjects. The characters are from all the strata of society and there is a remarkable depiction of inner and outer conflicts besides picturesque descriptions. The writer has a command over the language which can be seen in dialogues, descriptions and narration. The novel is regarded as a classic in Gujarati literature and has won appreciation from most of its critics. Its impact on contemporary readers was phenomenal, and many writers wrote novels keeping it as a model. Hargovindas Kantawala (1849-1932) wrote Andheri nagarino Gadharvasen (1881) which can be called the first satirical novel. The plot is based on the misrule of the native rulers. The king is referred to as the chief of donkeys and the state capital as the city of misrule and disorder. Bhadrambhadra (1900) by Ramanbhai Nilkanth (1868-1928) was the first full-length humorous novel. In it the author has attacked the fundamentalists and exposed them, making them behave in a funny manner. Bhogindrarao Divetia (1875-1917) has written social novels dealing with contemporary social and national problems. He, as a novelist, sustained the interest of Gujarati readers in the post-Govardhanram period. He introduced Tolstoy to his readers by adapting his novel in Gujarati. His novels deal with the social problems of upper middle-class families. His style is lucid.

From the second decade of the twentieth century, Kanhaiyalal Munshi (1887-1971) began publishing his social novels, introducing romanticism in them. He revolutionised the novel-form in his treatment of plot, dialogues, characterisation, style and artistic presentation. He wrote social and historical novels, and also novels on mythical themes. In his historical novels he was inspired by the French writer Alexander Dumas. Munshi's trilogy of historical novels comprises Patanni Prabhuta (1916), Gujaratno nath (1919), and Rajadhiraj (1922) in which he has eulogised the Solanki period, considered the golden age of the history of Gujarat. His pauranic novels Bhagwan Parsuram, Lomharshini and Krishnavtar depict pauranic episodes in the light of the modern age. Munshi is at his best when he treats the historical and pauranic incidents. Fast moving story, romantic touch, bewitching style of narration—all these place Munshi at the top amongst Gujarati novelists.

as well as historical novels. Meghani,who was better known as a researcher in folk literature, has brought all the niceties of folk literature in his novels. He has a genius for characterisation and for fathoming the depths of the human mind. He excels in the portrayal of family life as revealed in his novels like Tulsi kyaro (1940) and Veviohal (1940). His women characters revolt against those social customs and norms which are unjust to women. Meghani also introduced the regional novel, Sorath taran vaentan pani (1937), in which attention is focussed not on human beings but on the region. His successors grasped this new form, and writers like Pannalal Patel (1913) who won the Jnanpith award for his novel Manavini Bhavai in 1986, Iswar Petlikar (1916-1987), Chunilal Madia (1922-1968), and others were influenced by his novels. Pannalal's novels like Malela jiv (1941) have been translated into several modern Indian languages and have also been screened. All the writers of regional novels have command of the spoken language of the region, and they depict every aspect of life in the region.

Gunvantrai Acharya (1902-1967) has specialised in depicting sea-faring adventures in his novel like Sakkar bar, Darialal and Harari. These novels are indeed sagas of adventure. He has also written historical novels like Desh diwan, Rai Bakurai and Maha amatya, and social novels like Daridra Narayan and Batwara. But Acharya will always be remembered as a novelist depicting adventures on the sea because he is the only novelist to write on this subject.

Dhumketu (1892-1965) has written about twenty novels, social and historical. The novelist is at his best in delineating emotions. He was a visionary and excelled in descriptions of grandeur and greatness.

Ramanlal V. Desai (1892-1954) was the most popular novelist of the Gandhian era, and he can be placed next to Munshi in his popularity. His Jayant (1925), Kokila (1929) and Divyachakshu (1932) depict the glory of the Gandhian era. His heroes are young men and women, who are influenced by Gandhian principles and who, though idealists, are men of the world. They fall in love and strive for fulfilment of their ambitions.

From 1947 the novel took a new turn. Jayanti Dalal (1909-1970) through his Dhimu ane Vibha (1947) set the trend of the psychological novel and thereafter Raghuvir Chaudhuri, Radheshyam Sharma, Chandrakant Baxi, Shrikant Shah, Saroj Pathak, Kundanika Kapadia, Madhu Raj and others developed the form. Kundanika Kapadia received the Sahitya Akademi award for her novel Saat Paglan akashman. Raghuvir Chaudhuri's novel Uparwas kathatrayi is a trilogy unfolding a saga of three generations. It got the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1977. Bhagwatikumar Sharma's Asuryalok depicts the story of generations of men and women struggling against darkness on the internal and external levels of reality. He was given the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1988. In these novels psychological time is depicted, and the stream of consciousness technique, and autobiographical and epistolary style are employed, and instead of conscious mind, the working of the subconscious and unconscious mind is revealed. The incidents of the outside world are presented only to show their impact on the human mind. Suresh Joshi (1926-1984) in his Chhinnapatra (1978) has, as he says, presented the draft of a novel instead of a novel proper.

Thus the novel in Gujarati, which is one and a quarter of a century old, has taken several strides towards progress.

NOVEL (Hindi). The origins of the Hindi novel lay in medieval romances, themselves derived either from Sanskrit literature and indigeneous folk-lore or from popular Persian sources like Gulbakavali and Tilism-e-Hoshruba. Rani Ketaki ki kahani by Insha Allah Khan, Madhavanal Kamkandal by Lallulal, and Nasiketopakhyan by Sadal Mishra may be cited as rudimentary beginnings. For want of an urban cultural nucleus (though Banaras did become one later on) and a delayed evolution of standard Hindi prose, the novel in Hindi took some time to establish itself. Pariksha guru (1882) by Lala Shrinivas Das was the first Hindi novel. It is the story of a rich young man who is mad after European goods, and is soon reduced to bankruptcy and deserted by his admirers. This novel, as well as Purnaprakash aur Chandraprabha (1889), an adaptation of a Marathi novel by Bharatendu Harishchandra, set the tone for subsequent developments.

Besides the novel of social purpose, there also sprang up simultaneously novels of adventure and pure entertainment. Devakinandan Khatri (1861-1913) was the pioneer of this popular type. A master of suspense and complicated plots, he created a huge reading public by his Chandrakanta, basically a love story. Kishorilal Goswami combined both these trends, love and suspense, in his novels. He played an important role in popularising the novel through his periodical, Upanyas. Among other writers of the period, Gopalram Gahamari specialised in detective fiction; Mehta Lajjaram Shastri translated a Gujarati novel; Pratapnarain Mishra translated Bankim's Kapal Kundal; and Gadadhar Singh brought out a Hindi version of Kadambari. Thus the novels of the Bharatendu Age (1850-1900) can be divided into three categories: novels of social reform, novels of miracle (or Tilismi novels, resembling the English Gothic romances of the late 18th century), and translations-cum-adaptations.

Curiously enough, different Indian languages adopted different names for this new literary form. In Gujarati, it was called 'Naval', in Marathi 'Kadambari', in Hindi as well as Bengali 'Upanyas', a term from Natyashastra which incorporates two meanings, one that gives delight and the other that presents an important meaning in a reasoned manner. Thus even that, rather remote, term seemed quite adequate to convey what a novel was expected to do.

Besides reflecting the spirit of national awakening the novels of the Bharatendu and Dwivedi eras dealt with social problems like child marriage, dowry system and untouchability. The transition from the nineteenth to the twentieth century was slow but steady as seen in Premchand and Prasad. Premchand is acclaimed as a pioneer of the Hindi novel. He had read Tilism-e-Hoshruba at a tender age—the best possible initiation for a would-be writer of fiction. He was thoroughly affected by the reformist ethos of his day. More important still, he knew life in the raw and had a first hand experience of life in Indian villages. His most creative period happened to coincide with a period of dreams as well as responsibilities, when an entire nation was roused under the leadership of Gandhi. His novels could register the hopes as well as the fears of the Indian masses, and he looked at life steadily and recorded it faithfully. His growth as a writer shows a gradual sharpening of social conscience, and a corresponding pruning away of the wishful and zealous reformism of his earlier career. Surdas in Rangbhumi (1925) is triumphant even in death. The evil that he resists in the form of John Sewak is unable to crush him. But all that moral strength, all that radiant faith which was available to Premchand in 1925 drained off by 1935. When he wrote Godan (1936). his masterpiece, he gave in Hori the most unheroic of all fictional heroes and yet one who strikes the inmost chords in all of us, a common denominator with whom we rejoice and suffer. The death of Hori, thus, comes to represent something like a collective tragedy—the betrayal of a vision that had grown out of the people themselves. Premchand's social conscience is not something intellectually conceived and then superadded to life. It grows out of life itself. The evidence in his novels of the birth and growth of this new conscience is as compelling as his insight into the in-built forces that were ultimately going to stifle it.

Premchand extended the scope of the novel by comprehending all the major social problems of his day. By handling most of the rural as well as urban middle-class types, he appeared to have almost exhausted the possibilities of the social novel at that time. Prasad, his contemporary, brought a poetic dimension to it. His first novel, Kankal, explored the living corpse of the contemporary society. Pollution of life here is detected at the source itself: a merciless exposure of the rot in religious and social institutions makes for razor-sharp distinctions and a new realism in depth. Caricature, rather than mere representation; satire, rather than sentiment; heightened individuality, rather than mere social conformism; ruthless surgery, rather than a reformist programme, set this novel apart. And this gain in realism comes from an unexpected quarter, from an intellectual yet poetic ordering of reality. Prasad's next novel Titali has a rural setting, but creates a variety of characters with due representation given to urban mentality also. While Kankal is mainly preoccupied with 'what is', Titali, with all its unmitigated realism, looks forward to the emerging values that would create a new society over the corpse of the old one.

Prasad introduced a new element—the suggestion of an inner life—which was fully realised in fictional terms in the novels of Jainendra Kumar. Parakh (Test, 1929) and Tyagpatra (Resignation, 1937) were important events in the history of Hindi sensibility. Jainendra lacked the emotion of the multitude and the knowledge of raw life which Premchand possessed, but he brought in a powerful capacity for delving deep into character. His innate bent for philosophizing works both ways: if it leads at times to overworked generalisations, it opens up in depth both situation and character.

The more characteristically modern developments in the Hindi novel become manifest in the post-Premchand era. i.e., from the forties onward. By that time, most of the thematic and formal varieties of fiction had been tried. Whole novels were written in the form of letters as in Chand hasinon ke khatut by Ugra. An unusual combination of pure fantasy and actual history was projected by the same author in his novel, Ghanta. Allegory, satire and dramatic dialogue were made to serve the purpose of the novel. New techniques of narration were inaugurated by Jainendra Kumar through Sunita (1935) and Kalyani (1939). One can readily believe his own admission of not having read Freud. This makes his approach to the motivation of character all the more remarkable. Ilachandra Joshi is the only writer of this era who made psychoanalysis the mainstay of his novels. His Pret aur chhaya and Sanyasi are admirable studies of individual characters from this point of view, but his is a rather specialized world which does not seem to attract other novelists. It was left to Agyeya to find subtler uses for psychoanalysis in a richer context of manifold experience. His Shekhar ek jivani is an outstanding performance from this as well as another point of view. Jainendra, too, had been concerned with individuality: in fact, it was he who was responsible for this major shift. But what distinguishes Agyeya as a novelist is a new self-consciousness and a new artistic awareness. He does not resolve situations philosophically like Jainendra; he confronts them in all their complexity. Above all, he is concerned with a radically new search for personality as an authentic source of freedom and freshly realised values. The socially oriented novel had, indeed, reached a stage of saturation. A wholly new start had to be made from the other pole, and herein lay the new possibilities of the novel-form which Agyeya came to explore and realise in his Shekhar ek Jivani and Nadi ke dweep (Islands in the river). Man-woman relationship has seldom been portrayed with such delicate precision. Agyeya showed his capacity for further evolution in Apne apne ajnabi, an existential novel of considerable subtlety.

The revolutionary undercurrent in the Indian struggle for independence benefitted the Hindi novel in a variety of ways. The revolutionary character is a phenomenon that engaged even those novelists who were Gandhian in outlook. Jaindendra, for example, showed a conspicuous obsession with such characters, and Agyeya made it a focal point of his study. Yashpal, in many respects an antithesis to Agyeya, shows the revolutionary spirit in an ardent way. His Dada comrade (1941) is woven round the thesis that the organised unity of workers is the best means of national reconstruction. His next novel, Deshdrohi, contains scathing criticism of Gandhism and the Congress, and favours a socialist revolution. His historical novel, Divya, presents the age-old exploitation of womankind. Manushya ke rupa (1949) portrays man as a helpless creature of circumstances. His most notable contribution as a novelist is Jhutha sach (1960), a panoramic, documentary novel dealing with the tragedy of partition. It deals not only with the sufferings of multitudes, but suggests a new morality to cope with the situation. Yashpal's work shows a continuity with the reformist past of the Hindi novels. This seems to be motivated as much by his Arya Samajist background as by his Marxist leanings. As a novelist, however, he suffers from some serious drawbacks: he is incapable of creating 'round' characters and is more driven by ideas than by the varied emotions of the free play of life-energies. Life in his novels is arranged schematically.

Yashpal is by no means alone in emphasising the sociological aspects of novel-writing. Amritlal Nagar and Bhagwaticharan Verma also join him in spite of obvious differences. The latter made his mark as a novelist with Chitralekha, a distant relative of Anatole France's Thais. The novel explores the problem of sin. Having taken up such an interesting theme, he could have delved deep into the psychological and sociological roots of the various conflicts in Indian society, but a deterministic view of life seems to have inhibited his growth. He did produce a number of successful novels which show his resourcefulness and skill in plot-construction as well as characterisation, but there is hardly any significant evolution in terms of creative insights into the life of a society in transition. His Bhule bisare chitra (Portraits long-forgotten), probably his best novel so far, seeks to depict almost half a century of our national history through narrating the fortunes of four generations of a family. The disintegration of a feudal structure of society and the joint-family system, the rise of capitalism and the breakdown of established values are sought to be dealt with here. His next novel, Sidhi sachchi baten (Plain truths), deals with the subsequent social history up to the attainment of freedom. But the creation of live human situations and characters in this novel is far less satisfactory than in the earlier saga.

Amritlal Nagar is a more interested, and therefore a more amused, spectator of life in his novels. There is certainly a greater surface animation in his characters and a more colourful texture of life in his otherwise rather loosely constructed novels. Both Bund aur samudra (The drop and the ocean) and Amrit aur vish are panoramic novels. He also wrote Manas ka hans with Tulsidas as its hero. His Ekada naimisharanye is an interesting excursion into the world of mythology. Recently he has attracted notice by a naturalistic novel about the life of the untouchables. Among novelists whose imagination is preoccupied with historical events, Vrindavanlal Verma is pre-eminent. Garhkundar, Jhansi ki Rani and Mrignayani are some of his well-known novels. They constitute an extremely attractive blend of history and romances.

But the most outstanding fictional fusion of scholarship and creative imagination was realised in Banabhatta ki atmakatha by Hazariprasad Dwivedi. In its conception as well as execution, this work seems to point the way towards something which could be called a home-made, characteristically Indian novel. Perhaps that explains why the Sahitya Akademi undertook the task of translating this masterpiece into all the important Indian languages. The author wrote three more novels. Charu Chandralekh, like its predecessor, was intended to provide rich insights into the life and spiritual turmoil of medieval India. His last novel Anamadas ka potha carries the reader into Upanishadic times. Through well-conceived characters and situations, this novel deals with moral and metaphysical problems which are not without relevance to our own times.

Yet another source of nourishment for the novel was tapped by Phaniswarnath 'Renu'. Although the poet Nagarjun also sought the folk element in his novel Balchanama, the achievement of Renu is immensely superior. In fact, it was Renu who restored the emotion of multitude to the Hindi novel, an element which was Premchand's peculiar privilege. This restoration becomes all the more significant because of the emotional intensity and artistic resonance that Renu gave it. Maila anchal and Parati parikatha are likely to remain unsurpassed for a long time to come. The language of these novels has an audio-visual density that cannot be easily matched elsewhere. His works did inspire a spate of 'anchalik' (regional) fiction and influenced writers like Nagarjun, Shailesh Matiyani and Ramdarash Mishra, but nothing comparable to the art of Renu really came forth. Shivprasad Singh, however, apart from his affiliation with this village-oriented movement, did produce a considerable novel, Alag alag Vaitarani—a well ordered and acutely realised narrative, juxtaposing and confronting a rural sensibility with urban complications. The work of Upendranath 'Ashq' also deserves mention for an authentic and sensitive delineation of the lower-middle class life and character.

By the beginning of the sixties, the novel in Hindi had acquired enough resilience to cope with the collective as well as the individual man. Agyeya on the one hand and Renu on the other had extended the scope of the novel in more than one direction. Further enrichment could only be expected through a concentration of the creative process itself, through experimentation in depth and through a search for more inclusive and complex structures. Ironically, however, the novel in the sixties suffered a set-back from the undue prominence given to the short story. The Nai Kahani movement focussed all the available creative energy on the lesser form. This short-sighted approach seems to have retarded the growth of the novel, although it continued to occupy the story-writers marginally. Andhere band kamare by Mohan Rakesh is a harrowing tale of the disintegration of man-woman relationship under the tensions of urban life. Rajendra Yadav and Kamaleshwar also wrote novels. Krishna Baldeo Vaid too attracted some critical attention through Uska bachpan, notable not only for its intense naturalism, but also for its style. His next novel Vimal is a good exploitation of the 'stream of consciousness' technique. Bhishma Sahni's evolution as a novelist looks comparatively traditional, but it is more socially aware and humane. His first novel Jharokha provides intimate glimpses into the growth of a child's sensibility. His latest novel Tamas is focussed on the tragedy of partition, not in the documentary manner of Yashpal, but in a free association style. Among women writers, Manu Bhandari distinguished herself by tackling a new theme in Apka Banti—the tragic destiny of a child against the background of marriage that fails. In her recent novel Mahabhoj (The great feast), she has taken a rather unexpected leap from domestic themes to a socio-political one. Krishna Sobati, yet another story-writer turned novelist, produced an unusual blend of boldness and delicacy in Mitro marjani—the portrait of an abnormally conditioned woman fighting her way to happiness. It certainly marked an advance over the rather sentimental preciosity of her earlier attempt, Dar se bichhuri. Her third novel, however, with the same obsessive theme, could not quite achieve an artistically convincing resolution of its tangle. Her sensibility as well as her peculiarly personal handling of language is matched in Naresh Mehta who is primarily a poet but has interestingly devoted himself to the novel. His Dhoomketu: ek shruti is notable for its intimate recreation of childhood. His next novel drew a lot of critical attention for its sensitive delineation of the tragic career of an idealist fighting a losing battle against circumstances. Shrikant Verma is yet another poet who distinguished himself as a novelist through his sensitive presentation of the conflict between two incompatible and sharply divided egos of opposite sexes. An interesting use of the diary-form was made by Devaraj in his novel Ajay ki diary. Technically, an important event was recorded in the story-within-story form in Suraj ka satawan ghora (The seventh horse of the sun) by Dharmavir Bharati.

All this looks impressive but somehow not reassuring enough, when one assesses these developments in terms of the heritage of the novel in Hindi. The gain in variety and local colour as well as specialised areas of sensibility was neutralized by a corresponding loss in intellectual toughness and artistic integrity. An over all dilution of meaning as well as form was evident throughout the sixties. The most self-conscious awareness of this predicament is found in Nirmal Varma, the author of Ve din, Lal tin ki chhat and Ek chithara sukh. He was the writer, incidentally, who had initiated the real breakthrough after Agyeya in the field of short story. The first of his novels had a lyrical quality about it. It recorded a painful experience on the borders of a sensibility frantically searching for meaning in human relations. His second novel anchored this fugitive sensibility on the fringes of consciousness itself, and working backward in time retrieved a structure of images to loosen the tangled knot of the present. His latest novel Ek chithara sukh is an attempt to bring into focus the wounded present itself through a group of human destinies as reflected through the consciousness of an extremely sensitive boy.

These last two novels of Nirmal Varma were published during the seventies—a decade of self-exploration and self-discovery rather than that of mere self-expression in the name of life and realism. Apart from the contributions of the older generation of novelists, some of the younger writers also ventured forth into this field. Some of the more critically noticed among these new arrivals may be mentioned here. Gobar Ganesh by Rameshchandra Shah is a tragi-comic telescoping of personal and social destinies in the post-independence context. Vinodkumar Shukla in his Naukar ki kamiz has used poetic wit to puncture some of the self-righteous assumptions about social reality as mirrored in the lower-middle class life and attitudes. Mahendra Bhalla, who had already produced a technically interesting novel during the sixties, came to tackle a new theme in his second novel Doosri Tarap—the theme of racial discrimination in Great Britain. The pattern of detective novels was put to a new use during the seventies by the satirical novelist Shrilal Shukla, whose Rag darbari had already drawn the attention of critics during the sixties for its extremely ironical and unflattering portrait of contemporary Indian life, particularly rural life which had so often been idealised in the past.

Shrilal Shukla was by no means alone in harnessing the novel to the service of social satire. Harishankar Parsai had sought to do the same in his Rani Nagfani ki kahani. It was an interesting and technically a quite refreshing attempt to blend an old narrative style with a contemporary theme. Unluckily, however, Parsai did not carry this experiment further. Not that such experiments alone could have changed the bearings of the Hindi novel; neither Shrilal Shukla nor Harishankar Parsai was endowed with that comic vision which alone could give a new orientation to the Hindi novel. Right from the beginning, the novel in Hindi has suffered from one serious drawback—deficiency of real humour. Satire passed through many stages of refinement from Ugra to Parsai, but all this transition failed to produce a satiric or humorous novel that could also be called a true work of art. The reason is obvious: satire or humour by itself can never inspire a novel unless it finds its legitimate place among other attributes of human nature. Long ago, G.P. Shrivastava in his Latkhorilal had humorously exploited the old Panchtantra style. But that too was conceived on the level of pure fun rather than humour proper. It is precisely this comic imagination, this sense of humour generating a perception of things in true proportions, which the novel in Hindi has yet to develop.

NOVEL (Kannada). The literary form which we now designate as 'novel' came to Kannada literature early in this century, and was one of the forms which Kannada borrowed from English literature and made its own. But there were anticipations of the novel even in the earlier literature. Kalavati (1815) by Yadava, who was in the court of Mummadi Krishnaraja Wodeyar of Mysore, is the first of such writing. It is the story of a maid who jealously guards her honour. But it is a romance rather than a novel. Krishnaraja Wodeyar himself wrote a long narrative, Saugandhika parinaya (1821); the hero of the work is Lord Indra who is born on earth because of a curse. A more important work, historically, is Kempunarayana's Mudramanjusha (The sealed casket, 1823). Based on Vishakhadatta's Sanskrit play, Mudrarakshasa, it narrates how Chandragupta Maurya, guided by Chanakya, overcomes his powerful cousins. It is influenced by Banabhatta's Kadmabari; there are lengthy descriptions, and the atmosphere is not always that of Chandragupta's era. But it is worth noting that it has no romantic strand, and is concerned with the fortunes of a kingdom.

The nineteenth century also saw the appearance of translations and adaptations of English works—Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress appearing, for example, as Yatrikana sanchara (1842). Baba Padmanji's Yamuna paryatana was translated from Marathi (1869); this was the first translation from an Indian language into Kannada. B. Venkatacharya's translation of Bankimchandra's Durgesha Nandini appeared in 1885, the first of several translations by him. With these translations began the popularity of this form. M. Venkatakrishniah's Choragrahana tantra (1896) is in all probability the first detective novel in Kannada; it seeks to bring home the lesson that crime never pays. The first independent social novel was Gulvadi Venkata Rao's Indira Bai; the subtitle, 'Saddharma vijayavu' (The triumph of righteousness) indicates its didactic purpose. But it was also an attack on religious hypocrisy. Galaganatha translated novels from Marathi, inculcating nationalism and pride in Hinduism.

Social conditions were also conducive to the development of this form after the turn of the century. The growth of literacy, the appearance of a middle class with interest in reading and also the leisure it requires, and, most important, the growth of the printing presses which could produce hundreds of copies at a reasonable price for the readers, all favoured the appearance of novels. The form was waiting for a novelist interested in human nature, who could show character revealing itself in action, and embody a vision of life in the work. Such a novelist appeared in M.S. Puttanna, whose Madiddunno maharaya is recognised as the first full-fledged novel in Kannada. It is avowedly didactic, but the novelist's interest in the complexity of life and in human nature over-rides the didactic purpose. Puttanna's language also is incisive and lively.

But the Kannada novel was singularly lucky in the appearance of a genius who could distinguish between didacticism and the moral responsibility of the novel. Such a genius was Shivarama Karanth. He was more interested in probing the solidity and hollowness of men and women and in assessing their potentiality for growth than in verdicts according to pre-conceived standards. His Chomana dudi (Choma's drum; 1933) revealed a blending of the awareness of social injustice with a sense of form. Marali mannige (1942) was the first great novel in Kannada. Freeing the novel at once from didacticism and the burden of the plot, Karanth made it an exploration of the process of growth, of what sustains and promotes the quality of life, and what weakens and destroys it. With him began virtually the realistic tradition in the Kannada novel. It is also worth remarking that he is singularly free from western influence.

Karanth is the greatest novelist of the Navodaya (or the Renaissance) Age, and deservedly received the Jnanapith Award in 1978. The Age was humanistic and innovative, and found its best expression in fiction and the lyric. It was influenced simultaneously by English literature (particularly the literature of the Age of the Romantics), and the nationalistic revival inspired by the struggle for freedom. Idealism and faith in man's effort and in the dignity of man as man, characterize the novels of this age generally. The ideal of service and of simple living and high thinking found its first expression in the immensely popular novel, Sudarshana by Betageri Krishna Sharma.

The development of the novel form was witnessed in the period 1928-40. Significantly, the flowering of a personality was the theme of several novels like Subbanna (by Masti Venkatesha Iyengar, 1928), Sudarshana, and Kanuru Subbamma heggaditi (by K.V. Puttappa, 1938). The first psychological novel, Devudu Narasimha Sastry's Antaranga, appeared in 1931. The questioning of society's ways, implicit in Karanth's Chomana dudi, became strident in A.N. Krishna Rao's novels. His first novel, Jivana yatre, was published in 1934. Almost all the major novelists of the Navodaya Age made their debut in the years 1928-40. Though new schools and movements appeared later, these novelists produced significant works in the later decades of the century, and the Navodaya tradition still survives. The works of the major novelists of the age also show the impact of the later developments. Thus, for example, Karanth's Alida mele employs a technique associated with the Navya novel; Puttappa published his fascinating depiction of man-woman relationship in the 'malnad' (hilly regions with plenty of rains), in his Malegalalli madumagalu in 1967, nearly thirty years after his first novel. In the years between 1952 and 1963, Devudu Narasimha Sastry gave Kannada three novels which form a unique group—Mahabrahmana, Mahakshatriya and Mahadarshana. This was the period when the Pragatishila movement was fighting its battle with the Navya movement, and the latter movement was seeking to embody in literature the Existentialist spirit. Devudu's novels recreate the world of the Vedas; it is a fascinatingly vivid recreation of a world of the devas, the asuras and the human beings, one in which the lives of the three races are interwoven, it is a recreation in which scholarship is impregnated by poetic imagination. The novels are a magnificent assertion of the purposefulness of life and the greatness of man—an assertion totally at odds with the sceptical spirit of the Navya Age.

Faith in the dignity of the individual, in the meaningfulness of life, in social reformation through the education of the individual and in the greatness of Indian culture forms the foundation of the Navodaya novel. The response of the age to the freedom struggle mainly assumed the form of the historical novel, which sought to recreate the great epochs of the past and to bring to life the great ones of the past—saint, soldier, scholar, poet, king and queen. These novelists were innovative only in a limited sense.

The reformatory zeal of the Navya novelist blazed into revolutionary fervour in the Pragatishila school. The Pragatishila movement in Karnataka was part of the Progressive Writers' Movement which swept the land in the forties. A.N. Krishna Rao led the movement. The spirit of the movement was anticipated in the novels of Karanth and Adya Rangacharya (Sriranga). Among the major writers of this school, apart from Krishna Rao himself, were T.R. Subba Rao, Basavaraja Kattimani, Niranjana and Archika Venkatesh. They sought to use the pen to spread their crusading spirit; they believed that the writer ought to be in the vanguard of the fight for justice and equality. The ugliest aspects of social life were to be drawn into the open. A well-known novel of Krishna Rao was entitiled Nagna satya (A naked truth). They brought into the vision of the novel areas of life which had been more or less ignored. Rural life came into it of its own. The struggle for freedom was the subject of several novels. The life of the prostitute, the factory worker, the compositor and the journalist received the serious attention of the novelist. The exploitation of women also became the subject of serious concern. The Pragatishilas were prolific writers; Krishna Rao alone wrote more than a hundred novels (not all of them in the Pragatishila vein). The school did produce some first-rate novels—Kattimani's Jwalamukhiya mele, Subba Rao's Munjavininda munjavu and Niranjana's Chirasmarane, for instance. Its contribution to the development of Kannada prose also is remarkable; power, vividness, lucidity and sensuousness generally characterized the prose of these novels.

While Navodaya was never superseded, the Progressive School was weakened by the Navya movement. The Pragatishila writers, by and large, wrote powerfully, but they often wrote rhetorically and without a controlling sense of form. Their thought-processes were not fully assimilated in the work itself. But they did bring into the Kannada novel areas of feeling and experience which had been excluded; and they stressed the social responsibility of the writer. The influence of the school is discernible in the 'bandaya' writing of more recent times.

Both the Navodaya novelists and the Pragatishila novelists wrote historical novels. Devudu Narasimha Sastry's Mayura (1928) was immensely popular; it also revealed how the form could be employed to resurrect the by-gone days of glory and to incarnate the ideals that the contemporary age demanded. But generally the Pragatishila novelists turned to this form after the Pragatishila movement had virtually faded away. During the sixties, many women novelists also started writing. Anasuya Shankar (better known as 'Triveni') was one of the most important among them. She achieved rare popularity. She could tell a story; she enshrined the values dear to the middle class, and her characterization showed a conspicuous interest in psychology. Till recently the range of the women novelists remained narrow, but some of them have enjoyed great popularity.

The Navya spirit first manifested itself in poetry but soon influenced the novel. Shantinatha Desai's Mukti (1961) is generally regarded as heralding the dawn of Navya in fiction. Influenced by Existential philosophy and novelists like Kafka, Camus and Sartre, the Navya novelist regarded the novel as an exploration of experience. Language was the means of this exploration, and therefore, the Navya novelist sought to bend language to his purpose and to employ it both with precision and with economy. Navya writing was characterized by a strong sense of form. The Navya novelists were severely critical of their predecessors—and particularly of the Pragatishilas—for their indifference to form. They saw character as a delicate balance of tensions; the conception of character as the sum of clearly definable qualities gave place to the conception of character as a delicate balance of tendencies, and the unpredictability of men was recognized. Soliloquy came to be employed as a means of revealing not only the unspoken thoughts of men and women but as a means of suggesting depths and complexities of which they themselves were not aware.

The Navya novelists were not prolific, but in a span of two decades they produced some outstanding novels. The best-known is U.R. Ananthamurthy's Samskara. Lankesh's Biruku is a representative work of the movement. Shantinatha Desai has given fine novels like Srishti, Sambandhagalu, Vikshepa and Bija among them. Purnachandra Tejaswi's Swarupa, Kamarupi's Kuduremotte and Giri's Gati stiti are among the other notable novels of this school.

The Navya novel generated considerable controversy. The writer-reader relationship changed markedly with the advent of Navya. For the first time the complaint was heard that fiction had come to be the prerogative of a few—the highly educated and sophisticated class. The charge of obscurity was made. Added to the difficulty that the ordinary reader faced was the fact that this fiction was introspective and gave the impression of being narcissistic. It tended to become imitative, and writers tended to lose sight of the fact that literature had to be a significant experience.

Navya fiction completely liberated the novel from the tyranny of the plot. The 'open' novel came to be accepted. Also, the complexity both of experience and of human nature came to be recognized. The importance of form and of discipline in the use of language was affirmed.

The seventies saw the strengthening of the Bandaya and Dalita movement. Bandaya literature is the creation of writers of upper castes and social strata with sympathy for the down-trodden. Dalita literature is the creation of the victims of oppression and injustice. Like the Pragatishila writers, Bandaya and Dalita writers also stressed the social responsibility of the writer. Devanru Mahadeva's novel, Odalala, is easily the best novel of the new movement. The veneer of humour in the narration deepens the poignancy of the sufferings of the exploited, some of whom are not even aware of the full extent of their impoverishment.

Two points have to be remembered. One is that all these six decades, the writers who did not strictly belong to any school, have produced significant novels. 'Sriranga' himself defies labelling. Both the Progressive Movement and the Navya Movement claimed him as a harbinger of their movements. Rao Bahadur's Gramayana is one of the major Kannada novels, but the novelist belonged to no school. Indeed, the Navodaya writers never regarded themselves as belonging to a particular movement with certain ideals and a manifesto. Shankara Mokashi Punekar's Gangavva-Gangamayi is sometimes described as a Navya novel because of the weak, drifting 'hero'; but the novelist makes conscious efforts to achieve a throw-back to the early Kannada novel. S.L. Bhyrappa, who has won immense popularity, created in his novels clearly defined characters, each with a definite philosophy of life and set of values, the characters who accepted life, took decisions and faced the consequences; and this he did in the age of Navya fiction with its weak, indecisive and introspective characters. Sometimes, writers who consciously began writing in a particular tradition or school later outgrew it. Most of the Pragatishila novelists later wrote novels glorifying Indian culture and tradition. Purnachandra Tejaswi first wrote as a Navya, but later, in the foreword to a collection of stories, strongly denounced Navya. Lankesh's Mussanjeya kathaprasanga not only retains some characteristics of Navya, but goes beyond it. Secondly, writers recognized as belonging to a particular tradition or school were influenced by other schools and movements. Shivarama Karanth's Alida mele shows the influence of Navya distinctly in its technique. Shanthinatha Desai has been an exponent of the Existential philosophy, but his Bija shows a social concern. Yashwanth Chittal, whose Mooru darigalu was one of the early and successful Navya novels, goes beyond Kafka and the Navya school in his Shikari.

In recent years the horizons of the Kannada novel have widened because of the innovative genius of novelists. To mention a few examples, S.L Bhyrappa's Parva (which has been translated into Hindi) is a retelling of the story of the Mahabharata. There is a process of demythification at work. Kunti gets her sons, not from gods like Yamadharma and Indra, but from men belonging to a race of exceptional human beings called the Devas. It is a sociological approach to the story of the epic, an attempt to understand society, with its attitudes and values, which made the terrible holocaust of war inevitable. The achievement of this novel has been debated. Purnachandra Tejaswi's Karvalo is another significant achievement. It is the story of a scientist engaged in the search of a creature which lived millions of years ago and has all but disappeared now; a community gets involved in the search and, against the background of evolution itself, the drama of the lives of mortals of a few decades is played out and ethical questions posed. Vyasaraya Ballala's Bandaya is a study of the nature of revolt and cruelty. These are just some of the novels which have appeared in recent years and bear testimony to the richness of the Kannada novel which transcends the limitations of schools and movements.

NOVEL (Kashmiri) came into being in Kashmiri recently under peculiar circumstances. Although Kashmiri verse has a long continuity of six hundred years, prose as a vehicle of literary expression began to take shape as a result of the upsurge caused by the tribesmen's raids into Kashmir during 1947. It was an outburst of patriotic fervour that gripped the writers and they presented, for the first time, the features, news commentaries, short stories, plays, etc., which laid the foundation of a flexible and viable prose style.

The instrument of expression having been stabilised and given some refinement, the Kashmiri novel was craving for its birth. It had to wait for nearly a decade after 1947, and the first novel in Kashmiri, Do'd dag (Sickness and pain) by Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din appeared in 1957. It tells the story of two orphaned sisters passing their married lives through proverty, want, sickness, pain and misery. The characters are drawn with reasonable ability. The novel may be said to be fairly successful as a first attempt and a fine specimen of prose, but it could not be classified as a work of art as it lacked the magnitude and depth of a novel.

A couple of years later appeared Gati manza gaash (Light amidst darkness) by Muhammad Amin Kamil, who was inspired by the well-known observation of Mahatma Gandhi in the context of the aftermath of the partition of the Indian sub-continent in 1947, that in the midst of darkness prevailing everywhere he had found a ray of light in Kashmir alone. Kamil has attempted to provide this concept with blood and bone which, of course, is a highly exciting task. Considering all the cirumstances, he has come off not too badly. The heroine Fatima, an educated young Muslim maiden of a distant village, working as a school teacher in Baramulla, the scene of carnage committed by the tribal invaders, refuses to marry Hasalala, a prosperous young Muslim, because of the complicity of his family in the political conspiracy, and prefers to be known as the widow of Ramkrishan, an ugly and illiterate Hindu, who had given his life in protecting her honour. Such characters, however, appear to be almost unearthly. Gati manza gaash portrays very vividly the death-dance enacted by the tribal invaders in Baramulla, and his portrayal appears to be even better than that of Bates in The Scarlet Sword which contains a similar episode. It is the only Kashmiri novel that is based on historical events.

With the arrival of Gati manza gaash, it may be said, the novel came to stay in Kashmiri, but the pace of output has been extremely slow. The novelette As'ti chhi insan (We, too, are human) by Ali Muhammad Lone, which came out later, is an allegory and a pilgrimage to the sacred cave of Amarnath. It serves as a device for the writer to view how suffering and sincerity bring about a change and ennoblement in the hearts of even the worst materialists. Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din made another excursion in this form in Zuv ta' zolaana (Life and shackles) depicting lives of the boatmen. The novelette appeared serially in a journal and was obviously written in haste.

Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' made his debut in novel-writing with his Mujrim (The accused). Gauhar, a magistrate, brings the law courts under the scanning gaze of a novelist. The inadequacy of the machinery for dispensing justice can occasionally lead to the opposite end-result. Likewise, hackneyed social traditions and class solidarity, which smother love and innocence, receive a drubbing. The novelist sheds unedifying light over the so-called intellectual elite. In introducing suspense and greater complicacy in plot Mujrim marks a step forward. Though the main theme is a variation of the Romeo-Juliet stuff, there is swiftness of movement in the novel and liveliness which enhances its readability. Gauhar gave us another novel, Miyu'l (Union) in succession to Mujrim. It presents a young man and a young maiden, both from the affluent classes, drawn closer towards a union. Gauhar does not let go the opportunity for stimulating an overflow of romantic sentimentalism. As in Mujrim, the novelist appears to have a grip over plot construction and pace of movement.

Bansi 'Nirdosh' has contributed two works to this genre in Kashmiri literature, viz., Mokajaar and Akh dore. The latter leads us into the underworld of pimps, bawds and commission agents. This underworld is a closed circle, and to get an insight into its activities and to present a portrait for public view needs exceptional ability. The novelist has even attempted to transform this world into one of love and sincerity. Whether the reader can willingly suspend his disbelief is a moot question.

Limited readership is a great hurdle in the way of the growth of the Kashmiri novel. Perhaps there is not enough motivation for writers to put in sustained efforts for the novel. It has, therefore, yet to establish its credentials convincingly. All talk of a 'school of novelists' and 'a movement in fiction', etc., is, thus, a little premature at the moment.

NOVEL (Konkani). The first Konkani novel was written in Roman script and was published during the last decade of the nineteenth century. Some of the most popular novelists who flourished until 1950 are: Aleixo Caitano Jose Francisco (Rose ani Generosa, 1895), F.X. Fernandes (Bail vortouta bunnad dadospannachi, 1897—Woman is the foundation of happiness), Sebastiao Salvador de Jesus Dias (Khuxalponnacho ghorobo, 1898—Happy family), J.J.A.B. Brito (Morn, 1903—The death), A. Fonseca (Angelina, 1912), Lourecinho Dantas de Souza (Lulu, 1912), Joao Caintano Francisco de Souza (Noxibacho Fator, 1916—The stone of destiny), F.X. Fernandes Liberal (Mog, 1918—Love).

A new impetus was given by Antonio Vicente de Cruz through his Ek khorea mogachi conta, 1909—A story of true love). With him the novel became sentimental and melodramatic to a degree and less carefully composed.

The other novelists of the period are: Joaquim Inacio Campos (Eduardo ani Florinda, 1908), Joao Luis Carvalho (Ernest ani Delfina, 1909), Bernardo Francis Cabral (Gabruchi sasumai, 1923—Gabru's mother-in-law), Roman Dias (Satvo sorg, 1937—The seventh heaven), Milton Caldeira (Esmeralda, 1939), C.S. Borges (Churchureachem morn, 1949—Sorrowful death), Taumaturgo de Souza (Areabealem colvont, 1948), Caridade Domasceno Fernandes (Goemchem colvont, 1951).

The most popular themes of these novels were love, adventure, lives of saints, the war between the classes, and historical tales. However, they lacked originality, used primitive techniques of narration and sermonising, and succeeded only in catering to the taste of the masses.

Following their line among the novelists of today we have: Reginaldo Fernandes who wrote Zorzorro, Koddu Somdir, Ezra and Cipriana (1978) and holds the record of the publication of more than a hundred novels, Eliott Elly's Bhirant (Fear), A.F.D'Souza's Conn muzo fuddar (What is in store for me), Dioginho de Melo's Mogancho anvddo (The anguish of love), Aloysius Affonso's Mahapapi (Great sinner, Parts I am II), Bonaventure D' Pietro's Mhojea paicho fondd (My father's tomb, 1975) and Anotonio L. Pereira's Kallzidar (Daring, 1975) and Vadoll and Varem (The storm and the wind, 1979). Both Pietro and Pereira have won the Kala Akademy Goa Award, 1975. They could be regarded as innovators of the Konkani novel in the Roman script.

The other promising novelists are: A. Carvalho (Sasnnak tujem—Yours forever, 1980), Planton Faria (Tujea mogakhatir—For the love of you), Jess Fernandes (Nirmonn, Parts I and II—Destiny), Freddy J. de Costa (Onit—Injustice), F.X. Rebeiro (Bhuerantli choli, Parts I and II—The girl in the cellar), John Serrao (Kallem sunnem—The black dog), R.F. Barreto (Bonichem farikpon, 1966—A sister repays), Pedro Piedade Fernandes (Utrachi mudi—Engagement ring), Ramakant Poulenkar (Zoitache put ami—We the triumphant sons, and Axen ghetlo ghat—The greed that destroyed). Juao Inacia D' Souza, Moreno de Souza, etc. are some popular novelists writing in the Roman script.

Most of these novelists often wrote to a given and acceptable formula, mostly on the life of a sailor, love or adventure, often refusing to make the readers think about a particular situation, and aimed at titillating fancy, finally driving home the accepted conclusions.

The fifties also witnessed a parallel movement in South Canara. Joachim Santana Alvares wrote Angel, a pioneering novel in the Kannada script. He has to his credit more than 28 novels wherein he has adopted the conscious art of narrating a story.

Vincent John Peter alias Shri Khadap brought a new understanding to the complex emotional problems. His popular and bulky novel Devache kripen (With blessings from God) is a masterpiece which depicts the customs and traditions of the Canarese Christians realistically. He has concentrated mostly on historic fiction and successfully portrayed the romantic and adventurous character of the Christians imprisoned by Tipu Sultan.

Francis Saldanha, the author of Dorachi bhul (Dora's error), Hanv chukan poddlam (I made a mistake), Hanv tukam pois korchina (I shall not leave you), etc. writes in a pleasant style and has been quite popular. Several other novelists have been busy constructing plot-novels with an attempt at psychological analysis which is not always successful.

The popular novels are: Joachim Santana Alvares' Gudgudi Fulabai, Roland Pereira's Pagor kosalle (The wall has fallen), Dophy Cascia's Ghata patlem sot (The truth behind the crime), H.J. Goveas' Bhuyarantly gutt (The mystery in the cellar), Irene Pinto's Tonvem mhakam nagar kelem (You denied me). Most of these writers broke away from the prose fiction of the past, involving a break with the old fashioned romances.

The seventies is a period of reformation. Over the years a new generation, bruised by socio-economic changes, came up. These novelists were more involved than the earlier novelists and displayed greater maturity.

Among the modern novelists in the Devanagri script, Ravindra Kelekar's only novel Tulsi is remarkable for a concise and terse style of presentation and for deep insight into human life.

Chandrakant Keni's Eklo eksuro (All alone) is a novel with purpose. He is highly successful in depicting the characters against a diplomatic background.

Pundalik Narain Naik's two novels Bambar and Ascheva could be considered outstanding novels. Both his novels make a successful attempt to depict the transitional scenario of Goa and to recapture the joys and sorrows of the silent masses.

Tukaram Sheth has written a psychological and social novel Pakhlo (White-skinned). He is highly successful in recreating the life of a Goan village.

Arun Sitaram Singbal's novelettes Zayu and Padabimba (Reflection) are notable for lively characterisation and realistic themes. His ideas on social relationship and behaviour are liberal.

Laxman Rao Sardessai, a noted writer in Marathi, has written Papdam Kavlleo (A packet of papadam). He narrates the story of an ordinary boy who has had his day. Here the impressions of life are simply and effectively recorded.

Damodar Mauzo's plot-novel Sudd (Revenge) is a model of simple and effective style. His portrayals are quiet but deeply disturbing. His Karmelin won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983.

There are also a large number of novels serialised in periodicals, published in all the three scripts—Roman, Kannada and Devanagari, but they have never appeared in book-form.

Modern Konkani novelists are more successful both in characterisation and in artistic form. Story-telling technique is improving, crudities are disappearing and a new exactness in the use of special vocabulary can be easily discerned, all of which indicate a new hope and bright future for the Konkani novel.

NOVEL (Maithili). The writing of a novel in Maithili started in the second decade of this century. Rameshwar (1918) by Jibachh Mishra and Nirdayi sasu by Janardan Jha 'Janasidan' are early examples, but they are mostly didactic tales hurriedly narrated in a novelette form. The real novel starts from 1933 with Chamunda by Lakshmipati Singh, Madhabi-Madhab by Harinandan Thakur 'Saroj', Chandragrahana by Kanchinath Jha 'Kirana' and Agilahi by Kumar Ganganand Singh. Of these the last, though incomplete, was highly appreciated for its character-portrayal. With the advent of Harimohan Jha, the Maithili novel came to its own. His Kanyadan, a social comedy interspersed with wit and humour and having a modern outlook, was a great success. He shows the same excellence in its sequel Dviragaman.

During the forties and fifties, novelists preferred to write on traditional social themes. Paro by Yatri, Kumar by Vyas, Bhalamanus by Yoganand Jha, Madhushravani by Shailendra Mohan Jha, Adikatha by Rajkamal and Agi mom a pather by Mayananda Mishra are some of the best examples.

Brajkishore Verma 'Manipadma', exploring the heroic ballads of Mithila and imbibing their idiom, has produced a number of novels. His Lorik vijaya, Naika banijara (Sahitya Akademi Award winner, 1973) and Raja Salahes are the most widely appreciated novels.

About 1960 the Maithili novel took a new turn with the advent of a progressive outlook. Attention shifted from the upper classes to the lower classes. Class conflict and social injustice became favourite themes. Balchanma by Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' was the first and the foremost progressive novel in Maithili. Prithviputra by Lalit stood next. Then came a band of novelists. Dhireshvar Jha Dhirendra came into prominence with Bhorukaba, Kado a koila and Thumuki bahu Kamala. Prabhas Kumar Chaudhari wrote about the rise of a new social order in Hamara lag rahab and Yugpurusa. Jivakanta struck another note, focussing on the frustration and indecisiveness of the youth. Du kuhesak bat and Panipat are his major works. Mayanand Mishra is no doubt progressive, but he is better appreciated for his treatment of love and passion. A woman for him is a touchstone and he treats sexual relation with a touch of both reality and idealism. Bihari pat pathar is regarded as his best novel. His recently published novel, Mantraputra, based on pre-Vedic society and culture, also reveals the same sensitivity to sex.

Ee bataha sansar (Sahitya Akademi Award winner, 1980) by Sudhanshu Chaudhari 'Shekhar' deals with the traditional theme of one-sided love. Du patra, another Sahitya Akademi Award winner (1969), by Upendranath Jha 'Vyas' juxtaposes the Indian and European types of conjugal relationships and stresses the superiority of the former. The third novel, honoured with the Sahitya Akademi award (1982), namely, Marichika by Lily Ray, surpasses not only in volume, but also in merit all the novels in Maithili. Against a colossal canvas of time and place, the novelist unveils the hidden forces of love, hatred and rivalry amongst the three generations of a royal house. It is a fine and detailed documentation of a culture changing dynamically.

The only historical novel deserving mention is Baladitya by Chandranarayan Mishra. It deals with the ambitious life and time of Narasimhagupta, a later Gupta king (5th century A.D.). The novel is as authentic as it is interesting.

NOVEL (Malayalam). The eighties of the last century saw the birth of the Malayalam novel. The distinction for laying the foundation of this literary genre goes to three English educated stalwarts, O. Chandu Menon (1847-1899), C.V. Raman Pillai (1858-1922) and Appu Nedungadi (1863-1933). The youngest born of the three, Nedungadi, published the first Malayalam novel Kundalata (1882), with Menon following suit with Indulekha (1894) and Pillai with Marthanda Varma (1891). Kundalata is by no means an outstanding novel, but it has its importance as the first original work of prose fiction in the language. It is a suspenseful narrative about petty palace intrigues, inconsequential wars and heart-warming romance set in Kalinga. The novel ends happily with the restoration of the kidnapped Kundalata, the heiress, to the throne.

Appu Nedungadi has not told us about the circumstances of his writing the novel, but Chandu Menon has. His was a conscious effort. He wanted to effect a change in the literary sensibility of the Malayalis as also to contribute to the social resurgence of his community. Menon belonged to the Nair community which had a special kind of relationship with the Nambutiris, the Malayalam speaking Brahmins of Kerala. The Nambutiri men entering into a rather loose kind of marital alliance with the Nair women, in spite of social acceptability, had already become a target of attack by well-meaning members of both the communities. The matriarchal joint family system among the Nairs had begun to develop cracks with the younger generation going decidedly in favour of the new education and the social and economic emancipation it was sure to bring. All these ideals of high social and moral relevance have been brought into bold relief in the novel. The story revolves round an ordinary domestic theme of an old, temperamental and autocratic head of the family refusing to give his grand-daughter Indulekha in marriage to his English educated grand-nephew. The old man spitefully bringing in an old Nambutiri as bridegroom to the heroine, and the consequent comedy arising out of the comic antics of the libidinous Nambutiri provide much of the delightful comedy and satire which does have a sting. The remarkable simplicity of the style arises out of the dexterous use of the spoken idiom. This was one of the avowed aims of the writer and the success of the novel depends, to a large extent, on this. The purposeful social awareness, the penetrating character studies, the masterful handling of the colloquial style for a serious literary purpose, the topical relevance of the theme and the authentic portrayal of the ferment of ideas—all within the framework of the central theme—make this first social novel a remarkably mature piece of work. It is amazing that an achievement of this magnitude was possible just after two years of the publication of the folklore-fantasy of Kundalata.

Chandu Menon published the first part of his second novel Sharada in 1892. Though he lived for another seven years, he could never find time to complete the novel which is a powerful indictment of the pernicious love for litigation of the landed gentry of the time. Though several attempts have been made by later writers to complete the novel, they have not been able to approach anywhere near the creative genius of the writer of the first part.

C.V. Raman Pillai's Marthanda Varma, a superb historical romance based on a tumultuous epoch in the history of Travancore, was published in 1891. The epic sweep and grandeur of this work was further extended by the author in his two other novels Dharmaraja (1913) and Ramarajabahadur (Part I, 1917 and Part II, 1920), both of which are extensions in theme, attitude, treatment and style of the earlier work. Raman Pillai not only sowed the seeds of the historical novel, but also raised a rich crop from the fertile soil of the eventful history of the past which remained fertile for another half a century for the writers of the next two generations to exploit its treasures. Appan Tampuran's Bhutarayar (1923), Ambadi Narayana Poduval's Keralaputran (1924), T. Raman Nambisan's Keraleshwaran, Kappana Krishna Menon's Cheraman Perumal (1939) and Sardar K.M. Panikkar's Keralasimham (1944) are successful attempts in the field of historical novel.

Two other forms of the genre, the picaresque and the detective, have had early exemplifications in Malayalam in Karat Achutha Menon's Virutan Shanku (1912) and Appan Thampuran's Bhaskara Menon (1905). Novels based on contemporary history, though veiled in their treatment for obvious reasons, had appeared as early as the first decade of the 20th century. Notable among them are K. Narayana Kurukkal's Parappuram (in three parts, 1908) and Udayabhanu (in four parts, 1905).

The travails of and the inequities suffered by the socially ostracized classes found artisitic expression in the closing decade of the last century itself in Potheri Kunjampu's Saraswativijayam (1892), a work of enduring merit which, as its title suggests, rightly stresses the importance of education as the only panacea for the emancipation of the depressed classes.

Of all these various manifestations of the genre, the most resilient and productive and significant as literature has been the social novel which has had an excellent pedigree in Chandu Menon's immortal works, Indulekha and Sharada. The social novel received a fillip when European and Bengali novels were made available through translations. Discussions on the theme and technique of the Western novels, mostly of French authors, by A. Balakrishna Pillai, a most influential critic of the first half of this century provided the much needed ideological background. Side by side with romanticism, realism came to be accepted as a credo by a whole new generation of writers. Historical romances continued to be written with fictitious and real settings. Pallath Raman's (d. 1950) Amrita pulinam and Sardar K.M. Panikkar's Kalyanamal are examples of romances written during this period.

The post-World War II scene saw the emergence of a group of politically and socially conscious young progressives. Of these writers Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai (b. 1914) has been most prolific. He has won national and international acclaim through translations of his works into Indian languages, English and other European languages. His Rantitangazhi (Two measures of rice, 1949), Tottiyude makan (Scavenger's son, 1946) and Chemmeen (Shrimps, 1956) have become classics. Thakazhi's later works are also notable of which Enippadikal (Ladder steps, 1963) is a successful attempt at portraying the social and political ferment of the 1940's up to the attainment of Independence. P. Kesava Dev is another important writer of this period. In his younger days he was a firebrand of a rebel who espoused the cause of the lowly and the downtrodden with a passion and verve unknown to the writers of the period. His most notable works are Odayil ninnu (From the gutter, 1942), Bhrantalayam (The mad-house), Ulakka (The pestle), Nati (The actress) and Ayalkkar (Neighbours, 1963).

Vaikkom Muhamed Basheer (b. 1910), who shot into fame by the publication of his first novel Balyakalasakhi (Childhood playmate, 1944), has remained right in the centre of the scene as an unrivalled master of his craft. He has a style all his own. He was the first important writer to portray the social life of the Muslim community with wit, humour and irony and a lot of compassionate understanding. The most successful of his novels is Ntu Uppuppakkoranendarnnu (Your grandfather had an elephant, 1951), which portrays the slow but sure change that was to usher in a new era of enlightenment in the Muslim community through education and consequent social emancipation.

The social scene was further probed in with significant details, though of a limited segment, by Cherukad (1915-1976) in his Marumakal and in Manninte maril (1952). S.K. Pottekkat (b. 1913) came into prominence with his first notable achievement Vishakanyaka (Poison damsel, 1948) which is a poignant tale of woes of the pioneering southern settlers, mostly Christians, on the malarial interior and the hilly tracts of Wayanad in Malabar. He came back with two other novels, Oru deshattinte katha (The story of a village, 1960) and Oru teruvinte katha (The story of a street, 1970), both of which are experimental in regard to technique. They are loosely structured, casual and episodic narrations of drifting characters against an autobiographical background.

The romantic strain at its best is seen in the highly sensitive portrayals of rural life by P.C. Kuttikrishnan, popularly known as Uroob (b. 1915). His first great novel Ummachchu (The beloved, 1955) tells the story of the eternal triangle in an exquisitely chiselled style, rich in refreshing rural imagery which breathes poetry at every turn. A contribution of much greater significance, of epic proportion, is his Sundarikalum Sundaranmarum (The handsome women and the handsome men, 1960). The panoramic view the novel unfolds of the Malabar of the post-Moplah uprising, with innumerable incidents and scores of characters and episodic narration thrown up as it moves majestically on, is something which was never before attempted in the history of the Malayalam novel. Verily a magnificent achievement.

Among those who came into prominence in the fifties were Joseph Mundasseri, E.M. Kovoor, K. Surendran, M.T. Vasudevan Nair, G. Vivekanandan, Parappuram, Nandanar, Kovilan and quite a few others, all of whom were, in varying degress, concerned with the social scene and the predicament of the individual. Joseph Mundasseri's Konthayil ninnu Kurishilekku (1955) and Parappurathu vithachcha vittu (1965) picture the turbulent political and social changes seen through the vicissitudes in the fortunes of the various communal and religious pressure groups.

M.T.'s (b. 1933) Nalukettu (The old mansion, 1958), Asuravittu (The dragon seed, 1962), Mannju (The mist, 1965) and Kalam (Time, 1969) are all powerful novels. Mannju keeps off the beaten track of conventional narration and makes artistic use of the flashback and the stream of consciousness techniques. G. Vivekanandan's (b. 1921) Kalli Chellamma (Chellamma, the thief) was a thumping success when it was first published. It portrays the life of a group of rustics with their loves and hates and the perennial struggle for existence, emphasising the essential humanity that brooks no permanent hatred, and rushes to the aid of one's own former enemies in times of need. Malayattur's Verukal (Roots, 1966) is the tale of an expatriate community, of which the protagonist, a youngman who had temporarily lost his attachment to his ancestral surroundings, realizes in the end where his roots are. His Yantram (Machine, 1976) is an authentic treatment of the corrupting influence of bureaucratic power with its many faces smiling and frowning at its real masters, the corrupting politicians and big money.

Parappuram, Kovilan and Nanthanar—all pen names—are writers thrown up from the barrack rooms. They have contributed in rich measure to the literature on army life. The hard life of our fighting men in the barracks and on the battle-fronts comes out alive with all its poignancy in their novels. Parappuram's Ninamaninja kalppatukal (Blood-stained footsteps, 1955), Kovilan's A minus B and Nanthanar's Ariyappedatta manushya jivikal (Unknown human beings, 1956) are representative works of this class of writing.

K. Surendran is a pastmaster in the art and craft of fiction whose novels Talam (Rhythm, 1960), Maya (Mirage, 1961), Kattukurangu (Wild ape, 1962), Seema (Limit, 1967), Maranam durbalam (Death is weak, 1972) and Bhiksham dehi (Mendicant, 1976) are powerful studies of human nature within well-wrought plots.

Among the new experimental novels the most noteworthy is O.V. Vijayan's Khasakinte itihasam (The epic of Khasak, 1969), a highly successful attempt at sketching the day to day experiences of a youngman who has lost all faith in conventional moral values.

One of the most significant contributions to contemporary Malayalam novel is P.K. Balakrishnan's Ini njan urangatte (Let me go to sleep now, 1976). It is a retelling of a highly touching episode from the Mahabharata, with Kunti, Karna and Draupadi as central characters.

Among the notable works of women writers may be cited Rajalakshmy's Oru vazhiyum kure nizhalukalum, Valsala's Nellu and Lalithambika Antharjanam's Agnisakshi (1977), the last one being a brilliant depiction of characters caught up between conflicting loyalities.

NOVEL (Manipuri) came to be written only in the present century, though some form of composition akin to it existed in the mediaeval Manipuri literature. Numit kappa, Thawanthaba hiran, Naothingkhong phambal kaba, etc. of the mediaeval period have some elements of the novel in them. The first Manipuri novel written in the present century was Madhabi (1930) by Lamabam Kamal Singh. It is a tragic tale of sacrifice. The next novel, Labanglata (1939), by Khwairakpam Chaoba Singh, is based on a historical incident. It is also a tragic story. It is the story of love between Kunjalata, the daughter of Khagemba, the king of Manipur (1597-1652) and Labanga, a sepoy in the enemy camp led by Shanongba, a half-brother of the king. Though he deals with the mediaeval period of Manipuri history, Chaoba Singh tries to infuse in the novel many of the modern ideas and beliefs. Rajkumar Shitaljit Singh in the late forties and early fifties wrote four novels. They are Ima (1947), Thadokpa (1941), Rohini (1948) and Nungshi wakheiba (1950). Shitalijit Singh's novels are moralistic in tone and steeped in idealism. Asangbam Minaketan Singh is of the view that each of the four novels of Shitaljit Singh is based on the yoga enunciated in the Gita. The author tells a story candidly in a straight forward language which is also racy and unadorned. Jahera by Hijam Anganghal Singh was posthumously published in 1964. The novel tells us about the tragic love of Jahera, a Muslim girl of Kunjo, and a Meitei youth, much against the social sanction and its code. This novel deals with a social problem of the period when inter-marriage between different communities was not only looked down upon, but also severely restricted. As such, the love between the Muslim girl and the Meitei boy had to end in tragedy. Anganghal Singh dealt with the problem boldly and showed the inhuman cruelty inherent in rigid social conservatism. The next important novelist in Manipuri is Hijam Guno Singh. His novels Laman (1958), Khudol (1964), Eikhoigi tada (1966) and Bir Tikendrajit road (1983) are widely read and discussed. Laman tells the story of the sufferings and sorrows of a Meitei widow and her only son who had to seek asylum at a Kabui village, disguised as Kabui to escape from the tyranny of their oppressors. The novel depicts a close relationship between the people of the valley and the hills of Manipur. This won the novelist the Jaminisundar Guha Gold Medal of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1965. Khudol is also a tale of trial and tribulation and the canvas of the story is very wide. Eikhoigi tada is about the lives of two orphan brothers who by virtue of sincerity and hard work overcome many obstacles. The last novel, Vir Tikendrajit road, which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1985, is different from the other three novels. The stories are episodic and are told in the stream of consciousness style. The novel is more concerned with the depiction of the inner mind of the characters than with telling an absorbing tale. Pacha Meitei, writing in the late sixties and early seventies, departed from convention with his Hayad begum (1967), Na tathiba ahal ama (1969), Haj (1970), Imphal amasung magi ishing nungshitki phibam (1971), Anouba pao ama (1973) and Lamdam asida eibu shakkhangba amatang thorakpa phei (1976). Hayad begum and Haj contain many details from the Manipuri Muslim community. Both the novels are absorbing tragic stories. Both Na tathiba ahal ama and Imphal amasung magi ishing nungshitki phibam are made of episodic tales woven together, and the novelist creates such situations as could reveal the characters of the protagonists through their reaction to these situations. These two set a new trend in Manipuri novel. Imphal amasung magi ishing nungshitki phibam won him the Sahitya Akademi award in 1973. Maharajkumari Binodini Devi's Boro saheb ongbi sanatombi (1976) which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1979 is a novel that deals with the tragic events which occurred after the conquest of Manipur in 1891 by the British. The characters and events are historical, but the novel is also rich in imaginative detail. The strong personality of Sanatombi who remained the wife of Major Maxwell, the Political agent of Manipur, after having forsaken her married husband, has been brought out with skill. There is subtlety in her depiction of the grandeur and majesty of the royalty of Manipur. The language is poetic and evocative.

Besides these major novelists, there are a few more writers who wrote novels in Manipuri. Tokpam Ibomcha Singh who died young wrote a romantic novel called Mongpham in the tradition of Kamal Singh. Thoibi Devi is another woman novelist who wrote Radha, Chingda shatpi ingellei and Nungshi ichel in a style which has a distinctly feminine grace.

Many novels in translation from other Indian languages, mainly Bengali, appeared in Manipuri. Almost all the novels of Bankimchandra Chatterjee and Saratchandra Chatterjee were translated by Ayekpam Shyamsundar Singh, Guruaribam Surchand Sharma and Haobam Iboyaima Singh. Louhakapat, Dristipat and Sandhya dwiper shikha, these three other Bengali novels, were translated by S. Nandichand Singh, Thoibi Devi and Kunjamohan Singh respectively. Besides these, a few other titles were also translated by other translators. From Hindi, Premchand's Godan and Gaban were translated by Chingangbam Nishan Singh, and Elangbam Dinamani Singh translated Tyagpatra of Jainendra Kumar.

NOVEL (Marathi). Although the form of the Novel in Marathi is named after Kadambari, a Sanskrit prose work by Banabhatta (7th century), the Marathi novel is neither traditionally linked up to Sanskrit prose nor does it have its sources therein. Similarly, although there existed a tradition of prose works in Marathi in the pre-British period (i.e. right from Lilacharitra of Mhaimbhatta, the first literary prose work in Marathi in the 13th century, to Bakhar literature in the medieval period) attempts made by a few critics to relate the Marathi novel to this prose tradition have not proved convincing. At the most the earlier prose works could have contributed to some extent a descriptive and metaphorical style to the Marathi novel in its early growth. One has to accept the fact that it is the form consciousness created by English literature that gave rise to various forms of literature like short story, novel, essay, drama, etc. in Marathi in the fifties, sixties and seventies of the nineteenth century. The Marathi novel owes much to this consciousness in its formative period, i.e. in the third and fourth quarter of the nineteenth century. For treating subject-matter, for arranging thought-content and for exploring a suitable structure, the Marathi novel had before it the path set by the English novel. This will also be evident from the fact that in its early days the form of the novel was named 'Naval' or 'Navalkatha' in Marathi in imitation of the word 'novel'.

Yamuna paryatan (1857) by Baba Padmanji is supposed to be the first original novel in Marathi. It should not be forgotten that the year of the publication of the first Marathi novel and of the establishment of Bombay University is one and the same. Indeed, the educational policy of the early British rule (1818-1857) did influence the literary consciousness in regional languages like Marathi, Bengali, Gujarati, etc.

Prior to Yamuna paryatan a few novels were translated into Marathi from English and other languages. Hari Keshavji's Yatrik kraman (1841), a translation of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, is supposed to be the first translated novel in Marathi. This was a starting point and we can see a number of translations of English novels by Reynolds, Walter Scott, Philip Meadows Taylor, Lord Lytton and others. Scott being a popular one attracted even creative novelists like Haribhau Apte. A large number of translations from English, Persian and other languages accelerated the development of the novel. Krishnashastri Chiplunkar's Rasselas appeared three years before Padmanji's Yamuna paryatan.

On the one hand a few British administratiors like Elphinstone and Malcolm made sincere efforts for the educational and cultural uplift of the natives, on the other the Christian missionaries criticised Hindu culture and Hindu religion as part of their propaganda. A few educated people like Balshastri Jambhekar and Gopal Hari Deshmukh alias Lokhitwadi wrote essays emphasizing the need for social change. Thus the ideas relating to social reforms were already mooted. This might have inspired the first original novel in Marathi, viz. Yamuna paryatan. It deals with the sorrows and problems of a Hindu widow. Although this novel is quite crude in its form, its characterization and depiction of social background are quite effective. Baba Padmanji being a convert filled the latter half of this novel with Christian propaganda. Another limitation of this novel is its peculiar style, which is anglicised Marathi adopted by missionaries. In Yamuna paryatan Baba Padmanji not only preached Christianity to Hindu wives for a peaceful and happy married life but also added appendices in support of his contentions. Apart from the shortcomings of Yamuna paryatan, we have to appreciate the skill of Baba Padmanji in the depiction of realism. Unfortunately the succeeding novelists did not pay much attention to this realism.

Uninspired by the realism of the first novel Yamuna paryatan, succeeding novelists mainly relied on romantic elements in their novels. The pioneer of the romantic school of novels was Laxman Moreshwar Halbe, who brought out the novel, Muktamala (1861), and set a tread. For the next twenty-five years this romantic school of novelists held the field of the Marathi novel. V.R. Sohani's Piyushbhashini va madira-manjiri (1863), A.K. Daptardar's Rajpura Rajhansa (1865), N.R. Risbud's Manjughosha (1866) and Vishwasrao (1870), Ek swadeshkalyanechhu's Prabhav Malini va Kalavati (1868), K.L. Jorvekar's Vichitrapuri (1870), V.K. Deshmukh's Suhasyavadan (1870), P.G.P. Parkhishastri's Mitrachandra (1870), Kanitkar brothers' Manovedhak Madhusudan va Rupsundari (1872); Salubai Tambekar's (who perhaps is the first Marathi female novelist) Suvarnamalini (1874) and N.D. Yogi's Prembhandhan (1874) are the novels which belong to the trend set by Manjughosha. In these romantic novels the authors did not particularly care for characterization. They relied on the description of unnatural and artificial incidents and coincidences revolving round the central characters of the novels. Both the hero and the heroine are separated from each other and face an unending row of calamities in their efforts for reunion. The novel, of course, ends with their ultimate union and with the note of the triumph of virtue. This again resulted in the incorporation of didactic sermons in the novels. The characters are divided into two categories, good and bad, and their very names tell us to which category they belong. These novels particularly Muktamala, Manjughosha, Ratnaprabha, Vasant kokila, Champakamala followed in some way the pattern of Banabhatta's Kadambari. The style of these novels is quite Sanskritized. This style perhaps may have saved Marathi prose from the encroachment of the anglicised Marathi style of the missionaries. A few novels of this Shastri or Pandit school treated current problems like widow remarriage and education of women, keeping up, of course, the romantic spirit of the novel.

Thus at the very beginning of the Marathi novel we find that along with the trend of realism it cultivated the trend of didacticism.

Then came the third trend of historical novel in Marathi. It was R.K. Gunjikar, a scholar of both history and language, who wrote his Mochangad (1871) as the first historical novel. Prior to it, M.K. Vijaykar had written Ghashiram Kotwal (1863), a collection of about twentyeight stories with Ghashiram as their central character. Scott and Reynolds were the models before the Marathi historical novelists, as we see the blending of realism and romance in their historical novels.

All the three above-mentioned trends in the Marathi novel paved the way for Hari Narayan Apte (usually mentioned as Haribhau) (1864-1919) who can be called the pioneer of the Marathi novel.

The last two decades of the nineteenth century are quite significant so far as the growth of the Marathi novel is concerned. Incidentally these are the decades which are also important to western India from the cultural, social and political point of view. The political ambitions of the people resulted in the establishment of the Indian National Congress. These decades saw the emergence of Lokmanya Tilak with his Kesari and G.G. Agarkar with his Sudharak. These are the decades in which Mahatma Phule worked for his non-brahmin movement. In these decades again, the problems of the middle class women such as widow remarriage, education, etc., received due attention and social consideration. The last quarter of the 19th century saw two groups of thinkers, viz. puritan nationalists and liberal reformers. Both these groups took recourse to literature—to various forms of literature in general and to poetry, drama, essay and novel in particular. The Marathi novel assimilated all these influences. It, however, paid more attention to social reforms than to the movements obtaining on the political scene. Even in the case of social reforms the Marathi novel remained contented with the depiction of reforms concerning the middle class Marathi family. It did not cater to reforms concerning the masses and the untouchables, neither did it touch problems like poverty, illiteracy, etc. which confronted India, a nation aspiring for political freedom. However, the Marathi novel during this period was all the while under the impact of Western liberal thought which once again turned it to realism.

In the pre-Haribhau Apte period the writers, it seems, did not choose to experiment with the potentials of the form of the novel. The novel had no independent identity as such. For a layman a novel was merely an imaginative long story. However, the same idea of the form of the novel must have been in the minds of a few novelists like M.V. Rahalkar (Narayanrao ani Godavari 1879), N.V. Bapat (Chhatrapati Sambhaji Maharaj, 1879), V.K. Oak (Shirastedar, 1881), R.V. Naik (Nahich na Aikayach, 1892), G.M. Limaye (Venu, 1886), C.M. Apte (Putalabai, 1889), B.M. Pandit (Susheel Yamuna Athava Vasudeo), Balvant Phadke (Yanchya Bandachi Dhamdhum), Shantibrahma (Sindhubai Kinve Ajkalchi Sadguni Manase, 1890), S.V. Puranik (Devi Satyabhama, Part I, 1886) in general and Hari Narayan Apte in particular. All these novelists were well-read and were able to read and understand English novels. They read historical novels and romances from English literature and cultivated a strong taste for this form. But except for H.N. Apte the rest of them could not cope with the demands of the novel as a form of art. It is easy to find the reason for such a state of affairs. Novelists of second rank (like Reynolds, Meadows, Taylor) were the ideals for these Marathi novelists. The well-known novelists like Hardy, Zola, Gorky were not known to them. This situation put limitations on the creative genius of Marathi novelists. They never thought of the novel as a picture of man's life in its wider context. However, it is pleasing to see that the woman in the Marathi novel in those days was not painted chiefly as an extraordinary character but as an ordinary person in a middle-class Hindu family. The woman in Marathi novel was portrayed in various roles like those of sister, daughter-in-law, widow, mother-in-law, etc. Similar was the case with men in the novels. They kept to their professions, surroundings and family backgrounds. This helped the Marathi novel to be true to life and realistic. We find this quality of the modern Marathi novel at its best in Haribhau Apte's works. He started off with historical novels of which Ushakal, Gad ala pan sinh gela, Madhyanha, Suryodaya and Suryagrahan were written on Shivaji. He wrote Rupanagarchi rajkanya on the history of the Rajputs, and Chandragupta and Kalkut on Chandragupta and the Vijayanagar empire respectively.

Apte's contribution to the popularisation of the novel as a literary form is significant. Apart from historical novels, he wrote a few social novels also, which were of great relevance to contemporary social problems, e.g. child marriage and women's education through Ganpatrao (1887-1888) and Pan lakshat kon gheto (1893), followed by Mi (1895) and Bhayankar. His social novels, though essentially didactic in approach, have a very strong emotional appeal for the contemporary middle class. Vaman Malhar Joshi with his Ragini (1916) added psychological dimension to the novel, opening a new vista in the development of the Marathi novel. Sushilecha Dev, his master-piece, was immensely popular. His characters are strongly individualistic and are not stereotypes.

Kashibai Kanitkar was perhaps the first woman novelist. Her Rangarao (1903) and Palkhicha gonda (1928) dealt with social themes, though they did not have anything profound to offer. Her contemporaries were D.M. Pitale, who wrote under the pen name, 'Nathmadhav', and N.H. Apte who wrote Doctor Kadambari in 3 volumes (1920) and Na patnari goshta (1923). The novel till 1930 remained confined mostly to historical and domestic subjects. D.A. Tuljapurkar's major work, Maze Ramayan (1972), deals with social problems with a new approach.

Mama Varerkar contributed generously to the development of the novel with his more than a hundred novels, each written for some social cause. Vidhva Kumari (1928) is an eye-opener to the problems of child marriage and child widowhood. The women characters in his novels, however, are strong characters who revolt against social injustice. In Dhavta dhota (1933) he portrays the plight of hopeless mill-workers and their brave fight against oppression and exploitation. Varerker has extensively translated the Bengali novels of Saratchandra Chatterjee and Bankimchandra.

Around 1925 the Marathi novel took a significant turn at the hands of N.S. Phadke and V.S. Khandekar. The novel became youthfully rebellious and romantic. Phadke's novels were technically perfect romances; they clicked with the masses and brought him unprecedented popularity. His first popular novel was Kulabyachi dandi (1925) which showed his exquisite craftsmanship. Though set in a utopia of love, it compels willing suspension of disbelief. The other novels which followed it were Jadugar (1928), Atkepar (1931), Pravasi (1937), Indradhanushya (1941) and Pratijna (1942). Most of then ran into several editions. His Akherche band (1944), based on the life of Bal Gandharva, the renowned figure in Marathi drama, in a way a break from the rest of his novels, carries a skilful blending of fact and fiction. His style is exemplary in lucidity and racy flow. He has more than 75 novels to his credit.

His contemporary, V.S. Khandekar, arrived on the literary scene slightly later. He made his debut with his novel Kanchanmrig (1931), bringing out the contrast between rampant materialism and spiritual simplicity. He shot to meteoric fame with his Ulka (1934) and Don Dhruva (1934). Both these novels show a realistic portrayal of society and a strong sense of social commitment. His characters, especially the central characters, are strong individuals with a deep romantic stance. His Kraunchawadh (1942) has a strong poetic quality. Yayati, set against the mythical background of the story of king Yayati, Devayani and Kacha, brought in the new technique of first person narration from all the major characters serially. It shows Khandekar at his best in probing the psychological depth of each of his characters, making the scene vividly alive for his readers. This novel won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1960. It ran into seven editions and has been widely translated into various Indian languages. He received the Jnanpith award also on this book. He was elected Fellow of the Sahitya Akademi in 1970. His lesser known contemporary was G.T. Madkholkar who wrote political fiction. Madkholkar was a journalist by profession, and most of his novels reflect his political awareness of different issues of social relevance. Of the twelve novels he wrote Bhangalele Deul (1934), Mukhavte (1940), Nave sansar (1941), Dak bangla (1942) have been quite popular. The credit for introducing metaphysical depth to the novel goes to P.Y. Deshpande. His Sukalele phul (1931), Kali Rani and Nave jag (1941) delve into the psyche of his characters and follow the surrealistic approach.

The beginning of the 20th century saw the emergence of women novelists like Gita Sane and Malati Bedekar. Vibhavari Shriurkar, who wrote under nom de plume Malati Bedekar, has two major novels to her credit, viz. Hindolyavar (1934) and Viralele Swapna (1935). Her Bali (1950) is famous for it sympathetic treatment of the inner world of criminals.

P.S. Sane alias Sane Guruji brought in a new type of sentimental didacticism through his novels such as Shyamchi aai (1935) Kranti (1940). Most of his novels were written for children. Shyamchi aai, an autobiographical novel, shows the influence of Gandhian philosophy on the novelist. A film has been made on the story which won him President's gold medal (1954). V.V. Bokil (1903-1973), with his Baby and Phol asha (1931), brought in a fresh change, introducing humour in the Marathi novel. He has some 25 novels to his credit which are a good entertainment. P.G. Joshi, P.B. Bhave and D.R. Kavthekar wrote social novels. P.B. Bhave's novels like Rani and Vaishnava are a combination of romanticism and the cultural values of classicism. R.V. Dighe and G.L. Thokal wrote a few novels on rural life. G.N. Dandekar created a place of his own in the Marathi novel. He wrote most of the novels against regional background with a very strong Marathi cultural flavour. His Machivarla budha and Padghavli are the best examples of this style. Kuna ekachi bhramangatha is his first person account of 'Narmada parikrama'. His Amhi Bhagirathache putra is based on the true story of the construction of the Bhakra-Nangal dam. He received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1976 for his autobiographical novel Smrangatha. Vynkatesh Madgulkar's Bangarwadi tells the story of a commited teacher working for the upliftment of a village. His Sattantar won him the Sahitya Akademi award for 1983. S.N. Pendse made a significant contribution to the development of the novel. His latest novel Tumbadche khot, which has been published into two volumes recently, is a story spanning three generations of contemporary Konkani society. His Shitu, Rathchakra, Lavhali and Elgar have been very popular. B.S. Mardhekar, the pioneer of new poetry in Marathi literature, brought in the stream of consciousness technique in Tambdi mati and Pani. Ghar by Vasant Kanetkar, Zapurza by Manmohan Natu and Liliche phul by Gangadhar Gadgil were also written in the stream of consciousness technique on which the influence of Virginia Woolf and James Joyce is apparent. Vishram Bedekar also made some experiments with the new novel. His Ranangan, a story of a foreign girl in love with an Indian boy, created ripples among the readers, and is looked upon as an important milestone in the development of modern Marathi novel. The unconventional love affair and the bold style of narration brought the novels closer to modern society. Bedekar's Ek zad ani don pakshi, written in the stream of consciousness technique at its best, won him the Sahitya Akademi award (1985). Bold and realistic description of life may be called the salient features of Jayawant Dalvi's Chakra, Madhu Mangesh Karnik's Mahimchi khadi and Bhau Padhye's Vasunaka.

Modern novel also shows a return to classicism through re-interpretation of mythology. V.S. Khandekar's Yayati was the trend setter, followed by Shivaji Sawant's Mritynjay and Ranjit Desai's Radheya based on the life of Karna. Ranjit Desai's Swami is based on the lives of Madhavrao Peshwe. G.N. Dandekar's Karnayan and Krishnayan are based on the lives of Karna and Krishna respectively.

Biographical and autobiographical novels have been quite in vogue recently. Anandi Gopal of S.S. Joshi is the real story of a typical Marathi woman sent abroad for higher studies at the instance of her eccentric husband, and ends on a tragic note. Gangadhar Gadgil's Durdamya gives a comprehensive account of the life and works of Lokmanya Tilak. Bhalchandra Nemade's Kosala (1983) and Bidhar brought the novel closer to the common man and day-to-day complexities. Dalit literature, the literature of the downtrodden, has assumed quite a significant place in the development of Marathi literature. Annabhau Sathe and Shankarrao Kharat started the trend around 1960. Daya Pawar's Balute, Lakshman Mane's Upara and Lakshman Gaikwad's Uchalya have been received enthusiastically by the readers. The last two have even received the Sahitya Akademi awards for the year 1981 and 1988 respectively, and have been translated into various Indian and foreign languages.

NOVEL (Nepali). The origin of the Nepali novel is traced back to the narrative episodes and fiction written in prose during the early part of the nineteenth century. The rendering of the Sanskrit drama, Hasyakadamba (1798), by the dramatist, Saktiballav Aryal, may be regarded as a pioneering work which prepared the ground for the novel as an important form in Nepali literature. A number of translations from Bengali literature appeared in Gorkhapatra, a daily newspaper, in the early part of this century. In 1914 a translation of Rameshchandra Dutta's Bangabijeta was published in Banaras. Gambirdwaj Shah translated the work, Chandrasekhar, of Bankimchandra Chatterjee. Similarly Hiranyamayi-charita was translated by Parasmani Pradhan. The publication of Gorkha sansar and Tarun Gorkha from Dehradun, edited by Thakur Chandan Singh, Gorkha sevak by Manising Rai from Shillong and Sarda from Kathmandu (Nepal) paved the way for the emergence of the Nepali novel.

The novel, Rupmati, by Rudraraj Pande (1900-1986) is considered to be the first modern Nepali novel. This novel was written in reaction to the political and social situation prevailing in Nepal under a repressive and autocratic rule. The other novels written by Rudraraj Pande, viz. Chappakai (1936), Prayaschit (1938) and Prem (1948) are equally fine literary works. Bhramar by Rupnarayan Sinha, published by the Nepali Sahitya Sammelan, Darjeeling, in 1936 was the first novel which set a romantic trend. Sinha considered novel to be a language of feeling and a reflection of life. Lain Singh Bangdel's Muluk bahira (Outside the country, 1948) and Maitighar (Parents' home, 1950) reflect the social life of the Nepalis in both Nepal and India. Shivakumar Rai's novel, Dakbungla (1957) and Achha Rai Rashik's Lagan and Dobhan, published posthumously in 1955 and 1964, throw light on the condition of the downtrodden and oppressed sections of the Nepali community.

Krishna Singh Moktan's Charandhuli (1959), Aseshyatra (1964) and Jiwan parikrama (1967) also depict the social life of the Nepalese. Indra Sundas in his novel Mangali (1958) gives a vivid picture of the hill people's life which underwent many tribulations during the British Raj.

The last two decades have witnessed a score of novelists some of whom have written captivating novels touching upon the tender aspects of life. They, more or less, have concentrated on the Nepali life style. Some of them, however, have gone further to show the contribution of the Gorkhas to national defence and their achievements on the war front. Indra Bahadur Rai's Aja ramitacha (1964) deals with the life of the middle class Nepalese in and around Darjeeling. G. Tshering's Yuddha ra shanti (1968) and Subash Ghising's Lunkhum camp (1968) belong to the category of novels which extol the valour of the Gorkha soldiers in war.

The novels of young novelists like Asit Rai's Naya kshitij ko khoj (1980), Mohan Dukhun's Kartabyata (1973), Arjun Niraula's Sisirko batas (1961) dwell upon new facets of life, trying to trace their origin in history.

NOVEL (Oriya). The novel in Oriya literature is of recent origin. It owes it origin to the spread of English education in the second half of the last century. The first Oriya novel is Umeshchandra Sarkar's Padmamali (1887-88) followed by Ramashankar Ray's Bibasini. But the father of the Oriya novel is Fakirmohan Senapati, who combined a deep historical sense with a rare insight into human nature. His Chamana athaguntha (1897), Lachama (1901), Mamu (1912) and Prayaschita (1915) are classics in Oriya literature. In them one notices contemporary scenes and characters culled from different strata of life, come alive in a language that is both simple and ironic.

Fakirmohan was followed by some less prolific writers of whom special mention may be made of Gopalballabh Das (Bhima bhuyan, 1908), Baishnabchandra Das (Mane mane 1925), Nandakishore Bala (Kanakalata) and Upendrakishore Das (Malajanha) who concentrated their attention on the rural scene and the simple folk in a period of social transition. Chintamani Mohanty was a conscious imitator of Fakirmohan in Rupa churi, Tanka gacha and Sanisapta. Kuntalakumari Sabat, the first woman novelist in Oriya, who wrote Parashamani, Kali bohu, Na tundi and Raghurakhita, was remarkable for her craftsmanship. Ramchandra Acharya's historical novels like Benaoriya, Kamalkumari and Birangana are very popular in Orissa.

In the thirties, the Oriya novelists almost entirely depended on the West for inspiration and ideas as the taste at home had changed because of the spread of education. The rural setting and the reformist tone of the earlier novels changed into an assertion of individuality of man in a semi-urban setting and of woman in the context of her new-found emancipation. Matir manisha of Kalindicharan Panigrahi, the most gifted among the newly formed 'Sabuja' group, was the second turning point in the Oriya novel after Fakirmohan's masterpieces. It depicts the disintegration of the joint family and the beginning of individualism in a colloquial style. Pandit Godavarish Mishra and Godavarish Mahapatra translated classic English novels into Oriya.

After the Sabuja Age the Oriya novel came of age. The complexities of life made the novelists aware of the new realities, and their plot and technique changed. Nityananda Mahapatra's Hidamati, Bhanga hada, Bhul and Jiyanta manisha mark a change from social reform to analysis of mental states. Kanhucharan Mohanty, a social realist, was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Ka in 1958. In his novels man's struggle for better life in the context of social change is realistically projected. Among his novels mention may be made of Jhanja, Baliraja, Sastri, Ha anna, Sarbari and Tamasa tera. In these novels he created a new style of his own. The other novelists of this category are Laxmidhara Nayak (Sarbahara, Hai re durbhaga desh), Sachi Routray (Chitragiba), P.K. Samal (Palli jivan), Gyanendra Verma (Satabdira swapna bhanga and Lal ghoda) and Kamalkanta Das (Bou). Harekrishna Mahatab's Prativa, Tautara and Tritiya parva are popular novels.

Gopinath Mohanty, Jnanpith Award winner, added new dimensions to language and characterization in the Oriya novel. He concentrated on Adivasi life and lent it an epic proportion in Paraja and Amrittara santana. In Mati matala he asserted the human content above technical virtuosity. In his Laya bilaya he experimented with the stream of consciousness technique.

The post-Independence Oriya novel quickly adjusted itself to the demands of an urbanized society and value changes in the fast rhythm of life. Surendra Mohanty, a great story-teller, probed man's moral crisis in the prevailing socio-political context in Andha diganta. His Nila saila for which he received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1969, is a work of great merit. Among the popular novelists, Basantikumari Patnaik (Amadabata, Chorabali), Bibhuti Patnaik (Chapala chanda, Badhu nirupama, Nayakara nama srabani), Santunukumara Acharya (Nara kinnar, Satabdira Nachiketa), Krishnaprasad Misra (Singha kati), Gobindachandra Das (Amabasyara chandra) and Faturananda (Nakata chitrakara) are important. Santunukumara Acharya has portrayed his characters in a very significant way. Gokulananda Mahapatra popularised science fiction in Oriya.

The Oriya novel is still in its youth and new experiments are being made by many aspirants while the old masters like Gopinath and kanhucharan continue to surprise us with their novels even today.

NOVEL (Punjabi). The genesis of the Punjabi novel can be traced to 'kissa-kav' (long narratives in verse) and not to 'janamsakhis' (biographies of Guru Nanak), as some critics assert. Towards the close of the nineteenth century, Bhai Vir Singh (1872-1957) produced historical romances, Sundari (1897), Bijai Singh (1899) and Satwant Kaur (1900), with a view to infusing a new spirit in the Sikh masses whose despair had touched the nadir. He took pains to highlight in these novels the deeds of valour and sacrifice performed by the Sikhs during the Mughal rule (eighteenth century) when their very existence was threatened. Indeed historical romances served the purpose for which they were written, and in the process the Punjabi novel came into being. As works of art, however, these novels need much to be desired. The story is generally thin, the emphasis being on loosely-connected romantic episodes and religious discourses of considerable length. The characters are invariably heroic and full of zeal for poetic justice. These novels are more like Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress than the historical novels of Walter Scott. It was, however, in Baba Naudh Singh (1921) that Bhai Vir Singh shifted his stance from presenting the glorious history of the Sikhs to depicting the harsh realities of the rural society of the time. Being an ideal Sikh, Baba Naudh Singh took upon himself the duty of crusading against the social evils rampant in that period. This novel set a trend for the Punjabi novelists who came on the literary scene in the next two to three decades. Hence social realism, romantic idealism and moral didacticism played a predominant role in giving a shape to the nascent Punjabi novel.

Close on the heels of Bhai Vir Singh came Mohan Singh Vaid (1881-1939) and Charan Singh Shaheed (1881-1935). Vaid had a penchant for suspense and chose ideal Sikh men and women as his characters. He tells interesting stories with a message for the common man. Some of his well-known novels are Sukhi parwar, Sukhdev Kaur and Susheel nunh. Charan Singh Shaheed wrote in the early years historical romances like Daler Kaur (1911) and Ranjit Kaur (1913) on the pattern of Bhai Vir Singh's Sundari and Bijai Singh, but before long he shifted to novels like Do wohtian and Chanchal murti, wherein social realism was depicted in a deft manner. Later on he took to journalism and created a memorable character, Baba Waryama, whose humorous exterior served as a cloak to a deadly serious purpose. Another novelist of this period, Amar Singh, wrote novels like Chhoti nunh (1912) and Ghar da nirbah (1912) with reformistic zeal, but this work suffers as art-form. Master Tara Singh (1885-1968) contributed two novels, Prem lagan (1934) and Baba Tegha Singh (1945), wherein he emerges as a promising novelist, but later his involvement in Akali politics left him little time to devote to literature. In Prem lagan, the novelist has described the emergence of Akali Movement, whereas in Baba Tegha Singh, the stress is on the delineation of a figure of historical importance. Apart from these novelists, there are others who did not write much, but their creations left an indelible impression on the minds of the Punjabi readers. Niranjan Singh's Prem Kani (1932)

Harbakhsh Singh's Shakuntla, Rup Lal's Bir Singh, Miran Bakhsh's Nawab Khan, Puran Singh's Chupp preet, Ishwar Chander Nanda's Tej Kaur (1928) and Murad (1943), Gurbaksh Singh's An-viyahi maan (1940), Joginder Singh's Kamla (1944) and Kamini (1946), and Joshua Fasal Din's Prabha (1946) are the products of the years when Punjabi novel was coming into its own.

It was, however, at the hands of Nanak Singh (1897-1973) that the Punjabi novel matured fully. He can rightly be called the father of the Punjabi novel. The earlier novelists had a limited range, since they aimed at presenting only ideal Sikh character. Their creations also suffered as works of art. Nanak Singh secularised Punjabi fiction and made it the true mouthpiece of the man in the street. He presented excerpts from contemporary life, throwing over them a thin veil of romantic idealism. He made his mark in the literary world with his novel Chitta lahu (1932), but his masterpiece is Pavitar papi (1942) in which he matures from telling a story convincingly to depicting the inner working of the minds of his characters, although he never abandons his position as an omniscient novelist. The narrative pattern of his stories is not the beginning, the middle and the end, but the middle, the beginning and the end usually. He adopted the flash-back method and the boomerang technique in his novels. He was of course conscious of inner tensions in human beings, but he never allowed his readers to have a peep directly into the mind of his characters. For him character was but the determinant of incident, and incident was but the illustration of character. He was a prolific writer. He penned as many as three-dozen novels, the best known being Adh khiria phul (1948), Kagtan di beri, Katti hoi patang (1953) and Ik myan do talwaran (1960). Indeed he enriched Punjabi fictional literature, but his prolixity did not allow him to come out of his favourite grooves of thoughts and feelings and view life from a new angle. He usually thought of satisfying the curiosity of the reader, rather than his craving for beauty, meaning and significance.

Nanak Singh influenced almost all the Punjabi novelists in one way or the other. The foremost among these is Jaswant Singh Kanwal. Like his predecessor, Kanwal's aim is to gladden the hearts of his readers by telling a well-made story. He loves countryside and endeavours to present a complete picture of the rural life. He starts his novel with the aim of creating a palpable design on the minds of his readers, but ends by telling a romantic love story. In Raat baki hai, he has been successful in driving home his view point, but the novel suffers as a work of art. Generally there is uninterrupted movement in his stories. His characters are not given to introspection, nor do they suffer from mental conflicts. Their actions or reactions are dictated by their instincts and not by reasoning. His well-known novels are Puranmashi (1950), Rup dhara (1959), Hani (1961), Lahu di lo (1975) and Manukhta (1980).

Gurdial Singh has also been nurtured in the Nanak Singh-Kanwal tradition. He knows the craft of telling a tale and, like Kanwal, he too paints the rural scene. A streak of sadness runs through all his creations. He believes that heredity and environment determine the destiny of man. His characters are the dregs of the rural society. In an unkind world, their nature becomes hypersensitive. They are full of passion, anger, hatred and jealousy but deep down in their souls there stirs an intense longing for the soothing touch of love. Whereas the earliest novelists were concerned mainly with the outward action of their characters, Gurdial Singh is concerned with their inward passivity also, especially in his novels such as Marhi da diva (1965), Anhoe (1967) and Adh chanani raat (1970).

Sohan Singh Sital is a traditionalist so far as the form of his novels is concerned, but in his outlook towards life he is quite modern. Chronologically speaking, he is with the older generation of novelists like Nanak Singh and Jaswant Singh Kanwal, but he got recognition as a gifted novelist only recently. His Jug badal gaya (1971) is his best novel, although Jung jan aman (1958) and Tutan wala khuh (1962) have been admired no less. In Jug badal gaya, he has been successful not only in telling a well-knit story and presenting life-like characters, but also in making alive the spirit of a bygone era. Indeed the end of the novel is a bit contrived, but he conveys his message in no uncertain terms. The novel, in his opinion, must accomplish a pre-determined social purpose, otherwise it is no better than idle talk.

Nanak Singh, Jaswant Singh Kanwal, Gurdial Singh and Sohan Singh Sital are materialists and regard fiction more as a criticism of life than a re-creation of the complexities of experience. Alongside these, there are novelists like Surinder Singh Narula, Narendarpal Singh, Kartar Singh Duggal, Surjit Singh Sethi and Narinjan Tasnim who are mostly concerned with the depiction of the complexities of experience, the registering of the minutest details of modern sensibility and the capturing of the very atmosphere of the minds of their characters.

Surinder Singh Narula is the harbinger of realism in Punjabi novel. He believes that a novel, in its broadest definition, is personal and a direct impression of life. His first novel Peo puttar (1946) proved to be a trend setter. It presents a complete picture of the changing conditions, political as well as social, of Amritsar during the first two decades of the present century. His other novel, Sil aluni, carries forward the story of Peo putter and forms the second part of the trilogy, the last of which is yet to be written. His other novels that need special mention are Dil darya, Rang mahal (1950), Deen te duniya (1951) and Nili bar (1952). His stories are loosely knit, and they proceed in a rambling way towards an open-end. Long digressions are the rule rather than an exception. His focus being on the seamy side of life, Narula always aims at probing deep into the inner recesses of the human mind. His realism verges on the naturalism of Balzac and Zola.

Realism takes a deeper hue in Sant Singh Sekhon's novel Lahu mitti (1950). In this novel Sekhon tells the story of a peasant family of Ludhiana district which feels uprooted as it goes in search of new pastures and settles down in West Punjab during the canal colonisation period. In another novel, Baba Aasman (1971), he tells once again how a peasant family has to struggle hard to keep its body and soul together. Sekhon disdains the determinism of Hardy. He thinks that socio-politico-economic factors are the real causes of the sufferings of the toiling masses.

The realistic novel as well as the psychological novel developed side by side. The novelists with modern sensibilities tried to probe the inner recesses of the human mind. The foremost among them is Narendarpal Singh. For a long time he was known more for his historical novels than the psychological ones. He is a novelist with a sense of history. He no doubt has a vivid historical imagination and he is always eager to feel the pulse of the days gone by. Under the influence of his talented wife, Prabhjot Kaur, he wrote Shakti (1955) and Triyajal (1956) in which he advocated the cause of women's emancipation. It was, however, in his historical novels, Khanneon Tikhi, Walon Nikki, Et marg jana and Ik sarkar bajhon, that he found his true subject. These four novels taken together form the entire Sikh history, from the death of Guru Gobind Singh (1708) to the annexation of the Punjab (1849).

Narendarpal Singh takes delight in making new experiments in form and technique. Punnya ke masaya (1964) is a stream of consciousness novel depicting the cultural background of India in the life-story of a school teacher. Tapu (1968) is an allegory of the journey of the human soul from darkness to light. Ba mulahaza hoshiar (1975) conveys the message that in the years to come people all over the world would try to understand each other in a better way, shedding their narrow parochial loyalties. His novel Sutardhar (1979) is a prophecy about the future of mankind.

Kartar Singh Duggal is primarily known as a short story writer, but his contribution to the novel is no less. After his first novel Andran (1948), he penned two trilogies, Hal mureedan da (1968) and Ma pio jaye (1974). In the former trilogy, Duggal depicts the boyhood, youth and the years of maturity of a sensitive soul. It ends on a note of despair, but its overall effect is that life, though full of agonising vicissitudes, is still worth living with gusto. In the latter trilogy, an attempt has been made to agglomerate the flux of time by visualising the course of events, not from one angle but from multiple angles. Its locale is Pathohar where communal riots broke out a few months before the dawn of Independence. This novel is in fact a saga of political upheaval on the Indian sub-continent that brought in its wake many clashes of loyalties—individual, social and national. Like Joyce's Ulysses, this novel proceeds by agglomeration and not by development. His latest novel Sharad purnima di raat (1978) conveys the idea that the sins of the parents do visit their offspring.

Amrita Pritam cannot be easily grouped with the novelists discussed so far. She has, from her very first novel Pinjar (1948), followed honestly her poetic vision. Her efforts have been to catch the tone, the light and shade of experience. Her novel Jalavatan has brought home to the reader the idea that the fund of experience is inexhaustible. The theme of this novel, which centres round the Oedipus complex of the hero, coupled with the lyrical style in which it has been written, has given this work a rare originality of conception and execution. As an artist, however, Amrita Pritam found her fulfilment in Ik si Anita. She is a prolific writer. From Jeb katre to Yatri and Unanja din is a continuous process, and she has never looked back.

Surjit Singh Sethi is generally known as an experimentalist. The publication of his fifth novel Ik khali payala (1960) created a stir in the literary circles as it had been written in the form of interior monologue, and this was something quite new in the world of the Punjabi novel. In this novel an attempt has been made to trace the inner void of a woman, Roma, who has been jilted more than once. Now she imagines herself as an empty bowl, used and discarded. She is in fact a symbol of the modern woman in search of her identity. Interestingly, he has once again presented a woman like Roma in his latest novel Badnaam sarkan (1979), giving her of course a new dimension, and in a way, a new personality. In his much-discussed novel Aabra Kadabra (1972) the inward turning of vision is complete. There is in it an intense awareness of time as a merging of the time past and the time present. Of course, there is no merger of the time future.

Narinjan Tasnim too has used the stream of consciousness technique in his novels. In Hanera hon takk (1971), he has tried to catch the flux of time past and present in moments of heightened sensibility. Ik hor nawan saal (1974) is an attempt to synchronize the interior monologue of the protagonist with the sights and sounds of the world outside. In Jadon sawer hoi (1977), an attempt has been made to capture the ethos of the period just before the partition of India. His latest novel Jugan ton paar (1981) has presented the fictionalized biography of the well-known artist and Punjabi poet, Ishwar Chitarkar. In this novel the time dimension has been completely ignored and the reader finds the Greek poet Homer as a contemporary of Ishwar Chitarkar who lived in London from 1961 to 1968, the year in which he died. Tasnim's greatest struggle in his novels is with the tyranny of time.

Sukhbir has come up slowly but surely as a novelist of great promise. He aims at depicting the inner reality and for that purpose he uses new techniques. In Sarkan te kamre, he presents the complexities of modern life in an admirable way. Dalip Kaur Tiwana is primarily concerned with the psychic reality of her feminine characters. Her novels like Eh hamara jiwana and Vaat hamari have been generally admired. Surinder Singh Johar in his novels Tutian tandan (1967), Chupp da safar (1976) and Sukke patte (1978) presents a thesis that the hiatus between aspiration and fulfilment is not narrowing down in the bourgeois society, rather it is widening day by day. Mohan Kahlon is a novelist of physical tensions. His heroes and heroines are aware only of the physical reality of their existence. His novels Machhli ik darya di (1967) and Beri te bareta(1970) are better known for the captivating style in which they have been written.

The contemporary Punjabi novel is now a maelstrom of various trends. A new socio-political consciousness has crept in the writers of today who want to project their point of view forcefully, even at the cost of art. Their theme, in the main, is the conflict between haves and have-nots. These writers belong to the rural areas and they have a first-hand knowledge of both the exploiters and the exploited. In rural Punjab, the feudal aristocracy has played havoc with the lives of unprivileged young men and women. These young persons are crushed both physically and intellectually whenever they raise their heads and claim a respectable place in society. The spread of education in the villages has brought about a change in the outlook of the exploited people and they now refuse to be brow-beaten by their so-called masters.

Om Parkash Gaso has written a number of novels about the dregs of rural society. He has seen these neglected persons from close quarters and whatever he says about their hopes and fears is authentic. His novel Mitti da mull (1972) gives a message of strife and struggle. Ram Sarup Ankhi's novel Sulagdi raat (1978) makes a forceful appeal to the sons and daughters of the soil to desist from acquiring personal property at the cost of amity with their near and dear ones. This novel is perhaps a dirge on the imminent death of the decadent and demoralised feudal class. Other novelists like Makhan Singh (Lava), Buta Singh Shaad (Adhi raat paher da tarka) and Balbir Singh Sandhu (Dhur uddi rahi) have made significant contribution to the Punjabi novel.

By the side of politically committed writers, there are others who are also committed, but in a different way. These writers are individualistic in their approach, but the appeal of their writings is no doubt universal. They are concerned with the reality of being. Surjit Hans, Majit Rana, Jagjit Singh Chhabra, Harnam Das Sehrai and Jagjit Brar have opened new vistas of thought and expression in the field of Punjabi novel.

From the late twenties to the early eighties is a far cry. During this period of a little more than half a century, the Punjabi novel has achieved what it might not have normally achieved in two centuries. The main reason for this is the overall influence of the western novel on the Punjabi novel. Left to itself, the Punjabi novel would have been at the stage of the late-Victorian novel at this time.

NOVEL (Rajasthani). Shivachandra Bharatiya wrote the first Rajasthani novel in 1903, entitled Kanaka Sundara. As it was inspired by the Gujarati novels, the author preferred to call it a 'Navala katha' (instead of a novel) as per the usage in Gujarati language. The next novel in the chronological order was Champa (1925) written by S.N. Agrawala. Both these authors lived in Maharashtra, having migrated from their native places in Rajasthan. These books had practically no impact on the literary writings at home. However, it goes to their credit that they were pioneers who introduced this genre to the language.

Attention of Rajasthani writers was drawn towards fiction in 1940. Abhai pataki by S.N. Joshi, published in 1956, bears a testimony to it.

Annarama Sudama's Maikati kaya mulakati dharati was published in 1966, followed by Dhoran ro dhori by S.N. Joshi in 1968 and Hun gori kina piya ri by Yadavendra Chandra Sharma in 1970. The genre gained momentum in the seventies. Some twenty-four novels were published in this decade, the important one being Kal Bhairavi by Ramnivas, Kanval puja by Satyen Joshi, Seli chanva khajyura ki by Premaji 'Prema', Minakha ra khoja by B.L. Mali, Tirashanku by C.P. Singh, Khulati ganthan by Paras Arora, and two novels Kun samjhai Chanvari ra kaul and Laladi ek pherun gamari by S.R. Maharshi. Annaram and Yadavendra gave two more novels, Andhi ar astha and Jog sanjog, one each respectively.

Two novelettes, meant for children, were also published: Bhora ra pagalia by B.L. Suthara and Bilanio Dado by B.L. Mali. Vijayadana Detha wrote two small novels having elements of folklore. These are Tido rava and Ma ro badalo. Some novels were also serialised in the journals, but were not published in book-form. These include Gunvara patho by Dindayal Kundan, Abhalade by Ramadatt Sankritya, Ujalo dag by Madhav Sharma, Dhadavi by K.K. Kant and Padamani ro sarap by L.N. Birla. The latest addition is Mevai ra runkh by Annaram Sudama which won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1978.

The Hindi novels written by Premchand and others have influenced the contemporary Rajasthani novels. The political awakening in Rajasthan was preceded by a social revolution headed by Swami Dayanand, the founder of Arya Samaj. This trend was followed by political workers in the erstwhile princely states, who led the social movements. It was, therefore, natural for our novelists to reflect the reformist cross-currents in their novels. Miseries of a widow were highlighted by S.N. Joshi in his Abhai pataki, just as those of the old-age marriage were depicted earlier in Champa by S.N. Agrawal. Kanak Sundar deals with the social evils of illiteracy, superstitions and moral degradation. The plight of a woman remarried to her husband's younger brother has been described in Hun gori kin piya ri. His Jog sanjog tells us of an inter-caste marriage. The comparatively wide canvas of Maikati kaya mulakati dharati is also concerned with social evils, besides depicting nationalistic idealism. The novel moves around the tragic life of a divorced woman. Sudama's Andhi ar astha describes the misfortunes of the poor family of a village Brahmana. Ujalo dag of Madhav Sharma concentrates on a man's sincere love with a prostitute, resulting in marriage. Khulti ganthan of Paras Arora is the story of newly-educated boys and girls who marry ignoring the bonds of castes and communities. B.L. Mali has taken up the cause of the scheduled and backward classes and arranged marriages between the so-called upper and lower classes. Thus, we find that the majority of novels, so far written deal with social reality and related problems.

Attempts have been made to write on other subjects as well. S.N. Joshi has chosen in Dhoran ro dhori the life of an Italian scholar, who practically settled at Bikaner. The treatment of the subject is idealistic and the style heroic in this novel.

The only historical novel is Kanval puja by Satyen Joshi, based on a historical account of Jaisalmer. This is an immature attempt, more so due to colloquial dialogues, difficult to be understood by an average reader.

Kal bhairavi by Ramnivas is based on the supernatural and Tantric powers. To try to explain the details of a mystic faith in the framework of a novel is a difficult task to achieve. Abhalade is another novel of this kind but it rests on firmer grounds, being linked with history and dealt with by a competent hand who has got a thorough grasp of the subject. Novels dealing with the eternal themes of sex and love are Ek binani do bina, Laladi ek pherun gamagi, Kun samajhai Chanvari ra kaul and Seli chanva khajyura ki. Each of them, except the first one which is a fictionised form of an English story in verse, depicts pangs of love. Mevai ra runkha by Sudama speaks of the exploitation of the simple rural folk by money-lenders and pseudo-spiritual heads.

The only novel with a political setting is Tirashanku by C.P. Singh. The difficulties faced by the revolutionaries and the vested interests that penetrated their ranks have been exposed in this novel. The feudal background and passionate love are two other elements in it. Bhora ra pagalia and Bilanio dado are meant for children. The former, however, fails to touch the problems of students. Vijayadan Detha has tried to understand the communist ideology in terms of material derived from folk-lore.

It is note-worthy that authors hailing from rural areas have shown a good grasp of the subject and language while the urban writers have shown a better command of technique. Yadavendra and C.P. Singh are two examples of the latter class. Some of the novelists have a fancy for idioms and maxims which, when stretched too far, tend to create monotony. Sudama, who is otherwise a talented writer, is at times a victim of this pitfall. Colloquialism is another drawback which mars the beauty of works in such writers as Detha, Premaji and Satyen. The genre is still in its infancy and much is desired before we can talk of it in comparative terms in relation to the form in other languages.

NOVEL (Sindhi), as a form of literature, was introduced in Sindhi in 1870 with a translation of Johnson's Rasselas by Sadhu Navalrai and Munshi Udharam Mirchandani at the instance of the British Government in Sindh with a view to popularising through it the divine right of kings and also the European statecraft. Sindh had been conquered by the British in 1843, and they stood in dire need in 1870 to reason out, if only indirectly, their right to rule over the new subjects (the white man's burden!) and rule over them in the manner they did. The translation in Sindhi stood them in good stead and the translators were rewarded suitably by the Education Department.

Between 1870 and 1888 there appeared in Sindhi many 'qissas', or tales, of Dalurai, Umar Marui, Sasui Punhu, etc., which were renderings in prose of what had already appeared in poetry. It was in 1888 that Mirza Qalich Beg's Dilaram presented a precursor of the modern novel in Sindhi. More like a prose narrative than a novel proper, Dilaram was crowded with kings, vazirs, dervishes, princes and princesses—the characters the people at large had known over the centuries. Wrought in a qissa form, the characters of the novel interact at the instance of the author who provides them with a string of incidents, probable and improbable. The author delineates Shah Adil and Jahan Beg as the two well-defined types of characters representing the good and the evil, and very often introduces deus ex machina in the nick of time to aid and assist the good. In the contrived circumstances, the story is too much swayed by the evil minded Jahan Beg, and the poor hero, Shah Behram, patiently waits till the end of the qissa to be rewarded for his virtue.

Mirza Qalich Beg betters his own record in his second novel Zinat (1890), which undoubtedly is the first modern novel of Sindhi literature. Unlike Dilaram, Zinat provides the raision d' etre, or the purpose justifying various actions taking place in the novel, and therefore its characters present themselves as real human beings in flesh and blood. Sensitively etched in the late nineteenth century milieu of Sindh, they come alive in their actions and dialogues. As A. Schimmel says, Zinat exemplifies the great women of Islam before its female readers.

It is of autobiographical significance. If we compare its characters with the real people in the Mirza's life, as described in his autobiography Sao panu ain karo pano, posthumously published from Hyderabad Sindh in 1965, we may observe that his maternal grandfather peeps through the character of Sarai Fateh Khan, Zinat's father.

Ajib Bhet (A strange comparison), another novel of social realism, appeared in 1892. The two classes of the Sindhi Hindus, viz. 'Amils' (the office-working) and 'Bhaibands' (the traders) were compared in it. Its author, Pritamdas Hakumatrai, tried to depict through its protagonist, Sachanand, the Hindus bound in their age-old customs and traditions, including the blood-sucking dowry system, the expensive 'karma kanda' or ceremonial practices, attending the deaths of near relatives, the blind faith in fake 'gurus' and the escapist surrender to fate. Sachanand stoically bears the impact of bad days in his life and doesn't swerve from the path of truth, despite his knowing fully well that the dishonest people around him flourish. Pritamdas draws his plots to the life and indirectly attempts at changing the social conditions. After his name Pritamdas Hakumatrai appear the words, 'An humble seeker of reforms', which express his credo in brief.

At the turn of the century, side by side with the novels replete with supernatural elements, adventures and miracles, love and romance, including translations of Chandrakanta santati and Bhutnath from Hindi, which tickled the curious adolescent mind, novels on social and historical themes came to be published. Marked by a fairly good plot construction and almost accurate characterisation, the third novel after Zinat and Ajib bhet (but not as much successful as these) was Lalchand Amardinomal's Choth jo chand (The fourth-day moon). It was serialised in the Saraswati of 1905-6 and brought out in book form in 1909. Written in an ornate and florid style characteristic of Lalchand, it portrays two young friends, Moti and Hiro, in love with each other. And it exposes many a superstition of the day, including the one indicated in the title of the novel that it is an ill-omen to view the moon on the Chaturthi or the fourth day of the Bhadra month. The two novels by Bherumal Maherchand, Anand Sundrika (1910) and Mohini B'ai (1917), were also written to 'entertain and educate' the people. As Bherumal was mainly an essayist, his heroines very often give discourses on subjects like an ideal wife, the evils of dowry and Hindu-Muslim unity. H.M. Gurbaxani's Nur Jahan (1915) was a historical novel. Wrought in the Mughal times, it sensitively describes the scenes of love, intrigues and wars.

Among the novels of the 1920's mention may be made of Abdul Khaliq Morai's trilogy Sundari, Satia ji satya (The fidelity of a Sati) and Chhatrapati (The king). It tries to reconstruct the ancient times of Raja Chach, D'ahar Sen and Muhammad bin Qasim and, unfortunately, brings out differences between the two communities of Hindus and Muslims. Around 1925, Vishnu Sharma published two social novels, Satia jo tyag (The Sati's sacrifice) and Sindh jo thog'i (The thug of Sindh). The year 1930 saw the publication of B'a bhaura (Two brothers) by Harjasrai Sukhramani. Not a great work of art, the novel describes day-to-day incidents in the life of a commoner, his hopes and despairs, achievements and failures. Its characters, round in structure, make mistakes and learn to mend them. Gopaldas, who is quite unjust in his dealings with his younger brother Gobinddas, sees the reason towards the end of the novel and thus redeems himself.

In 1933 and 1934, Shevak Bhoj'raj's Ashirvad (The blessing) and Dada Shyam appeared. Ashirvad concerns itself with the freedom movement in India and shows how Mahatma Gandhi's ideas changed the very behaviour of the people in their day-to-day activities.. Dada Shyam, a less successful novel, is a portrayal of a morally corrupt school teacher, who presents himself as an uglier person than he really is because of the author's ire. Rochiram Sad'ani's Azad khayal zalun (Free-thinking women) of 1937 focuses its attention on marriage without dowry and remarriage of a widow.

In the forties, a great development took place in the Sindhi novel writing. Asanand Mamtora's Shair (The poet) and Guli Sadarangani's Ittehad (Unity) appeared in 1941 on the theme of national integration. Shair's hero, Chander, is an aesthete who intellectualises beauty. While Shair celebrates, among other things, the inter-caste marriage of a Sindhi boy with a Kashmiri Brahmin girl, Ittehad unites people regardless of their different regional and religious backgrounds. Naraindas Bhambhani's were also the novels of unconcealed social purpose. He stands out as the most significant novelist of the decade with three novels authentically portraying the times, Malhin (The female gardener, 1942), Vidhava (Widow, 1943) and Gharibani jo varso (Inheritance of the poor, 1946) to his credit. Malhin seems to have been based on some problems of human psychology, sometimes though not properly dealt with. Human beings, in contradistinction to animals, are discontent because of the irrationality of the world in which they live. When they fail in the principle of pleasure, they have the urge to die. That is why in Bhambhani's Malhin, failures in love lead the people to death, at times the willed one. In Vidhava, too, Ajit cannot cope with the reality of situation he finds himself in and drives himself instinctively to death. Sona, his widow, remarries. But Moti, her new husband, is murdered. Now she becomes a nervous wreck and seeks refuge in eternity. The author says in Gharibani jo varso: "Man, tormented by the world, wishes death. If death were not there, who else would fulfil man's death wish. By creating death, God expressed His love for him." Piru, a poor crippled man, dies of the irrational, selfish attitude of the people around him. So do some other characters in the novel. Like Bhambhani, Ram Panjwani was a college professor-novelist, who published Qaidi (A prisoner, 1943), Latifa (1945) and Chandia jo chamko (The shine of silver, 1947), besides a few adapted ones. Mainly on social themes, these novels portray with sympathy all kinds of people—a musician who is imprisoned during the freedom struggle, a village woman Latifa who represents the simple rural folks and freedom fighters who are betrayed by some anti-national elements for the sake of money they get from the foreign rulers, respectively. The last significant novel to come out before the partition in 1947 was Ram Panjwani's Chandia jo chamko.

To the post-1947 Sindhi novel, Gobind Malhi, Ram Panjwani, Chandulal Jaisinghani, Sundari Uttamachandani, Mohan Kalpana, Lal Pushp, among others, have made a significant contribution. Gobind Malhi, who has about a score of novels to his credit, says in his preface to the Pyar ji pyas (The thirst of love, 1972) that he knew in his personal life the grim original of his heroine, but has painted her in the present work differently, in sublime hues. This underlines his idealistic attitude towards art. Mohini, the heroine, in her longing for true love, stumbles on one and the same type of 'press-the-flesh' man everywhere, the man, who looks for a mere woman in her. The story in it, as in some other novels by Malhi, is told from the omniscient standpoint; it is not the characters who reveal themselves, but the writer who reveals them. Ram Panjwani's religio-social novels are popular among the people of older generation. Chandulal Jaisinghani's Bahi ain barsat (The fire and the rains), as also the other novels by this legal-fiction writer, makes a plea that the existing law be amended in view of the changing social conditions. Sundari Uttamchandani's Prit purani, rit nirali (New modes of the old love, 1956) presents individuals like Moti, Jamuna and Sarla in sharp outlines, and with problems of their own. Mohan Kalpana's Runj'a ain pachha (Mirage and shadows, 1968) has the range and vision of a great novel. Of an autobiographical significance and archetypal pattern, the novel portrays one Kumar, who identifies himself with the legendary figure Kartikeya (who sets out to go round the earth thrice) and not with his brother Ganesha (who showed wordly wisdom by going round their father Shiva three times and was, therefore, declared the winner). To Mohan Kalpana, Kartikeya appears to be an artist engaged in a ceaseless effort to know for himself the pains attending a struggle. Lal Pushp's strictly modern novel Huna je atam jo maut (The death of his self, 1973) delineates one Kafur, almost a non-name, who has no pretensions to bring any change in the 'rotten social order'. Among the new contemporary Sindhi novels, mention may be made of Param Abichandani's Hika j'ara b'a j'ibhyun (Two flames and one fire, 1964) and Ien bi (That, too, 1988), Lal Pushp's Atam maryada (1962), Hika sard diwar (A feelingless wall, 1966), Tad'ahin ain hane (1975) and Hika divar aasmana tain (1981), Anand Khemani's Hika sakhsa ji vasana (An individual's lust, 1970), Motilal Jotwani's Narangi traffic light te (At the amber traffic light, 1974) and Ihe rishta nata (These relationships, 1982), Shyam Jaisinghani's Khahia je chautaraf (Around an abyss, 1976) and Krishin Khatwani's Yadi hika pyar ji (Remembrance of a love, 1978).

Sindhi literature is yet to have its own novel: what masquerades as the Sindhi novel today is a portrayal of either the life in general, not particularly of the Sindhi people drifting fast from their moorings, or a slice of life, not the life itself in the Sindhi particulars. A novel today may concern itself with the general destiny of man, but it does so successfully when it is rooted in the soil and pitched against the particular set of people.

NOVEL (Tamil). With the introduction of English education and the printing press a new genre in literature, the novel, came to be imported into the Indian languages during the latter half of the nineteenth century. Bengali was the first to adopt this form and other Indian languages followed. Although every Indian language has its own nomenclature for its different literary forms, the newly imported name 'novel' has come to be adopted in its very English form in all the Indian languages. In Tamil, for instance, it is spelt 'naval', with an elongated first syllable.

Although there have been tales and fables existing in Tamil earlier, the first long story to qualify for the category of a novel was Pratāpa Mudaliār charitram by Vēdanāyagampillai, published in the year 1879. With this and another work of his, Suguna sundari (1887), the Tamil novel was launched for rapid growth. Others soon followed in the footsteps of Vedanayagampillai and produced fictional works dealing with contemporary life. While Vedanayagampillai, a Christian occupying a judicial post as Munsif in Mayuram of Thanjavur district, handed his novels to inculcate the values of morality and good life, a lawyer from Ceylon wrote a novel in 1885, describing the adventures of a Muslim youth, abducted in his childhood from Egypt and brought to India. The author, Siddhi Lebbe Marikar, editor of a journal Muslim Nesan, was able to expound the tenets of Islam in the course of the narration. The story, Asan Bey charitram, covers more than one country, taking in its canvas the important cities of the Middle East and India. The appearance of a Governor General of India in Calcutta as a character in the novel lends reality to the contemporaneity of the incidents.

This trend in the development of the Tamil novel was taken up after Vedanayagampillai by another writer, Guruswami Sarma of Tiruchirappalli, whose novel Prēmakalāvatyam appeared in 1893. This work differed from Pratāpa Mudaliār charitram in that it employed a romantic mode, though it dealt with identifiable contemporary incidents. While Vedanayagampillai attempted perfection in ideal characters in his first novel, he made use of unexpected incidents full of suspense, in his second book Suguna sundari. Premakalavatyam seems to be more akin to the pattern of the story in Suguna sundari. However, Guruswami Sarma's declared purpose of reviving social aspects like indoor games practised by women and other details lend credibility and entitles it to take its place among viable works of Tamil fiction.

There was a temporary departure from the practice of depicting contemporary life when Saravanamuthupillai, while working as a keeper of the Oriental manuscripts Library in Madras, wrote a historical novel called Mohanāngi (1895), dealing with the love of a Maduranayak king for the Thanjavur king's daughter. He drew his material from the recorded history of the Nayak kings of the 17th century, with a spot of romance woven into it.

The first complete realistic work of fiction satisfying the requirements of the novel as a literary form was written by B.R.Rajam Iyer as a serial in the monthly journal, Viveka chintamani, and published as a book in 1896. The novel was called Kamalambal charitram in accordance with the tradition set by Vedanayagampillai who called his first novel a 'charitram', a term originally used for biography and at present used to mean history which deals with the life and activities of people Rajam Iyer knew and lived with in his own life time. The availability of the English novels by authors like Thackeray, Dickens and George Eliot at that time seems to have influenced both Vedanayagampillai and Rajam Iyer to attempt fiction in Tamil after the pattern set by them.

Another novel to be called 'charitram' followed Rājam Iyer's creation within two years and was written by Madhaviah who called it Padmavati charitram (1898). While Rajam Iyer was fully aware of narrating a 'fictitious story', Madhaviah felt the need to point out the short-comings of the social set-up he was depicting. He almost set himself up as a social reformer devoted to the eradication of superstitious customs afflicting brahmin life. The novel as a social document might be said to have had its beginning at the hands of Mādhaviah.

Notable among others who followed the trend set by Rājam Iyer and Mādhaviah were S.M. Natesa Sāstri and T.M. Ponnusamipillai. By the time these two with their large output entered the field in the beginning of the present century, the pattern of Tamil fiction had taken on a recognisable form known as the novel. Natesa Sāstri in his preface to the first novel Dheenadayalu (1990) wrore: "Novel means new. Since this story is written in a new mode the name 'naval' is given to it. This work Deenadayālu is the first novel in Tamil". The justification for his claim may be the fact that those who had written before him had never used the term novel, though they had used other Tamil equivalents.

Talking of the novel as a form, G.S. Fraser says: "It is an exploration of the variety of life through realistic prose narrative in the hope of finding a pattern". Applying this definition to the early Tamil novels, we find that not all the works of the pioneers conformed to this maxim. Pratāpa Mudaliār charitram is more a didactic, sermonising attempt than an exploration of the variety of life. The author himself set out his intention in the preface which he wrote in English for his Tamil work in the following words: "In writing this story I have not followed the example of those novelists who depict human nature as it is, and not as it ought to be, and who thus exhibit bad specimens of humanity which are often mistaken by the young and the inexperienced for objects of imitation". Accordingly, Vedanayagampillai represented his characters as perfectly virtuous. He was more intent on showing what life ought to be and, therefore, discarded realism. Nor did he attempt to find a pattern through a realistic prose narrative. Since he had already expounded the aspects of ideal life in his earlier didactic works Niti nool, Penmati malai, and his collection of moral lyrics known as Samarasa kirtanai, he made use of the novel as a new vehicle for the same purpose. Comparatively Siddhi Lebbe Marikar wrote a more realistic prose narrative when he pursued the career of Asan Bey. But by far the most realistic handling of a theme is found in Kamalambal charitram wherein the author's hope of finding a pattern is visible in every chapter, until his quest for Godhead intervenes.

In the case of Madhaviah the realistic narrative is there, but he had already known the pattern because he had a purpose in writing his novels. It was to expose the short-comings of the society in which he lived. The apparent similarity between Vedanayagam's and Madhaviah's attempts to show up the social weaknesses receded to the background when we realise that the former was more concerned with projecting the virutes in a positive manner while the latter focussed attention on the less bright side of social life, thereby adopting a negative approach.

Not until we come to Natesa Sastri do we find a complete recognition of attempts to present life as it is. Though Natesa Sastri himself has written other stories resembling fables and romances, his Deenadayalu follows the fortunes of a young man who is beset by poverty and, therefore, undergoes all kinds of tribulations. The situation and the actions of characters arising out of them are identifiable, possible and probable instances, which lend verisimilitude to the story.

Another novelist who explored life like Natesa Sastri was T.M. Ponnusamipillai who found in his exploration that characters were motivated to act as they did as a result of their environment. But even Ponnusamipillai could not resist the temptation to interpolate philosophical expositions in the course of his exploration. In the six novels he wrote, beginning with Kamalākshi (1903), the nineteenth chapter in each novel is devoted to a lecture on Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy. Most of those who followed Ponnusamipillai inherited the tendency to overemphasise the negative aspects of life. A case in point would be Kokilambal kadithankal (1921) by Swāmi Vedachalam, better known as Maraimalai Adikal. While he adopted the technique of epistolary narration after the manner of Samuel Richardson in Pamela, he was conscious of the purpose of his narrative which was to highlight the sufferings of a brahmin widow. He had no need to explore life to find a pattern. The pattern he wanted was already set, and he overdid what Madhaviah had attempted in his novels, Muthu Meenakshi (1903) and Clarinda (1910).

The prolific growth of periodicals during the early years of this century gave rise to a form of Tamil novel which consisted more of adaptations from popular English novels. Arni Kuppuswami Mudaliar and Vaduvoor Duraiswamy Iyengar are two names whose monumental output of cheap English adaptations attracted an enormous reading public. Arni's adaptations of the eighteenth century English story teller G.W.M. Reynolds were avidly read by Tamil men and women without discrimination. Some of his novels ran into five or six volumes, each having more than a thousand pages. While his adaptations carried Tamilised names of characters in English settings, Duraiswamy Iyengar transformed names and situations to Tamil style. Kothainayaki Ammal was another inveterate story-teller catering to the women readers during this period, and her novels were issued in instalments through her monthly journal Jaganmohini. The prevalence of such output of stories, which caught the public eye after Ponnusamipillai, did succeed for a time in eclipsing real works of literary merit with the result that even responsible researchers failed to penetrate this mask and get at the real thing.

The development of the Tamil novel in the following years was marked by emphasis on the content and a kind of aggressive reformism. While the child-widow occupied the centre of the stage, other characters representing ignorance, superstition and social decadence served to help the novelist explore the limited range of variety in life. In all these stories the pattern was set and predetermined by the nature of the theme chosen by the author. Stalwarts of Tamil renaissance like Subramania Bharati and V. Ramaswami Iyengar, popularly known by his initials Va Ra, handled these themes and succeeded in giving a form to the novel in spite of a propagandist vein. The realistic setting of Chandrikayin kathai (an unfinished story, 1925) by Bharati and the sensitive presentation of characters in Sundari (1917) by Va Ra, saved their novels from ending up as sermons from the pulpit. There was an obvious conflict between the artist and the reformer in both these writers. A convincing attempt to achieve artistic success helped them play down the didactic aspect of narration in their novels.

During this period of development the emphasis on social reform prompted a few novelists to engage themselves in chastising the factors responsible for social backwardness. This was motivated more by social consciousness than a desire for literary experimentation. Naturally the contents of stories like Mohana Ranjani (1931) by Girija Devi and Dasikalin mosa valai (1936) by Ramamirthathammal were overburdened by a strident cry for eradication of superstition and immorality. It is significant that these two novels were written by women who were themselves victims of a rotten social system. Girija Devi was a brahmin child-widow who dared to break the rule and married a Harijan. Ramamirtham was a former devadasi who campaigned for the emancipation of women who were compelled to lead the life of devadasis by an outmoded custom. The novelist of the day could hardly have escaped the compulsion to put on the mantle of a preacher because of a powerful movement in Tamilnadu for asserting the self-respect of men and women which had then come into being under the leadership of Periyar Ramaswami. But this trend of flogging the sick society soon yielded place to a rising political consciousness. This purely social aspect in the content of the novels began to be less and less visible as many novelists felt the urge to portray the aspirations of a people trying to shake off political slavery. This thematic change which was discerned in the novels of authors like Chenkai Raju Chettiar (Gnānakānti, 1912) and Panayappa Chettiar (Kāntimati, 1926) was seen to be complete in K.S. Venkataramani's Desabhaktan kandan (1932). In this novel Venkataramani employed the actions and interactions of a set of characters against the dominant background of India's freedom struggle.

From the forties of this century when literary revival was marked by the growth of the short story in Tamil, the novel also came into its own, and attempts at writing with literary awareness were made by many authors who not only succeeded in their work but also set trends in modern Tamil fiction. The variety of techniques employed and the range of themes depicted mark the Tamil novel of today as a well-established genre. The influence of the English novels felt in the beginning was augmented by that of European and American writings in the fifties and sixties enabling the Tamil novel and short story to take their place among the literatures of the country.

While the early novelists were satisfied with portraying what they experienced, the creative artists of the forties deliberately emulated a variety of techniques in form and content which marked the growth of literature in the post First World War period in England and Europe. The trend set by these modern pioneers who formed the avant garde of that time is being followed to this day by a few novelists with varying degrees of success.

A notable feature among some writers is the employment of regional background and dialect to lend verisimilitude to the theme and characters as distinct from the tedious practice of using unidentifiable background and neutral characters who do not belong to any known environment. This healthy trend of relating characters and places to familiar situations was originally handled by R.

Shanmugasundaram, author of Nāgammāl (1942) who had begun to write novels when Sankarram (Mannasai, 1940), K.P. Rajagopalan (Verottam, 1942) and Kaa. Naa. Subramaniam (Pasi, 1942) were experimenting with the form. Thus the development of the novel in its third stage was noted for the impact made by Western writers.

Henry James's theory of character determining the incident and the incident being the illumination of character helps to identify a completeness in the role played by a particular character in a story. The character of Yamuna in T. Janakiraman's Moha mul (1961) is a case in point. It is her own inner strength which determines almost all the incidents and even makes her concede the persistent demand of Bapu who waits patiently for the moment of fulfilment. The moment is itself an illustration of Yamuna's realisation of Bapu's attitude towards her, but not necessarily a slip on her part.

A similar case of strength of character can be seen in Marappan who is the head of a family in Chinnappa Bharati's novel, Daham (1975). Marappan is a fatalist who is prepared to come to terms with his own life with the meagre opportunities he has. Since he is not prepared to deviate from the accepted custom of caste distinction and master-servant relationship, he does not think twice before forsaking his own son who flouts the age-old custom by marrying a Harijan girl.

What is more important in characterisation is that the personality represented by the character must be identifiable as the natural outcome of the emotions involved, without modifying the character itself. The sudden determination of Bhuvana in Akilan's novel, Enke pokirom (1973), to sell her body for amassing wealth could hardly appear to be a situation warranted by the revealed circumstances in the story. The incident is not determined by the character, but is contrived to make the story interesting. In contrast to this character Akilan's Uma in Pavai vilakku (1958) reveals a development which is more convincing and, therefore, evokes the sympathy of the reader.

A conscious evolution of the technique of stream of consciousness is now prevalent in the works of authors like L.S. Ramamirtham and Neela Padmanabhan. In the hands of Ramamirtham (Puthra, 1965) this technique takes on a mystic complexion as a result of his over-playing with words. Yet he is able to recreate a situation in an atmosphere as intense as the one in which the reminiscing character has his existence. Neela Padmanabhan (Uravukal, 1975) makes his characters evoke the emotions of past incidents in a way that makes the apparent detachment deceptive.

The expansion of consciousness on the part of a character in re-living the past incidents lends an impression of extended time and space. The comparatively less time taken by the character to recall events of a longer period of time serves to accentuate the intensity of the experience recaptured. A successful example of this technique is seen in the novel, Avarkalukku vayathu vanthuvittathu (1973) by Arul Subramaniam. In the space of forty-eight hours and in the midst of an excitement of a Tamil New Year day and partly in the course of a train journey, the author makes the characters re-live the incidents of the past few months which almost threatened to ruin their lives. This technique was first successfully handled by Kaa. Naa. Subramaniam in his novel Oru Nal (1950) and later by Neela Padmanabhan in Pallikondapuram (1972).

In Tamil literature descriptions of the country and the city in which the action takes place have been traditional. In fiction which is a later development, place acquires significance because of the particular set of characters who people the place. Such use of place which enables us to identify the characters of a novel as belonging to a particular region is being made by some novelists who set their story in specific geographical areas of the country. R. Shanmugasundaram as delineator of the Kongu region in Coimbatore, T. Janakiraman of the Thanjavur district, Neela Padmanabhan of Trivandrum, Chinnappa Bharati of Salem, and writers from northern Ceylon like Chenkai Azhiyan, Daniel and Ganeshalingan make use of the region they know very well in a vein that brings out the special characteristics of the people.

The use of place to lend a sense of vast space transcending the borders of the region in which the story begins is evident in P. Singaram's novel, Puyaliley oru thoni (1965). Set in the days of the Second World War, the story deals with the people from South India who settled down in Malaysia and who are forced to seek refuge in different places in South-East Asia. The example set by Kalki who made use of the many cities of India as a setting for his novel, Alai osai (1950), can be seen in Rajam Krishnan's novel, Verukku neer (1972), in which the characters from South India visit many other places in the North. Rajam Krishnan in some of her stories has taken different parts of the country as specific backgrounds. In Valaikkaram (1969) she makes use of the region of Goa and in Amuthamahi varuha (1965) the Nilgiris. The implications of an urban atmosphere affecting the characters moving in it are set out with an eye for detail by Kritika (Dharmakshetre, 1969) and Indira Parthasarathy (Thanthira bhoomi, 1968) in their novels dealing with the life in the capital of India. The latest attempt in this direction is by Athavan in his novel, Kākitha Malarkal (1978), wherein he provides a kaleidoscopic view of life at every level in the capital. No one has surpassed Jayakanthan in presenting life against the background of an urban slum in his novel Unnaipol oruvan (1964), in which he makes the characters come alive in the midst of poverty and backwardness. There have also been attempts to make the setting dominate the narrative with the result that the characters are subordinated and the background itself becomes the hero. S. Kandasamy's Chayavanam (1968) is a case in point. Chenkai Azhiyan makes a jungle stream occupy the entire stage in his novel, Kattaru (1975). Sundara Ramaswamy makes a single tamarind tree dominate the whole narrative in Oru puliyamarathin kathai (1966) to the extent that it seems to control the lives of the people living around it. With the disappearance of the tree the lives of the people also fall apart.

Writers like Raghunathan in Panchum pasiyum (1953), Selvaraj in Malarum sarukum (1966), M.V. Venkatram is Velvi thee (1966), Daniel in his novel, Panchamar (1972) and Kailasanathan in Kadal katru (1972) deal with the lives of backward classes with a greater sense of involvement and sensitive appreciation.

The use of symbolism in Tamil novel has been of recent origin. This has resulted in a deliberate attempt to emulate some of the English and French novelists who make use of this technique to convey impressions felt by them in a manner which is distinct from mere factual description. While Kaa. Naa. Subramaniam has attempted to bring symbolism in his novel Poithevu (1950), Nakulan is able to turn even commonplace expressions into symbols. His experiment in the novel wherein symbols dominate seems to border on obscurity because of the intensely subjective approach he exhibits, for example, in Ninaivuppāthai (1972) and Nizhalkal (1972).

The novel in Tamil as a genre borrowed from the West has taken deep roots within the period of a hundred years and is still developing. Along with the novelist the reader has also grown. He is now of a stature which enables him to discriminate between the evanescent and the lasting in literary creation. Tamil literature is rich in fully developed forms like the kavyas, puranas, and a variety of prabandhas. The novel and the short story as recent forms can also be accepted as viable literary genres if the innate strength of the Tamil language is put to the maximum use in developing fiction.

NOVEL (Telugu). The Telugu novel at its earliest stage seems to have been modelled on the eighteenth century English novel. For example, Vireshalingam's Satyara japurvayatralu (1891) was based on Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels. Inspired by Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield, Vireshalingam published Rajashekhara charitramu (1878), a realistic novel portraying contemporary society and true-to-life characters. However, the credit of writing the first novel in Telugu rests with a revenue official of the Madras Government, Narahari Gopalakrishnama Chetti, whose Sri Rangaraju charitramu appeared in 1872. Chetti's effort was in response to Lord Mayo's offer of a prize for a novel depicting native life. Chetti's novel is a string of adventures gone through by the hero with a love-story tagged on, and has no other merit except being the first to appear in the genre. After Vireshalingam's Rajashekhara charitramu, the first significant novel of considerable social criticism and realistic portrayal, Chilakamarti's Ramachandra vijayamu, (1894), Rajaratnam (1919) and Ganapati (1920) maintained the tradition of realism. There are well-knit plots and characterization, criticism, ridicule or outright preaching in these novels. During this period, in response to the annual prize offered by the journal, Chintamani, several historical romances, modelled on Sir Walter Scott's novels appeared, and quite a few of them, authored by Chilakamarti himself (Hemalata, 1896, Ahalyabai, 1897 and Karpuramanjari, 1898) won prizes consecutively.

The influence of the first translations from Bengali Kapalakundala (1899) and Anandamatha (1907) done by O.Y. Duraswamayya helped the development of the historical romances. Pachkari Dey's detective fiction, and Bankimchandra Chatterji's novels translated by Venkata Parvatishvara Kavulu and several others were widely read. The theme of social criticism and reform gradually broadened into a full portrayal of society and an examination of cultural values. Unnava Lakshminarayana's Malapalli (1921) and Vishvanatha Satyanarayana's Veyipadagalu (1934) attempted a comprehensive portrayal of society in depth with the aim of laying bare its cultural and philosophical bases. Bapiraju's Narayanarao (1934) which made a similar attempt is discursive and does not measure up to the artistic greatness of the other two novels. While Lakshminarayana, a Gandhian, felt that the values of Indian culture were renewing themselves vigorously and society was in the throes of a new birth, Satyanarayana felt that the values of ancient Indian culture had been undermined by the impact of Western ideas and education and there was nothing to be hopeful about in the general dissolution except for a few individuals who still adhered to the old norms and values. Despite their differing points-of-view, the two novels are an achievement of a high order in the growth of the Telugu novel. Malapalli, the first novel in 'vyavaharika' or spoken Telugu, is a many-sided but fully integrated work of art, which was the earliest to identify the problem of the Harijans and the labour class as the most vital one in the development of our society. Veyipadagalu is a huge prose-poem abounding in description of the Telugu countryside and the cycle of seasons, and rich with cultural symbols like the thousand-hooded serpent, the temple, the river, the zamindar's fort, etc.

The element of romance and adventure found in the early novels based on history gradually gave way to patriotism and a rediscovery of Indian cultural values through history. Vishvanatha Satyanarayana's Ekavira (1925), Baddanna senani (1938), Kadmichettu (1946) and Dharmachakramu (1947), and Bapiraju's Himabindu and Gona Gannareddi are novels grafted on the history of the Andhra land which blend romantic love, patriotism and philosophy. However, the novels based on a systematic and scholarly study of the history of Andhras came from Nori Narasimha Shastri, who portrays the Chalukya period in Narayanabhattu, the Kakatiya period in Rudramadevi, the Reddi kingdoms in Mallareddi and Kavisarvabhauma, and the Vijayanagara period in Dhurjati. The historical novel achieved its best form and shape in Nori's novels.

The social reform motive was revived in Chalam's provocatively iconoclastic novels like Maidanam (1934) in which a middle class brahmin housewife runs away with an uneducated brawny Muslim to live a primitive life in fulfilment of her sexuality. Though he appears as a champion of woman and a votary of free-love in his novels Amina (first two parts in 1926; final two parts in 1942) and Aruna (1935), Chalam matured from his romantic extremism and reformist fervour into an aesthete of the senses and ended up as a mystic. Vishvanatha Satyanarayana's Cheliyalikatta (1935) was a likely rejoinder to Chalam's Maidanam (1934) as it dealt with a similar theme of elopement: a married woman lured by ill-digested notions of free love ends up in regret and death. Whatever it may be, the novel inaugurated two new trends ushering in the modern Telugu novel. One is the portrayal of an anti-hero; and the other is the emergence of an intellectual woman displacing the merely romantic and the conventional woman.

The anti-hero theme emerged in the psychological novels like Gopichand's Asamarthuni jivayatra (1946), Buchchi Babu's Chivaraku Migiledi (1946) and Rachakonda Vishvanatha Shastri's Alpa jivi (1954) and in the sociological novels like G.V. Krishna Rao's Kilu bommalu, K. Kutumba Rao's Bedarina manushyulu and Ranganayakamma's Sweet Home. Cheliyalikatta's central character, Ranga Rao, has no intellectual pretensions, and his ideology wears thin as soon as he ventures out into life's arena from the sheltered life of a student. He lapses into confusion and ineptitude. But not so Sitaramarao in Asamarthuni jivayatra, or Dayanidhi in Chivaraku Migiledi. They are men of ideas; they are mentally obsessed and they fight a losing battle with the world around them. The portrayal of Sitaramarao is a psychological exploration of the creed of rationalism and materialism tested against the practical demands of life and its imperfections. From Vireshalingam and Chilakamarti to Gopichand and Buchchi Babu the quest is continuously renewed.

In Vishvanatha Shastri's Alpa jivi (1954) the anti-hero is an N.G.O. (Non-gazetted-Officer or clerk in the government). In the fifties, the N.G.O. became the focal point for plays, short stories and novels. Shastri not only adopted the Adlerian 'inferiority complex' as a basis for the crucial transformation of his central character in the novel, but also adopted the 'interior monologue' as a narrative technique. Here again the question of individual fulfilment versus social idealism is brought into focus and an existential conclusion gains ascendancy over moral conformity.

In contrast with the novels cited, Krishna Rao's Kilu bommalu (The marionettes) and Kutumba Rao's Bedarina manusvulu (Frightened creatures) describe men as creatures of society without any freedom or will of their own. Here the anti-hero is a frightened creature content to float on the tide of events, the social milieu and the political and economic forces assuming an inexorable control over man. In Ranganayakamma's Sweet-home (1970) the anti-hero is a creature of the movement for Women's Liberation. The anti-hero of the sociological novel is an outright conformist.

After 1947, realism had a new birth in the Telugu novel, and the social conditions during the Second World War and in the post-War period were graphically portrayed by several novelists. Sarada (real name Natarajan) in his Manchi-chedu and Apasvaralu, Kutumba Rao in his Varasatvam, Anamika and Tara, Sambasiva Rao in his Udaya kiranalu and Anveshana, Balivada Kanta Rao in his Dagapadina tammudu and Sampangi, delineated different layers of society. Realism with a political perspective produced M. Ramamohan Rao's Rathachakralu (1954), Onamalu (1956), Kollayigattitenemi (1970) and I dari ekkadiki (1979); V. Alvar Swami's Parajala manishi and Gangu (1956) and Dasarathi Rangacharya's Janapadam (1976). Critical realism discussing social institutions like marriage and caste and issues like status of women, status of Harijans, etc. is found in a variety of novels competently written by Shridevi (Kalatita-vyaktulu), Ranganayakamma (Krishnaveni, Balipitham, Kulinagodalu, Janaki-vimukti), M. Ramamohan Rao (Evari kosam, Kattula-vantena, Svayamvaram), N.R. Nandi (Naimisharanyam), Lata (Edari puvvulu, Pathavihina, Mahanagaramlo stri); Malati Chandur (Alochinchu, Rekkalu-chukkalu, Sadyogam), Kommuri Venugopala Rao (I desham lo bhagamidi), Binadevi (Punyabhumi kallu teru), Vasireddi Sitadevi (Matti-manishi), D. Vishalakshi (Marina viluvalu kovvotti), Rachakonda Vishvantha Shastri (Raju-mahishi, Rattalu-Rambabu), K. Sadananda (Gandaragolam), Tulasi Krishna (Natta-gullalu); Navin (Vichalita), Randhi Somaraju (Dukhitulu), P. Ganapati Shastri (Grihini), Keshavareddi, Viraji, Manju Shri, Maruti Rao and a host of other novelists. Yaddanapudi Sulochanarani, Madireddi Sulochana, Kavalipati Vijaylakshmi, Koduri Kaushalyadevi, Ananda Ramam are popular and prolific writers with scores of novels serialized in journals, printed in uniform editions, and many filmed, whose literary worth has not been assessed and whose market-popularity places them beyond the pale of reviewers and critics at the moment.

The stream-of-consciousness novel was a natural development after Racakonda Visvanatha Sastri adopted the interior-monologue technique in his Alpa jivi. V. Nagaraju adopted this method first in Tagubotu (1962) and later in Ubilo dunna (1970). The first novel is the portrayal of a farm-worker worn out with age and drink. The second novel, which is not equally successful, gives an account of a man's Herculean efforts to rescue a buffalo stuck in a bog, the buffalo serving as a symbol for the government administration stuck in people's apathy. Navin's Ampashayya portrays student-life in the sixties. Navin's novel is an outstanding artistic success.

Novel in the form of alternating diaries is the structure adopted by Uppala Lakshmana Rao. His lengthy novel Atadu-ame (1950) describes competently the social and political events from 1930 (Salt Satyagraha) to 1942 (Quit-India Movement) as lived and seen by a High Court advocate, who is inclined to support the establishment, and alternately by his wife whose heart is in the national struggle.

The psychological novel in its later stages acquired a philosophic dimension with a quest for meaning and identity. Buchchi Babu in Chivaraku migiledi made Dayanidhi, his questing neurotic hero, face his loneliness towards the end, and gave an existentialist conclusion. Gopichand in his later novels (Pilla temmera, Gadiyapadani talupulu, Merupula marakalu) gave an existentialist depth to his unconventional and restless women. In R.S. Sudarshanam's early novels, Anubandhalu (1958) and Malli-vasantam (1960), psychological analysis turns into philosophy, the latter novel making use of the 'interior monologue' technique. His Asura sandhya (1968) is a quest for philosophy in which existentialism in the character of Nagaraju first throws a challenge and offers in the end a way to the hero who is a disillusioned idealist. In Samsara vriksham (1976), advaitic existentialism finds expression through the quest of the central character. Vaddera Chandidas's Hima-jvala (1974) is an outstanding existentialist novel devoted to the difficult task of indicating 'freedom of being' through parallel but value-different experiences of the characters in the novel.

The humorous and the satirical novel has only a few representatives. Mokkapati Narasimha Shastri's Barrister Parvatisham (1925) is so well-known that his character Parvatisham has become a byword in Telugu for an innocent fool, whose country-bred manners and habits make him an Alice in the wonderland of a modern city. Forty-five years after the first part of the novel appeared, the author wrote a sequel to describe Parvatisham's student-life in England, but it failed to convince; and the delicate humour of the first book could not be recaptured by the author. In the 'thirties Munimanikyam Narasimha Rao created the woman character, Kantam, in a series of short novels and stories as the kingpin of domestic humour and felicity. Vishvanatha Satyanarayana wrote a satirical novel, Ha ha-huttu, on the English language and the Western civilization. In the sixties appeared Mullapudi Venkataramana's Rinananda lahari, a satire on creditors and borrowers; and Rajakiya bhetala panchavimshati, a satire on politicians and their machinations. Palagummi Padma Raju's Bradikina College attempted to create a veritable zoo of certain familiar types of characters but succeeded in making them only quaint and outlandish.

A few novels deserve mention as being redolent of 'Teluguness', an undefinable quality, made up of the language, custom, manners and character of the people, who come to life because of it, the story and other elements taking only a minor place, so that in translation into another language the quality disappears leaving only the mere bones of story and dialogue. Such are Shripada Subramanya Shastri's Atma bali (1951), Poranki Dakshinamurti's Velugu vennela Godari (1962), Vishvanatha Satyanarayana's Ma Babu and Malladi Ramakrishna Shastri's Krishna tiram (1967).

Notable translations from other Indian languages, which have influenced the Telugu novel in its growth and development, are mainly from Bengali: Bankimchandra, Panchkari Dey, Romeshchandra Dutt in the early decades of this century; Rabindranath Tagore and Saratchandra Chatterji in the forties: and from Hindi: Premchand in the fifties. Translations from Kannada, Malayalam and Tamil abound in recent years but they have little or no influence on the development of the Telugu novel. English, French, Russian and American novels have greatly influenced the growth of the Telugu novel at different periods and they are too numerous to find detailed mention here.

The latest trend (1980-81) in the Telugu novel is the introduction of para-psychology in a pseudo-scientific manner into the events of the story, which has evoked a large response from the general readership and made N.R. Nandi's Drishti (1980) and Y. Virendranath's Tulasidasam (1981) interesting novels.

NOVEL (Urdu) has been described as the epic of the bourgeois age. When the Industrial Revolution gave birth to cities and the urban alienation made the individual the centre of universe, the life of the ordinary middle class young man and woman formed the fabric of the novel, which revolved round the variegated tensions of the city life.

In India, industrialisation started late and an Industrial Age still awaits its dawn. Yet with the advent of the British Raj and the consequent emphasis on industry and trade, rise of cities, coming into being of a middle class and the growing centralisation, the development of the press and other factors led to the birth of this prose genre.

In Urdu, the novels came as a descendant of the allegory, the prose tales and the 'dastan'. Prior to novel-writing, various types of prose tales were popular since the 15th century. Then the dastans which told the tales of the fairies, magicians, and the faithful who could defeat them all in a series of unending skirmishes, came in vogue. Every night scores of people would gather on crossroads and the narrator would compose the tale extempore and keep the audience spell-bound for hours together.

NOVEL (URDU)

The novel came in vogue in the latter part of the 19th century when the Urdu-speaking people were faced with the challenge of adjusting themselves to the mode of living which the British Raj brought in its wake. With the old durbar and its mansabdars abolished, a number of them desperately needed a change in their outlook. Government service could no more be looked down upon. Business, trade and other professions were to be explored and a new type of education, which the first Urdu novelist, Nazir Ahmad (1836-1912), had in view, was precisely the propagation through his tales of this new ethics so as to rejuvenate the sapping morals of the people.

All his novels are borderline cases between didactic prose tales and the Western novel, but the portrayal of the contemporary reality, the delineation of the characters and the flow of language, particularly that of dialogues, is so overwhelming that these can still be enjoyed by a modern reader who may not agree with the message they are designed to convey.

Taubat-un-Nusuh, for instance, is a fervent plea for saying prayers regularly and father Nusuh turns his non-conformist son Kalim out of his house for not being a devout ritualist, but the novel does depict the unforgettable character of Mirza Zahir Dar Beg, who personifies unashamed bravado even in utter destitution. Nazir Ahmad relentlessly ridicules those who refuse to change themselves and remain stuck in the mud of feudal indolence.

Fasana-e-Mubtala has as its central theme the vices of bigamy, but in the process lays bare the living conditions, trials and tribulations of a middle class Muslim family and its complex problems.

Ibn-ul-waqt is the story of a young man who accepted change and took up government service, but in his zest for modernisation, adopted the Western style of living and lost favour not only with his own community, but also with the British officers. Thus the novelist clearly expresses himself in favour of a blending of the Orient and Occident at the level of culture, and collaboration at the level of working arrangement.

Whatever be the ethical components of these novels, Nazir Ahmad shall live as the creator of characters of Mirza Zahir Dar Beg and Haryali, and also as the unrivalled perceptive painter of the post-1857 middle class life in a forceful language which remains matchless even to this day.

Ratannath Sarshar (1845-1903), in his four-volume picaresque novel, Fasana-i-Azad, depicted the cultural and social transformation coming over the north Indian society. For Sarshar the ideal was provided by the culture of Lucknow which was the result of a fine synthesis of the Indo-Iranian ethos. Sarshar mirrors the entire span of this cultural wealth, but his love for the fast fading spectacle does not blind him to its serious limitations, even shortcomings, and in his inimitable humorous vein, he caricatures decadent characteristics of the age in a character like Khoji, who lives in the past and threatens everyone with his Karoli (sharp-edged dagger) which he does not possess. Though a mere dwarf, he boasts of overpowering the mighty wrestlers. Though ugly, he takes pride in his beauty and often thinks himself to be the centre of feminine attention and love.

But Sarshar's hero is cast in the mould of a crusader-noble of the Middle Ages, self-sacrificing, handsome and valiant. He actually takes part in Turkish-Italian war and joins the ranks of the Turkish army to win the hand of his beloved. In the process, he sheds his feudal shortcomings and modernises himself, and at the final banquet given in his honour after his marriage, advises his compatriots to shun old, antiquated notions and readjust themselves to the new norms of living.

Sarshar wrote many novels, and adapted and translated Cervantes' Don Quixote, but his best novel is Fasana, which to this day remains a saga of many a splendoured age.

With the stabilization of the British Raj in India, a new search for identity gave birth to the historical novel. Abdul Halim Sharar (1860-1926) mainly devoted himself to depicting the crusades where Western powers were defeated by Muslim warriors. The main aim was to paint the faded glory of the subjected race and to restore self-confidence among the subjugated Indian Muslims. Though, as art pieces, these novels have not much to offer today, in their heyday they claimed a vast readership and Sharar was acclaimed one of the finest novelists of his times. His Firdaus-e-Barin, however, still remains a delightful masterpiece. It depicts a historical anecdote in which a political group of heretics build a replica of Paradise on earth and elude young devout believers into this paradise temporarily and then ask them to indulge in murders and killings at their behest to regain the promised Paradise. His portrayal of the character of Sheikh Ali Wujudi gives the novel authenticity and relevance.

Umaro Jan Ada by Mirza Muhammad Hadi 'Ruswa' (1856-1931) marked a refreshingly new trend in Urdu novel-writing. By selecting a woman of easy virtue as the pivotal character and depicting her travail in the perspective of a fallen society of Awadh, Mirza Muhammad Hadi broke new ground. He, for the first time, painted social system as the real villain. Though Dilawar Khan was the villain initially responsible for abducting the innocent girl and selling her to Khaunam, the keeper of a brothel in Lucknow, what prevented Umrao Jan to lead a normal human life was the unseen social taboo attached to the name of a dancing girl so much so that when she at long last visits her mother, her real brother threatens to kill her for fear of getting a bad name. For the facility of expression as well as for the portrayal of the social and psychological tensions, Umrao Jan Ada remains an all-time masterpiece, even though its structure is rather loose and diffused.

Munshi Premchand (1880-1937) started his career as a Urdu novelist, though later on, he also wrote in Hindi and earned a reputation as a leading novelist. His main contribution was the broadening of the base and scope of the novel by introducing peasantry in his novels as a decisive factor. What distinguished him from other contemporaries is the fact that instead of glorifying the past, in which he did indulge for sometime, he could grow into an artist who could see the peasants and workers as the levers of power in future.

His Gosha-e-afiyat and Godan portray the struggles of the Indian peasantry against all kinds of oppression and exploitation on the one hand and for national independence on the other. His Godan narrates the yearning of a simple Indian peasant to possess a cow and how his wish was made unrealiseable by the exploitation of the social forces which governed his destiny. His Gosha-e-afiyat unveils the corruption and exploitation which mar our urban and rural life. Influenced by Gandhi and Tolstoy, he outgrew their influence and shaped his novels on the ideals of the October Revolution and introduced new compactness and realism in his novels.

Contemporaneous with Premchand, the romantic trend in Urdu literature created some significant novels. On the one hand, Niyaz Fatehpuri wrote novels like Shahab ki sarguzesht and Shair ka anjam, which, though short and compact, fully immersed in the self-obvious romantic agony and tenderness, on the other hand Qazi Abdul Ghafar's Laila ke khutut and Majnu ki diary not only sharply attacked false norms of ethics and morality, but also introduced a new type of very powerful and robust prose. These novels adopted new technique of letters and diary writing, and thus introduced a new pattern. Other significant novelists of the epoch were Hijab Imtiyaz Ali and Majnoon Gorakhpuri.

With the advent of the Progressive Writers Movement in 1936, a number of novelists emerged on the literary scene, the most important among them being Krishan Chander, Rajinder Singh Bedi, Ismat Chughtai, Khwaja Ahmad Abbas, Aziz Ahmad and Qurratulain Hyder.

Krishan Chander's Shikast was the turning point of romanticism which now took to the portrayal of social inequalities and injustice within its scope and dwelt on them as matters of vital concern for the aesthetic fulfilment of a sincere and sen itive artist. Shikast is the story of a tender romance of a young couple which is shattered by grim social realities, and in the process Krishan Chander the artist paints a beautiful panorama of Kashmir with his sensitive pen. Shikast is the story of the turbulant youth of the forties and fifties who was yet to find his identity and could finally identify himself with social anger and tension.

Bedi's Ek chadar maili si is a cultural-picaresque tale of the rural Punjab where the tradition of marrying the widow of the elder brother to his younger brother creates moral dilemma and psychological tension for the widow who had brought up her husband's brother as her own child. The use of complex symbolism on the one hand, and lifelike portrayal of the Punjab peasantry on the other gave this novel an altogether different flavour and made it a class by itself.

Ismat in her Terhi Lakeer combined social study with a touch of psychoanalysis and depicted the story of a wayward girl who could not accept the usual social norms. Her Masooma and Dil ki duniya complete the story of the invisible grip of social prejudices which the modern woman seeks to release herself from.

Khwaja Ahmad Abbas' Inqilab was based on the course of the struggle of national independence and how it created new patterns of national integration and social and class tensions. Aziz Ahmad's novels covered a wide range of the social and cultural life of the Hyderabad State on the one hand and the historical milieu of the Mongol hordes on the other. His Aag depicts the story of the feudal Hyderabad, while his Zarrin Taj revolves round Changiz Khan, the Mongol conqueror. His life like description of men and events and the philosophical and psychological dimensions he lends them make his novels a work of art.

Qurratulain Hyder started as a senstive romantic, lamenting the end of a glorious era marked by the partition of the sub-continent. But the theme she chose for her two earlier novels, Mere bhi sanamkhane and Safina-e-gham-e-dil matured in her most important work Aag ka darya, which depicted the tale of the Indian psyche from the earliest days to the recent times desperately struggling for new synthesis and integration despite occasional setbacks and debacles. Time conquers all, though the timeless struggle goes on. Here one finds oneself rubbing shoulders with the immigrant Aryans moving into the northern table and in search of new pastures, with the Turks and Mughals fraternizing with the earlier inhabitants and in the process creating new social and cultural patterns and with the Westerners who march into the subcontinent as political enslavers and harbingers of cultural enlightenment and precursors of a new Renaissance.

Outside the orbit of the progressives, Hayatullah Ansari's Lahu ke phool, in five volumes, was significant as it narrated the story of the Indian Freedom Struggle from 1911 to 1947, from a Gandhian-Nehru angle and concluded with the First Five-Year Plan period (1951). The novel covers the social life in the Indian princely states and percolates deeper into the layers of the urban and rural life, focussing attention on the changes brought about by the Indian resistance to the British Raj—changes through the weapons of 'ahimsa' and 'satyagraha' in the context of the national consciousness and social sensibility of the common man.

In the recent past three significant novelists, who made their mark, are Jeelani Bano, Qazi Abdus Sattar and Alim Masrur. Jeelani Bano focussed attention on the multi-faceted exploitation in the feudal order, the subjugation of man as a slave of class hierarchy and the use of women as luxury merchandise, and her Aiwan-i-ghazal did not end there but depicted the evolution of the downtrodden into militant crusaders for human justice. The younger generation born of these exploited women grows into bomb-wielding Naxalite girls.

Qazi Abdus Sattar made his debut with his Shikast ki awaz, which was set against the feudal zamindar background of Awadh, but soon flowered into a forceful novelist of the rural background. His portrayal of the village life in Eastern Uttar Pradesh marks the extension of the art of Premchand. With his powerful pen he captures the changes brought about and the new socio-economic measures in the structure of rural life since 1947.

He juxtaposes the predicament of the decadent feudal system and the travails of the ex-zamindar families with the tension effected in the new psyche of the north Indian peasantry and the creation of new classes among them. His Shab Gazida was an outstanding novel in this respect, while his Dara Shikoh captured with surprising vividness the age of Mughal decline and the battle of succession which ended with the death of an ideology.

Alim Masrur with his only novel Bahut der kardi appears significant because of his tender and mellow treatment of a difficult theme. A woman of easy virtue is acquired by a young man to live with him and feign herself to be his wife for a short period so that he could get a house on rent which could only be rented to a married couple, but in this short stay, both of them discover themselves and develop a strange communion of soul transcending all physical needs.

Wajida Tabassum is perhaps the most tantalizing name, for she deliberately bases her novels on themes bordering sex and its persuasions, and then slowly adds new dimensions to them through art-devices. Her latest Qisas depicts the story of a prostitute betrayed by the father and avenges herself by curing the son of sexual impotency through her advances and then sacrificing herself in the process.

The Urdu novel has explored new themes, techniques and forms during one hundred odd years and has acquired new dimensions.

NOVEL SAHITYAM (Malayalam). First published in 1930, the work by M.P. Paul (1904-52) is a detailed study of that literary genre with a critical evaluation of individual works and an analysis of the principles underlying the making of a novel. A comparatively new branch of literature in Malayalam, the novel had not come of age at that time, though there were a few of recognised merit. Naturally the author had to depend more on Western works for his examples. Even for his new venture, perhaps the only model he had then to follow was E.M. Forster's The Aspects of the Novel (1927). But Paul's is not a derivative work. He looks at his subject so comprehensively as to juxtapose, compare and consider together the Eastern concepts of dramaturgy, characterisation, etc, and the Western concept of the novel. So he examines the mutual relationships between the genres. His approach is scientific and his observations research-oriented.

Selection of material, formation of plot, development of emotion, the five components of exposition, development, climax, solution and denouement, types of stories, characters, ideals and morals are the aspects of the genre elaborated in the book.

A novel, according to Paul, is "a work in prose as an expression of human thought and emotion and possible human experience". For him, the term novel has no specific meaning and has the possibility of immense diversity.

A novelist cares more for his plot than for anything else. The author's recurrent reference to plot as an integral part of a novel gives the impression that he could not anticipate the modern types without plot or even characterisation with which we are familiar today. This in no way detracts from the value or relevance of his work because it analyses a few Malayalam novels in a masterly way. He goes deep into Chandu Menon's Indulekha and Sharada. He compares C.V. Raman Pillai's historical novels with Ivanhoe, and Ivanhoe in turn with Bankimchandra's Durgeshnandini. His objectivity is clear when he unhesitatingly opines at one point that C.V. Raman Pillai's Premamritam is grotesque and in another context that Appan Tampuran's Bhutarayar has no art.

At the time when the work was published, the Malayalam novels were used to 'type characters' belonging to the high castes. Contrary to this tradition was the refreshingly new novel of a modern author: Balyakalasakhi by Muhammed Basheer. Paul is very liberal in eulogizing this novel.

In short, Novel sahityam, being a maiden attempt of the kind in Malayalam, gives more than one might expect from a pioneer with meagre material available to him, though here and there some drawbacks could be pointed out, besides the fact that more works on the subject have been published since then.

NOVROZ-I-SABA (Kashmiri). The Persian term 'Novroz-i-saba' was coined and used by the traditional musicians of Iran and Kashmir in medieval times for a 'Muqam' (mode) of the 'Sufiana mausiqi'. Abdul Rahman 'Rahi' (b. 1925) adopted this Persian term for a title of the collection of his Kashmiri poems. The collection was first published by him in 1958.

Prior to the publication of Novroz-i-saba, Rahi's poems were included in the anthologies Subhuk soda, Yim saani aslov, Loluk partav and Sanawun saaz along with those of other progressive poets. None of these poems could, however, click; but the poems included in the Novroz-i-saba show Rahi's involvement in the progressive movement of the time, especially when it was being patronised by some political leaders like Ghulam Muhammad Sadiq and D.P. Dhar at the local level, and by literary giants like Dinanath 'Nadim'. Against this background, some of the poems in Novroz-i-saba depict the hardships suffered by the labour class of Kashmir at the hands of some internal and external exploiters. No doubt the compilation is loaded with slogans and versified statements on the movement at many places, but at the same time the poet's skill in presenting his progressive outlook and in rendering two beautiful translations of Sheikh Sadi and Nazim Hikmat from Persian into Kashmiri is evident. In this collection Rahi has also introduced the form of blank verse successfully for the first time in Kashmiri. During early sixties when there was hardly any competition in Kashmiri poetry, the collection, Novroz-i-saba, for its merits earned literary acclaim. It received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1961.

Rahi has since moved towards the modern school of thought and Novroz-i-saba is no more considered to be his best work. It seems that the collection failed to stand the test of time; nevertheless it served as a mile-stone at a time when most of the Kashmiri poets were engaged with some outdated trends of traditional poetry and indulged in only mechanical excercises. The contents of Rahi's ghazals in Novroz-i-saba bear the impact of some of the prominent Persian and Urdu poets including Hafiz, Ghalib, Iqbal, Firaq and Faiz. However, the poems, especially those with a background of the 'Dal lake' and the 'Sona lake', are very good sketches of romance on the whole.

NRISINGHACHARYA, SHRIMAN (Gujarati; b. 1853, d. 1897) was a mystic by temperament, gifted with intuitive perception. He earned his living first by establishing a small school and later by joining the P.W.D. at Vadodara cantonment. His wife died young, and his association with Mohan Swamy showed him the way to the contemplation of the Divine. He left service and devoted his time to meditation. Soon he attracted a large number of disciples who formed themselves in the year 1882 into a society called 'Shreyas Sadhak Adhikarivarga' under his spiritual guidance. He preached that spiritual bliss was to be achieved not by discarding the mundane but by leading the pious life of a householder, subordinating material pleasure to spiritual uplift. His teachings are embodied in such works as Vanivilas (poems, 3 vols.), Bhaminibhusan (stories), Siddhant sindhu (doctrinal book), Panchavarad vritant (novel), Tribhuvanvijayi khadga (novel), Sati suvarna (novel), Surescharitra (drama), Sanmitranu mitra prati patra (letters), Sadbodh parijata (letters) and Mahakal (essays).

NUMIT KAPPA (Manipuri) is an allegorical tale in archaic Manipuri and is written in the Meitei script. A transliterated version in current script, edited by Oinam Bhogeswar Singh, was published in 1977.

Numit kappa contains an allegorical story. Out of the five sons of the mother of the Sun only two have survived. They are the Sun and Taohuireng, a star. The Sun shines during the day and as soon as he sets his brother Taohuireng appears to shine in the night sky. Thus people have no leisure. A certain man named Khwai Nungjengbam Piba is angry that these brothers should keep every one busy day and night. He resolves to do something about it. He asks his wife to bring a bamboo from her relatives so that he can make a bow and arrows to shoot one of the two brothers. Having prepared the bow and the arrows he tests his skill and finds it satisfactory. He goes away one night telling his wife that he is going to ambush a boar in their field. At nightfall Taohuireng rises in all his splendour and Khwai Nungjengbam Piba shoots at him. The arrow misses Taohuireng but hits his horse and the star falls down from the sky frightened. As he sees this, the Sun is also frightened and he goes in hiding for a long time. The world remains dark for many days until he comes out of hiding at the instance of the goddess Panthoibi, who assures him of safety.

Even though Khwai Nungjengbam Piba shot at Taohuireng, the brother of the Sun, the book is named Numit kappa which means 'Shooting the Sun'. This is probably because Taohuireng shone at night brightly as a second Sun and he was considered yet another Sun by the people. The allegory hidden in the story is explained in the following manner. Once two brothers of the Angom clan were rulers of a small principality in the Imphal valley. The elder brother was the ruler of a part of the principality and the younger brother was the ruler of another. Both were extremely powerful so much so that they were likened to two bright suns. People had no rest at all as they had to serve the two brothers all the time. Khwai Nungjengbam Piba shot at one of them. His daring attack put a stop to the tyranny of the two brothers and from then on they behaved properly. The story has a kind of epilogue at the end in the form of a few hymns to the Sun-god. These hymns appear to be older from the stand-point of language and style than the rest of the work. From the linguistic point of view and from a consideration of other matters it appears that Numit kappa must have been composed in the first half of the 10th century.

NUN MIM RASHID (Urdu; b. 1910, d. 1975) was one of the important modern Urdu poets. He is known, primarily, as an iconoclast and innovator, and as such he wielded influence on his own generation as well as on the coming generation of Urdu poets.

Nazr-i-Muhammad Rashid (Nazr-i-Muhammad being the full name for which Urdu initials 'Nun' 'Mim' stand) was born at Akalgarh in district Gujranwala (Punjab). He received his early education at the local Government High School. Later, he joined Government College, Lahore and took his M.A. in Economics in 1932. He joined the All India Radio in 1939 as News Editor, became Programme Assistant after sometime, and then rose to the position of Director of Programmes. In 1943, he received a temporary Commission in the Army and served as Public Relations Officer for four years in Iraq, Iran, Egypt and Ceylon. On return to India, he was posted at Lucknow, but after the partition, he migrated to Pakistan. In 1952, he got appointment as an Information Officer at the United Nations, New York, and was posted in different countries, including Iran. He retired in 1974 and made London his permanent abode, where he died.

Nun Mim Rashid began his poetic career under the pen-name Rashid Waheedi when he was a student. His early poetry was written under the combined influence of Josh Malihabadi, Hafiz Jalandhari, Akhtar Shirani and Rawish Siddiqi. During this early phase of his poetry, Rashid wrote poems in regular verse and a few sonnets. He came to his individual self about 1932, when he found 'Azad nazm' (free verse) as the form most befitting his creative genius. Rashid, along with Tasadduq Husain Khalid, the first poet in Urdu, and Miraji, a master exponent of the form, was among the avant-garde poets to experiment in Urdu. The popularity of the Urdu free verse owes much to Rashid, who, by his poetic verve and artistic treatment of the form, made it a powerful weapon of expression in Urdu poetry.

Four collections of Rashid's poems have been published so far: Mawara (1941), Iran men ajnabi (1955), La-insan (1969) and Guman ka mumkin (1977).

NUND RISHI (Kashmiri; b. 1377, d. 1438), the great patron-saint, is the symbol of the composite culture of Kashmir. His epithets include Sheikh-ul-Aalam, Sheikh Noor-ud-Din, Alamdari Kashmir, Shams-ul-Aarifin, Kashur Wazkhan, Pirani Pir, Piri Rishian and Sahaz Anand. Irrespective of faith, creed and religion, he is adored alike by all Kashmiris. He is the father of Kashmiri 'Nazm' and one of the founders of the Muslim Rishi Order of Kashmir, a Sufi order of indigenous origin.

There are as many as eight shrines in his honour in different parts of the valley, but the shrine at Chari Sharif attracts the largest number of pilgrims throughout the year. The largest congregation of pilgrims assembles at Chari Sharif at the time of the annual festival in the month of October every year. The festival continues for a month and people from all parts of the valley visit the shrine for blessing. People from other parts of the country also visit this renowned shrine.

The ancestors of Nund Rishi were Surajvanshi Rajputs and rulers of Kistawar (a district of Jammu). It was some dynastic feud and defeat in battle which made them abandon their motherland. They migrated to Kashmir in the last phase of the Hindu rule and settled at Dardar Kot (Kulgam) and Telasara (Chadura), where they were allotted an estate at Rupvan in Chadura Tehsil by the local chief of the area.

Nund Rishi's father, Salar Sanz, lost his estate after the Dulchoes invasion in 1320. He left his native place in search of some employment. During his wanderings he reached Kulgam village in Anantnag district and embraced Islam at the hands of Syed Hussain Simnani, a Syed from Central Asia. He married Sudramaj at the instance of the Syed. She too was from the Surajvanshi clan of Kistawar, who had earlier settled at Dardar Kot. Sudramaj had also embraced Islam at the instance of the above-mentioned Syed. Nund Rishi was proud of his ancestry and wrote in one of his 'shruks': "My father belongs to the brave class of Rajputs. My mother also is from the same origin. I am proud to have such a great tradition to my credit."

After his marriage, Salar Sanz settled at Khejogipora in Kulgam Tehsil. Nund Rishi was born in this village during the sultanate period of the Kashmiri history.

Salar Sanz died when Nund Rishi was in his infancy. Sudramaj left Khejogipora and settled with her foster mother at Kaimoh in Kulgam Tehsil, because all her relatives had died earlier in an epidemic.

Nund Rishi married Zai Ded of Dadasara (Tral) when he was in his teens. She bore him one son, Hyder, and a daughter, Zoon Ded. Both Hyder and Zoon died very young and are buried at the Kaimoh shrine with Sudramaj and Zai Ded. He renounced his family at the age of twenty-one and entered the Gufabal cave for meditation and spiritual attainment. Sudramaj tried hard to bring him round, but all her efforts proved futile. Nund Rishi remained in the cave for twelve years. When he came out of the cave he composed a long narrative, Buddha charita, which contained two thousand verses. The poem is lost forever, but the title of the poem is enough to prove that the poet had something to say about the life and works of Mahatma Buddha. It is evident from the words and deeds of Nund Rishi that he owes a lot to Buddha and his teachings. He resembles more a Buddhist monk than a Muslim sufi. He is against the slaughter of living beings and all sorts of violence and tyranny. From Kaimoh he proceeded to Chemier, a village in Nurabad, and stayed there for six months. Then he went to Mukta Pukhri (a mohalla in Srinagar) and remained there for six months. He next stayed for seven years at Honchipora in Berwa Tehsil. From there he shifted to Sutharan in Berwa Tehsil and lived there for eighteen months. From Sutharan he proceeded to Darigam and remained there for twelve long years. Rupvan is the place where he spent the last seven years of his ascetic wanderings and he breathed his last there. His dead body was carried to Chari Sharif where a great shrine was built on his grave. Besides others, great Bud-Shah, the then king of Kashmir, was in the funeral procession. People in thousands assembled at Chari Sharif to pay their respects to the departed saint.

Nund Rishi, though a follower of the Islamic faith, was a strict vegetarian. He represents the ancient rishi culture of India, which is obvious from his noble thoughts and high ethical calibre.

After renouncing his family, Nund Rishi lived on dry vegetables and followed the path of 'Patrahara' rishis, and in the last phase of his life, he lived on mere water and adopted the path of the 'Salihara' rishis of ancient India.

Besides being a great saint, Nund Rishi was a poet of repute and rank and is second to Lal Ded alone. His poetry is graceful and replete with meaning. It appeals to the heart of the reader and makes him think of the lofty ideals of life. His compositions are known as 'shruks' which is the Kashmiri form of Sanskrit shloka. But the resemblance is in name alone. There is nothing common between the Sanskrit shloka and the shruk of Nund Rishi so far as prosody and form are concerned. His poetry is full of allusions from Hindu mythology and references from the epics, puranas and other shastras. It shows the least influence of Persian and is close to Sanskrit in thought, content and language.

Some of his compositions have been given the name of 'Shamaskrite' and 'Guri' by Persian writers. But Nund Rishi's Shamaskrite and Guri poetry is lost forever.

Nund Rishi's shruks were published by Ghulam Muhammad Nur Muhammad, publishers of Srinagar, in the forties of the current century in a series of pamphlets, but it is observed that the compiler did not follow the original text. Most of the compositions included in this series of seven pamphlets of 32 pages each seem to have no meaning.

The first serious attempt in this direction was made by Amin Kamil who edited Noornama (1965), published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages, Srinagar. The compilation gives the evidence of the compiler's faithfulness to the original text even though a few errors have crept in the work. The compiler has wrongly attributed some 'vakhs' of Lal Ded to Nund Rishi. The greatest flaw in this collection is that a large portion of Nund Rishi's poetry has not been included in it. The hexa-centenary of Nund Rishi was celebrated on Government level in Kashmir with great eclat in 1977-78. A number of seminars, mushairas and debates were organised and twelve books on the various phases of Nund Rishi's life were released. It was during the celebrations that a comprehensive Kulliyat of the saint, edited by Motilal 'Saqi' was released by the Academy in two volumes. During the celebrations, the shruks of Nund Rishi were also translated into Hindi, English and Punjabi. The translations were later published by the Academy in a book form. Kashmiri Muslims call the poetry of Nund Rishi 'Kashur Quran' (Quran in Kashmiri).

Nund Rishi is the symbol of that great tradition of brotherhood that believes in the motto, 'Live and let live'; and this is the great gift of Kashmir to the subcontinent. His towering personality is a source of inspiration to all of us, the personality that stood for human dignity and cherished the values of tolerance, good-will and universal brotherhood.

NUNGAIRAKTA CHANDRAMUKHI (Manipuri) is a collection of the short stories of M.K. Binodini Devi, a renowned Manipuri writer. First published in 1964, the collection originally contained sixteen short stories. In the second edition published in 1967 three more stories were added. These stories deal with the excitement of youth, the different values of youth and age, and the pieties of life. M.K. Binodini Devi's language is evocative and musical; it has a finesse and a charm which are singularly her own. There is sometimes a play of light and colour in her stories. She writes short and direct sentences pregnant with meaning. The popularity of her short stories owes much to her deep understanding of human nature and her skill in revealing it. Nungairakta chandramukhi heralded a new phase in the history of Manipuri short story.

tury) belonged to the galaxy of writers who flourished in the first half of the eighteenth century. He was to a great measure responsible for the growth of the Manipuri literature of that period. Writers like Mayengba Brindaban and Wahengba Madhabram who shot to fame in the second half of the eighteenth century were his close disciples. His command over both Sanskrit and Bengali literatures was great and his translation of Astakal from Bengali into chaste old Manipuri speaks volumes of his erudition and religious piety. But he is mainly remembered for his original work, Takhel ngamba, a biography of Garibniwaz, the great king of Manipur. It is an eye-witness account and depicts the superhuman courage of the king and his select warriors in defending his country against the Takhels (the Tripuris) at a time when the Burmese threatened Manipur from another direction. The description of the preparation for the battle, of the actual fighting with an exchange of boastful words and the heroism of the king and his men reaches epic heights. The splendid diction, though the work is marked by prolixity, is free from archaism. It is also comparatively free from the extensive use of Sanskrit and Bengali words widely current in the works of that time. An invocation of both the deities, local and Hindu, and a short outline of the story that is to follow are first presented, and the concluding prayer with the humble submission of the poet for sins of omission and commission is made for the general weal of the king and the people.

The work was published in 1986 after being transliterated into the Bengali script and edited with annotations by O. Bhogeshwar Singh.

NUNGPAN POMPI LUWAUPA (Manipuri) is a book in the original Manipuri script about the supra-mundane love of Nungpan Pombi Luwaupa for his deceased wife, Kouparon Namoinu. It is a work of the early period of Manipuri literature in that its theme is of the soil and its language free from being interlarded with words of any Indo-Aryan language. The name of the writer or the time of its composition cannot be ascertained from the text.

The story in brief is this: Leinung Thongaren, the god of the dead, reigning in the dark nether world dispatched his younger brother, Poireiton, and his youngest wife, Leiano Tabi, to the bright world for a journey and for the establishment of the seven Salai groups of mankind. But the two were separated on the way and Leinao Tabi took shelter in the palace of the Koubru king, where she was well looked after as the daughter of the childless king. Poireiton, on the other hand, entered the Luwang region where he took the name Luwang Paningnapa and became the chief of the community. Nungpan Pompi Luwaupa was born out of his marriage with Santhong Humureima. Luwaupa soon grew into manhood and, becoming lovesick, went out in search of a sweetheart. Before long he chanced to meet the daughter of the Koubru king, now named Kouparon Namoinu, and instantly the two fell in love. On returning home he beseeched his parents to make a formal proposal to the parents of Namoinu which was promptly done with a lavish offer of rich presents. The marriage followed with due solemnity, but the happiness was not destined to last long. Thongaren did not take kindly to his wife spending her days as an ordinary mortal in the company of another man. So she died. Pompi Luwaupa was heart-broken but did not take his tragic fate lying down. Taking the help of Nongta Chingkhanyang, a bird, he sent the request that Thongaren returned the soul of his deceased wife or accepted the challenge of a single combat. He kept the dead body without performing the obsequies. Thereupon the king of the subterranean world sent one of his younger brothers fully equipped for the fight. But Luwaupa defeated him and held him captive under the weight of a heavy slab of stone with his hands tied. Another brother of Thongaren met the same humiliation. At last the god of the dead himself, armed to the teeth, appeared in all splendour to defend his honour. But Luwaupa fell prostrate before him and begged his mercy. He requested him to give back his wife so that the Luwang dynasty might have further progeny. Moved to pity, the Lord fulfilled the wishes of Luwanupa and forthwith left for his dark abode. Thus the couple lived in clover for a hundred years and Hongnem Luwang Pushipa, a son, was born to them.

The work attains excellence because of its diction and characterisation. The characters of Pompi Luwaupa and Thongaren are particularly well-drawn. There are some excellent descriptions such as that of Namoinu through a female messenger or of Namoinu's death and Luwaupa's laments over her lifeless body.

It was published after being transliterated into the Bengali script in 1980 by the Manipuri State Kala Akademi.

NURJAHAN (Bengali) is a five-act drama by Dwijendralal Roy (1863-1913). As the title suggests, it is a drama on the life of Meherunnisa, later known as Nurjahan. She was the wife of Sher Afgan, a chieftain of Burdwan, and lived a very happy conjugal life with her husband. But her bewitching beauty aroused the passion of Emperor Jehangir of Delhi. Jahangir contrived to murder Sher Afgan and married her. She was now renamed Nurjahan, which meant 'the light of the world'. Her life became miserable, torn as it was between the gnawing memory of her departed husband and the disagreeable compulsiveness of adapting herself to the pomp and splendour of the regal atmosphere of the Agra Court and of surrendering herself to the embraces of a lecherous monarch. This produced in her sensitive heart a storm of conflict. She was lacerated by the spirit of vendetta against Jahangir, the killer of her husband, as well as by an indomitable lure of power associated with her new life as the Empress.

It is plain that by the very nature of the position in which Nurjahan found herself she could not but be an enigmatic character and the playwright tries to bring out this particular aspect of her personality. The play is predominantly psychological and its characterisation seems to have a Shakespaerean touch. Apart from the main character of Nurjahan all other characters are also well-drawn.

N.C.

NURJAHAN (Hindi; 1935) by Gurubhakta Singh 'Bhakta' represents one of the most popular and talked-of epics in the Hindi poetry of the thirties. It narrates the love tale of Emperor Jahangir and Nurjahan, then the legally wedded wife of one of his generals, Sher Afghan. Here the poet has endeavoured to catch the musical notes of real life—now full of ecstatic joy and now replete with deep agony. the poet infuses into the narrative the sufferings of his own soul, and enriches it with the imaginative vividness of the details of circumstances, and thus brings about a rich blend of emotional upsurge and enforced restraint to make it a true-to-life portrayal of the ruthless exploitation by the high and mighty of the unfortunate low. Nurjahan's entire narrative is endowed with warmth of life and dynamism, with concreteness that results from realism, with psychological poignance, and with an overall natural environment and milieu. 'Bhakta' touched a novel, vibrant chord reflecting realistic humanism, when the overall literary scene was permeated by over-idealism and conventional life attitudes. The characters of his epic are real and life-like in all their frailty and inner strength. Divested of its historical content, the love tale is as real and as touching as any, and that forms the basis of the reader's identification with the main characters. Nurjahan was warmly applauded and acclaimed as a break from the stagnation that had set in the Dwivedi era because of its originality, its humanism and its weltanschaaung based on the realistic approach to love and beauty. It is the philosophy of love and beauty that is reflected in Nurjahan. We find a rich and harmonious blend of the cosmopolitan quality of sufism, Iranian sensuousness and Indian contemplativeness. Though the tale is strictly speaking not Indian, its tone is essentially Indian.

Nurjahan earned for its poet, though not a prolific writer, eminence and renown. The poem is, indeed, a confluence of the three streams of history, romance and poetry.

NURSERY RHYMES (Bengali) are traditional verses or chants, usually rhymed, spoken or sung by adults to small children. They include lullabies, jingles, riddles, snatches of popular songs and even proverbs. They are normally meant to soothe or amuse children and their effect is felt all along with their haunting jingle and melody. In fact, it is this uncanny melody which is the chief characteristic of these verse rhymes, but some of them, such as the counting rhymes or the rhymes used in teaching alphabet, can be instructional. But these last need not be regarded as nursery rhymes proper.

Nursery rhymes essentially belong to the oral tradition and as they pass on from generation to generation they undergo vocabular changes. Such vocabular changes may also occur when a rhyme travels from one place to another taking in elements from different dialects. As a result there can be several versions of a single rhyme, sometimes with significant variations. One of the most famous rhymes, 'Agdum bagdum ghoradum saje', which has at least three versions, is an instance.

Nursery rhymes are works of anonymous versifiers and they vary in age and origin. For instance, there is a rhyme which alludes to the railways (Rel kam jhamajham) which means it could not have been composed earlier than the later part of the 19th century. There is a melancholy tune, sung as a lullaby (Khoka ghumalo para juralo) which refers to the Maratha raids in Bengal during the early part of the eighteenth century. It can be safely assumed that this was composed sometime in the eighteenth century.

Some of the popular rhymes originated almost certainly in ancient folklore or folk-tales. There is, for instance, a reference to one Shibthakur or Shibsadagar in three or four rhymes and to his marriage. It is possible that there was an elaborate tale centring round this character. There are others, again, which speak of some misfortune shared in common by the country-folk, or of some woes resulting from some social evils. The most piognant of these are about married little girls living in alien homes estranged from their parents.

Bengali nursery rhymes often lack thematic structure. This is not because of any lack of skill but because the essence of these rhymes consists in surprise, resulting from passage from one unexpected image to another. Such rhymes, in complete disregard to linear narration, are built of only suggestions of disjointed scenes or images. There is no attempt to relate them. There is no attempt to elaborate an image or to dwell upon a scene. But because of the suggestiveness inherent in such capricious brevity the child who listens can conjure up a whole scene in his mind. The scenes thus evoked are familiar scenes within the experience of the child, but inasmuch as they are incompatible, they acquire the quality of a dream. They are actually the stuff of which dreams are made, and Bengali nursery rhyme often has the absurd structure of a dream.

Even those rhymes which are made as linear narratives have the same unexpected change of scenes or sentiments. This change is not any deliberate forcing together of incompatible images aimed at achieving a particular effect. The change is almost thoughtless, capricious and as easily effected as would be done in a child's restless mind. Thus they correspond to the pattern of a child's thought-pattern wich is built up of incongruities, asburdities and surprises. These qualities are so pronounced in some rhymes that they verge on the nonsense.

These traditional rhymes express various sentiments, but they all pertain to the life in rural Bengal. Some bring out poignantly the sadness of married little girls living exiled from their parental home. Indeed, there are a number of rhymes which deal with the strange ambivalence associated with marriage: excitement and sadness, attraction and fear. Some rhymes again dwell upon mother's love for her child and the child's love for his mother. This is a kind of love which knits all the world into a family: the trees, the rivers, the birds, the sky, the moon and the stars are living beings who are members of the child's home. The moon is the child's dear uncle who is easily tempted by the milk of a black cow. A fish takes away the boat from under the child and another, watching this discomfiture, begins to dance in joy.

It is impossible to know now how many such rhymes existed. It was only in the last part of the nineteenth century that attempts were made to collect them. Rabindranath Tagore collected 81 of these rhymes and published them in Sahitya parisat patrika in 1894-1895 under the title 'Chhelebhulano chhara'. Subsequently another fifty-four rhymes were published in the same journal. Later some rhymes were collected by Upendrakishore Roy Choudhury, Jogindranath Sarkar, Dakhinaranjan Mitramajumdar and Abanindranath Tagore.

These traditional rhymes inspired many later poets to write rhymes for children. Tagore himself wrote a number of rhymes for his Sahajpath, Chhara o chhabi and Chitrabichitra. Jogindranath Sarkar (1866-1937) is best known for his instructional rhymes but he also wrote some rhymes which were meant only to delight. He was the author of Hasikhushi and Khukumanir chhara which are still popular with the children. Upendrakishore Roy Choudhury wrote some rhymes for his delightful stories for children. But the greatest writer of Bengali rhymes—the traditional rhymes excepted—was Sukumar Ray. His strange imagination created strange creatures which only children could see in their dreams. He was an adept at writing nonsense verses, and the rhymes of his verses are faultless. The most popular of his books of rhymes are Abol tabol and Khaikhai. Abanindranath Tagore who was an excellent story-teller wrote some rhymes for his stories like 'Buro angla' and 'Bhutpatrir deshe'. Sunirmal Bose wrote verses for children but they are altogether of a different nature. Annadasankar Ray comes nearer to the spirit of nursery rhymes, though his rhythm is at times faulty and his rhymes forced. Among the other writers of rhymes, mention needs be made of Pramatha Choudhury, Premendra Mitra, Ajit Datta, Subhas Mukherjee, Sukanta Bhattacharya, Buddhadev Bose, Birendra Chatterjee, Kamakshiprasad Chatterjee, Nirendranath Chakravarti, Sukhalata Rao, Sunil Ganguli, Shakti Chatterjee, Naresh Guha, Mahindra Ray, Nabanita Deb Sen, Shamkha Ghose, Amitabha Chowdhury, Amitabha Dasgupta, Ram Basu, Mangalacharan Chatterjee, Kabita Sinha and Siddheshwar Sen.

NURSERY RHYMES (Gujarati). Gujarat has a rich tradition of nursery rhymes. Not only the folk poets but also the poets of the modern period have contributed to the genre of nursery rhymes. Children were considered a treasure bestowed by God. In one of the nursery rhymes, addressing the child in the cradle, the mother says:

> You have been offered to me by gods.
> I asked for you;
> You are cordially welcome. May you live long.

Thus from his very birth an impression was sought to be created in the mind of the child that he had a respectable place in the family, and he was a fountain-head of joy.

There is an innumerable variety of sentiments and themes in nursery rhymes. The music of the words and the rhythmic humming of the songs put the child to sleep. In a song the mother tells the child:

> My darling, you are fond of lullaby,
> Oh! lustrous diamond of my heart,
> you love lullaby.
> You will see a sweet dream.

Besides the temptation of sweet dreams, the mother asks the dream to favour the child and cling to the cradle so that under its soothing effect the child becomes fresh when he wakes up. The child is also given the temptation of sweets he likes. In one such song the mother says:

> My little baby, if you go to sleep now
> Your aunt will bring sweet balls for you.

In other nursery rhymes, the childish pranks of Krishna, like breaking curd and butter pots, and his brave deeds like wrestling with his maternal uncle Kamsa are described. In another lullaby the mother says:

> Sleep my darling, sleep soundly.
> When you are awake
> Rama will play with you,
> And Sita will give you a bath...

Jhaverchand Meghani (1897-1947), who did extensive research in folk literature, edited folk nursery rhymes. He was a scholar of repute and composed many nursery rhymes, a collection of which called Halardun was published in 1927. His 'Shivajinun halardun' (lullaby of Shivaji) is extremely popular. In the song, the mother, while making the baby to sleep, tells the story of Shivaji's childhood implanting patriotic sentiment in his mind. The mother says:

> My child, sleep soundly tonight
> Tomorrow you shall have to fight fierce battles,
> And you won't get time to sleep.

In his nursery rhymes Meghani also depicts various sentiments like parental love and eulogizes the cradle which makes the life of the child comfortable and happy.

Other poets who have contributed to this genre are Tribhuvan Vyas, Jayamangauri Pathakji, Deshalji Parmar and Dhiruben Patel.

Thus, nursery rhymes which are part of folk poems have been given a new dimension by the poets of the modern era.

NURSERY RHYMES (Kashmiri). Folklore and legends are the oral history of an ethnic or social group which throws light on its cultural and social life. Folk literature, of which folk songs form a basic component, is an inseparable part of man from the cradle to the grave. The first cry of a newborn baby is the beginning of nursery rhymes and lullabies. Most of these rhymes are of anonymous authorship; a few are academic excercises by poets.

Sometimes the cradle songs written by renowned Kashmiri poets are taken as folk songs, and are akin to nursery rhymes. Such stray instances are the result of the lack of printing facilities until recently. The Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages has brought out about a dozen volumes of Kashmiri folk songs spread over various regional languages and dialects, and they include nursery rhymes as well. The spontaneity of utterance strikes us as we read these rhymes, as does their variety. In order to give sanctity to the birth of a child and also to ward off evil, Kashmiri pundits whisper Vedic hymns and the Muslims the Azan into the ears of a new-born babe. It may be recalled here that folk literature is essentially secular in character and it is the mother's love that is instinct in every Kashmiri cradle song. Kashmiri pundits thus welcome a new-born baby:

> Live long, little baby; Shiva cast your horoscope.
> Inder Raja is your father, daffodil your mother,
> Would the damsels of heaven swing your cradle,
> Adorned with ringlets

Likewise, the Kashmiri Muslims greet the new-born child, praying for the grace of Allah:

> Would I swing your cradle in the name of Allah,
> To ward off evil, may Allah grant you longevity
> And make your face radiant with heavenly light.

The prosody of these lullabies is simple, their mode of expression musical and refreshing and they are full of local colour. And the objects of day-to-day life, and the fairs and festivals of Kashmir find a place in these songs.

It is but natural that some nursery ryhmes are meant only for a male or a female child, a son or a daughter. Whatever the case, motherhood, human love and selfless affection are their pervasive themes. In spite of technological advancement, the child will continue to suck at the breasts of the mother, the fountain source of nursery rhymes.

S.R.P.

NURSERY RHYMES (Konkani). The Konkani language has a rich variety of nursery rhymes. There are certain rhythmic and verbal nuances in them which make it well nigh impossible to translate them into any other language. The flora and fauna of the region occupy quite an important place in these rhymes. The most common ones are action songs, game songs, seasonal rhymes, lullabies and rhymes without much sense.

Action songs are perhaps devised to give exercise to a child's palms, fingers, feet, etc., e.g.,

> Tha ge tha, thathanchi
> Gorya, gorya babachya hatanchi
> Tha kar ge kasi thinguna
> Hatant bayechya kankannam
> Tha kartam kartam bhagli
> Nidi yenuk lagli.

(Move the fingers, move the fingers/Move the fingers fair./The battles jingle./Moving the fingers, the child is tired./Now she is dozing).

Another, describing the movement of the feet, would read in English like this: Dance on one foot/O my little Krishna/Let the anklets jingle/Dance on one foot, etc.

A nursery rhyme for a game says: Go and hide, go and hide. What's in your ear? A ring? Now go and look for your husband/wife.

Some nursery rhymes describe nature and seasons. One such rhyme 'Pavas pavas ghogeta....' means: It rains and it rains/And the clouds are sweating/Come rain, come in torrents.

An example of nonsensical rhyme is: Lame fellow, lame fellow/Pound the rice. Lame fellow has many children/And for himself keeps the brain.

Lullaby also in a way belongs to nursery rhymes. One such lullaby sung to put the child to sleep goes like this: Swing O child, swing with your bed. Here comes the baker, with sweet bread/But he quotes too high a price. Dear baker, dear baker/Take the bread back/If you are wise.

There are many nursery rhymes which contain witty proverbs and also effective political and bawdy quips.

Some of these also offer entertainment as well as instruction on various topics, e.g., child care and healthy upbringing.

NURSERY RHYMES (Maithili). The nursery rhyme in Maithili has grown out of the spontaneous overflow of maternal love for the child. It is not a creation of learned scholarship. It is rather a genre of folklore and as such of unknown authorship. Maithili is rich in nursery rhyme fit for different occasions and age groups of children. The rhyme for putting a baby to sleep is called 'lori'. The most common theme of 'lori' is to ask a bird to come and bring along with it a gift of sleep for the baby. The semantic aspect of 'lori' is less important than its melody since a baby can hardly comprehend the meaning: it is only sound that matters, putting the child to sleep. When a baby is put in a cradle for rest or sleep, the mother sings the cradle-song while swinging the cradle softly. A cradle song is called 'ghughua git' or 'jhulua git', and the most common rhymes of this type began with 'ghughua mana' 'upage dhana' or 'jhulua jhul' or 'malal jhul.' In the absence of a cradle the baby is swung gently on the feet of the mother. As the mother raises her legs or lowers them down, she sings, 'Nab ghar uthe, puran ghar khase.' A very popular rhyme recited while feeding a baby may run thus in English version:

> Come Moon, come Moon, come here Moon,
> Come with milk and rice, come soon.

In some rhymes the mother gives vent to her feelings regarding her domestic, social and economic life. In others, the mother's concern for her child's welfare is reflected. For example, while massaging her child the mother sings:

> Let your head be stronger than a pail,
> Let your back be harder than rock.

Children of the upper age-group are fond of play-rhymes, which are often nonsensical, such as 'Atkan matkan dahia chatkan' or 'oka boka', etc.

The vast store of nursery rhymes in Maithili is yet to be collected and published. Anima Singh and Loknath Mishra have appended some rhymes to their anthologies of Maithili folksongs. Prafulla Kumar Singh 'Maun' shows a wide awareness of these rhymes as is evident from his occasional papers in periodicals. But a comprehensive edition is yet to come out.

Apart from the 'natural' nursery rhymes, some poets have also written nursery rhymes. The children's monthly, Batuk, edited by Sudhakant Mishra, and Dhiaputa edited by Dhirendra, have published a number of such poems. The children's column in different periodicals is also a good forum for such rhymes. Some songs of the Maithili poet, Rabindranath Thakur, deserve to be ranked with the best nursery rhymes in Maithili.

NURSERY RHYMES (Malayalam). Numerous anonymous Malayalam nursery rhymes have been orally transmitted to us from the hoary past. The first conscious attempt to compose rhymes suitable for children was made most probably by Pandalam Kerala Verma under the influence of Kerala Varma Valia Koil Thampuran who, as chairman of the Text Book Committee (1968-73), wanted to compile graded poetical and other pieces by supplementing extracts from earlier classical poets. Pandalam wrote about two dozen poems which are still among the best of their kind. Then came Kumaran Asan and Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer who also made valuable contributions. The next important well-known poet who wrote specifically for children is S. Sankara Kurup. His Ilam chundukal and Olappippikal are collections of such poems. Vailopilli Sreedhara Menon's Kunnimanikal and Anandakuttan Nair's Cheeta also belong to the same genre. Nursery ganangal (Nursery rhymes) published by the Kerala State Institute of Education contains a number of short, simple graded poems contributed by a group of poets. The Kerala Grandha Sala Sanghom has also published a collection containing nursery poems.

There was a sharp rise in the demand for children's poems and rhymes when the Sahitya Pravartaka Co-operative Society introduced in 1962 their scheme of publishing ten juvenile books every year. Their publications include a large number of poems suited to the varied interests of children.

Among the present generation of poets who have been composing rhymes especially meant for kids, the names of Kunjuni and Evoor Parameswaran deserve special mention. In addition to all this, children's magazines have also started coming out. These contain illustrated nursery rhymes. Cheppad Bhaskaran Nair, Nilamperur Madhusoodanan Nair, etc. are rendering valuable service in this regard.

Though nursery rhymes as a branch of juvenile literature are not very old in Malayalam, their growth during the past few decades is remarkable.

P.N.K.

NURSERY RHYMES (Marathi) have a rich history. Their origin may be traced back to the literature of saint-poets. There is a reference to their existence in 'Mahanubhav' literature too. Chakradhar's Lilacharitra contains the traditional story of the sparrow and the crow, though these poems cannot be called nursery rhymes proper, which are meant for small children and which work on the children's minds with sound and melody rather than with meaning. The tradition had a glorious continuation in the poetry of the saint-poets up to the eighteenth century. The saint-poets also composed cradle-songs and lullabies and introduced something like 'the song of dawn' (Bhupali). The tradition of such Bhupalis was later on enriched by minstrels (shahirs) like Honajibala whose Bhupali is known as 'the immortal Bhupali'.

During the nineteenth century, children's literature came under strong English influence. It affected the form and content of the children's songs as well. The traditional story of Lord Krishna's childhood and the spiritual meaning associated with it slowly disappeared as the repeated theme for nursery rhymes. The traditional songs were replaced by bare nursery rhymes with their new content. Such nursery rhymes seem to have enriched modern Marathi poetry in their own way. The songs composed by the modern Marathi poets liked Balkavi, Tambe and Keshavsut reflect this change. The contribution made by the Rev N.V. Tilak deserves special mention. Being a Christian, Tilak sang songs which had a different content and a new point of view. He had the rare sensibility to establish proper dialogue with children. He is rightly called 'the poet of children and flowers'. Amongst other poets, B.R. Tambe, V.G. Maideo, Sanjivani Marathe and Anant Bhave have composed nursery rhymes and enriched the literature for children in modern Marathi.

In spite of the radical transformation that the Marathi poetry underwent under the leadership of B.S. Mardhekar there was a considerable fascination shown by his successors for children's songs. The songs composed by poets like Sarita Patki and Vinda Karandikar had a considerable impact on the later generation.

NURSERY RHYMES (Rajasthani). The genre has not found much favour with modern Rajasthani writers, though it has been quite popular in folk literature. Ganapati Swami of Pilani did attempt a sort of lullaby in the heroic style and Meghraj 'Mukul' experimented with another style in the modern context. Recently some rhymes have been published by Bhansingh Shekhawat, a budding poet, related to the Children's Literature Publication Trust at Lachhmangarh (Sikar). The rhymes are more or less on the pattern of their counterparts in Hindi. There is a rich tradition of such rhymes in Gujarati, but they have found little acceptance from Rajasthani writers. In folk literature, however, there are plenty of baby songs, meant for breast-sucking children, along with a few verses for the grown-ups. Children recite them on their own while playing. Absence of studies in child psychology and the general indifference to such literature are the main reasons for the slender output of children's literature in the language. The genre of nursery rhymes happens to be the most neglected one in Rajasthani.

R.D.S.

NURSERY RHYMES (Sindhi), when considered part of the oral folk-tradition, are as old as the Sindhi language itself. But they were recorded in writing much later, after the advent of the British rule in Sindh in 1843. Sweet poems for small children were included in the language text-books published by the education department of the British government in Sindh after 1853. At an earlier stage, Udharam Thanwardas Mirchandani (1833-1883), and later on Bherumal Maherchand Advani (1875-1950) composed a good number of nursery rhymes for school text-books. Such melodious lyrics were published in the columns of literary magazines also, the publication of which in Sindhi started during the later half of the last century. However, the first collection of nursery rhymes and small poems for children in Sindhi in a book form seems to be B'arana shaira (Lyrics for children) brought out by Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929), one of the outstanding poets and prose writers in Sindhi. He had also the credit of bringing out a collection of Sindhi riddles for children entitled B'arani ji vindura ya piroliyun (An entertainment for children or riddles) published in 1922. It contains a good many riddles in verse form.

During the third decade of the present century, some of the Sindhi writers and poets paid special attention to the production of juvenile literature in Sindhi. Mellaram Mangatram Vasvani started in 1924 a monthly series of literary books under the title of Sundar sahit maahvaar risalo. During the next year, he started a separate series of monthly books in Sindhi for small children belonging to the age-group of five to ten years. This series, entitled Gula phula (Flowers), contained many nursery rhymes and melodious poems for small children. It was during this decade that Shevak Bhojraj started 'Balakan ji bari' (Children's Guild) in 1925, which in due course of time became a national institute for children in India. Gulistan, a monthly magazine started by Shevak Bhojraj in 1944, catered to the needs of Sindhi children. Kishinchand Tirthdas Khatri (1885-1947), well-known by his pen-name 'Bevas', contributed significantly to this genre. He composed a number of nursery rhymes, melodious and instructive poems for small children, which were published in the above-mentioned magazines. Later on, these poems of 'Bevas' were brought out in a book form, entitled Shirinshairu (Sweet songs, 1929), and Mauji geeta (third edition, 1964).

Following the footsteps of Bevas', many Sindhi poets entered the field to compose small melodious poems for children. After Independence, many collections of such poems appeared in India as well as in Sindh (Pakistan). Some of the significant contributions in this direction are: Latiyun (1958) by Goverdhan Bharati, Bagh-o-bahar (1963) by Parasram 'Zia', B'arana geeta (Songs for children, 1982) by Satramdas Sayal, Mahikandara mukhiryun (Fragrant buds, 1974) by Dayal Asha, Mazedar geeta (Entertaining songs, 1983) by Hari Dilgir and Mithiryun latyun (1984) by Subhash Sharma. Besides, there is a good number of collections of poems, which contain a separate section of nursery rhymes and lyrics for children. In this connection Sangitanjali (An offering of music, 1963), a collection of Hundraj Dukhayal's poems and songs, is worth mentioning.

Hundraj Balwani, a young writer of Ahmedabad, has brought out more than a hundred books in Sindhi meant for small children. He is actively associated with 'Bal Sindhi Circle', an organization for developing the faculties of children in the field of literature, art, drama and games. As regards nursery rhymes, he has brought out an anthology of Sindhi nursery rhymes with Hindi translation. The book entitled Hindi mein Sindhi ke baal geeta (Sindhi nursery lyrics in Hindi) was published in two volumes from Kanpur in 1983-1984. It contains representative Sindhi poems and songs for children.

It may, however, be mentioned that the genre of children's literature in Sindhi has not developed to the extent it should have developed as compared to such literature in other regional languages.

NURSERY RHYMES (Telugu) form an intergral part of children's literature. Children's literature from its ancient past has been of an oral type. More so are the nursery rhymes. In Telugu any written form of children's literature is of recent origin.

Gurajada Appa Rao, the pioneer of modern poetry, may be regarded as the pioneer of children's literature. His anthology of poetry entitled Mutala saralu contains nursery rhymes. The greatest masters of these nursery rhymes are Gidugu Venkata Sitapathi, Chinta Deekshitulu, Venkata Parvateeswara Kavulu, A.V. Subba Rao, Adivi Bapiraju, Kavikondala and Nalam Krishna Rao. At present hundreds of writers like Narla Chiranjeevi, Mullapudi, Illindala Saraswati Devi, B.V. Narasimha Rao, Utpala, Dasarathi, Boyi Bhimanna, Masuna, Ellora, Miriyala Ramakrishna, Velaga Venkatappayya, Nyapathi Raghava Rao and Kameswara Rao are writing nursery rhymes.

Nursery rhymes can be classified into the following varieties on the basis of their content: a) Festival songs; b) Sports songs; c) Mockery songs; d) Riddles. Apart from these, 'Tokku Palukulu' appears to be a chief form of nursery rhymes in Telugu. It is doubtful whether such a form exists in other Indian languages. It lies in the repetition of the end word as the beginning of the next line, which helps in the formation of another new word. This sort of writing helps a lot in learning new words and remembering them. 'Guggilla patalu' of Sri Etukuri Venkata Narasayya are specially significant. Several volumes of nursery rhymes written in Telugu won prizes from the state and central governments. These nursery rhymes provide knowledge besides pleasure.

D.N.S.

NUSRATI (Urdu; d.1683) was born in Bijapur. He was educated and brought up in the traditional style of his times. We do not know much about his boyhood except that he took to writing poetry at a young age. His fame soon reached the court of Ali Adil Shah of Bijapur (1656-73), who invited him to his court and showered favours on him. Nusrati rose to be the most eminent poet of Bijapur. He died there at an advanced age.

Nusrati wrote three masnavis (romances): (1) Gulshan-i-ishq (Garden of love) was composed in 1657 and contains 8000 lines. It describes the love of Kunwar Manohar and Madhumalati. (2) Ali nama, another masnavi, was composed some years later. It recounts, in verse, the happenings in the reign of his royal patron. The poem, considered superior to any other poem produced in Bijapur, is interspersed with 'qasidas'. These qasidas are different from those written in north India, inasmuch as they contain more description and are less panegyric. The poem also differs in its style from the other poems of Nusrati. It established his mastery over different styles of language. (3) Miraj nama: It contains more Dakhni words and expressions than the other two masnavis mentioned above and is therefore more difficult to understand.

Nusrati has also left a collection of qasidas and one of ghazals (lyrics) entitled Guldasta-i-ishq (Bouquet of love). These collections bear testimony to Nusrati's power of imagination, variety of subjects and his mastery over the poetic idiom. He is also said to have composed humorous poetry occasionally. His fame, however, rests on Ali nama which is considered to be his best work.

'NUTAN', DESHBANDHU DOGRA (Dogri; b. 1939) was born at Ramnagar and grew up in the picturesque surroundings and secular atmosphere of that town. Quite early in life he developed a broad outlook and observed with sensitivity the unrelenting poverty and exploitation in a section of society, particularly the downtrodden, and he experienced stirrings of revolt within himself. He saw in the crumbling feudal structure of Dogra society the haves with their callousness and avarice lined up against the have-nots paralysed into inaction. In 1948, he met Deenubhai Pant and was influenced by him. He started writing in Dogri in 1957, but being involved in political activites he could not get his work published. During this period, he wrote an epic on the Kashmiri poetess, Habba Khatoon, and some poems and short stories.

The partition of the country in 1947 and the subsequent socio-political aftermath touched him to the core. The sufferings of the refugees and the breakdown of law and order which created social tensions disturbed him.

This suffering and the outbursts of religious fanaticism coupled with economic exploitation influenced his thinking, which in turn shaped the characters of his fiction.

Qaidi (1980) is his first published novel, and it can easily be called an important work in Dogri. It is a realistic epic of the Pahari region of Jammu. Written in 1972 in jail, its central character, Bhagan, conveys a message of revolt against the forces of exploitation. The book earned the Sahitya Akademi award for 1982, but the author declined the award as a protest against the Akademi's policy of selecting books for awards. Pyoke bhejo is his second novel which reveals some unexposed aspects of the life of the Pahari people, their social practices and customs, their difficulties and weaknesses. It shows not only a society caught in the shackles of tradition, but also the very foibles and animal instincts of men and women that go to make that society. The novel is a fitting comment on the culture of the rural Duggar people. Nutan's writing is characterised by his mastery of the language, use of appropriate folk words, and close observation of life. The radical views of the writer have earned him the accusation of being an extremist which landed him in jail. He has been commissioned by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages to write a comprehensive critical history of Dogri literature.

NYAYA (Sanskrit) stands for 'logic' in Sanskrit and is known as one of the six orthodox philosophical systems. Its unique contribution to Indian thought is its total emphasis on reasoning. Panini derives the word 'nyaya' from the root 'i' which, like the root 'gam', means 'to go'. Therefore, the word 'nyaya' signifying 'logic' or 'reasoning' seems to be etymologically identical with the word 'nigama', i.e. the conclusion of a syllogism, as, in Sanskrit, the connotation of 'logic' is not conveyed by the word 'nyaya' alone. However, as a distinct school of Philosophy, Nyaya has incorporated various elements in the different stages of its development.

Its founder is known as Gotama (Gautama) or Akshapada, which literally means eye-footed, i.e. one with eyes directed at the feet. Gotama composed his celebrated Nyayasutra around 150 B.C.—a work accepted as the fundamental text-book of the system. This system treats formal logic in the most exhaustive manner. In the opening sentence of Nyayasutra sixteen logical ideas have been enumerated with the observation that by acquiring true knowledge of their nature, one can attain final emancipation, i.e. the release of the soul from the cycle of births. These sixteen logical ideas are (a) Pramana (b) Prameya (c) Samshaya (d) Prayojana (e) Drishtanta (f) Siddhanta (g) Avayaba (h) Tarka (i) Nirnaya (j) Vada (k) Jalpa (l) Vitanda (m) Hetvabhasa (n) Chhala (o) Jati (p) Nigrahasthana.

According to Nyaya, the aforesaid Prameya has twelve sub-categories, viz., Atma (ii) Sarira (iii) Indriya (iv) Artha (v) Buddhi (vi) Mana (vii) Pravritti (viii) Dosha (ix) Pretyabhava (x) Phala (xi) Duhkha (xii) Apavarga.

The Nyaya system emerged partially as a science of philosophical debate, and since it specialized in the theory of arguments, it enjoyed immense popularity. As the terminology of Nyaya thoroughly influenced the modes of expression of other philosophical schools, their text-books bear the unmistakable stamps of the Nyaya jargon. Though the art of debate seems to have stemmed from Nyaya, the unique methodology of moving towards a philosophical position through confrontation of thesis with its anti-thesis arose from a fairly long scientific tradition prevalent in ancient India. On the one hand, we find traces of the ancient practice of theoretical debate in the Upanisads, called 'Vakovakya', which might be compared with the Greek practice of dialectics, while on the other hand, there are evidences of debates or logical disputes prevalent among the ancient medical practitioners envisaged in the bulky Charaka Samhita (about first century A.D).

Modern scholars are, however, reluctant to treat the Nyaya system as limited to logic and dialectics only; they draw our attention to the fact that the school in its present form is a complete philosophical system. Its claims to supremacy in the expositions of the theories of philosophical debates, however, did not remain unchallenged for long. The Buddhists developed logic in their own way and reached heights of perfection in no time. Nevertheless, in the history of Indian philosophy, the Nyaya system has other areas of prominence as well. Its theoreticians have dealt excellently with various aspects of language, meaning, and the meaningfulness of words and sentences, thus exhibiting subtlety in explaining syntax, semantics and pragmatics. Further, Nyaya defines the empirical theory of validity and truth and opposes uncritical use of intuition and authoritarian appeals to revelation.

Before we trace the gradual development of the Nyaya school we may have a glimpse of its proto-history. We have already spoken of its probable origin in the proto-logic of the Upanishadic 'Vakovakya' and the dialectics of the ancient medical treatise. Oberhammer, a prominent western scholar, traces the origin of the system in an ancient tradition called 'Vada', which furnished one with an appropriate theory of arguing and winning a discussion. He also thinks that the tradition might have existed independent of the famous theory of self and perfect wisdom in the pre-Vatsyayana phase. But Vatsyayana's unique genius brought about a sort of metamorphosis in the philosophical set-up. He contributed substantially to the development of the Nyaya school by being able to cause a synthesis of disparate elements. In this connection, we should also take note of Vatsyayana's efforts to identify 'the science of argument' or 'nyayavidya' with an ancient science called 'Anvikshiki'. This term seems to have initially meant 'investigation', though elsewhere in Sanskrit literature it carries the definitive specialized meaning of 'the study of the Vedas'. While some scholars suspect that the term does not have any reference to philosophical process and only means 'science of proper argumentation', others are of the opinion that probably it stands for an earlier form of Nyaya-Vaisheshika school, or may have referred to a form of early Samkhya.

Though the systems of Nyaya and Vaisheshika have evolved independently, Indian tradition quite often mentions them together. They borrowed a great deal from each other and there is rightly some speculation about a possible syncretism between them as they agree on most of the fundamental questions and oppose other philosophical systems on those scores. Saptapadarthi of Shivaditya may be regarded as the first work on Nyaya-Vaisheshika syncretism. The later treatise like Tarkikaraksha and Tarkabhasha may also be described as syncretic works. While Nyaya specialised in epistemology and methodology, Vaisheshika excelled in metaphysics, and both the systems considered each other mutually supportive.

According to the Indian tradition, the exponents of Nyaya are worshippers of Shiva, while the Vaisheshikas are Pashupatas. It seems therefore that both these schools had practically the same religious affiliation. The question as to why the Nyaya-Vaisheshika schools went through a process of metamorphosis to become completely monotheistic by the time of Prashastapada has always vexed the scholars. They argue that Gotama's professed piety for the Veda is only a technique of evading the censorship of law-givers. In the conditions in which he lived, there was a tremendous resistance of Vedic orthodoxy against the sciences; hence the exponents of Indian atomism and logic found it comparatively safe to advance their own ideas only under the protective care of an apparent veneration for the Veda and the demands of Brahmanical orthodoxy.

One may now retrace the historical perspective of the development of Nyaya as a distinct philosophical system. It is stretched over a vast period of time commencing from the composition of the Nyayasutra (fourth century B.C.) to the present century. This history is arranged into two main phases—Prachina Nyaya (Old Nyaya) and Navya Nyaya (New Nyaya). The earlier phase constitutes the contributions of Vatsyayana or Pakshilasvamin (c. A.D. 450) who composed the first extant and also the most important commentary on Nyayasutra. Udayana (10th century A.D.) is regarded as the last great exponent of the older stratum of the Nyaya systems; he attempted to furnish proofs in support of the existence of God. The Navya Nyaya originated in Bengal; Gangesha Upadhyaya (14th century) is universally accepted as the greatest exponent of the new stratum in which objective foundations of the relations between 'sadhya' (the item to be proved) and 'hetu' (the ground submitted) have been keenly analysed with a view to rendering the coveted proof.

There is much controversy regarding the number of aphorisms as well as the text of Nyayasutra, which is rather unusual for any school of Indian philosophy. Vachaspati Mishra wrote his Nyayasuchinibandha in order to dispel those anomalies conclusively. But, in spite of his attempt, firm decision seems to have eluded the scholars. That is why, even after a few centuries, two other works have come into existence centring round the same problem, viz., Nyaya sutravritti, written separately by Vishvanatha Nyayapanchanana and Radhamohan Goswami. Thus the extant text gives us 538 aphorisms while there are four other different conclusions in the following manner: Nyayasuchinibandha gives 528, Nyayasutroddhara 531, Nyayavarttika 533, and Vrittikara 525. Each of the five chapters of Nyayasutra has two 'ahnikas'.

Modern scholarship has been able to trace 82 titles of schools of which only 51 are available. For this purpose A.D. 1350, the probable time of Gangesha, has been accepted as a sort of cut-off-year. Vatsyayana (5th c) tops the list since his Nyaya-bhashya, i.e. the commentary on Gotama's collection of aphorisms, has laid the foundation of numerous sub-commentaries that came up in the succeeding centuries.

Vasubandhu, most probably a contemporary of Vatsyayana, initiated the sub-stratum of Buddhist logic. It was further developed by Dignaga (c. A.D. 480-540) and Dharmakirti (c. A.D. 600-660). In fact, Dignaga was the founder of the 'Vijnanavada' school of the logical tradition, which is one of the main subdivisions of the consciousness affirming Yogachara or Vijnanavada school of Mahayana Buddhism. Dharmakirti, author of Nyayabindu, was the most noteworthy successor of Dignaga who elaborated the theories of his predecessor. Both of them had tremendous influence on the course of later philosophical works, one of which is the Nyayapravesha of Shankaraswamin. Among the later philosophers the following deserve special mention: Shantarakshita, Kamalashila, Ratnakirti, Jnanashrimitra. Here we may note that many texts, though lost in the original language, have been fortunately preserved in the Tibetan or Chinese translations.

Uddyotakara, probably a contemporary of Prashastapada (c. 6th century A.D), composed his Nyayavarttika as a commentary on the Nyayabhashya. This is the oldest available treatise on Vatsyayana's work. Uddyotakara has tried to refute Dignaga's views with consummate skill. Thereafter we come across Nyayamanjari of Jayanta Bhatta (9th century A.D.) in the three intervening centuries. The solid base of Buddhist world-view seems to have considerably eroded while Brahmanism gained strength. Bhasarvajna (860-920), an inhabitant of Kashmir, is the next prominent explorer of this system. He composed Nyayasara and also its famous commentary called Nyayabhushana. The latter exerted undoubtable influence on several authors because of its originality and unique merit. During the tenth and eleventh centuries the conflict between Nyaya and Buddhism reached its culminating point. This was the period when Vachaspati Mishra wrote Nyayavarttika Tatparyatika, a commentary on Uddyotakara's work. Udayana, the great genius of the eleventh century, composed Parishuddhi, a commentary on Vachaspati's treatise. He also wrote Lakshanavali, Lakshanamala, Nyayaparishishta, Atmatattvaviveka and lastly his magnum opus, Nyayakusumanjali.

Between Udayana and the advent of Gangesha, the following deserve mention: Shrivallabha's Nyayalilayati, Bhatta Vadindra's Mahavidyayidambana, Manikantha Mishra's Nyayaratna and Shashadhara's Nyayasiddhantadipa. Gangesha Upadhyaya and Pakshadhara Mishra, Raghunatha Shiromani are the great stalwarts of Navya Nyaya.

NYAYARATNA RAMGATI (Bengali; b. 1831, d. 1994), educationist and litterateur, studied at the Sanskrit College of Calcutta and joined the Education Department of the Government of Bengal. He retired as Headmaster of the Hoogly Normal School in 1891. Ramgati earned the distinction of being the first historian of Bengali literature, with his masterly Bangla bhasha o bangla sahitya bishayak prastab in two parts. Besides writing useful text books on history and natural sciences, Ramgati proved his mettle also as a creative writer of plays and novels.

His other important works are Ramabati (Calcutta, 1862); Ramabati natak (Calcutta, 1869); Bharatbarsher samasta itihas (Calcutta, 1879); Ramcharita (Calcutta, 1882); Bastubichar (1884).

ODRUSHTACHE KOLLE (Konkani) is a collection of poems by Pandurang Bhangui, a major poet. These poems have the unmistakable stamp of his personality. He is a poet of solitude. For him poetry is not action but introspection. With his eye turned inwards, he reveals through his poems a wealth of inner experience which can hardly be seized but dimly felt. Translation of Bhangui's poetry is difficult since it captures both a symbol and a mood. Many of his images are complex and his ryhthm varied. Some of his images, however, are strikingly suggestive and richly sensuous: 'the sea-like eyes become wind-swollen sails bouncing towards a distant land'; 'Paths don't move, I am condemned to roam, this broken cross is a witness to my swollen feet.' At times a telling thought compels the reader to ponder over man's fate: 'Each one of us has to carry his own cross and suffer death in silence and if possible to be born again'. An assiduous reader of Portuguese poetry, Bhangui gives this quotation from Fernande Pessoa: 'I was a poet animated by philosophy, not a philosopher with poetic faculties'. Like Fernande Pessoa, Bhangui is a poet animated by philosophy, expressing in quivering words the poetic soul of the universe in the poems of this collection which are appropriately called 'flowers of fate.'

OJHA, GAURISHANKAR HIRACHAND (Hindi; b. 1863, d. 1947) was born at Roheda village in Sirohi (Rajasthan) and studied history, archaeology and graphology in Bombay. He was recognized as a first rate researcher after his pioneering work on Ancient Indian Scripts in 1898.

He was honoured with titles like Raibahadur and Mahamahopadhyaya and awarded the Manglaprasad Paritoshik on his enlarged edition of Prachin lipimala by Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. A commemorative volume, Bharatiya anushilan, was presented to him in 1933. The degrees of Vachaspati, Sahitya Vachaspati, and D. Litt (Honoris causa) by the Banaras Hindu University were also conferred on him.

He wrote on the authenticity of Prithviraj raso, and his studies of ancient Indian scripts and the history of Rajasthan are important works.

His other important works include Solankiyon ka prachin itihas (1907); Rajputana ka itihas (1923); Prithviraj-vijay.

OKHANA (Rajasthani) is the corrupt form of the Sanskrit word 'Upakhyan', meaning an episode or a subordinate story. It is generally accompanied by a proverb or a saying which gains currency in course of time. Rajasthani, as a living language of millions of people, is a rich storehouse of such sayings, backed by anecdotes, factual or imaginary. K.L. Sahal, while classifying the proverbs, has discussed them at length. Manohar Sharma too has published a good number of these episodes, supported by proverbs still in use amongst the people. Earlier, Sahal had also published two books on historical and cultural episodes, but all the episodes treated were not based on proverbs. It is not possible to record here 'upakhyans' from all the fields, but some interesting episodes which have a literary flavour may be mentioned. A poet once visited Maharana Bhim Singh of Mewar, and when he was asked to recite a poem he uttered a couplet: "O Bhim Singh, you are just a big stone of the mountainside, but I keep you close to my heart and adore you as Lord Shankar". Another event relates to Hingalajdan Kaviya, the last great poet of the old order. Somebody told him that the work Karuna bahottari by Ramnath Kaviya was so full of pathos that it was impossible to talk of another sentiment (Rasa) in it. Hingalajdan took it as a challenge and composed a heroic couplet which fitted the context, and put it in the mouth of Draupadi who remarked sarcastically, "Had my mother-in-law (Kunti) given birth to a single son from my father-in-law (Pandu), the occasion would have been marked not by making me naked in the assembly but by the twitching of moustaches (i.e. by show of valour)." The succinctness of the proverb adds to the charm of an Okhana.

OLI SANZ (Konkani) is a collection of seventeen short stories by Sheela Naik. Konkani has very few women writers today and Sheela is certainly one of the most prominent. The collection is marked by a distinct variety of themes, treatment, and a flair for the dream world. Most of the short stories depict characters engrossed in fantasy, daydreaming and peculiar flights of poetic imagination. The author's preoccupation with dreams is evident even in stories avowedly delineating realism. The title story 'Oli Sanz' (Moist evening) is a shining example. The author has great skill for creating moods. Poetic atmosphere and romanticism permeate the stories like 'Ghai' (Wound), 'Khell' (Game), 'Ashich ek dupar' (A strange afternoon), 'Satar' (Sitar), 'Mog (Love), Varyavelem sapan' (Dream in the winds). Pathos invariably accompanies these dreamings in most of the pieces. In addition to stories mentioned above, 'Srap' (Curse), 'Bhabi' (Sister in law), 'Kodvem sukh' (Bitter happiness) and, Maggie, may be cited as examples. Some stories, though unusually short, exhibit potential depths. The author's ability to give universality to her themes is amazing. 'Vidyechan tar' (Swear by knowledge) and 'Baby' illustrate this point. Sheela's characterisation is effective. Some characters like Prasad Kankonkar from 'Vidyechan tar' and 'Baby' in the story of that name are striking instances. It appears that quite often the author's creative process gives more prominence to sentiments and emotions than to intellect. The treatment is usually on a philosophical plane. And occasionally, as in 'Vidyechan tar', 'Maggie', Baby', etc., the author suggests that she is capable of weaving stories without taking recourse to flights of imagination or dreamings. Sometimes, the fantasy itself has a realistic basis. This gives the stories a touch of authenticity. Some stories are characterised by effective twisting turns at the end as in 'Satar', 'Bhar' (possessed), 'Baby', 'Mog', 'Bhabi' and 'Varyavelem sapan'. Sheela's language, however, betrays her grounding mainly in Hindi and Marathi literatures and often shows want of local flavour.

OMCHERRY (Malayalam; b. 1924). N. Narayana Pillai, popularly known as Omcherry because he belonged to a family of that name, was born in Vaikom. After his primary schooling, he joined the Advaita Ashram at Kalady, the birthplace of Adi Shankara, at the age of 16 with a view to learning Sanskrit and practising religious activities. But he left the Ashram of his own accord after two or three years. While taking the B.A. and later the B.L. degree courses, he had to eke out his livelihood by working as a private tutor and also as a correspondent of a leading Malayalam daily. He joined the All India Radio as an announcer and was afterwards shifted to the Publications Division in New Delhi as editor. Deputed to teach Malayalam to students in the U.S.A. he lived there for a couple of years. It was at that time that he took his M.S. degree with specialisation in Mass Communication. Now he is a professor of that subject at the Institute of Mass Communication, New Delhi.

Omcherry is not a prolific writer. There are only three plays and a collection of one-act plays to his credit. The poignant dialogue in his plays, the poetic nature of his expressions and the humanistic ideals he advocates are all notable. There is also a sense of humour even as he depicts the harsh realities of life. Of his plays, Pralayam (Deluge) won him an award. Tevarude ana (The deity's elephant) has been widely staged in Kerala. The third one, Itu nammude nadanu (This is our land), is an earlier work written under the influence of G.B. Shaw. 'Oppatinoppam', one of the five one-act plays in the collection of that name, has also been extremely successful on the stage owing to its broad humour and brilliant touches of sarcasm and irony.

The values upheld by the middle class are mocked at in most of Omcherry's plays. Nowhere given to sentimentalism, he knows how to depict emotion realistically.

OMMEN KOSHY, ARCHDEACON (Malayalam; b. 1825, d. 1899), whose name is mentioned in the context of missionary influence on Malayalam, was the author of such works as Pulleli Kunchu, Kannittaupadesham and Paradeshi mokshavatra. He was one of the foreign Christ-an missionaries who came to Kerala and learnt Malayalam for the purpose of spreading religious ideas among the local people. As part of his work, he published in a periodical a series of articles which were later collected together and brought out under the title Pulleli Kunchu (1882), the so-called first novel in Malayalam. It presents a realistic picture of the way in which the missionaries propagated their religion through arguments, but lacks the characteristics of the novel as a literary genre. Hence it is better to call it a religious tract. However, it presents some well delineated characters.

Ommen Koshy's religious works have not taken roots in the popular mind because, as T.M. Chummar observes in his Bhasha gadya charitram, they were written with a view to refuting the doctrines of other religions or sects. Nevertheless, we can see in them some specimens of good Malayalam prose.

His Paradeshi moksha yatra is a Malayalam translation of John Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress.

ON THE MOTHER (English). Coming in the best traditions of Indian biographical literature in English, On the Mother sets out to retell the eventful life and spiritual ministry of Mirra Alfassa, popularly known as the Mother of Sri Aurobindo Ashram at Pondicherry. As Iyengar admits in his illuminative preface, the telling could not be easy. There were the available facts, but the Mother herself said: "Do not ask questions about the details of the material existence of this body; they are in themselves of no interest and must not attract attention." Hence, throughout the biography, Iyengar does not surrender "to an obsessive interest in the outer details" lest he should divert the reader's attention from "the all-important inner history, the unfolding of the Divine Manifestation and the saga of the Divine Ministry". All the same, it is a fully documented study in depth of a magnetic presence who gave a visual form to the sadhana of integral yoga posited by Sri Aurobindo. The book was selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1980.

The biography is in three parts. The first part deals with the steady progression of Mirra's spiritual life from childhood to the time when she came face to face with Sri Aurobindo. Born of affluent parents in Paris on 21 February 1878, she was a rather serious child and began seeing an aura around her head when she was hardly five; the illumination remained with her all through her life. As a student she was good at studies, purposeful, and a born leader. She took part in sports and learnt painting. In her thirteenth year she had a persistent dream in which sorrowing and sick people came to her and obtained instant relief by merely touching a golden robe that spread out from her. She married Henri Morisset the painter, and they had a son, Andre. Domesticity and spiritual life went together. She learnt occultism from Max Theon, read the Gita and Swami Vivekananda's Raja Yoga, and held spiritual discussions.

Separated from M. Morisset, in 1910 Mirra married Paul Richard who was widely read in the philosophical and religious literature of the East and the West. The Richards came to Pondicherry in 1914 and met Sri Aurobindo on 29 March. In the words of Iyengar:

"They were received at the end of the stairs that led up to the upstairs veranda, and after greetings they sat down before Sri Aurobindo. The moment Mirra had so ardently looked forward to had arrived at last, and there was a blaze of instantaneous recognition. Sri Aurobindo was clearly the Master of her occult life, the 'Krishna' she had met so often in her dream-experiences, and of whom she had made an impressionistic painting psychically alive. And Sri Aurobindo too recognised in her at the first flash the radiant emanation of the Mother he had divined since his Baroda days."

On Mirra's part it was a total self-surrender and the fruition of long years of seeking. She recorded in her diary on 30 March:

> Little by little the horizon becomes precise, the path becomes clear, and we advance to an even greater certitude.
> It matters not if there are hundreds of beings plunged in the densest ignorance. He whom we saw yesterday is on earth: His presence is enough to prove that a day will come when darkness shall be transformed into light, when Thy reign shall be indeed established upon earth.

The Richards and Sri Aurobindo launched the magazines, Arya and Revue, which projected the evolutionary philosophy of Sri Aurobindo. The exigencies of war forced Mirra to spend a few years in Japan. Iyengar fondly dwells on Mirra's Japanese experience which was to have a direct impact on her emphasis on orderliness, politeness and flower arrangements in the Ashram later managed by her at Pondicherry. In Japan, she interested herself in Zen and the Still-Sitting Movement of Dr. Okhata.

Mirra returned to Pondicherry in 1920 and stayed there till her passing away. By deftly interweaving passages from her Prayer and Meditation, speeches, conversations and dramatic writing with the facts of her outer life, Prof. Iyengar successfully prepares us for the Second Part where Mirra is seen as the endearing Mother of the Ashram. When Mirra decided to become a permanent resident of Pondicherry and a disciple of Sri Aurobindo, there were already a handful of young sadhaks with him. On 24 November 1926, Sri Aurobindo experienced the 'Descent of Krishna' and withdrew into seclusion. While Sri Aurobindo continued with his yoga sadhana and literay work, Mirra organised the growing community. She selected the sadhaks who came from all over India and even from abroad, allocated work to them, acted as conduit between them and their guru, Sri Aurobindo. Karma Yoga was in action in the Workshop, Bakery, Dining room and other services. At the same time there was a concerted attempt to overcome egoistic and materialistic desires. The early years were financially insecure, but the Mother's attention to detail overcame all obstacles. Group interaction in activities like the 'Soup Ceremony' and flower games brought the Ashramites together all the time, raised the level of their consciousness and released the best in them as builders, poets, farmhands and teachers. The Mother's conversations had always a purposive thrust and were tuned to the appropriate situations. And always the accent was on the need to shed fear and surrender to the Divine.

The Second World War brought problems. The Mother and Sri Aurobindo favoured the Allied Cause. The chapter titled 'The Mother's War' traces the correlation between the war years and the Mother on the occult plane. Her prayers were answered and the Asura was defeated. With the independence of India, new problems arose. The Mother would not accept the Partition and on 5 August 1947 she hoisted her own flag—the Spiritual Flag of India—that showed India, Pakistan, Burma and Ceylon together with her symbol. Sri Aurobindo's passing away on 5 December 1950 was a terrible jolt to the Ashramites but the Mother was "an incarnation of divine strength, poise and calm" and gave unfailing direction to everyone and applied herself to the tasks on hand.

Aptly titled 'Aditi', the Third Part of On the Mother is about the vast expansion of the Ashram under the Mother's guidance. Industries were established and an International University Centre was inaugurated along with revolutionary concepts in innovative education like the Free Progress. An international city of Dawn—Auroville—was launched in 1968. And all the time she experimented at the spiritual level as well in order to usher in the glorified human body. This meant a lot of inner pressure and suffering. However, on 8 November 1972 she did experience the supramental consciousness for a brief while that signified "an utmost activity in complete peace.. like the harmonisation of contraries". The Mother also directed the Sri Aurobindo Birth Centenary Celebrations in 1972. She passed away on 17 November 1973.

In this "plausible, convincing and highly moving" biography of a saintly personality, there is a corporate identity of excellence because Iyengar is also the biographer of Sri Aurobindo and has been associated with the Ashram for more than forty years. His constructive skill makes the work pleasing to the common reader while provoking the thought-processes of the student of philosophy and mysticism. The two volumes certainly leave a profound impression of 'Grace Abiding'. To conclude in the words of Iyengar:

> She had spent her whole life spread over ninety-five years visibly exemplifying these golden words, revealing in her speech of massed illumination and in her tens of thousands of still gratefully remembered acts the infinite comprehension and limitless compassion of the Divine, manifesting in every circumstance of her life the purity and power of the Mother Divine, essaying with sleepless vigilance her glorious ministry of love, and always and with inexhaustible patience coaxing her errant children to rise to her own level of puissance and perfection. The Mother was a Person, a Power, a Presence, an Experience.

ONE-ACT PLAY (Hindi), is a distinct genre which emerged in Hindi as a result of the impact of western literature. In ancient Indian drama we did have short plays, such as 'Bhan', 'Prahasan' and 'Vithi', which had some resemblance to one-act play, but structurally, as we understand the term today, this genre has grown out of the Little Theatre Movement of the West in the 19th and 20th centuries and the use of curtain-raisers enacted before the beginning of the main play on the stage. In London in 1903 the performance of W.W. Jacob's The Monkey's Paw as a curtain raiser charmed the spectators so much that they left the theatre without sitting any longer for the main play. This proved the effectiveness of the genre which gained more and more of strength from a number of competent playwrights. And soon it caught the attention of the Hindi writers.

The one-act plays of the Bharatendu Age, rooted in the traditions of Sanskrit drama, differ substantially from those of the modern times written under the western influence. The former are primarily based on the theory of 'Rasa', while the latter are largely concerned with the treatment of some problem or conflict. The Hindi one-act play kept itself free from sentimentalism and idealized portraiture and adopted a realistic and intellectual attitude. In form, it is a play of one act, but in organisation it has either one scene or a series of a scenes. The action moves fast towards denouement, and it observes the law of three unities. The one-act plays of Bhuvaneshwar and Ramkumar Varma, and Jayashankar Prasad's 'Ek ghunt', may be cited as examples.

During the Bharatendu Age, Bharatendu himself wrote a one-act play, 'Vediki hinsa hinsa na bhavati', keeping in mind the norms of both Sanskrit and western plays. Balakrishna Bhatta, Pratapnaraian Mishra, and Radhacharan Goswami were the other writers who practised the form. The next stage came with the latter phase of the Indian Renaissance when Jayashankar Prasad wrote his 'Ek ghunt' which was a sharp departure from the one-act plays of the Bharatendu Age. In structure and form, in stage directions, and in thematic analysis, it is a new experiment. But it is Ramkumar Varma who can be said to be the father of the modern Hindi one-act play. One can trace on him the influence of such western playwrights as Shaw, Maeterlinck and Synge. His 'Badal ki mrityu' is a symbolic one-act play, but he wrote such realistic one-act plays also as 'Champak', 'Das minute', 'Nahin ka rahasya', 'Prithviraj ki ankhen'. In fact, he widened the range and scope of the Hindi one-act plays by exploiting mythological, historical and realistic subjects. His other famous pieces are 'Reshami tie', 'Taimur ki har', 'Shivaji', 'Durgawati', 'Rajrani Sita', and 'Bharat ka bhagya'.

Another famous one-act playwright is Bhuvaneshwar who wrote in a new style. His 'Shyama—ek vaivahik vidambana', 'Pratibha ka vivah', 'Shaitan', 'Ek samyahin samyavadi', and 'Lottery' are plays of inner conflict, and show the influence of Shaw, D.H. Lawrence and Freud. His other plays 'Ham akale nahin', 'Strike', 'Sava ath baje' and 'Usar' exhibit revolutionary fervour. He has also written such symbolic plays as 'Roshani ki aag', 'Kathaputaliyan', and 'Tambe ke keede'.

Ganeshprasad Dwivedi and Seth Govind Das were other practitioners of one-act play, but are not outstanding masters of the form. Another writer, Udaishankar Bhatt, emerged on the scene with such one-act plays as 'Asahayog and Swaraj' and 'Chittaranjan Das', and then tried his hand at socio-political issues in a comical-satirical vein. His 'Ek hi kabra mein', 'Neta', Kar nirvachan', 'Seth Lalchand', 'Stri ka hridaya', 'Nakali aur asali', 'Bade adami' ki mrityu', 'Adim yug', 'Pratham vivah', and 'Visha ki pudiya' are powerful plays both thematically and structurally. The other remarkable plays by him are 'Girati diwaren', 'Pishachon ke nach', and 'Bimar ka ilaj'—all artistically satisfying.

In the artistic development of the Hindi one-act plays, mention must be made of several important playwrights, such as Upendranath 'Ashk', Jagdishchandra Mathur, Vishnu Prabhakar, and Laxminarayan Mishra. Ashk is a master of comical-satirical modes. The anthologies of his one-act plays are 'Devaton ki chhaya mein' (1940), 'Charwahe' (1947), and 'Toofan'. He is a skilled craftsman and has a remarkable power of analysis, coupled with a sense of fine irony. Jagdishchandra Mathur treats socio-economic issues with imaginative finesse. His one-act plays like 'Ridhha ki haddi', 'Makadi ka jal', 'Khandahar', 'Ghonsale', 'Khidki ki rah', 'Kabutar khana', 'O mere sapane', and 'Bhor ka tara' are memorable contributions to the genre. Then we have Vishnu Prabhakar who has a firm grasp of life, and reveals it in many forms in his socio-nationalistic plays, such as 'Man bap', 'Sanskar aur bhavana', 'Raktachandan', 'Desh-raksha ke liye'. And for sheer power of intellect we may go to Laxminarayan Mishra's 'Pralaya ke pankh par', 'Med tod do', 'Ashokvan', and Bhagwan Manu tatha anya ekanki.

Amongst other leading one-act playwrights, we have S.P. Khatri, S.S. Avasthi, Bhagwaticharan Varma, Ugra, Vrindavanlal Varma, Yashpal, Harikrishna 'Premi', Vinod Rastogi, Satyendra Sharat, Chiranjit, and Rewatisharan Sharma. They have dealt with both social and political issues, though they have not contributed much to the growth of the genre, structurally speaking. Nevertheless, they have led to the development of the one-act play through such mediums as the People's Theatre, the All India Radio and the television. Till 1970 we find a spate of activity and experiment in the field of Hindi one-act play, thereafter there seems to have been some sort of a deadlock.

OPERA (Bengali) is a dramatic performance of which music is an essential part. Besides music, spectacle, acting and recitation form parts of an opera. In some operas there is a continuous flow of music. In some others there is a combination of music and recitation. The musical numbers may be set in the frame-work of a spoken dialogue.

There are several types of opera such as the Grand Opera, Light Opera and Opera Comic. Opera Comic, also called Opera Buffa, originated in Italy in the eighteenth century. Though at first it was connected with the main plot, it gradually developed as an independent play. This Opera Comic was carried to France and under its influence the French Opera Comic came into existence. Another kind of opera called Ballad Opera was added to the musical stage with the production of Gay's The Beggar's Opera. It is a play of popular and topical character with spoken dialogue and songs set to the existing tunes. The second half of the nineteenth century was dominated by a great composer named Wagner. Wagner gave the name Music Drama to his creation. While music was the most important element in the traditional opera, Wagner, however, laid more stress on the dramatic element of his composition. In his opinion drama was the main thing and vocal and instrumental music only contributed to the development of the drama.

Bengali operas were written and produced under the influence of the various types of the western opera. There was a kind of musical play in medieval Bengal called 'natagita' or 'gitanata' which developed into the predominantly musical 'jatra' play, which also came to be called opera. Grand operas and comic operas were introduced in Calcutta through the English theatres. There was a theatre house in Calcutta named the Opera House where opera performances were often held by companies coming from Europe.

The Bengalies were very fond of songs and opera plays and being inspired by the western operas they wrote opera-like plays for performance on the stage. The Bengali opera or musical play was, like its western counterpart, a song-based play but its structure and method of presentation were different from those of the western opera. In the Bengali opera-like plays songs are often accompanied with dances but the dialogue is equally important. Bengali opera plays are more akin to Opera Comic or Opera Buffa, where musical and comic elements are intermingled. Even sad and serious things are presented in a comic vein as in Kshirodprasad Vidyabinode's Alibaba. Musical plays were performed usually on festive occasions, such as the Pujas and the Christian festivals. The stories of many popular operas can be traced to the Arabian Nights and other exotic tales.

It goes to the credit of Ramtaran Sanyal, a contemporary of Girischandra Ghosh to have introduced plays like Grand Opera and Opera Comic in Bengali. It was with his assistance that Girischandra's musical plays were successful on the stage. Nagendranath Banerjee's musical play, Sati ki kalankini or Kalanka-bhanjan, was immensely popular on the stage. Atulkrishna Mitra's Siri Farhad and Tufani delighted the audience with their scintillating comic songs. Kshirodprasad's Alibaba was a phenomenal success on the stage with its exotic songs, witty dialogue and mock-pathetic sentiments. It was indeed a comic opera par excellence. The spectacle of colourful dances with lilting music and dazzling light in the production of Kinnari was an unforgettable experience.

Rabindranath's musical plays are comparable to the western form of the opera. The whole play is set to music and there is no prose or verse dialogue apart from music. His Mayar khela is predominantly musical and can be called a pure opera. But there is a preponderance of dramatic qualities in Valmiki pratibha and this play should be called a music drama. Here the words and tunes of songs have been used to heighten the dramatic situations and develop the action of the play towards its logical and inevitable conclusion.

In the nineteenth century the old traditonal jatra was transformed into a new type of folk-play named 'gitabhinay' which was also called opera. Gitabhinay was a compromise between the jatra and the theatre. It was mainly song-based like a jatra but it had a more cohesive plot-structure like that of a regular stage play. Manomohan Basu, Brajamohan Roy, Motilal Roy and Rajkrishna Roy made significant contribution towards the development of gitabhinay. Later on, jatra was still regarded as a form of opera and jatra parties were still called opera parties. The name opera is still retained in many cases by the jatra performers though songs are going more and more out of use in the modern jatras.

OPERA (Hindi). The opera in Hindi in its present form owes its revival to the influence of the West. In the past folk theatre did exist and develop alongside Sanskrit drama. Opera in the form of folk theatre still exists. Tribal singers like Teejanbai may be seen performing on the stage to the accompaniment of music even today. From the literary point of view, however, Karunalaya by Jayashankar 'Prasad' deserves to be called the first Hindi opera.

An opera is, in fact, a form of drama in which we find all the dramatic elements, with music superadded to it. Some critics, and even creative writers, have described opera as versified drama or emotional drama because of the predominance of poetry and emotion in it, but when we consider its form and technique we feel that it is a distinct type by itself. These appellations, however, ought to be kept in mind while discussing an opera. Another element which makes it conspicuous is dance. Sometimes the characters do not speak but express themselves through the dances. Subjectwise, most of the operas are based on myths and legends or folk life, but a good many of them have realistic themes also drawn from contemporary life.

The Hindi opera had its beginnings in the 13th century. One could see traces of the ancient opera in Teejanbai's performances based on folk elements or on stories drawn from the epics. In the 17th century we had several operas with a dominance of poetic element in them, such as Mahantak (Pranchand Chauhan, 1623), Hanumannatak (Hridaya Ram), Samayasaranatak (Banarasi Das, 1636), Chandi charitra (Guru Govind Singh), Prabhodha chandraodaya (Shrikrishna Mishra), Karunabharan (Newaj, 1680), and Shrikrishna Jivan (Ramlachhi Ram, 1715). Govind hulas is said to be the first modern opera, whose authorship is ascribed to Jiva Goswami, the great devotee of Rama. As against this religious play in Braj bhasha, we have nearer our times Agha Hashra's Inder sabha (1853), a racy play and a fine example of folk drama which was extremely popular on the stage. From the view point of presentation, Bharatendu's Andher nagari, staged by the National School of Drama, was a remarkable success.

A new trend in drama began with Jayashankar Prasad. His Karunalaya (1905) is an opera in its purest form. It is composed in 'Arilla' metre. Based on the Shunahshepa in the Vedas, it attacks the custom of making sacrifices to the gods. There is no prologue here, nor any stage manager, but there is benediction at the end as was the custom in most Sanskrit dramas. Then there is Maharana ka mahatva (1914) based on the legend of Maharana Pratap. Both these operas reflect romantic elements. Though Prasad moved away from the style of Karunalaya, Maithilisharan Gupta, Mangalaprasad Vishwakarma, Siyaramasharan Gupta, Harikrishna 'Premi', Udayashankar Bhatt, Seth Govind Das and others came under its spell. Maithilisharan Gupta wrote Anagha (1925) and Lila (1961). The influence of Gandhi is evident on the former, while the latter deals with the story of Rama's life. Both are composed in lyrical metres.

Anandiprasad Srivastava wrote four operas, Parvati aur Sita, Shivaji aur Bharatlakshmi, Nurjahan and Chanakya aur Chandragupta. Their themes are drawn from either history or mythology, and the verse used in them is without rhyme.

The great poet, Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala', too wrote an opera, Panchavati prasanga, in five parts in blank verse. He has taken the episode of Shurpanakha from the Ramayana and made a successful opera out of it.

Harikrishna Premi's Swarna vihan is another good opera. The plot unfolds beautifully as he tries to show non-violence triumphing in the end. In his Punjab ki prem kahaniyan we have such love-stories as of Hir and Ranjha, Sohni and Mahiwal, Mirza and Sahiban, Dulla and Bhatti rendered into competent operas.

The contribution of Udaishankar Bhatt to Hindi opera is outstanding. From the artistic point of view, his Matsyagandha (1937), Vishwamitra (1938), Sant Tulsidas (1950), Guru Drona ka nirikshana, Ashokvandini, Ashvatthama (1959) and Nahusha nipata (1961) are all excellent operas. They are based on legends and mythology and are good examples of the synthesis of poetry and drama. The inner conflicts of various characters come out in sharp relief in them. Bhatt calls his operas 'bhavnatya' because of the excess of emotions in them.

Siyaramsharan Gupta wrote two operas, Krishna (1921) and Unmukta (1940); the first one is based on scriptures while the other on the principle of ahimsa enunciated by Gandhiji.

Bhagwaticharan Verma's operas Draupadi (1945), Tara (1950) and Karna (1953) are based on epics. Artistically, Tara is a greater success since the dramatist leans here on psychology to delineate his characters.

Kedarnath Mishra wrote operas like Samvarta (1943), Kaladahan (1945) and Angulimal (1951). Most of them are lyrical dramas and are representative of the age they seek to depict. Seth Govind Das too wrote an opera Sneha ya swarga (1946), in which he frees himself from the fetters of dramatic unities. Arasiprasad Singh's operas, such as Dhup-chhanh (1950), Indra dhanusha and Rituraja are essentially lyrical.

Sumitranandan Pant too wrote operas, most of them for broadcasting with the result that the auditory element dominates the visual aspect. Some of his operas are Shubhra purush, Uttar shati, Phulan ka desh, Rajat Shikhar, Sharad chetana, Shilpi, Dhwansa-shesh, Apsara, Swapna aur satya, Jyotsana, Sauvarna. Because of the density of philosophical element, some of them tend to be too terse for the stage and are more in the nature of closet plays. His Shilpi and Jyotsana have rightly been hailed as excellent literary works.

Ramdhari Singh 'Dinkar' wrote three operas, Magadha mahima (1951), Himalaya sandesh (1958) and Urvashi (1961) with their plots drawn from mythology. Artistically, Urvashi is an excellent opera in which the author sublimates the love story of Pururava and Urvashi. Dinkar has used all types of verse: rhyme, blank verse and free verse.

The major operas by Siddhanath Kumar are Jivan kavi, Srishti ki sanjh, Lauh devata, Sangharsha, Vikalangon ka desh and Badalon ka shap. Their plots are imaginary and seek to highlight social problems. Girijakumar Mathur too wrote some operas like Indumati, Prithvikalpa, Dhara deep, Ram ki agnipariksha, Megha ki chhaya and Ritu samhar, but from the point of view of technique they are, perhaps, not very successful. Bharatbhushan Agrawal also wrote a few operas, but they too are run of the mill creations. Agyeya's Uttar shati was, however, very popular. Similarly, Dushyant Kumar's Ek kantha vishapayi based on an episode in the life of Shiv and Parvati, is quite an effective opera. Janakivallabh Shastri, Manohar Prabhakar and Vinay Kumar too wrote some operas with an eye on the stage.

Dharmavir Bharati's Andha yuga, sometimes called a long poetic drama, is an achievement by itself. It depicts the agony of man wrought by the blind war of the Mahabharata, and its theme has relevance to our own times. Andha yuga has added new dimensions to opera. Its style casts a spell over the audience. Its excellent presentation, its dialogues, the unfolding of its plot, the song of the watchman, the beggar's comments, all have dramatic effect.

Naresh Mehta's Sanshaya ki ek raat, Agnidevata, Prithviputra, Khambonwala Mahanagar, and Lakshmi Narayan Lal's Sukha sarovar and Kalanki are examples of other good operas. Attempts have been made by many other writers also to write operas. Some examples are: Sri Narayan Chaturvedi (Champe ki kali), Anantkumar Pashan (Rituraja), Sitaram Chaturvedi (Bhagwan Buddha), Machwe (Mukti devata), Praphullachandra Ojha (Vrindaban), Ushadevi Mitra (Pratham chhaya), Chiranjit (Dev aur manav), Kartar Singh Duggal (Ooper ki manzil). The radio and now the television have contributed a great deal to the growth and development of the opera.

OPERA (Kannada) is a form of musical drama in Kannada moulded and enriched by the composition of P.T. Narsimhachar, Shivaram Karanth and others. The roots of the opera or 'gita nataka' are traced to celebrated Sanskrit works like Gitagovinda and Krishna karnamrita, and the inspiration is carried from Thyagaraja's Nowkacharitam, and Prahladavijaya and the Tamil Nandanarcharita. It is said that the Kuchipudi dance drama and the musical dramas of the professional theatre have also played a significant role in shaping the form of the opera. Of course, in the professional theatre which aimed at providing entertainment to a large crowd of different tastes prose-dialogue was interspersed with songs. Even in social and historical plays (not to speak of the mythological, musical 'extravaganzas') songs indicated emotional climate, though they were used mostly as 'relief' from the humdrum conversation. However, the genuine opera in Kannada had to wait till the pioneering experimenters arrived.

That major poets in Kannada have all tried their hand at composing operas speaks of the popularity of the form. The first big step was taken when Shivaram Karanth wrote his Muktadwara, Kisagoutami and other plays and produced them in his little rural theatre as music and dance dramas. Some were even tried as shadow plays. Karanth's early experimentation led him to revive the yakshagana in order to stir the interest of the modern urban and elite audience in the folk form.

But the opera lives as a living form in the gita natakas of P.T. Narsimhachar, especially in Ahalye and Gokula nirgamana. In the latter he takes up from the Bhagavata the story of the boy Shrikrishna who, now at the end of all his fun and frolic, growing into the cares and responsibilities of manhood, is about to depart from Gokula to Mathura. Through the characters of Radha, the gopis, Sridhama, Akrura and others, the poet orchestrates the painful drama of childhood, casting off the slough of innocence and growing into maturity. The gesture of drama, the meaning of poetry and the rhapsody of music have coalesced into an enchanting effect here. Ahalye traces through its memorable songs the drama of the fallen woman and her deliverance at the feet of Shri Rama. It is also a drama of a man attaining wisdom and knowledge through pain and suffering.

OPERA (Kashmiri), basically a genre of western origin, was introduced in Kashmiri by Dinanath 'Nadim' (b. 1916). The history of Kashmiri Opera begins with Bombir ta yambarzal, which Nadim wrote in 1953. It was an epoch-making effort and was for the first time staged in 1953 at Nedous Hotel, Srinagar. This opera was the main cultural item presented before Marshal Bulganin and Khruschev, the two Soviet leaders when they visited Kashmir in the autumn of 1956. This opera was directed by Mohanlal Aima and was a great success. This opera was some time later translated into Russian. The main theme of this opera was the Anglo-American shadow over Kashmir which was presented symbolically. Bombir ta yambirzal and Gilitore symbolised the forces of peace. Nadim continued to write operas and made history in this field. After Bombir ta yambirzal he wrote Niki ta badi, an opera, in which the forces of good and evil are at war. At last evil is defeated and good prevails. This opera was staged at the Government Women's College, Srinagar.

Based on folklore, Nadim wrote two operas Shihil kul and Madanvar zuvalmal. Both these operas were staged in the auditorium of Women's College, Srinagar. Based on a famous folk-tale of Kashmiri origin, 'Himal-Nagraay', Nadim wrote another Opera titled Himal Nagraay in collaboration with Nur Muhammad 'Roshan' (b. 1919) in early sixties. This opera was directed by Colonel Gupte of the Songs and Drama Division, Government of India, and was presented with the help of 'Sound and Light' in the foothills of Hari Parbat, Srinagar. This opera was really a breakthrough and was witnessed by lakhs of people.

Nadim then wrote Vitasta for Radio Kashmir and this oprea was broadcast on Radio in 1970. In 1978, Nadim rewrote this opera for stage with modifications and improvements in songs as well as narration. This opera symbolises the synthesis of the early Naga and Aryan cultures of Kashmir. This opera was produced under the banner of Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages and was produced by the well-known producer Pran Kishore. Besides Srinagar, Vitasta was staged at Delhi, Hyderabad, Calcutta, Lucknow, Bangalore and Patna by a Kashmiri cultural troupe and was highly hailed and appreciated by spectators and the National Press. Vitasta has appeared in book form also.

During 1950 and 1970 three more operas were written. Amin Kamil (b. 1924) wrote Ravi Roopi which was published serially in Kong posh (1954-55). Shambunath Bhat 'Halim' (b. 1921) wrote Bombur ta holar which appeared in Son adab 1959. Abdul Rehman 'Rahi' (b. 1925) wrote Yali lal motus phur which was broadcast from Radio Kashmir in late sixties. These operas were never staged because the authors lacked the technique of the stage and the pre-requisites of a real opera. They classed their efforts as operas, but in fact these so-called operas can be termed as musicals.

It is Motilal 'Saqi' (b. 1936) who continued the tradition of the opera in Kashmiri. Saqi's first opera was Hayatan ziyun which was in the first instance broadcast and later staged at Srinagar. His second opera Maj Kashiri which symbolises the traditional brotherhood and tolerance of Kashmir was staged in Women's College, Srinagar, in 1981. A special show of this opera was arranged in honour of the President of India when he visited the valley. Saqi's another opera Gashi aagur was staged by the Government Women's College, Srinagar, in Tagore Hall in 1982. This opera is based on the tradition of folk tunes and it added some sweet lyrics to Kashmiri literature. Opera has a great future and is liked by all irrespective of any distinction. It enjoys enormous popularity because it is very close to Kashmiri temper and is somewhat of a higly sophisticated form of early 'dastan' which allures us even today.

The present-day Kashmiri opera is a combination of 'ballet' and 'opera'. In its technique some new experiments have been made and this western genre has come very close to the Kashmiri temper.

OPERA (Punjabi). Punjab has had the tradition of ballads, love legends written by poets like Piloo, Waris Shah, Fazal Shah, and others in their long narrative 'quisas'. The 'dhadis' (group of traditional singers) still sing then in powerful dramatic rendering and bring out the pathos, love pangs, joys and various rasas through their singing. Women have preserved birth and wedding songs, dirges (siapa) and seasonal songs in dialogue. The 'gidda' song and 'bolis' are converted into musical dramatic snippets by women in their mud courtyards as they sing and dance to the drum. This singing-acting tradition has continued for centuries in Punjab.

It was the production of Heer Ranjha written and produced by Sheila Bhatia in 1957 which marked the birth of contemporary opera in Punjabi. Its story was the famous love legend of Punjab celebrated in a masterpiece qissa by Waris Shah. Sheila used 35 folk-tunes in her composition, and music was set by Sushildas Gupta. The traditional Heer tune appeared only at three or four peak points using the original lines of Waris Shah. Folk songs, folk tunes, folk dances like gidda, tappa, bolian, ceremonials and seasonal festivities and rituals provided dramatic and musical elements.

In the early forties with the national awakening and the impact of World War II, a group of women in Lahore (its core being Sheila Bhatia, Snehlata Sanyal and Pooran Mehta) wrote and composed songs on contemporary events and performed them. The themes were rationing, blackmarket, rising prices, national freedom, awakening of women and the Punjab heritage. Her famous compositions of those days are Nikka mota bajra—by ho ha and China inj charinda. After the partition, Sheila Bhatia produced her experimental small opera Vadi di goonj on the plight of Kashmiri people and their struggle, in 1950. Her other production was Rukhe khet (Dry fields) in 1954.

Her later production Chann badlan da (The moon in clouds) is a collage of Punjabi folk songs, dances and rituals. In her Sulagde darya (The smouldering river), staged in 1981, Sheila used more than forty pieces of Bulleh Shah's kafis, the poems of Shah Husain and Baba Farid, and a number of folk songs. Safdar Husain Khan (nephew of Bare Ghulam Ali Khan) moulded these kafis and folksongs into dramatic music.

In the fifties, influenced by the left-wing peace movement, Tara Singh Chann wrote Akhri parah (The last stage), Sazish (Conspiracy), Lakkar di latt (The wooden leg), Neel di Shahzadi (The Princess of the Nile) and Amar Punjab (Immortal Punjab). Lakkardilatt, described the tragedy of a farmer who goes to war to fight and returns with his leg amputated. Joginder Baharla, another opera writer, wrote and staged Dharti de bol (Voice of the land), Harhi sauni (Monsoon crops), Dollar da vanjara (The dollar merchant) and Tax. They were staged in villages.

Jagdish Rai Firadi wrote Jatti Heer, Shaheed Bhagat Singh and Mirza Sahiban which were set to music and directed by Pandit Khalili, and performed in Bhatinda. Apart from these, Harnam Singh Naaz, Nand Lal Nurpuri and Bhag Singh wrote some operas which were staged with some success.

Today Punjabi theatrical scene is distinctly divided in two main streams: the psychological and emotional dramas of prose with contemporary sensibility and staging techniques, and the operas using folk-tunes, folk-songs, folk-myths, rituals and legends with a new sensibility.

OPERA (Tamil) is known in Tamilnadu as 'isai natakam'. Music and theatre have been inseparably connected in Tamil cultural life from the beginning of its known history and yet it is difficult to identify an operatic tradition in Tamil in the strict Western sense of the term. At the very dawn of Tamil literary history, we encounter 'banas', the wandering minstrels, who criss-crossed Tamil Nadu with an instrument in hand, singing lyrics of love and panegyrics in dramatic form, as though they were a band of mono-actors. This tradition of the Sangam era (the first few centuries of the Christian era) was continued by the saint singer-poets, Nayanmars and Alwars, till about the 10th century. If this 'bana' tradition could be taken as belonging to opera, and the institution as of wandering operatic groups, much has not changed in Tamil life, as the present day 'kathakalakshepam' (musico-religious discourses) artists, who also sing and act out mono, with an accompanying full-fledged orchestra in the background, are heirs to that tradition.

Theatre too is as old as the bana tradition. But then, the 'natakam' the Tamils knew consisted of only dancing to music. Music was never divorced from theatre, though it was always allied to dancing. There has not been a tradition of stage presentation exclusively through music. In theatre, music was an adjunct to dance exposition. Silappadikaram, the 5th century epic in Tamil, records this theatre in great detail. There is epigraphic evidence to the effect that in Raja Raja Chola's time (11th century) Raja Raja natakam was staged at Thanjavur temple. This again was a dance drama.

The Naiks (Telugu chieftains), successors to the Vijayanagar empire, ruled Tamilnadu during the 17th and 18th centuries. It is during the Naiks' time that we hear of a genre, 'yakshagana', making its appearance. Texts of such yakshagana plays are in palm-leaf manuscripts available in the Madras Oriental Manuscripts Library. Yakshagana, coming from the Andhra country, was a form of 'geya natakam', musical folk theatre originating in the 13th century. As this travelled to Karnataka it evolved into a semi-folk, semi-classical dance drama familiar to us by that name today. In Tamilnadu, however, it branched off into two forms, both under the same name. In a few villages in Thanjavur district, however, in and around Mallatur, it grew into a distinct 'Bhagavata mela' fusing Bharatanatyam and Kuchipudi features, which is an annual event even today. One of them seems to have retained its original operatic forms, as is evident from the manuscripts available in the archives referred to earlier. Apart from the published 'Vallala Rajam yakshaganam', the other available manuscripts are 'Neeli yakshaganam', 'Sarangadara yakshaganam', 'Siru thonda yakshaganam' and 'Narasimha vijaya yakshaganam', which have not been published so far. From the Thanjavur Saraswati Mahal Library three operatic texts 'Madana Sundara vilasam', 'Pandya keli vilasa natakam' and 'Puroosuva natakam' have been published. The third is available only in fragments. These were written during the Maratha rule of Thanjavur under their patronage. All these are the only operatic yakshagana texts available and the rest are yakshagana dance-drama texts.

Apart from yakshagana, Tamilnadu also imbibed the tradition of 'kathakalakshepam' (i.e. musico-religious discourses) with the full orchestra backing up and a Bhagavata singing and acting out mono all the characters of the play. These kathakalakshepams, by their very nature, are improvised on the spot with a liberal use of the existing Tamil and Sanskrit works and puranic texts. These artists were erudite scholars and talented musicians rolled into one. It is from this tradition that two great figures of Tamil opera emerged. Arunachala Kavirayar and Gopala Krishna Bharati have made available to us written down librettos, so to say, though they expressly meant these texts only for purposes of kathakalakshepam performance. Arunachala Kavirayar (1711-1767), who was a Tamil scholar, chose to render the Kamba Ramayana in kirtana form and had it set to music with the help of his two disciples, Venkataraman and Kodamdaraman, who were musicians.

This was closely followed by Gopalakrishna Bharati, a musician par excellence, whose knowledge of music extended to both the Carnatic and the Hindustani styles. He was a kathakalakshepam artist himself and inspired by the example set by Arunachala Kavirayar, wrote Nandanar charitra kirtanaigal and set it to music fusing Hindustani, Carnatic and also the folk music forms. Though he meant it for his own use, his exposition became very popular.

Therukoothu, the age-old folk theatre staged in streets and open grounds during Draupadi Amman festival celebrations, was in essence in opera, as the whole story was unfolded in music, and the music still retained its classical and semi-classical (folk tunes elevated to classical modes) form. These plays had their themes drawn from mythology and folk legends and were staged in public places away from temples and royal patronage. Music was the dominant feature of these plays as there was hardly much prose dialogue as such. Only those who could sing could be actors in the play and only those who had a skill to compose songs and set them to music could emerge as playwrights or directors. This theatre gave Tamilnadu phenomenal figures like S.G. Kittappa and K.B. Sundarambal. This form became so popular that it gradually drove every other form of theatre into relative insignificance. Even the advent of the cinema in the thirties and forties could not suppress the form. In fact, the operatic form began to have a new lease of life through the films.

OPERA (Telugu). The Andhra operas were shown since the times of the Satavahanas. The Chalukya king, Gunaga Vijayaditya, and the Vengi king, Amma Raju, supported operas by offering valuable gifts.

The operas were played in the court halls of the emperors and on the premises of the temples in the beginning. Hence it is natural that Sanskrit poems were adapted to operas. Even now the influence of Sanskrit is considerable on the songs of operas in Andhra Pradesh.

The shlokas in Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, Narayanatirtha's Krishnalila tarangini, and Lilashukakavi's Krishna karnamritam are sung in the operas. It is said that Padmavati, Jayadeva's wife, used to dance, according to the ashtapadis of Gitagovinda. It is believed by devotees that Bala Krishna used to dance to the tune of Narayanatirtha while he sang the 'tarangas' of Krishnalila tarangini. Kuchipudi Bhagavatas used to dance for hours together, amplifying Balagopala and other tarangas. Lilashukakavi's famous taranga, 'Kasturitilakam lalataphalake', was very popular.

Slowly in place of Sanskrit, Telugu crept into the operas but with a Sanskrit background. The writers like Nannechodudu, Palkuruki Somanadhudu, Yarrana, Srinathudu, Jakkana have made a mention of the operas in their works.

Annamacharya was a devotional writer who dedicated his life and writings to Lord Venkateshwara. It is a tradition to include the popular lyrics of Annamacharya which display rich variety and charm in the operas. The songs of Annamayya also find an honoured place in the operas.

ORU DESHATTINTE KATHA (Malayalam) is the reputed autobiographical novel written by S.K. Pottekkat. It is the story of Sreedharan born and brought up in the village of Atiranippatam. Innumerable characters who represent a generation of Atiranippatam, who lived with Sreedharan and with whom he shared his experiences of life, appear in the novel. Each and everyone of them is identifiable by his or her individual qualities and preferences. The author considers the world a crematory. Generation after generation continue to live their lives upon the layers constituted by their forefathers. The same thing happened in Atiranippatam also.

Krishnan Master who always stood for truth and justice, and Kunhikelu Melan who destroyed the wealth and nobility of the Kelanchery family and himself, lived in Athiranippatam. Koran Butler, Kuloos Parangodan, Perikkalan Ayyappan, Adharam Anti, Sakuni the Compounder, Meesa Kanaran, Koonan Velu, Nhantu Govindan, Thatichi Kunki Amma, Vellakkoora Kunhiraman, Kutakkal Balan—all these people are born and brought up in the same atmosphere. Sreedharan also is one among them. He is recollecting the places and people of Atiranippatam. He saw a reservoir with a capacity of 10000 gallons, where once stood the house of Ammukkutti. He was in love with her. But he knew from her brother that she had died two years back. Ammukkutty had entrusted her brother with a notebook containing her poems to be given to Sreedharan.

In a poetic style Pottekkat presents in this novel the story of his native place, and of the people who lived there half a century ago. Oru deshattinte katha (the story of a village) won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972 and also the Jnanapith Award in 1981.

OTAKKUZHAL (Malayalam) by G. Sankara Kurup, (widely known as 'G'), the recipient of the first Jnanpith Award in 1966, is a collection of sixty poems, selected from his earlier publications. It was first published in 1950 and reprinted in 1955, 1963, 1966, 1967 and 1970.

Fourteen poems from Otakkuzhal were translated into English by V.V. Menon and published from Madras in 1966 under the title Otakkuzhal and Other Poems. Two other collections of poems selected and translated into English were brought out by the Kerala Sahitya Akademi (Trichur) and Dialogue (Calcutta) which were very well received. The whole book has been translated into Hindi and published under the title Otakkuzhal by Bharatiya Jnanpith, Varanasi (1966).

The first poem in the collection, 'Otakkuzhal' (flute) is a short lyric of 28 lines. Man is just an insignificant and empty reed that becomes alive and spirited when God breaths through him. This reed produces melodious music just because the Universal Singer is present in it as a song. Let the stream of music in the flute flow out again and again mingled with the divine smile, as also with faithful love, the struggle of day-to-day life, the enhanting tearful eyes, the dreadful shadows of the dark clouds of poverty and all the eddies of the sins of the world. The flute may become mute, may be eaten away by white ants, or may turn into a handful of ashes. Some may speak about the good, but the world will generally sing about the flaws only. Nevertheless, the flute feels that its life is blissful and worthy because it has entrusted itself to Him. This basic idea of the relation between God and man and of the presence of God in man has got its root deep in the core of oriental philosophy, and G. has sung about it in different tones in more than one of his later poems. Natural beauty has ever been a wonderful source of inspiration to the poet. This leads him to the devout worship of the mysterious force in the universe. The general trend of theism in such early poems has been fully developed in his later poems like 'Vishwadarshanam' (Vision of the universe). With the poems like 'Pushpagitam' (Song of flower), 'Sandhyataram' (Evening star), and 'Pinnatte vasantam' (Next spring), the poetic genius of G. attains its full blossom. He gains mastery over language and his poetic style attains maturity. The rare combination of theism and love that we come across in the unique lyrics of Tagore's Gitanjali can be felt in 'Pushpagitam'. In 'Sandhyagitam', the poet looks at the evening star with wide wonder and his imagination soars high, ultimately to realise that

> The light that shines in you and me
> A spark from the same source it may be;
> If not, why should my soul aright
> So glad be when you burn so bright?

This is the true and natural tune of his soul. These poems, where the poet emerges as the high-priest of nature, have added a new dimension to Malayalam poetry. Even before G. there were Nature-worshippers among Malayalam poets, but G. is quite different. Instead of being thrilled by the wonders of Nature, G. enjoys sublimation at the thought of the hand that created these wonders. The realisation that this nature is of unbounded beauty and that he shares equally the same immense eternal divine light opens before him an exalted world of experience beyond words. This feeling of union with nature is the background of his mysticism. But he is not a mystic in the same sense in which the term is used to call Tagore or William Blake a mystic. The mystic in him experiences God in nature and, therefore, he may be called a 'Nature-mystic'. The poems 'Kuyil' (Cuckoo), 'Prabhatavatam', 'Meghagitam' (Cloud's song), 'Nizhal' (Shadow), etc., add yet another subtler dimension to it. In 'Kuyil' the poet gives expression to his soul through the Cuckoo. The bird sings in complete forgetfulness, enchanted by the sight of heaven. Though somebody may feel that it is just wasting its life ever singing, it has the solace that its song may console some dejected soul. In these poems, the poet's style becomes more and more symbolic. The flute in 'Otakkuzhal', the cuckoo in 'Kuyil', the flower in 'Pushpagitam', the cloud in 'Meghagitam' etc. are apt and beautiful symbols.

'Suryakanti' (Sun-flower), 'Ente veli' (My wedding), 'Anveshanam' (Enquiry), 'Innu nan nale ni' (Today I, tomorrow you) etc, won for the poet the acclamation as the most note-worthy poet. 'Suryakanti' speaks outwardly of a tender hidden love. But at the core, with an element of philosophy, it sings of the eternal thirst of the human soul for the Universal Soul. The flower is the symbol of the soul imbued with love and devotion, and here this poem stands with 'Meghagitam', 'Pushpagitam' etc. 'Ente veli' is a symbolic poem. It depicts the thoughts of a bride, adorned with bridal attire, awaiting the blessed moment of the arrival of the groom. She has already heard of her future husband. A strict disciplinarian, he never allows anybody to come to the parental house and hence nobody knows whether the harem is heaven or hell. The poem attains a graver dimension when the parental house, the harem, the moment of wedding, the bride and the bridegroom become symbols of this world, the world after death, the time of death, human soul and God of death respectively. 'Ente veli' endures as one of the few sublime symbolic poems in Malayalam literature. 'Anveshanam' is another poem to be grouped in this class. It is concerned with the search of the human soul for God, blessed with the everlasting memory of a momentary realisation of His sweet presence, 'Innu nan nale ni' marks an obvious turning point in G's poetic career. Here the poet's mind opens out to society and sees sorrow and death. There was a dead body which was taken to the church-yard and on the hearse was written 'Today I, tomorrow you'. This echoed in his mind with the ringing of the church-bell in the background and reminded him of the pathos of the poor and futility of human life. Though there are certain poems like 'Sakshatkaram' (Fulfilment)' 'Jeevitam' (Life) and 'Pujapushpam' (Flowers for worship) in between, 'Nale' (tomorrow) was a natural development from it. The mystic in him was gradually giving way to the revolutionary, though he was for a time both. In 'Nale', addressing the glowing stars above, the poet warns them that their term is coming to an end and that the crimson dawn is ahead. It is coming to distribute equally among all mirth and light that are now being enjoyed by a few stars only. Here the poet comes out openly as the defender and spokesman of the downtrodden and the suppressed, especially the peasants. These revolutionary ideas, though quite Gandhian, were an anathema to the authorities than and quite naturally had their repercussion on his official life. 'Kalam' (Time), 'Nakshatragitam' (Song of star), 'Sagarasangitam', (Song of the ocean) etc. are the major poems of this period. 'Kalam' is a grand sonnet in which Time is presented as a huge snake crawling through the universe searching for its dwelling. In 'Nakshatragitam' we see the poet as a lover of sorrow. But this love of sorrow also becomes magnificent and desirable when he says,

> When life but a furnace to me
> The earth I whitened with that light.

'Sagarasangitam' is one of G.'s great works. The four sonnets in the poem quite significantly mark the different phases in the development of his poetic career. The poetic personality of G. is clearly seen reflected, with all its grandeur, in these sonnets.

The next few poems in the collection reveal a more profound and significant stage in G.'s poetry. As the poet himself has pointed out, his heart was trying to assimilate the experiences of the people of the whole world breaking the limitations of personal experiences. It was the time of social awakening, and national as well as international upheavals were changing the face of society. Though some of the poems of G, during these days, speak of the philosophic anxiety of the individual soul in general, the poet was singing for the common man in society. The Indian Independence movement was heading towards its culmination. This thirst for light can also be seen in his poems and along with it we could hear through him the desire of India for the independence of all colonial countries. 'Pratikaram' (Revenge), 'Raktabindu' (Drop of blood), 'Shavappetti' (Coffin), 'Bharatashandesham' (India's message), 'Charitrattinte kinavukal' (Dreams of history) etc. are the great poems of this period. In these poems we find a poet who was a devout nationalist blossoming into an internationalist and humanist. This international humanism expands the horizon of the poet to such an extent that it enables him to reach out beyond the bounds of language. 'Nimisham' (Minute) and 'Bharatendu' (The moon of India) are two other poems of this phase which are evidently two master-pieces in Malayalam poetry. Time that soars incessantly towards eternity on its feeble but beautiful wings is the theme of 'Nimisham'. The eternal time is made of moments moving one after another and the poet sees in a moment the whole expanse of the universe and eternity. The poet becomes enchanted before this revelation. 'Bharatendu' is a poem on Gandhiji. The poem ends in a hopeful mood that though Gandhiji is no more, his message will remain for ever making human life worth living throughout the world. It says,

> "On the pyre did burn the wings of death,
> But eternal soul lives on this earth!"

Though some of the great poems of G. were written after 1950, the year in which Otakkuzhal was published, in this collection itself we get many great poems of the poet which won him the coveted honour, the Jnanapith Award, thus bringing him to the forefront of Indian writers.

OTAYILNINNU (Malayalam) is a novel by P. Kesava Dev (b. 1904), one of the stalwarts of contemporary Malayalam novel. The work was published in the second edition in 1942 from Trichur.

In this novel the author narrates the story of a rickshaw-puller by name Pappu, noted for his proud independence and the humanity he shows to a helpless girl named Lakshmi. His rikshaw knocks her down one day and this event starts his attachment towards her. Pappu learns of the poor conditions in which the girl lives with her mother. He befriends the family and takes the mother and daughter under his protection. He meets the expenses of the girl's education and does his best to ensure a bright future for her. He moves into their home and lives as the master of the household. Many are the struggles which the ageing and by now tubercular rikshaw-puller undergoes to finance the girl's education and to see that she has not a care in the world. The pathos of the situation is in the fact that while the girl loves the man, she is ashamed of him, a mere rikshaw-puller being her protector. Thus when he once appears at the school bringing with him money for an overdue payment of her fees, she informs her inquisitive friends that he is their servant. But whenever she exhibits her snobbery at home, her mother scolds her.

Lakshmi is a talented dancer and soon earns a name for her talent. This leads to her marriage with a rich young man from the town and she moves into her new luxurious home. Her mother would, of course, go with her; but the young bride wants Pappu also to join her in her new prosperity. In this desire she is supported by her virtuous husband who has only the highest praise and admiration for the large-hearted rikshaw-puller. But Pappu is a proud man and refuses to move into the new home. He would prefer to continue in his humble position. The mother, enchanted by the invitation of this new prosperity, is critical of his obduracy and is willing to leave him alone. In the end we hear Pappu's persistent cough as a reminder of the man's pride and self-respect.

Kesav Dev's Otayilninnu is representative of the realistic and progressive literature which emerged in Malayalam in the nineteen forties. It indicates the change in literary norms which the period brought about. In the place of the upper class men a mere rikshaw-puller has become the novel's hero and his struggles and character emerge from the pages of the work. Yet it is incorrect to regard this work as one on the working class. It is not on the class of rikshaw-pullers; it is on one man. It is on his pride, independence and humanity. In this sense the novelist has built up his character in a romantically heroic mould. As in his Ayalkkar (Neighbours, 1963), Dev builds up the personality of a dominant character true to his concept of a strong man. Otayilninnu is a little classic in Malayalam with a wide readership built up by its direct and vigorous style in addition to its fascinating hero and its insight into human nature.

OTTAKKUTTAR (Tamil; 12th century) ranks foremost amongst the ancient Tamil court poets. He was the poet-laureate of the Imperial court of the three Chola monarchs, Vikrama Chola, his son Kulottunga Chola II and his son Raja Raj II. He composed a 'ula' poem on each of the three. He earned the title of the Tamil Emperor of Poetry. He was named Kuttar since the members of his family worshipped Nataraja Shiva, known in Tamil as Kutar or Cosmic Dancer. Hagiography claims that early in life he worshipped Sarasvati enshrined at Kuttanur in Tanjanur district and became a distinguished poet. His talents were recognized by Emperor Vikrama Chola who made him his court poet and appointed him also tutor to his son. He was capable of attaching a few lines to the already existing lines of verse and this gave him the name Ottakkuttar (from 'Ottu', to attach). Many uncomplimentary tales are narrated about his intolerance and pride. Some later legends would make him a contemporary of a popular poet, Puhalendi, of the 13th century and weave tales of rivalry between the two and make the other poet humble this great man's pride by training common artisans to excel him in versification. Another elaborate legend was woven in the 17th century. According to this, he built a throne of seventy heads of his clan and sang thereafter Ittielupadu (seventy verses on the lance) extolling his own community.

But Ottakkuttar is today remembered for six long poems. Three 'ula' poems have been mentioned earlier. 'Ula' is a long poem in a single continuous 'venba' verse where a deity is taken in procession along the streets round the temple. Girls and women, in seven traditional age groups between the years five and forty, see him and fall in love with him. The poem narrates in realistic detail the reaction of the girls and women appropriate to their ages. Vikrama Cholan ula is in 342 couplets. Here Kuttar for the first time devotes the poem to glorify a king instead of a deity. Kulottunga Cholan ula is in 387 couplets and has the distinction of having an early classical gloss on it. Raja Rajan ula has 391 couplets; to this ruler the poet was a respected elder counsellor. The three poems are important in Tamil literary history for the corroborative evidence which they provide on the genealogy of the Chola rulers of the period.

Kulottunga Cholan Pillai Tamil is a poem of 100 verses in ten sections, on prince Kulottunga as a child. This is the first independent 'Pillai-Tamil' poem in the language. In it the poet borrowed themes from Periyalvar's songs on Krishna's childhood and developed them into a new genre. Later poems modelled on Kuttar are innumerable.

Dakka-yagap-bharani, another long poem of the poet in 814 couplets, celebrates the destruction of Daksha's yajna by Virabhadra on the orders of Lord Shiva, because Daksha had slighted Shiva. Kuttar made innovations in his 'Bharani' poem, though this genre had come into existence earlier. The poem is remarkable for its fine lilting metre and for the profuse use of Sanskrit words and forms. The poem has a distinct place in the history of Tamil culture. In it Kuttar for the first time introduced Tirujnanasambandhar as an incarnation of Muruga.

The last poem is Uttarkanda, an adaptation of the seventh book of the Ramayana. Its authorship has been doubted. The poem is in 1526 quatrains, divided into 20 chapters, and narrates the traditional Uttarakanda story. It is probable that Kuttar wrote this poem in his younger days before he became a court poet.

Ottakkuttar is a great name in Tamil literary hisotry not only for the poems written by him but also for his wit and repartee.

PABBI (Punjabi) is a slender volume of poems by one of the foremost poets in Punjabi, Prabhjot Kaur. Coming as it did more than two decades ago (1962) when this language was struggling for a place in the main stream of Indian literature, it is a remarkable achievement of the author's poetic art. Prabhjot, a prolific writer, is also continuing the tradition of literary journalism through Vikendrit (monthly) which she edits. She received the Sahitya Akademi Award for this book in 1964.

Pabbi (Plateau) is a collection of poems inspired by intellectualised passion, romantically tragic in tone and rich in music. Except for three or four poems which strike a different note, it is, like Elizabeth Browning's Sonnets from the Portugese (1850), the expression of different facets and moods of a single romantic, tragic life. There in the opening title-poem is a piece that may stand comparison with this kind of poetry in any Indian language. It sings of memories of a love-life, rich in experience, now gone somewhat blase, as would be the natural transition for all love. The moods reminiscent of such experience are varied in imagery, and in all cases find richly musical expression. As a matter of fact, structurally most of these poems are in the nature of song. These songs, however, express a feeling that is steeped in modern consciousness which is aware of the fleeting nature of fulfilment in love. For its rich variety of moods the study of these poems is a highly rewarding experience. Interspersed are flashes of intellection, metaphysical in nature, enshrining the mystery of the changing moods of a life given to reflection on a life whose guiding force is feeling. The concluding poem 'Pathar' (mountain slope) outlines the mood of a life whose colours have now gone grey, leaving memories of disillusionment behind.

Two or three poems touch on the social theme. 'Pasheman' (Repentant) is the reflection of a pick-pocket, the product of the gutter and the slum. 'Atom Bomb te mahigir' (The atom bomb and the fisherman) purports to reflect the sentiment of a Persian poem, bringing out the tragedy of bombing through the wail of a Japanese fisherman. It highlights the destructive nature of the bomb, poisoning all existence around.

PABUJI RA PAWADA (Rajasthani) is a long narrative poem eulogising the various heroic achievements of Rathore Pabuji. Scholars have variously tried to explain the word 'pawada', a folk narrative sung by minstrels, men and women alternately line by line. Pabuji ra pawada is, perhaps, the only famous example of this genre. The entire narrative is divided into several chapters, and each chapter contains an independent part of the tale. Not all the fifty-two pawadas have been published so far. As is the case with folk compositions, no name of the poet is traceable, though initially it might have been the creation of one single person. The Pawadas of Pabuji (1256-80), who was a resident of Kolu village in Marwar, are sung by his devotees—the 'Thoris', who were the companions of the hero in his deeds of valour. The hero is now held as a deity by countless families in Rajasthan. The Thoris have taken up the priesthood of the deity. They recite the narrative on a special stringed instrument known as 'Ravan hattha'. They also maintain a picture-cloth, known as 'phad' listing the major events of Pabuji's life. The Thoris who play on the instrument and recite the poem are called 'Bhopas'. They are usually accompanied by their wives who sing at a high pitch, making the recital more fascinating.

The entire story is based on a mare of high breed, called Kalami, which belonged to a charan woman, Dewal. She had a flock of cows and grazed them at various pastures. The nearby landlords had a greedy eye on the mare. Some of them asked the charan lady to sell it to them which she refused. Khichi Rao Jindrao was prominent among them. Pabuji was allowed the use of the mare during his marriage on condition that he would rush to her help, if needed. When Pabuji was in the midst of marriage at Umarkot, the charan lady called for him to protect her cows from being taken away forcibly by Jindrao. Pabuji kept his word and gave his life in the defence of the cows.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The metre used in this poetic composition, though uniform throughout, does not agree with that of others. In its present form, the metre consists of two lines, each containing 24 to 28 'matras' in the first line and 30 to 34 in the second. Essentially meant for recitation, such variations are but natural which could be adjusted in the process of singing. The poem serves as a document of medieval culture. The poetic beauty of the diction deserves special mention. The printed text appears to be 100 to 200 years old. The entire text deserves publication in book form.

PACHA MEITEI (Manipuri; b. 1943), the noted novelist published Hayad begum (1967) and Hajj (1979), two novels which deal with Manipuri Muslim life. Na tathiba ahal ama (An old man hard of hearing,1969), Imphal amasung magi ishing nungshitki phibam (Imphal and its atmosphere, 1972), Anouba pao ama (A new message, 1973), Thanil (1979), etc. are some of his other novels. His early novels are more or less conventional; they tell a story and there is an emphasis on characterization, etc. The later novels beginning with Na tathiba ahal ama are a class by themselves in Manipuri because they are more like the stream of consciousness novels without a plot. Pacha Meitei made several experiments in novels not only with regard to theme but also the language. He coined new words in these novels by taking certain parts of different words and putting them together to form a new word. His grammar is also unorthodox as he tries to follow his own system.

He is associated with several literary and cultural organisations ot Manipur. His novel Imphal amasung magi ishing nungshitki phibam won the first Sahitya Akademi Award in Manipuri in the year 1973.

PACHITTIYA (Pali) is the second of the two parts of Sutta vibhanga, the first book of Vinayapitaka of the Buddhist canon. Suttavibhanga explains the monastic discipline as laid down in the Vinayapitaka to regulate the conduct of the Bhikkunis. Pachittiya is the explanation (vibhanga) of a part of the rules listed, namely those which deal with individual transgressions and which can be atoned for, vis-a-vis parajika which are errors of serious nature, resulting in expulsion from the Order. In all, 166 Pachittiya-dhammas are listed. While all these are related to the Bhikkhunis, 90 or 92 are related to the Bhikkhus.

Once in fifteen days, there was an assembly of the Sangha wherein the patimokkha was recited. It was mandatory for all the Bhikkhus and Bhikkhunis to attend it. As the text was recited, members were required to confess the guilt committed, if any.

If a Bhikkhu told a deliberate lie, or used abusive language to a fellow Bhikkhu or spoke ill of him, or if he drank liquor or strong drinks—all these and similar cases have been listed as pachittiya offences. Expiations thereof must have been directed by the presiding monk of the Assembly.

There are thirty rules prescribed, referred to as Nissaggiya–pachittiya–dhammas, which involved forfeiture. One of them is: if a Bhikkhu, desirous of a fine robe, made suggestions to the party or parties concerned for a particular kind of robe, it was regarded as committing an offence requiring forfeiture.

Pachittiya tells us when and how the rules were laid down. Most of the rules are traced to the Buddha himself. There are also rules without any reference to the Buddha. These might have been additions in course of time for they regulated the Buddhist order, and the Burmese and Sinhalese traditions vary regarding their number.

PADA (Gujarati) was a universally acknowledged form in medieval poetry. It is a Sanskrit word which means 'a part of the line,' but later the word was used to denote the whole line. Eventually the term was used to denote the number of lines which constituted a lyrical poem. In the Gitagovinda by the famous Sanskrit poet, Jaydeva (1185-1206), each unit is known as 'Ashtapadi' (a unit consisting of eight lines). Dolarrai Mankad says, "The word pada might have been derived from the Sanskrit word 'padya' which means poetry. In medieval Gujarati literature, the word 'pada' was synonymous with 'lyrical poetry'."

The pada being a lyrical poem has emotion as its sole constituent. The emotion expressed in a pada is of two categories. One is that of love which is based on devotion, and another of ecstasy experienced by the devotee on realising the Universal Self. The former is at its best in the padas of the Krishna cult, for it is only in that cult that the love of the finite human being for the infinite is expressed in terms of lover and his beloved. Thus there is a wide variety of emotions expressed in a pada.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In other cults such as Shaiva, Shakta, Rama and Jain, the supreme deity and his devotee are on different planes whereas in Krishna cult they, being lovers, are on the same plane. In Krishna cult 'Madhura bhakti' (devotion based on male-female love) provides an ample variety of emotions, such as pining for the Lord, deep agony of separation, Krishna's love pranks, frolicsome Krishna adored by the Gopis who quarrel for his favour, Radha relating to the maid her longing for him, Krishna and Radha expressing their love for each other, anger and anguish of Gopis when Krishna sends a message of spiritual love instead of personally coming and meeting them. All these emotions are vividly expressed by the poet in the manner of the medieval Gujarati padas of such poets as Narsingh Mehta (15th century) and Dayaram (19th century). For example:

> Maro Nath na bole abola mariyere.
> (My Lord does not talk to me; this lack of communication is killing me). (Narsingh Mehta)
> Amo jal Jamna bharva gyantan vahala Kanado padyo marikede.
> (My dear, I had gone to Jamuna to fetch water; there, darling Kanha was after me). (Mirabai)

In padas the depiction of the relation between the devotee and the lord, in terms of love-making, was so popular and wide-spread that even the monks and saints of the Swaminarayan sect had free recourse to love phraseology.

Temples have contributed a great deal to the evolution of padas. In Krishna temples, the idol of the Lord could be viewed by the devotee several times a day, and everytime padas suitable for the occasion were sung. Each time the idol was differently dressed. To meet the demand for different occasions, padas were composed. Thus this ritual gave rise to such padas as 'Sangar' (relating to the dress and make-up of Krishna), 'Hindola' (relating to the Lord relaxing on the swing and its movements), 'Thal' (describing the dishes served to Him), and 'Arti' (offering prayers to the Lord and other deities, both in the morning and in the evening). Two other poetic forms 'chaitavandan' (songs recited while having a view of the deity) and 'snatrapuja' (songs recited while the deity was given a bath and when flowers were offered to him) were noteworthy. Krishna Janma (birth-day festival of Krishna) was an occasion when songs welcoming his birth were sung. It must be noted that originally all the padas were composed for the expression of emotions, and later they adopted the form of narration or description. In some padas, descriptions related to the narration of characters. Even in descriptive padas description was a style of expressing emotions. Hence in the beginning padas were short, but later on descriptions became a part of the ritual and the proportion of the emotional element gradually diminished.

Bhajan institutions (institutions where religious-minded people gathered to sing hymns) also played a predominant role in the composition of padas, bacause hymns were required for collective singing. Bhajan meetings were held at night and sometimes lasted the whole night. On festival days meetings were also held during the day. A peculiarity of these padas was that the devotee simply eulogised the Lord, and did not ask for any material gain. They contained references to the transitoriness of the material world. Bhajanas or padas in which the devotee communicates his or her experience of the realisation of Almighty in an emotionally surcharged language, are found in abundance in the medieval Gujarati poetry. Narsingh says in one of his padas:

> Nirakhne gaganman kon ghumi rahyo tejhun sadba bole.
> (Behold there in the sky. He moves about incessantly saying, It is I, it is I).

In one of his padas the poet Akho (1591-1636) bursts into a rhapsody:

> Abhnavo anand aj agochar gochar havune.
> (Oh! what an unusual kind of joy I experience today because that which eluded the senses has permeated them).

The philosophical padas we come across are known as Avalvani (incongruous speech); it is mystic poetry in an enigmatic language. The statements made in such poetry are apparently incongruous, but deep below there is an inner meaning which records the mystic experience of the poets in their spiritual progress. Dhiro (1753–1825) in one of his Avalvani poems says:

> Tarnan the dungar re, dungar koj dekhenahi.
> (The mountain is overshadowned by straw and nobody is able to see it.)

Here the mountain symbolises the all-pervading Lord of the universe while the straw represents the finite things of the world. Thus in order to enjoy this poetry, one has to grasp the symbols.

In the narrative padas religious stories are narrated. Such stories are mythological, or are derived from those incidents in the lives of some famous devotees in which God had helped them materially. These being narrative poems, there is little scope for emotions. Most of these padas deal mainly with incidents from the life of Narsingh Mehta whom Krishna is supposed to have helped by appearing in human form.

Padas of the type of dramatic lyrics were either dialogues between two characters, or monologues of a character. The poet always stepped aside and allowed the characters to speak.

Narsingh Mehta and Nirantbhakta have composed padas in the letter form. In the former, the letter is from Gopi to Krishna depicting her miserable condition because of separation from Krishna, in the latter it is from a devotee to his preceptor making some queries on spiritual matters.

In the outward form of pada, the tek or dhruvpada (refrain) was an integral part. Sometimes instead of repeating the whole line some words were repeated. In Jain padas, the 'dhruvpada' is known as 'ankni'. Many a time the main concept of pada was presented in this refrain, and in the succeeding lines illustrations were given in support of the concept.

In one of the padas Narsingh Mehta says:—

Sukhdukh manman na aniye ghat sathe re ghadiyan.
(One should not ponder over happiness or misery. They are inborn with the body.)

Thus, the refrains were crucial lines in a pada. Some times we find that the tek is not the first line but some other line in which the main idea is presented. In some padas the teks for odd and even lines are different. As the padas were meant to be sung, the rhyme scheme was absolutely necessary.

Although the pada is mainly a poetic genre of the medieval Gujarati poetry, it has been extant in the modern period, because it is the most convenient genre which caters to the taste of all the poets irrespective of the sects to which they belong.

PADA (Marathi) in medieval Marathi was one of the various forms of verse. But pada did not quite enjoy the popularity of 'abhanga'. This pada form was not much used before the advent of the saint-poet Eknath (16th century A.D). Yet we get good specimens of padas in the works of the first Mahanubhava and Warakari poets. Thus we get padas in the 'chaupadis' of Damodar Pandit and in the writings of Jnaneshwar. They have a distinct refrain or 'dhruvapada' which is joined to the last line of the 'antara' stanza by the rhyming device. Needless to say that all these padas were set to the tune and rhythm of medieval Indian folk music. In Mahanubhava writings we get references to such compositions as 'dhuva', which is most probably derived from the term 'dhruva' present in Bharata's Natyashastra, denoting a genre of songs that are sung to the accompaniment of musical instruments. Saints like Namdev and Tukaram disliked the 'khyal' type of music, but Eknath as well as his great contemporary Dasopant (16th century) seems to have liked its indigenous counterpart, the Indian folk music. Ramadas (17th century) eulogized music, saying 'blessed is the art of singing'. The akhyanas and kirtanas of medieval poets and devotees helped the 'pada' pattern thrive. This trend continued right up to the end of the 19th century .

The first eminent pada poet is, without doubt, Eknath, to whose credit go many regular padas and such other songs as 'gavalans' and 'bharudas'. Ramadas composed many fine specimens of these padas all of which were, and still are, a favourite with the kirtanakars. Next comes Madhvamunishwara, whose lyrical songs are still a delight to the lovers of padas. Amatya, lovingly called 'Rayji' by the kirtankars, was also an equally popular writer of such songs and lyrics as were originally composed as padas. These two poets flourished in the 18th century. The pada form was ably utilized by poets like Manik Prabhu and Madhav in the 19th century, following the medieval tradition. Other pada poets, who belonged to the 18th century, are Shivdinanath, Mahipatinath, Devanath, Rajarama Prasadi and Sohirobanath.

One peculiarity about the writing of padas in medieval Marathi was that it was never the main or sole form of expression with the saint-poets of Maharashtra. In medieval Braja (Old Hindi) period, saints like Surdas and others expressed their devotion to God mainly through the pada form. Only some Marathi poets like Vitthal Bidkar, Ananda Tanya and other akhyankaras composed padas with a view to creating a definite musical effect, but these songs were simply a part of the whole akhyana, composed in classical metres and medieval verse forms. But the pada form, with single lines and refrains as dhrupadas with antara stanzas rhyming with them in their last lines, remained a favourite and esteemed way of poetical-cum-musical composition with the medieval poets.

The medieval pada form of verse composition had caught the imagination of the lavanikar poets (called Shahirs). Many of the lavanis, especially the 'gana' and 'gavalana' pieces, remind us of the padas of the saints and the classicists. It is likely that the sweet, musical padas and songs of the saint-poets, praising the dalliances of Radha and Krishna were the real inspiration behind such lavanis of the 18th and 19th century Shahirs.

These traditions of the Bhakti poems and lavanis greatly influenced the playwrights of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The musical compositions in the 'sangit natakas' were fashioned in the same mould, and were significantly called 'natakiya padas'. The lyrical poets of the same period wrote their 'bhava gita' compositions in the same strain. The pada form of composition is witnessed in many 'stree gits' and other folk-songs as well.

The pada form was accepted by almost all poets of the past four or five centuries, though it could never be the sole form of expression with any one of them.

PADAKALPATARU (Bengali) compiled by Gokulananda Sen (alias Vaishnavadas) is the most voluminous anthology of medieval Vaishnava lyrics composed in Bengali, Brajaboli and Sanskrit. Gokulananda collected 3101 'padas' of 130 poets and composers. Most of the padas in this anthology are related to Radha-Krishna episodes, while some centre round Shri Chaitanya. The latter are known as 'Gaurachandrika' (that is, pertaining to Gaurachandra or Sri Chaitanaya).

The original title of Padakalpataru was perhaps 'Gitakalpataru'. It is divided into four 'shakhas' (branches). The first 'shakha' is divided into eleven pallavas (sub-branches). The second, the third and the last are divided into 24, 31 and 36 'pallavas' respectively. This anthology includes 182 padas of Jnandas, 136 padas of Balaramadas and a considerable number of padas by Jayadeva, Vrindabandas, Ray Ramananda (an Oriya disciple of Sri Chaitanya), Madhav Ghose, Basudev Ghose, Lochandas, Narottamdas and Radhamoham Thakur. Gokulananda had intimate knowledge of Sanskrit aesthetics and the theories of 'rasa' as propounded by the Vaishnava acharyas. Moreover, his proficiency in 'kirtan' songs enabled him to winnow the authentic padas from the trite ones. Hence his collection has always been accepted as the most authoritative.

Gokulananda's special credit lies in the fact that he saved the Vaishnava lyrics from oblivion, mutilation and corruption. Indeed, some of the information given by him may not be correct. Some times he ignored the bhanita (the poet's name incorporated in the last line of each song) or gave wrong bhanitas. Hence there has been some confusion with regard to a few songs. But there is no denying the fact that the Padakalpataru is the best source book of Vaishnava lyrics of the medieval Bengali literature.

Of late, editors, publishers and printers of Bat-tala (a market for cheap books in north Calcutta), namely Keshab Ray, Baneswar Ghose, Bishwambhar Laha, and others published several editions of the Padakalpataru but these texts are mostly corrupt and inaccurate. The most authentic version came out in 1915, edited by the eminent Vaishnava scholar, Satishchandra Ray. It contained an elaborate introduction, useful information about phonetic changes that occurred in course of time, and important data regarding the lives of the composers. It also included variant readings of each pada.

PADALIPTA SURI (Apbhramsha/Prakrit) is an eminent Prakrit poet of the first or second century A.D. Several traditional Jain sources present his life as an inextricable tangle of history, legend and myth. They tell us of Padalipta's prematurely developed mental powers, his mastery of magic mantras, and his great influence over several kings of his time. The anecdotes describing his encounters with the famous Buddhist philosopher and Siddha Nagarjuna who, worsted in the performance of miracles, became his pupil, feature prominently in these hagiographies.

Myths and legendas apart, it is quite likely that Padalipta was a leading Jain monk of Koshala. He went to Pratisthan (modern Paithan in Maharashtra), which was then the seat of the Satavahan rulers and also a vigorous centre of Prakrit literature. After initial opposition from some poets and scholars, he seems to have acquired a highly respected position in the famed literary circle of Satavahan Hala, the glorious hero of legend and romance and renowned as a poet and patron of Prakrit literature. Several lyrics in Sapatshatak, the Prakrit anthology edited by Hala, are attributed to Padalipta.

The legend that Nagarjuna founded a city at the foot of the Shatrunjan hill in Saurashtra in honour of Padalipta is hardly reliable, but the corresponding modern place-name 'Palitan' (in modern Saurashtra) does mean etymologically the town or city belonging to, or named after Palitta, i.e. Padalipta.

Padalipta's fame as a great Prakrit poet rests primarily on the Taramgavai kaha (Sk. Tarangavati katha)/, which is unfortunately lost. But we can form a fair idea of the contents, form and narrative, and the poetic merits of that verse romance on the basis of its abridgement (prior to the tenth century A.D.), Samkhitta-Taramgavai kaha. Taramagvai has earned for Padalipta a respectful place among such eminent writers of early Prakrit narrative and lyric literature as Gunadhya, Hala, Sarvasena and Sanghadas. Some other works also, mostly religious or astrological, like Nirvanakalika, Samachari, and Prashnaprakasha are attributed to Padalipta Suri. The character of the subject-matter, its style and linguistic usages show that Nirvanakalika is a late work. As the legends associated Padalipta with Krishnaraja of Manyakheta (A.D. 878-914), Nirvanaraja also could be, in all probability, the work of a later writer.

PADAM (Tamil), literally a word, has the sense of a part of a verse in lyrical poetry; the word 'padyam' is a derivative which means poetry as against 'gadyam' which denotes prose.

The Natya shastra uses the term 'padam' to mean a song. Down the centuries, padam has come to be associated with dance, representing as it does the kind of lyrical song that lends itself to aesthetic representation through 'abhinaya' i.e. the language of the hands and eyes. Padams are found in almost all languages of India, wherever the dance tradition has been alive. It is believed that the padam as in vogue owes itself to the influence of Jayadeva whose Gita Govinda is held as model. Stylised in form, padam has some unique characteristics which lend distinction; first, it is dramatic in structure, in the form of a message or sentiment addressed to someone, recalling an event or an experience; second, its theme is romance, in all its aspects; third, the lyric is sensuous and delicate, both as song and as music. All this goes to make it apart from songs of other kinds, such as 'bhajan' or 'keertan', though in outward form the padam may consist of three parts, i.e. pallavi, anupallavi, and charanam exactly on par with 'keertanam'. The first two characteristics cited above are integral to the concept of the eight 'nayikas' described in Natya shastra and what makes the padam universal in its appeal is the impersonal nature of the song; no names are ever mentioned. The three characters who form the dramatis personae are HE, SHE and SAKHI; the first two represent a pair of young lovers (often referred to as the hero and heroine), while the third denotes the female companion of the girl in love—an intimate well-wisher, she is the one who steers the course of love, fixing the tryst for the lovers to meet, consoling the girl when she is lonely and pining for the man, cajoling the man into fidelity when he seems to stray away, admonishing the young girl when she shows excessive jealousy or peeve, etc. The Tamil tradition refers to her as 'tozhi', sometimes; but the word 'sakhi' also occurs as such. The manner in which these norms and devices are worked into poetry is reflected in the infinite variety as well as subtlety which the padam manifests; Kshetrayya, the composer in Telugu language is held as model. In Tamil, Ghanam Krishna Iyer, Subbarama Iyer and Kavi Kunjara Bharati are among the well-known composers of padam.

In the medieval period, the padam came to be employed to depict the love of God that humans manifest; thus God, in the form of a deity such as Krishna, Murugan, or Shiva, was the hero and the devotee, the heroine. But, the language of romance as employed by young ones in love continued to be used in poetry that sought to be devotional. This was known as love on surface, but devotion within (bahir shringara, antar bhakti). The double entendre that the listener comes across in many a devotional song can thus be explained.

PADAM (Telugu) is the generic name for several kinds of Telugu compositions set to music and dance. Palkuriki Somanatha, a famous Virashaiva poet, mentions in his Panditaradhya charitra several varieties of padam—Tummeda padam, Prabhata padam, Parvata padam, Ananda padam, Shankara padam, Gobbi padam, Vennela padam, Nivali padam, etc.—as having been prevalent in Telugu during his time. Some of these varieties survive to this day in the 'Yakshagana' text and Annamacharya's padams.

Bharata's Natya shastra (32: 25 to 27) defines pada as a combination of raga, tala, and pada (svara tala padatmakam) and classifies it as 'nibaddham' (metrical) and 'ani baddham' (free verse). Sankirtana lakshanam of Tallapaka Chinnanna (16th cent.) in Telugu recognises a third variety, 'vritta padam', freely employing any of the twenty-six Sanskrit metres, but examples of this type are hard to find in Telugu.

Though padam, a spontaneous and emotional expression of song and dance, originally belonged to the oral and folk tradition, classical writers too were drawn to this genre. Krishnamacharyulu is said to have composed more than four lakhs of 'vachana sankirtanas' (anibaddha padams), a few of which are extant. He used to sing them dancing in ecstasy in front of the presiding deity at Simhachalam. The 'vachanas' composed by the poets of the 'Yaganti' family (13th cent.) and the 'gadyas', etc. of Palkuriki Somanatha (13th cent.) may be mentioned among the prominent contributions to the 'anibaddha' variety of padam. Padam and sankirtana are used synonymously. Tallapaka Annamacharya (15th cent.), a devotee of Lord Venkateswara of Tirupati, who left to posterity about 32,000 padams inscribed in copper plates, is hailed as 'padakavita pitamaha' (lit. the grand-father of the genre of padam), as well as 'sankirtanacharya' (master of sankirtanas). His padas, which are nibaddha type, are classified into shringara (erotic), 'bhakti' (devotional), and 'adhyatmika' (metaphysical) varieties. Conversant with Purandaradasa's compositions in Kannada and Alvars' pasurams in Tamil, Annamacharya enriched his songs with piety and a rare charm. His son Peda Tirumalacharya and grandson China Tirumalacharya too composed quite a few mellifluous padams.

The most significant contribution to this genre, however, comes from Kshetrayya of Mova whose padams are rich in shringara and madhura bhakti and are compared to Jayadeva's Gitagovinda in Sanskrit. They have been favourites in Kuchipudi and Bhagavata performances and with Devadasis till recently. Pada literature had its hey-day during the reign of Vijayaraghava Nayaka (1633-1673) of Tanjore, whose court Kshetrayya visited and from where he received honours. Vangala Sinayya and several others also composed quite a few padams.

Usually a padam has a pallavi (refrain), and a few charanas (stanzas). A 'nibadhha' padam gives great scope for interpreting it variously by means of innovations in music and 'abhinaya'.

PADAVALI (Maithili). Vidyapati's fame as a great poet solely depends upon his Padavali (a series of padas or songs) in Maithili. From the Varnaratnakara of Jyotirisvara Thakura (1280-1340), the earliest extant prose work in Maithili, it appears that the practice of composing songs in Maithili is older than Vidyapati. Vidyapati simply picked up the pada and perfected it in such a way that it became a powerful vogue not only in Maithili but in other north eastern languages also. Songs numbering about one thousand are ascribed to him. It is very difficult to decide on the genuineness of all these songs, especially of a good number of devotional songs relating to Shiva, like 'Maheshavanis' and 'Nacharis'. It is equally difficult to arrange these songs in a chronological order.

There are three sources of the padas of Vidyapati: (1) manuscripts, (2) old collections and (3) oral transmission. Manuscripts were found in Mithila as well as in Nepal. In Mithila two manuscripts were found: (1) Rambhadrapura manuscript containing 96 padas and Tarauni manuscript, now lost, from which N.N. Gupta collected 239 padas. First Nepal manuscript contains 261 padas. Second Nepal manuscript has 37 new padas, edited by Ramanath Jha in his Bhasagita sangraha. Lochana in his Ragatarangini, a work of the 17th century, collected 51 padas of Vidyapati. Various collections of Vaishnava songs of Bengal have 283 padas of Vidyapati. George Abraham Grierson collected 84 padas from oral sources in 1881. N.N. Gupta's collection contains 663 padas in all. K.N. Mitra and B.B. Majumdar's collection contains 923 padas.

Thematically Vidyapati's songs may be divided into three types: (1) love songs, (2) devotional songs and (3) occasional songs. Love songs outnumber the rest two types. It is on his love songs that the influence of Jayadeva is visible. It is also corroborated by the title, 'Abhinava Jayadeva', bestowed on Vidyapati. Both Gitagovinda and love songs of Vidyapati are based on the love legends of Radha and Krishna. But the range of Gitagovinda is very limited in comparison with that of the love songs of Vidyapati. Gitagovinda describes the estrangement of Radha and Krishna, Radha's pining for Krishna and their final reunion. Love songs of Vidyapati describe Radha's love for Krishna and that of Krishna for Radha from the beginning to the end, delineating all the nuances of love. Besides, his songs also describe physical beauty, especially that of a woman, in different stages, and poses, and from different angles. But unlike Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, Vidyapati's love songs do not appear to form a connected whole. The thematic source of Jayadeva's Gitagovinda as well as of the love songs of Vidyapati cannot be definitely located. Both of them were acquainted with the Srimadbhagavata. Vidyapati even copied the whole of the Srimadbhagavata, although late in life. But the Srimadbhagavata does not mention Radha, and describes the autumnal and not vernal Rasalila. There are parallelisms between the treatment of Radha-Krishna legends by both Jayadeva and Vidyapati on one side and by the Brahmavaivartapurana on the other, but it cannot be conclusively proved that both of them were indebted to the Brahmavaivartapurana. But the legend of Radha appears to be older inasmuch as it occurs in Hala's Prakrita saptashati.

Devotional songs: They are in praise of Krishna, Shiva, Durga and Ganga. Most important of all devotional songs are Shiva songs which are of three types. The first type consists of prayers of Shiva which are well-known for their sincerity and simplicity. Some of these songs are composed in specific tune, and they are known as 'Nacharis' because devotees sing them in dance. The second type describes the incongruous marriage of the poor Shiva and Parvati, the daughter of the mountain-king. The third type describes the poverty-stricken domestic life of Shiva and Parvati. It is very difficult to accept all these Shiva songs, popularly ascribed to Vidyapati, as genuine.

Occasional songs are sung at different social functions. Occasional songs and devotional songs overlap one another. Songs composed in praise of Durga are sung at the beginning of every festive occasion by women-folk in Mithila. Marriage songs of Shiva and Parvati are sung on the occasion of marriage. Pure occasional songs are 'Uchitis' which are sung to the bridegroom as an appeal to look upon the bride kindly, and 'Jogas', viz. spells or charms to influence the husband of the newly married wife, etc. The authenticity of most of these occasional songs is, however, dubious.

Vidyapati's songs of love became a powerful vogue in Mithila as well as in neighbouring regions. In Mithila a large number of imitators of Vidyapati, who migrated from Mithila to Nepal, became instrumental in spreading his love-songs and other lyrics in Nepal with the result that both kings and their subjects composed songs in imitation of the great master. Vidyapati became a precursor of what was destined to be the great Vaishnava poetry of Bengal solely due to Chaitanya, who felt ecstatic pleasure in singing songs of Vidyapati. It was on this account that Vidyapati became a house-hold name in Bengal. He gave a new theme as well as a new language in the form of Brajaboli to the Vaishnava poets of Bengal. From Bengal the influence of Vidyapati reached Assam on one side and Orissa on the other.

PADAVALI (Oriya). The word 'padavali' occurs for the fisrst time in the famous Sanskrit work, Gitagovinda, of Jayadeva to denote musical composition. It seems, towards the beginning of the sixteenth century the Vaishnava poets of Bengal used this word for their lyrical compositions written on the model of Jayadeva and dealing with the love of Radha and Krishna. Since then the word padavali is mostly used in Bengal to denote songs dealing with the love of Krishna. In Oriya, the word is often used in the same sense.

Sri Chaitanya, the great exponent of the Gaudiya school of Vaishnavism, used to sing the songs of Vidyapati, Chandidas and Rai Ramananda, most of which were written in a mixed language, called 'Brajaboli'. As a result of Sri Chaitanya's long stay in Orissa and under his influence, such songs to some extent gained popularity in Orissa. A few Oriya poets like Rai Ramananda, Jadupati, Champati, Madhabi Dasi and Kanhai Khuntia composed songs in Brajaboli. Naturally these poets tended to write on the same theme in Oriya. The first known poet who wrote songs based on the 'rasa' of Krishna was Banamali Dasa of the sixteenth century.

But it can be safely said that in spite of the preachings of Sri Chaitanya, his doctrine of 'Prema-bhakti' or 'Raga-marga' could not gain superiority over the indigenous cult of the land during the period. No trace of influence of the preaching of Sri Chaitanya can be found in the writings of the five saint-poets of Orissa, viz., Balarama Dasa, Jagannatha Dasa, Achyutanada Dasa, Ananta Dasa and Jashobanta Dasa. However, in the subsequent century the doctrine of Prema-bhakti was gradually synthesised with the indigenous cult of the land and we find effusion of such songs, particularly from the pen of Dinakrushna Dasa of the later part of the seventeenth century.

The eighteenth century may be regarded as the golden age of the Vaishnava lyrics. Many devoted Vaishnava poets like Dinabandhuraj Harichandan, Sadananda Kabisurya Brahma and Banamali Dasa wrote beautiful songs dealing with the 'lila' (activities) of Krishna. Even the poets like Upendra Bhanja, Ramakrishna and Brajanatha Badajena, who were not Vaishnava, were also inspired to compose such songs. It seems the theme became popular and turned into a poetic convention during the period.

Hence most of the poets of Orissa mainly wrote 'padas' or Vaishnava lyrics till the advent of the Modern Age. Those who showed their excellence during the nineteenth century in writing such poems were Gopalkrishna Pattanayak, Kabisurya Baladeva Rath, Goudari Parichha and Gouracharan Adhikari. Besides, Hanuman Raiguru, Govinda Raiguru, Haribandhu Bebarta Pattanayak, Somenath Singh, Kishorechandra Rajendra, Biswambhar Rajendra also enriched this form with their writings.

It may be admitted that most of the poets who wrote such songs belonged to South Orissa, where the love-story of Krishna and Radha was more popular and was related to the public through the medium of 'lila' or dramatic performances known as 'Radha-prema lila' and 'Krishna-prema lila'.

Oriya padavali is to a great extent a string of conventional songs of Orissa known as 'chaupadi'. It starts with a 'dhruba pada', followed by four or five subsequent padas and ends with a colophon or 'bhanita', where the name of the poet is mentioned. Since these poems were written during the age of Riti, most of the poems manifest the rhetorical skill of the poet. These songs are more noted for their musical quality than for their wealth of ideas.

Though a few Oriya poets tried their hand at writing songs in Brajaboli or in Sanskrit metre, they did not gain popularity, because the Oriya pronunciation is different and the long vowels are not pronounced as such. Gourcharan Adhikari may be taken as the last poet who composed songs in Brajaboli. These padavalis were mainly written to be sung during the festivities associated with Lord Krishna, such as Dola Yatra and Jhulana when 'lila' and 'kirtana' are usually performed. Dancing boys dressed as girls, popularly called gotipua, sing these songs, appearing as Radha, Krishna and gopi. Generally the 'raga' and 'tala' used in 'chaupadi' are used in padavali. These songs are very different from the kirtan of Bengal.

In Orissa, Krishnalila or Rasa is performed twice, once during the spring, and then during the autumn. There are two types of songs called 'vasant rasa', pertaining to spring and 'sharada rasa' pertaining to autumn. Of these two types, vasant rasa of Pindiki Srichandan and sharada rasa of Gourcharan Adhikari deserve special mention. In these songs such themes as the unearthly beauty of Radha and Krishna, their preliminary aquaintance, Krishna's dalliance with the gopis and Radha, his home-coming from the forest with cows and friends at dusk, Radha's 'mana', Krishna's soothing words in praise of Radha to appease her, her intense love, her longing in separation, and 'akshepanuraga' (Radha accusing all including herself for not being able to win the love of Krishna), the final union of Radha and Krishna, the pleasing jokes of the companions of Radha and Krishna are the general themes. A few songs also depict the filial emotion of Yashoda for Krishna. However, in padavali the mental condition of Radha and Krishna in different phases of their love is described through conversation among their respective companions. Some songs are written in the form of an address of a particular 'sakhi' or group of 'sakhis'.

The imagination, experience and feelings of the medieval poets found expression in these poems. These songs were very popular because of their human appeal and musical quality. They also owe their popularity to their basic appeal to contemporary religious fervour.

PADAVALI (GOPAL KRISHNA) (Oriya). An enormous amount of literature on the Vaishnava cult was written in Orissa as in other regions of India. A collection, entitled Padavali of Gopal Krishna (1785-1862), was first published in 1889-93. Many padavalis were written earlier in Oriya from the sixteenth century to the first part of the eighteenth. The poets who composed Krishna kavyas are Danai Das, Debadurlava Das, Upendra Bhanja, Bhupati Pandit, Vrindabati Dasi, Dinakrushna Das, Abhimanyu Samanta Sinhara, Brajanath Badajena, Bhakta Charana Das and Kavisurya Baladeva Ratha. Their padavalis were popular because of their emotional fervour which stirred the hearts of the common men. The poets depicted Radha and Krishna not as spiritual personalities but as ordinary human beings. Gopal Krishna Pattanayak adopted the style of Vaishnava padavalis which were both musical and lyrical. He not only composed a larger number of padavalis than his predecessors and contemporary poets did, but also depicted the lila of Krishna with all its variety and richness in his poems with great naturalness and artistic beauty. In his conduct and ideals he was a true Vaishnava, and his literature was part of his religious practice. He conceived Sri Krishna as Shringara incarnate and 'Paramananda svarupini' (supreme bliss). He considered singing and chanting the names of Radha and Krishna to be the supreme goal of his life. In his Padavali he worshipped them as his 'sakhi' (friend).

The Padavali of Gopal Krishna is based on the feeling of love-'shringara rasa'. Shringara is considered the basic element in the padavali literature, but the Vaishnavas call it madhura rasa. Gopal Krishna has portrayed both the union with and the separation from Lord Krishna, the 'purusha' par excellence. His depiction of pathos in the separation of lovers is very heart-touching. Gopal Krishna has depicted in many of his poems the tireless effort of Radha to attain the love of Krishna and the trial of her love in separation. For example, he says in one of the poems—'daya na karantu mu dasi sina re'. He has also invoked 'shanta' rasa in his chaupadis, entitled 'Manah siksha'. His devotional poem, 'Anusarita Prabhu kalayaka gala sarita' is based on shanta rasa. He has also depicted 'vatsalya' rasa as in 'Uthilu ede begi kahinkine duhki dhana'. These padavalis were meant to be sung, and musical metres were followed while composing them. He has used ragas and raginis like ashabari, ananda bhairabi, kalyani, kedar, gandhar, bhaikhi, bangalashree, shankarabharana, etc.

Gopal Krishna, had a good command of Sanskrit, but his padavalis are wonderfully free from terse Sanskritised language. He has successfully used colloquial Oriya words and idioms and harmonised them with polished 'tatsam' (pure) words, Mayadhar Mansinha has compared Gopal Krishna's poems with the water of an autumn spring which flows scantily but is pure and tasteful. His poems need no commentary, as they convey eternal joy to both the learned and the ignorant.

PADGAONKAR, MANGESH KESHAV (Marathi; b. 1929) is one of the most popular post-Independence Marathi poets. He did his M.A. in first division, winning Tarkhadkar and N.C. Kelkar gold medals. He heads the Marathi section at the U.S. Information office in Bombay. Earlier, he was Professor of Marathi, and thereafter, senior producer of the Marathi section at the All India Radio. He was also the co-editor of Sadhana, a Marathi weekly, for sometime.

As a poet, he acknowledges his literary debt to some senior poets like Borkar and Kusumagraj, who have left some mark on his style. Dharanritya (1950), Gypsy (1953) Chhoti (1957), Sharmishtha (1960), Utsava (1962), Vatratika (1963), Mira (1965), Vidushak (1966), Bholanath (1968), Salam (1978) and Gazal (1981) are his well-known collections of poems. His poems are expressive of different moods, ranging from devotion to introspection. Chhoti and Bholanath got the State Government awards. Salam was the Sahitya Akademi Award winner (1980). Nimbonichya zadamage (1950) is a collection of his short stories. He has done some translations also from English into Marathi.

PADGHAVALI (Marathi) is one of the major works of G.N. Dandekar who describes it as a portrait, rather than as a novel, of a village standing on the brink of decline. Published in 1955, it pioneered the trend of regional novels in Marathi. Padghavali is the name of a village in the Konkan region round which the story revolves. It is, in fact, the village Padghavali itself which becomes the central character of the story which covers three generations of malgujars (village chiefs). The natural beauty of Konkan with its tropical flora and fauna, as well as its cultural life pattern, comes out vividly through the graphic details of the novel. The book offers a realistic portrayal of contemporary society woven through the fabric of characters and situations. It also raises pertinent questions about sex-based inequality and points out the glaring discrepancies in the prevalent social order, e.g. customs like child marriages and pitiable status of child widows in the family. The most engaging character of the novel is Amba who enters the family of the malgujars as an adorable child-bride and grows into a strong character playing the pivotal role of the first lady of the village. Firm and resolute, she ably deals with the challenges of time and tackles the problems facing not only her family but also the villagers. She leads them in their fight against socio-economic injustice.

The novel also deals with the problems posed by mechanical advancement, such as unemployment in villages and the not-so-happy consequences of migration. It also brings out the collapse of the prevailing value-system and the tightening grip of materialism. Amba tries her best to hold the village together, protecting the villagers from Vyanku, her villainous brother-in-law. Her husband has already fallen a victim to the evil designs of Vyanku and met his tragic death. Her efforts to maintain the dignity of the village win her the love and respect of the people. Finally, weary of unending problems and having grown old, she decides to leave the village to stay with her son at Bombay. The whole village fondly gathers at the jetty to bid her good-bye. She gets into the boat with a heavy heart, sails past a short distance, but then realizes that her attachment to Padghavali is too deep to be served.

The novel ends on a touching note, reinforcing the unbreakable bond between Padghavali and Amba. It was serialised on television in 1989.

PADHIYAR, AMRITLAL (Gujarati; b. 1870 d.1919) was born at Chorwad in Saurashtra and had his education at Rajkot. From an early age he had a spiritualistic leaning, and was devoted to meditation and study of philosophical works. Nanalal, the famous lyricist of Gujarat, wrote a poem on him, entitled 'Saurashtrano sadhu' (Saint of Saurashtra). Though he did not renounce the world, he led a saintly life. He has written about twenty-two books, which comprise devotional poems, hymns, bhajans, fables, stories for children, illustrative stories, etc. His Navayugni vato (1911) is a book of short stories presenting social problems of contemporary life. Dukhiane dilaso (1918) shows an unhappy man's ways of shedding the gloom. His Ishwarstuti (1918) contains songs of obeisance to Almighty, Bhajansagar contains hymns of a devotee, Harijan stotra (1932) lays down the characteristics of a true devotee. Dashtrasutriala (1940) gives some practical suggestions regarding eradication of misery. Bansiman Bhagivane sun gayun (1948) gives in nutshell the teachings of Lord Krishna. Balkoni vato (1953) has humorous stories for children with a message.

He has written twelve books on the subject of heaven, such as Sachnun swarga (Heaven of truth, 1940), Swargani kunchi (Key to heaven, 1940), Swargani sadak (Passage to heaven, 1940), Swargano prakash (Light of heaven, 1940), Swargni jindagi (Life in heaven, 1940), Swarga no anand (Joys of heaven, 1941), etc. All these books contain directions for those who want to establish heaven on earth, each written from a different angle and the source being his rich spiritual experience.

PADHYE, BHAU (Marathi) b. 1926) is a free-lance journalist. He was born and educated at Bombay and obtained his B.A. degree from the University of Bombay.

He shot into prominence in 1965 when he brought out his work, Vasunaka, a terse and true-to-life portrayal of hypocrisy in society. His earlier two works are Dombury-acha khel (1960), dealing with the life of workers, and Vaitagwadi (1964), a search into the futility of life, which received an award from the Maharashtra government. Barrister Anirudha Dhopeshwarkar (1969), got him the 'Lalit' award. He has written eight novels and one drama.

PADHYE, PRABHAKAR ATMARAM (Marathi; b. 1909, d. 1984) was one of the foremost figures in the field of Marathi journalism and literary criticism during 1940-1980. He was a spirit of fire and dedication that strove to attain excellence in all his pursuits. As has been the case with most of the Indian intellectuals, his convictions were subjected to diverse pulls of the best in ancient Hindu tradition, western liberalism and the basic doctrines of Marxism understood in terms of humanism. Towards the end of his career, he was inclined towards a mixed creed in which liberalism, socialism and humanism co-existed in different proportions.

Padhye did his B.A. in Economics from the University of Bombay in 1932. He was carried into the stream of Marxist thought at that time. He was editor of the Marathi weekly Dhanurdhari between 1939 and 1945 and of the Marathi daily Navashakti from 1946 to 1953. He was Secretary of the Indian Committee for Cultural Freedom in the fifties. Between 1955 and 1967, he was Asian representative of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to which the ICCF was affiliated. He was Director of the Centre for Indian Writers, established in Pune towards the end of this period. He was President of the Gomantak Marathi Sahitya Sammelan held in Belgaum in 1950 and of the Marathi Patrakar Parishad at Kolhapur in 1952.

In 1935, Padhye wrote the book, Aajkalcha Maharashtra, in collaboration with S.R. Tikekar. It maps out the cultural, social, intellectual and political life of Maharashtra from the times of Shivaji to the period after the First World War. Pakistan ki pannas takke (1941), Samajavadacha punarjanma (1952), Yugoslavia (English, 1962) are some of his books commenting on the political developments between and after the two wars. In the reputed literary periodical Pratibha, Padhye wrote the feature 'Pashchimekadche ware'. He was particularly interested in the personalities of Bertrand Russell, Trotsky, Max Eastman, Waman Malhar Joshi and Jayprakash Narayan.

A scholar of aesthestics, in his book Kalechi kshitije (1942), Padhye took cognisance of the ideas on aesthetics of several Indian and foreign scholars and raised fundamental questions about the nature of art. In the book Mardhekaranchi saundaryamimansa (1970) Padhye examines the aesthetic thought of Mardhekar in depth. He wrote another book on Patankar's theories of aesthetics, entitled Patankaranchi saundaryamimansa (1979). In Saundaryanubhav which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1982), Padhye propounds a new theory of the experience of beauty.

On this rather controversial issue, he suggests that it is 'interest' which supports all experience of beauty, and that every experience has two sides, one concerned with its means and the other with an ingrained 'rasa'. Much more debatable is the theory of 'reticular formation' which he ties up with the experience of beauty.

Three more works of criticism by Padhye are Waman Malhar va vicharsaundarya, Aswad (1977) and Kadambarikar Khanolkar (1977).

Padhye was deeply interested in alien cultures. He wrote interesting travelogues such as Nave jag: navi kshitije (1954), Agastichya anganaat (1958), Udta galicha (1959), Tokonoma (1961) and Hirvi unhe (1964). Padhye's position in the Congress for Cultural Freedom gave him a rare opportunity to mix with American intellectuals such as Herbert Passin, and to travel through westernised countries like Japan. This side of his life is reflected not only in the travelogues, but also in a novel, Maitrin (1961); its hero, torn between an indigenous set of values and morals, is typical of the dilemma which Padhye himself experienced in his later years. Padhye, though better known as a journalist and critic, was himself a creative writer. He has a few collections of short stories to his credit, viz. Vyadhachi chandani (1944), Krishnakamalichi vel (1945), Ardha vartule (1949), Andharatil savalya (1966), Neele diwas (1976) and Sandhykalchya savalya (1984).

Prabhakar Padhye will be long remembered for his distinguished career in journalism, for breaking a new path in travelogue writing, for ushering in the modern psychological short story, for his contribution to literary criticism and aesthetic theory, and above all for the sustained display of a dauntless spirit.

PADIKKASUP PULAVAR (Tamil; b. 16th cent.) was born in Kalandai in Thondai Mandalam. He was a devotee of Shiva and daily placed a gold coin on the step of the Lord's temple to help a poor brahmin priest who performed the 'puja' (worship) with empty stomach. Hence the Shiva of that sanctum came to be known as Padikkasuththambiran (Lord with coin on the step), an appellation that was applied to the poet as well.

He had composed sadhagams (hundred songs) and loose poems on several occasions on several topics. He composed three sadhagam works, namely Thondai mandala sadhagam, Pullirukku veloor sadhagam and Thandalaiyar sadhagam. Thondai mandalam covers the entire Pallava kingdom, and Pullirukku Vellor and Thandalai are famous sacred places with ancient Shiva temples. The modern name of Pullirukku Veloor is Vaidhessvaran Koil, and the ancient name of Thandalai was Thandalai Neel Neri. These three works contain a hundred songs each. Manikkavasagar's Thirusadhagam is the first work which contains a hundred songs sung by a single poet in a single poem.

The loose thirty-one songs of Padikkasup Pullavar are found in the collection of songs called Thanippadal thirattu. These songs are on deities, like Shiva, Parvati and Subramanya, and on kings like Ragunatha Sedhupati, and on popular individuals like Seedhakkadhi, Thirumala and Kumarendra Gangeyan. In the poem on Kumarendra Gangeyen, he refers to the sculptures of Skandha purana episodes carved out in the Shiva temples. In the poems on Shiva and Amba the experiences of devotees are mentioned with the simplicity of a child. In the poems on Seedhakkadhi, Padikkasup Pulavar hails the greatness of the man who was a strong supporter and admirer of Tamil poets and language. The famous poet Ottakkootar (the contemporary of Kamban), Villiputhoorar and Adhiveera Rama Pandiyan are some of the poets mentioned in these songs for their strong opposition to sub-standard poems. The works of Padikkasup Pulavar are written in a simple unadorned language.

PADMA RAJU, PALAGUMMI (Telugu; b. 1916) is a noted Telugu novelist, short story writer and poet, popularly known as 'Papa' in literary circles. Born in a Brahmin family at Rayakuduru, he took his M.Sc. degree in Chemistry from the Banaras Hindu University in 1937 and taught in several colleges. Afterwards he entered the field of cinema in Madras. To him writing is not an end in itself but a means to cultural liberation. He was greatly influenced by Russian, English and French writers. In his early days he experimented with free verse. With 'Puriti pata' (Song of delivery, 1938) he made his debut as poet and his first poem was very much appreciated by the modernists.

Padmaraju's study of Marxism and his association with freedom struggle in the 1940's took him to radical humanism in political thinking and to a lively style in story-telling. Under the influence of his uncle, a Satyagrahi, he produced 'Galivana' (The cyclone, 1951) which won the second prize in the International short story competition conducted by the New York Herald Tribune. It deals with the life and values of the upper middle class. It is a good-humoured acceptance of the behaviour pattern of a woman living from moment to moment. Earlier, he published two outstanding collections of short stories, Kuli janam (The labourers, 1944) and Papa kathalu (Stories of Papa, 1945).

He made his short story a strong vehicle for the presentation of some living characters and their attitudes of life and environment. For example, in 'Padava prayanam' (Journey by boat, 1950) he gave vent to a personal middle class reaction to the totally rustic behaviour of a woman. His first novel Bratikina kaleji (Living college, 1965) was written in the style of Wodehouse, the English humorist. In it, the sense of the ridiculous matters more than the theme. His second novel Bendava Asokuni munnalla palana (The short-lived rule of Ashoka the Second, 1968) is a political satire written in the fashion of Steinbeck, the American novelist. Nalla regadi (The black cotton soil, 1970) is a tale of two families in feud. However, it has a romantic background.

Rama rajyaniki rahadari (The highway to the kingdom of Rama, 1971) is his own record of political events since 1930. He recollects a group of characters near Bhimavaram who came into the Congress Movement for a variety of reasons, individual and patriotic, and then got into a quarrel. His characters show a full judgement of life. In narration he combines pathos with humour. He also translated some Tamil plays into Telugu. Rakta kanniru (Tears of blood, 1971) and Shanti nivasam (A home of peace, 1973) are popular among them. He worked as script-writer for many successful films and All India Radio serials. The Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi honoured him with an award for his novel Nalla regadi.

PADMABATI (Bengali) is a verse narrative by Alaol who was one of the most powerful poets in medieval Bengali. It was written sometime between 1645 and 1652. Alaol was a court poet of king Thosominter of Arakan (now in Burma). He wrote it under the patronage of Quershi Magan Thakur, an important officer of the king. Padmabati is a translation of Malik Muhammad Jaisi's Padmavat, composed in Awadhi-Hindi in 1540. But Alaol's work is much more than a literal translation. The story is briefly this. King Gandhrava of Sinhal had a very wise parrot. Padmabati, the daughter of the king, loved this bird. The parrot made a vow that it would go out and find her the best groom. It flew away but was caught and sold to a Brahmin of Chittor. The Brahmin sold the bird to Ratnasen, the young Rajput king of Chittor. The king came to know from the bird about the beauty of Padmini (Padmabati) and resolved to get her as his queen. The king went to Sinhal with his sixteen hundred followers, all disguised as saints. Ratnasen had to overcome many hurdles, and ultimately, with the help of Mahadeva, married Padmini and came back with her to Chittor.

Emperor Alauddin of Delhi learnt of the legendary beauty of Padmabati and besieged Chittor to secure her as his empress. He kept Chittor surrounded by his army for eight years but failed to conquer it. He then played a trick. He proposed a friendly treaty which Ratnasen readily accepted. They became friends. But while leaving, the Emperor suddenly arrested Ratnasen and took him to Delhi. Padmabati arranged to save his life and ensured his safe return with the help of Badal and Gora, two faithful and gallant warriors. Ratnasen came to know that during his absence Devapala, the king of Kuntalan, had tried to secure Padmini as his queen. He attacked Devapala and killed him. Ratnasen, who was fatally wounded, entrusted Badal with the responsibility of saving Chittor from the enemy. Both Nagmati and Padmabati followed their husbands to the funeral pyre. Emperor Alauddin attacked Chittor again, killed Badal and brought Chittor under his rule.

PADMAGUPTA (Sanskrit; 11th cent.), alias Parimala or Parimala Kalidasa, was a Sanskrit poet. He was the son of Mrganka Gupta (or Datta), court-poet of the famous king Munja of the Paramara dynasty of Dhara (Malwa, Madhya Pradesh) and an ardent devotee of Shiva. He wrote the poem Navasahasanka-charita, depicting the marriage of his patron king Paramara Sindhuraja alias Navasahasanka (two of the many names borne by Munja) with the mythical Naga princess Shashiprabha. The princess finds her pet deer pierced by an arrow bearing the king's name; the king, pursuing the deer, finds a swan with a pearl-necklace with the princess's name on it; the princess's maid, searching for the necklace, meets the king; an interview follows. He is asked to invade Nagaloka, kill the demon Vajrankusha and fetch the golden lotus from his pleasure-pond. All this is easily accomplished and the lovers are united. The poem does not have much historical value. It is only a heightened fairy-tale. The narrative interest, however, is maintained in spite of some digressions. Padmagupta also seems to have written another poem, now lost, on the theme of the Tailanga king Baspa's expedition against Mularaja of the Chalukya dynasty of Gujarat. Padmagupta is quoted and praised by many later poet-critics. He admired and imitated Kalidasa so successfully that he is sometimes called 'Parimala Kalidasa'.

Mohanlal Bhatt, a poet himself, encouraged his son to write poetry. The first to acknowledge his poetic gift and to reward him was Raghunath Rao Apa, the ruler of Sagar. However, there was some misunderstanding between the two, and the poet had to go back to his ancestral home at Banda. The rulers of Jaitapura and Sugra became his admirers. For the latter he wrote laudatory verses compiled as Arjun Rayasa. Then he went to the court of Datiya and received land as a gift for his poetry. Later, he visited Rajadhan and was able to please its ruler with his composition. From there he went to Satara, and its ruler, Raghunath Rao, gifted him ten villages and a cash of one lakh rupees. At Jaipur, he won over the heart of the king and was made court-poet. It was here that he wrote his famous book Jagatvinod, a book on rhetoric. He visited Udaipur and Gwalior too, and wrote Alijaha prakash in 1821 in honour of the ruler of Gwalior, Daulat Rao Sindhia. In 1826 Ratansimha was coronated at Charakhari, and Padmakar went to pay his respects to him but was rebuffed by the king. Taking this insult to heart Padmakar decided to pass the rest of his life on the banks of the Ganga.

Padmakar's original works include three types of poems: laudatory, erotic and devotional. The dominant note in the laudatory verses is the heroic sentiment. These verses are full of historical anachronism, yet for their effective language and use of figures they cling to our memory. His two works on rhetoric combine theory and practice. After enunciating in brief the canons of poetry, he writes artistic verses to serve as illustrations and dwells mainly on the delineation of the erotic sentiment. His Padmabharan is a good book on figures of speech. The images are, by and large, erotic in nature. Musical syntax, polished vocabulary and racy style characterize his poetic diction. These qualities drew the attention of many a poet who wrote under his influence. Gwala and Lachhiram are notable among those who followed Padmakar's diction and style.

PADMAKUMAR SINGH, KANGHAM (Manipuri)

PADMANABHA (Gujarati/Rajasthani; 15th century) was an eminent poet of old Gujarati and Western Rajasthani, famous for his only available work, Kanhadade prabandha (1456). The work extols the heroic fight of Kanhadade (a Rajput prince of the Chauhan dynasty ruling at the fort of Jalore in western Rajasthan) against the invading armies of Sultan Alauddin Khilji of Delhi. Kanhadade did not allow the army of the Sultan to pass through his territory when the latter invaded Gujarat, and looted his army while he was returning to Delhi. That was how the struggle started and lasted for twelve years. The events described by this heroic poem took place in the first decade of the 13th century.

The poet Padmanabha was a Nagara Brahmin from Visnagar in north Gujarat and was the court-poet of Akheraja, the contemporary ruler of Jalore and a descendant of Kanhadade. The saga contains over one thousand verses in four parts in addition to some prose. Evidently it ranks foremost in literary merit among the longer heroic poems of old Gujarati and Rajasthani literature. All the characters of the poem are historical except, perhaps, Piroja, the princess of Alauddin, whom the poet has introduced to describe her tragic love for Virama, the son of the hero.

The chief merit of Padmanabha's work lies in its diction, realistic descriptions and characterization. It also gives a vivid picture of the social conditions of Gujarat and Rajasthan.

The poet was perhaps the last representative of the joint family of Rajasthani and Gujarati. His knowledge of Sanskrit and Indian scriptures was profound, a fact apparent at several places in Kanhadade prabandha. The classical style of epic poetry, handed down from Sanskrit through various Prakrits and Apabhramsha, was thoroughly mastered by him. He was imbued with patriotic fervour—the spirit he reveals in his depiction of the Chauhan's fight against the aggressors. He was, indeed, an inspiring poet of great calibre.

PADMANABHA KURUP, AZHAKATTU (Malayalam; b. 1869, d.1931) belonged to the illustrious family of Azhakattu at Chavara, a few miles to the north of Quilon. He had little schooling in the modern sense of the term, but had enough of a rigorous, traditional type of education, involving the study of advanced Sanskrit kavyas, shastras and some texts of astrology under the supervision of able preceptors. Later, he acquired some proficiency in Hindustani also. His official life, as a Malayalam Pandit in the Government High School at Chavara, was short (1918-1924), but inspiringly brilliant as attested by no less a person than Suranad Kunjan Pillai, one of his well-known disciples.

Though highly talented, Kurup did not write anything worth noting until he was 22, owing mainly to his household duties and litigation. His first contribution is Gandharva vijayam (1891), an attakkatha with some highly readable passages. His contributions in the form of translation, 'samasyapooranam', etc, began to appear in the same year in periodicals like Vidya vinodini (Trichur) and Manorama (Kottayam). In 1894, there came Meenaketanacharitam, a drama in seven acts. This was followed by a series of translations from Sanskrit. Kurup's claim to fame rests chiefly on his Ramachandra vilasam, which took him amidst his multifarious preoccupations nearly eleven years to finish (1894-1905). It is the first typical mahakavya in Malayalam, written in strict accordance with the rules laid down by Dandin, the great Sanskrit writer on poetics. It has twenty-one cantos and 1833 stanzas in different Sanskrit metres, and covers the story of the Ramayana from the birth of Sri Rama to his coronation as king of Ayodhya. There is one whole canto (8th) in the 'yamaka' style and there are stanzas embodying 'chitras' or figures and those written using only one or two letters of the alphabet in another canto (20th). All these feats Kurup has accomplished not with an overdose of Sanskrit words as done by some of his successors in the field, but mostly with the help of Malayalam words. So the work is regarded not only as one of the best mahakavyas, but also as one of the great poetical compositions in Malayalam on the Ramayana story. His 'Prabhu shakti' (1914), a narrative poem, is another notable contribution.

PADMANABHA PANICKER, MULLUR S. (Malayalam; b. 1869, d. 1931), a native of Tiruvalla, was brought up by his father Mullur S. Sankaran Vaisyan, a Sanskrit scholar and physician. His father and some village teachers taught him Sanskrit texts like Kumarasambhava and Naishadha, as well as Ayurveda. He started writing poems at the age of thirteen. Though he studied Ayurveda, he did not practise it. He concentrated on literature and social work. Being a member of the Ezhava caste, he became a disciple of the great Narayana Guru. Panicker wrote many poems even in his younger days, and the work entitled Asanna maranachinta shatakam (Thoughts of the dying man, 100 verses) won him a prize at a competition held by the famed Bhashaposhini Sabha. He was involved in many activities relating to literature and social problems. Padmanabha Panicker wrote about twenty works, including original poems, translations, etc. Sri Parikshidudbhavam, Nalacharitam, Krishnarjuna vijayam, Kiratam, and Ammana pattu works, Kotiyaviraham, some portions of Vishwagunadarsha champu, etc. are translations from Sanskrit. Padadoshaprakaranam is on poetics, Krishnarjuna vijayam is an attakkatha, and Sanmargachandrika is a didactic poem comprising four hundred verses. Panicker also wrote in different forms of verse such as stotras, lullabies, unjal pattu, vanchippattu, etc. There are some prose works as well. Kerala Varma Valiyakoil Tampuran, the father of modern Malayalam, honoured Panicker with the title 'Sarasakavi'. The works of Padmanabha Panicker show the poetic merits of a disciplined poet.

PADMANABHA PILLAI, KAINIKKARA (Malayalam; b. 1878, d. 1976), the eldest of the 'Kainikkara brothers', was a noted dramatist in Malayalam. He inherited literary and histrionic talents from his father and began writing at an early age. After graduation, he became a teacher in the N.S.S. High School at Changanacherry and later became the Headmaster of the N.S.S. School at Karukachal. He was appointed Inspector of N.S.S. Schools, and earned reputation as an orator and actor. He was elected to the Travancore Legislative Assembly, and later entered Government service and occupied several high posts. After retiring from Government service, he devoted his time to literary and journalistic activities.

Padmanabha Pillai is one of the most powerful dramatists of Kerala. His first published play Velu Tampy Dalava, based on the life and death of the earliest freedom fighter from Kerala, Velu Tampy, created a big sensation when it was staged by a group of talented amateur actors including the author and his younger brother, Kainikkara Kumara Pillai. His second play Kalvariyile kalpapadam on the life of Jesus Christ was also a big hit in which he played the part of Jesus Christ to perfection. His play Swati Tirunal won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. Besides nine plays, he has written five novels and a number of short stories and essays. His prose is highly powerful and poetic. He is rightly considered one of the pioneers of the Malayalam prose drama.

PADMANABHA PILLAI, SRIKANTHESVARAM (Malayalam; b. 1863, d. 1946), was a well-known lexicographer and scholar. His dictionary of the Malayalam language is a standard work in popular use. Besides his contribution to this field, he has authored several works in a variety of areas. His main works are Kanakalatasvayamvaram (A play, 1892), Pandavavijayam (A play, 1893), Kishanighantu (A pocket dictionary, 1905); Madanakamacharitam (A musical play, 1906); Sahityabharanam (A biographical dictionary, 1934); Shabdataravali (A dictionary, 1941); Amarakosham (Sanskrit lexicon with commentary). Altogether he wrote about seventy works. Shabdataravali, however, is the basis of his lasting fame.

Executive Engineer in Kerala. His novels have earned him good recognition. His novel Talaimuraikal (1963) is a realistic study of the conflict between two generations in a Chettiar family—a study of failure in human relationships. Theravi, symbolising the new generation, reacts to Sivanathaperumal's injustice to his wife, Nagu, who is his sister. The attempt of an individual to define himself fails somehow. Pallikondapuram (1970) also deals with a similar theme. Anandan Nayar's wife Karthikayani runs away with a Tahsildar because of the husband's brutal behaviour coupled with his sexual inadequacy, and Anandan's attempt to take revenge on her fails. In all his novels, the emphasis is on human ties (or 'Uravukal', the title of another novel) which are now crippled by sex-consciousness in a sick society. His later novels, like Min ulakam (1976), Files (1973) and Vattathin veliye (1980), portray the life of an average man in a society caught in the circle of bureaucracy against which runs the family life with its more positive rhythms. In all his novels, the realistic dialogue with a regional flavour plays a major role; in Min ulakam, the technique of a telephonic dialogue is exploited to portray existentially the predicament of the modern man. Talaimuraikal has been translated into English as The Generations by Ka. Na. Subramaniam, and Pallikondapuram has been chosen by the National Book Trust of India for translation into Indian languages. Uravukal has earned the writer the Rajah Annamalai Chettiar Award (1977). His other novels include Yathirai (1965), Anubavankal (1972), Samar (1973), Udayatharakai (1970), Ithayame alinthu po (1964); and Netru vanthaval.

He has published quite a few short stories also which have been anthologised as Moham muppathu andu, Sandaiyum samadhanamum (1972), Moonravathu nal (1974) and Irandavathu mukam (1978), the most important of them all. All his stories give us flashes of reality and a sense of ordinariness and incompleteness of life. Psychic sickness is often portrayed in stories like 'Kadi koram' and 'Veedu'.

PADMANABHAN, T. (Malayalam; b. 1937) is a well-known writer of short stories. He started his career as a lawyer and practised for over ten years in Cannanore. Now he is an officer in the F.A.C.T., Alwaye. Unlike the renaissance writers, who gave importance to incidents, characters and day-to-day problems, Padmanabhan adopted an entirely different approach to short story. The flight from the mere narrative to the highly imaginative is obvious in his stories. His stories have also a poetic quality about them. More often than not he employs a modified version of realism utilizing a technique of quick, vivid scenes, while characters and incidents come to represent something beyond themselves, a pattern suggesting a dark, pessimistic vision of life.

Padmanabhan started writing in 1948. He was selected for the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for his collection Sakshi, though he declined it.

FURTHER WORKS: Prakasham parattunna oru penkutti (1955); Oru kathakrittu kurishil (1956); Makhan singhinte maranam (1958); Sahrudayanaya oru cheruppakkarante jeevitathil ninnu (1961).

PADMANABHAN UNNI, D. (Malayalam; b. 1886, d. 1962) was an outstanding critic and essayist. After taking his M.A. degree in Malayalam, he became a lecturer and finally Professor at the Union Christian College, Alwaye. His contribution to literature includes some historical novels and dramas, but his fame rests mainly on his critical essays.

Padmanabhan Unni's seven critical appraisals of Charudatta by A.R. Rajaraja Varma, Jyotishmati by K. Narayana Kurukkal, Nalini and Leela by Kumaran Asan, Kesari by Vengayil Kunhiraman Nayanar, Heera by Ulloor, Bhootarayar and Bhaskara Menon by Appan Tampuran, and Urubhanga by Bhasa have been brought out in the volume Mandana manjari (1928). Sahityasarani (1948) contains his essays on the study of literature in relation to other forms of art, life and society. His critical studies on the contribution of Thunchat Ezhuttachhan, Naduvat Mahan Nambutiri, Chandu Menon, C.V. Raman Pillai and Appan Tampuran have been compiled in Sahityarangam (1949).

Padmanabhan Unni has written some poems, collected in Sri Chitrodayam (1938), two plays, Antiyamantranam (1932) and Aniyara (1954), and three novels, Sirajdaula (1920), Ashaphalam (1931) and Pratapasimhan (1954). His essays on scientific topics have been published in two volumes, viz. Shastra sopanam (1937) and Atbhutayugam (1942). He has also translated Dutachatol (1950) and Abhijnanashakuntalam (1957).

PADMANADIR MAJHI (Bengali) is a novel by Manik Banerjee, published in 1936. Some parts of the novel had been serialised two years before its publication in a monthly magazine.

Padmanadir majhi is perhaps the most popular novel by Manik Banerjee. It deals with the life of fishermen who live near the Padma, a river in East Bengal. The Padma is a great river which rises in high spate during the monsoon and devastates the country. The story centres round Kuber, a poor fisherman, his crippled wife Mala, and their children. Kuber, who at the beginning of the story seems to be a simple man, acquires complexity as the story progresses. He is torn between emotional conflicts. First, he feels an irressistible attraction towards Kapila, his wife's married sister. Secondly, he is deadly afraid of Hossain Mia, who was previously a fisherman. He is rich and lends the poor fishermen money when they are in need. But in return he wants them to leave their occupation and settle in Maynadweep, a foresaken island which he has bought and which he considers his kingdom. The fishermen, in spite of abject poverty, have no desire whatsoever to settle in Maynadweep. They nevertheless are mortally afraid of Hossian Mia, whom they consider to be as powerful as God and as evil as the devil. In the course of the story, a fierce storm destroys Kuber's dwelling place, and his daughter Gopi breaks her leg. The problems of Kuber increase; he is forced to borrow money from Hossain Mia to build his hut again. He is also forced to spend a night with Kapila when they take Gopi to town for medical treatment. Kuber's love for his wife and his occupation on the one hand, and his irresistible lust for Kapila and the lure of Hossain Mia on the other, which are continuously in clash throughout the story, relentlessly drive him to make the final choice at the end when Kuber, in order to evade the false charges of theft, leaves his wife and family and sails for Maynadweep with Kapila accompanying him.

Padmanadir majhi ranks high among the novels of Manik Banerjee. The characters speak a dialect of East Bengal which provides a contrast to the literary language of the narrative passages. There is the same authenticity in the minute description of the dwelling places of Kuber and other fishermen as in the delineation of their characters. The structure is closely knit and the author's fine sense of balance prevails throughout the work. He seeks to reduce life to bare facts looking for the essentials. The novel has been translated into English, Russian, Chinese and several other foreign and Indian languages.

PADMANJI BABA (Marathi)

See under MULEY BABA PADMANJI

PADMA-PURANA(Assamese) must not be confused with the Padma-purana, a 'mahapurana' in Sanskrit. The Assamese work deals with the worship of Manasa or Padma, the snake goddess, and her conflict with Chandradhara, the merchant-prince of Champaka Nagar. The birth of Padma, her exploits and her long-drawn conflict with Chandradhara are depicted in detail by Sukavi Narayanadeva, a poet of the seventeenth century. Two of his predecessors, Mankar and Durgavara, had also written on the same theme, but those works, smaller in scope and fragmentary in treatment, are not called Purana. Mankar's work describes the genesis of the world, the marriage of Shiva and Parvati, the birth of Padma and her suzerainty over the snakes. The latter's conflict with Chandradhara is absent in Mankar's work. Durgavara's narrative, on the other hand, relates the conflict of Padma and Chandradhara to its bare outline. In contrast to the two preceding works, Sukavi Narayanadeva's book is a voluminous work which incorporates several puranic episodes and ultimately culminates in the conflict between Padma and Chandradhara. Incidentally, it brings into focus the chastity and the steadfast love of Behula or Beula for her husband Lakhindar, the youngest son of the merchant. The early part of the work describes the genesis of the world, the quarrel between Kadru and Vinata, the birth of Aruna and Jatayu, the churning of the ocean, the sacrifice of Daksha, the immolation of Sati, the marriage of Shiva and Parvati, the birth of Kartikeya, the killing of Tadakasura by Kartikeya, the birth of Manasa or Padma, her marriage with Astavakra, the birth of Astika, the snake sacrifice of Janamejaya, the rebirth of Usha and Aniruddha as Beula and Lakhindar and a few more incidents. The mythological incidents are followed by a series of episodes in which Padma subdues her opponents and establishes herself as a deity. Finally, she comes into conflict with Chandradhara, a devout Shaiva, who refuses to recognise her as a goddess. In her revenge Padma kills his six sons one after another, rendering their wives childless widows. As this did not move the merchant, he was harassed and his seven boatloads of merchandise were sunk in the sea. He was imprisoned but remained unmoved. Manasa finally decided to kill Chandradhara's surviving son Lakhindar after his marriage with Beula. On the nuptial night he was bitten by a snake and killed. Beula with the corpse of her dead husband went down the river on a raft, and ultimately reached heaven. Pleasing the gods with her dance, song and supplication and with her promise to persuade her father-in-law to worship Padma, she succeeded in bringing her dead husband back to life. The remaining part of the story depicts the gradual softening of Chandradhara's attitude towards Padma after his daughter-in-law had brought back his seven dead sons alive.

Had the work been written in Sanskrit, it would certainly have been recognised as a sub-purana. Written after the puranic model, the work contains many digressions. Although apparently it is a religious work, secular elements pervade it. The book is also important from the literary point of view. Further, it reflects the customs, ceremonies and life, in general, of the Assamese society of the seventeenth century. It reveals in flashes a sense of the poetic in the writer and his ability to draw characters. The mythological characters are, however, painted without orginality, a weakness on the part of the author, though some behave more as human beings than as gods. The mortal characters such as Chandradhara, his wife Soneka, and Beula are sharply drawn.

Interspersed in the book are humour, and sentiments of love, wonder and anger, and pathos (the predominant mood). Humour is occasionally coarse and erotic and sometimes degenerates into obscenity.

The Padma-purana is an admixture of songs (or lyrics) and narrative verse. Every chapter is prefixed with a refrain followed by narrative verse. The emotional situations are depicted with songs tuned to classical ragas (melodies).

The available versions of the Padma-purana contain interpolations by later 'ojhas' who, while reciting and singing the verses, used to interpolate their own compositions. Sukavi Narayanadeva's Padma-purana, compiled and edited by the late Daivachandra Talukdar, was published by the Lawyer's Book Stall, Gauhati, in 1965 but the version is not authentic inasmuch as it contains material derived from the oral tradition. Two complete versions in 'sachi' bark are preserved in the manuscript section of the Gauhati University library.

PADMARAJAN, P. (Malayalam; b. 1945). Born at Muthukulam in Alleppey district, Padmarajan took his degree in science and started his career as producer in All India Radio. After working there for twenty years, he voluntarily retired in 1986 to join the fraternity of full-time screen playwrights and cinema directors. Now he is better known in the film-world than in the realm of letters.

Padmarajan's contribution to the literary field is by no means negligible. He started as a short story writer, and has to his credit two collections, both published in 1970, which saw the publication of one more book by him containing three novelettes. His novels include Nakshatrangale kaval (Oh stars, be guards, 1971), It a ivide vare (Here thus far, 1972), Vatakakku oru hridayam (A Heart to let, 1975) and Savavahanangalum tedi (In search of coffins, 1975), in all of which the author has depicted the resurgence of lust and violence in modern society and the philosophy of the new generation that rejects everything.

He won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for the first novel cited above and the national and state awards, more than once, for direction of films and script-writing.

PADMAVAT (Hindi) by the Sufi poet, Malik Muhammad Jayasi, is the first authentic epic in Hindi literature. It runs into 59 cantos and has a total number of 653 stanzas. The first part of the story deals with the love affair of Ratansen and Padmavati and runs into 37 cantos. The rest of the story deals with Alauddin's longing for Padmavati and the tragic end of the heroine.

Jayasi begins his epic with the praise of the Almighty, the Prophet Muhammad, the four Khalifas, the contemporary ruler Shershah Suri, his religious guide Mehdani Sheikh Burhan of Kalpi, followed by a mention of the year of the poem's composition, i.e. Hijri 947 (AD 1540) and the theme of the epic.

Padmavat is an admirable blend of imagination and history, folklore and legend. Such an impressive synthesis of fact and fiction is unique in the history of Hindi literature. The poet has very ably exploited the traditional epic motifs and expressed divine love through the medium of a popular love tale. We should, however, bear in mind that the poem is not an allegory, not even an 'anyokti' or 'samasokti', but an epic, and in its form and structure we find a coordination of the norms and conventions of the classical epic, the 'charit kavya' of Apabhramsha (the 'Karvakant Chatta' technique) and the Persian 'masnavi style'. This composite technique of Jayasi reflects his basic attitude to Indian culture in the contents of Padmavat.

Jayasi's philosophy of life is based on the ideology of love. Love to him is a means as well as an end. The means may be temporal, but the end is divine. It is love which exalts human life and makes it worth living. In the poet's concept of love we can see several trends mingling together: 'Shraut' (Vedic), 'Shraman' (Buddhist and Jain), and the Sufi tradition. Jayasi gave due weightage to all these traditions. The philosophy of non-dualism preached by Id-ul-Arbi, Vedanta's 'Advaitvada', the basic concept of 'Tauheed' and the 'An al haq' of the Sufi seer Mansoor Halaj are all harmonised in Jayasi. He insists on the suppression of the ego and the exaltation of the human soul through love. He writes in Padmavat: "Love the adhesive solution prepared in blood, the thicker it is, the more lasting it becomes. May this love tale live long in the world and may the readers remember me through it."

Besides spiritual love, Jayasi has depicted in Padmavat physical love, both in union and in separation. The portrayal of love-lorn Nagmati in the absence of her husband has received unique praise from critics. Love is most poignant when blended with tears. Jayasi expresses this through the traditional technique of 'Baramasa', i.e. monthwise description of Nagmati's restiveness and mental agony. Jayasi has used in this context apt images and symbols from nature and rural life.

The depiction of the physical charm of Padmavati is also impressive. The poet has described the physical beauty of the heroine from head to toe in the convention of 'nakh-shikh' description. Padmavati is, indeed, a source and a touchstone of beauty on this earth. This description is full of beautiful word-pictures, replete with colours and sensuousness. Besides, Jayasi also writes about the eternal quality of Padmavati's beauty. She symbolises the Supreme Beauty in creation.

As regards the beauty of Nature, Jayasi has described it in different forms, soft as well as dreadful. It provokes varying emotions in different situations. The poet has also personified nature; she is sentient and living, like a human being. Finally, the beauty of nature makes us think about her creator. Here his poetry becomes mystical and follows the Persian tradition. Padmavati the female represents the Almighty, and Ratansen the male symbolises the human soul.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Padmavat is written in Avadhi. The poet has made adequate use of Sanskrit, Apabhramsha, Prakrit, Persian and Arabic words, where necessary. He has also used words of Rajasthani, Braj, Bundeli, Bhojpuri, Khariboli etc, and in this way added to the richness of Hindi vocabulary. Further, Jayasi was a pictorial artist who could combine the effects of colours and sensuousness through evocative images. And he could also produce the effect of sounds of static (or non-living) as well as living and dynamic objects. In richness of craftsmanship, only the modern Chhayavadi poetry can equal Padmavat.

PADMINI-UPAKHYAN (Bengali) or the saga of Padmini is a poetical work by Rangalal Banerjee. The story was taken from Tod's Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan. Rangalal almost faithfully followed Tod in his narrative.

Padmini was the daughter of King Hamirsankha Ray of Ceylon. She was exceedingly beautiful. She was married to Bhim Singh, the guardian of Lakshman Singh, the Rana of Chittor, who was a minor. Her devotion to her husband was as matchless as her beauty. The fame of her beauty spread far and wide, and ultimately it reached the Sultan of Delhi. Sultan Alauddin Khilji set out for Chittor with an army. On the way he wrote to Bhim Singh asking for only a glimpse of Padmini. To save Chittor from a holocaust, Padmini agreed to allow him a glimpse of her reflection in a mirror. Alauddin agreed. But when he saw her reflection he was so infatuated that he broke his promise and took Bhim Singh a prisoner. Padmini, with the help of her soldiers disguised as women attendants, freed Bhim Singh and outwitted the Sultan. A battle followed and after the death of his sons, Bhim Singh at the behest of Padmini himself went to the battle-field to die. The proud queen performed 'jaharbrata' and sacrificed her life at the burning pyre.

The work is a long narrative poem in the current payar, tripadi and maljhanp verse forms. Rangalal lent payar a new freshness. The sequence of events is arranged under suitable captions.

PADYA (Sanskrit). The term 'padya' in general means a verse or a stanza. This term became a synonym of 'shloka', which also means verse. Derived from the root 'shloka', the term means 'to praise or extol in verse' or 'a stanza/verse in the anushtubh metre', which is also otherwise called shloka metre. In analogy with the first meaning of shloka, the term 'padya' also means a praise or a panegyric. Gangadasa's Chhandomanjari, a treatise on metrics, takes 'padya' as a technical term and defines it as a verse 'consisting of four padas' (padyam chatushpadi), where 'pada' means a pāda or 'a quarter' (i.e., one-fourth). Thus a padya or a stanza is said to be consisting of four lines or quarters. As the word pāda also means 'foot', its synonym 'charana' also came to stand for one of the four lines of a standard stanza. Hence, a stanza may be said to be consisting of four feet (i.e., four charanas or padas). The favourite stanza, in both Vedic literature and classical literature, was of four lines, "usually equal and varying in length from eight to over twenty syllables."

In the Vedas there are stanzas with three or five lines also. Of the three-lined stanzas, one couched in the gayatri metre is most common. Each line of the gayatri metre contains eight syllables. The celebrated gayatri mantra is given in this metre:

> Tat savitur vareniam bhargo devasya dhimahi dhiyo yo nah prachodayat. (Rigveda, 2.62.10)

(Let us think of the lovely splendour of god Savitri that he may inspire our minds.)

But most of the Vedic hymns contain stanzas of four quarters. The commonest four-lined stanza is said to have the trishtubh metre where each of the four lines contains eleven syllables. Another four-lined metre having twelve syllables in each line is called jagati. In the later hymns of the Rigveda a four-lined metre having eight syllables in each line became more popular. This is called anushtubh. A celebrated hymn called Purusha-sukta (Rigveda 10.90), couched in the anushtubh metre, begins with the following oft-quoted stanza:

> Sahasra-shirsha Purushah
> sahasrakshah sahasrapat
> Sa bhumim vishvato vritva > atyatishthad dashangulam.

From the anushtubh of the Vedas developed the shloka metre of the Puranas, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. This is the shortest metre most commonly used in classical Sanskrit literature, while of the more commonly used longer metres, sragdhara, having twenty-one syllables, is the longest. Text books on metrics define over hundred metres having four lines with names which smack of a highly poetic taste, e.g., tanumadhya (the girl with a slender waist), vasantatilaka (the bride of spring), charuhasini (the sweet-smiling one), and so on. Of the numerous metres, only twenty or thirty were more popular.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Some of the verses having four lines also have lines conforming to more than one metre, having equal number of syllables. In that case the metre is called upajati. Some metres again have lines of different length because of unequal number of syllables. There are also padyas or verses couched in a type of metre where the length of line is not measured by the number of syllables, but by the sum total of the morae. Such a metre is called matrachhandas.

The term padya is not applied to the Vedic stanzas, which are generally called 'mantras'. Stanzas taken from the Rigveda are particularly called 'riks'. Only the stanzas belonging to creative classical Sanskrit literature are called padya. A stanza dealing with some technical subject in classical Sanskrit literature is called a 'karika'.

PAGADI, SETUMADHAVRAO (Marathi; b. 1910) was born at Nilanga in the Hyderabad State. His family belonged to a well-known house of local landlords, following the Vaishnav cult. Kannada and Marathi were the languages spoken at home, but he received elementary education in Urdu in which, later, he achieved proficiency. Owing to stringent financial conditions, he could not continue his studies at his home town and went to Banaras to joint the Banaras Hindu University, where he completed his college education entirely on his own resources. Finally, he did his M.A. in Politics from the Allahabad University with a first class. He wanted to start his career as a lecturer in Politics, but entered the State service in 1933 as a Tahsildar. He rose steadily to various positions in government service, reaching the rank of a Secretary. He retired in 1969 and settled down in Bombay to devote himself to studies and research.

His main work lies in the field of Maratha history in the writing of which he leaned heavily on the source material obtained from Urdu and Persian works. He also studied the life of the Gond tribe. He has been responsible for introducing Urdu poetry to Marathi readers and was also interested in the mystic tradition of the sufis. His important works include: Maratha-Mughal Relations (1680-1707); History of Freedom struggle in Hyderabad (1800-1970); Eighteenth Century Deccan; Grammar of Kolami Language; Grammar of Gondi Language; Marathe va Nizam (Marathi); Panipatcha sangram (Marathi); Motal Maratha sangharsha (Marathi).

PAGI (Rajasthani), published in 1978, is an experiment in new poetry by Chandraprakash Dewal. As the title of the book indicates, the poet is in search of new modes of expression and technique, and non-traditional metaphors, similes and phraseology.

This small book contains 28 topics, covering 82 pages. The overall impression one gets from the first reading of the poems is that of an unconventional outlook on life and its values, which emphasises the need to cast off religious taboos and blind beliefs, to shun the feudal and capitalistic pattern of society, to honour hard labour and sincerity of purpose, to root out the decaying order, and to usher in new ideals and fresh values. The book won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979.

PAGPHERO (Rajasthani) is a collection of poems (1974) by Mani Madhukar, which won the author the Sahitya Akademi award in 1975. Being a committed writer, Madhukar decries the feudal and capitalistic elements in society and depicts the miserable lot of the afflicted and exploited masses. The poet has a good command of language and a keen insight into the life of the common people. The book has 83 poems in all, most of them containing only a few lines each. Usually, his subject is well-defined, but even when he deviates from the committed path, as in his three-line poem 'Chumo' (kiss) which reveals his romantic sensibility, he is an accomplished poet. The title of the book Pagphero means 'auspicious or inauspicious arrival.'

PAHARE (Punjabi), a poetic form based on a unit of time, is derived from 'pahir' which means the eighth part of a day and night. A day or night has four pahirs, each consisting of three hours. In Punjabi, many poetic forms are there pertaining to the unit of time, e.g. 'din rain' (day and night), 'satwara', 'athwara', 'barahmaha', etc. This form, which was popular in the medieval age, has special significance. Pahare signifies the different stages of the life of a human being, viz., the period during the pregnancy of the mother, the childhood, the youth and the old age. Human life is like a night where one has to stay for four pahars, i.e. one has to pass through the four stages of life. Like a merchant, he has to go abroad for earnings. He has to keep vigil on his merchandise. In the morning (after death) when the night of ignorance vanishes, he will realise the hard realities. Such is the central theme of pahare.

Though pahare orginated as folk-form, the folk pahares are lost in oblivion. There are four hymns in Adi Granth, entitled 'Pahare' in Tukhari Rag—two are by Guru Nanak, one by Guru Ram Das and one by Guru Arjan Dev. This form has attained a special mystical significance. In pahare, the Gurus have signified the physical world as night, and its four pahares are the pre-natal stage in the mother's womb, childhood, youth and old age, and suggest to the seeker of truth to keep himself aloof from worldly activities which are transitory, and devote himself to meditation. The 'jivatma' (soul) is like a merchant who is wandering abroad and will have to return home ultimately after harvesting good or bad deeds. But in Tukhari Rag, the main symbol used by guru Nanak is that of a Jiv as wife and God as husband. Being a devoted wife, she should subdue herself completely to His will.

PAI, NARASIMHA NARAYANA (Konkani; b. 1879, d. 1959) had very little formal education. He studied instrumental music and took great interest in drama, 'bhajan' and 'kirtana'. From 1891 to 1927 he worked in different fields, as teacher in a school, as Superintendent at Cochin Harbour, as 'devaswam Parapadhakari' at T.D. Temple (Cochin) and also as building contractor and draftsman. He was also an author and editor of a large series of musical polyglot orchestration. He compiled anthologies and 'Harikathas' and wrote a few books on economics. On their publication he spent a large part of his savings and had to put up with a number of hardships.

He was an ardent lover of Kathakali and many plays were performed at his own house. In all those plays he used to play different roles.

He worked for the progress of his community and established many organisations, such as 'Gowda Saraswath Seva Sangh'. Though he faced all sorts of problems, his deep faith in Lord Krishna and his self-education helped him write beautiful literary works.

He composed a Harikatha on Bhakta Kuchela under the name Kuchelopakhyanam in Konkani. He wrote a 'Katha Kalakshepam' in English entitled Refutation of Bhishma's Vow. He has to his credit the following works: Challaya charitram (1926), Prahlada charitram (1927), Bhagavad-geetasara (1947), Sathyavan Savitri (1951). He also composed some Kathakalakshepas, namely Krishna leela, Janma saphalya and Santhanagopala. He has to his credit bhajanas such as 'Shri Krishna bhajanam', 'Shiva bhajanam', 'Shri mahamaya kirtanam', 'Shri Krishna arati'. He also published in simple and lucid Malayalam chellaya charitram in the year 1926.

PAIALACHHINAMAMALA (Prakrit) is the earliest work on Prakrit lexicography by Dhanpala in the tenth century A.D. In the existing Parkrit literature we find only two lexicons, this being one of the two. It contains words which were used at that time by common men in their everyday conversation. It can, therefore, be easily called a lexicon of colloquial words. Actually it was written by the author to teach his younger sister the meaning and usage of Prakrit words. The lexicon consists of 275 gathas, and is a small collection of 998 words.

Most of the early lexicons of classical Sanskrit are of two types: one pertaining to synonyms and the other pertaining to homonyms. But Paialachhinamamala contains both types of words. We get so many synonyms for one word; for example, we are given the following words for a black bee: fullandhua, rasau, bhinga, mahuara, alino, indindira, dureha, ghuagaya, chhappaya and dharma. Likewise, an elephant is refered to by several names: piloo, gayo, mayagalo, mayango, sindhuro, karenu, doghatto, danti, varno, kari, kunjaro and hatthi. The six words for 'row' are mentioned as follows: oli, mala, rai, rinchholi, avali and pantti.

It seems that the tradition of 'Namamala' (garland of names) is an ancient practice. There were many lexicographers in Sanskrit and Parkrit. Hemchandra refers to earlier compilers in his Desi-namamala, viz. Dhanpala, Devraja, Gopal, Drona, Abhimana-Chinaha, Padaliptacharya, Shilanka. We know their names only, as their works are lost with the exception of Paialachhinamamala.

The importance of Prakrit lexicon for studying Desya words is, indeed, very great. In Paialachhinamamala the proportion of Desya words, however, is quite small as compared to 'Tadbhava' words. The following are a few Desya words available in this lexicon:

Kumpala	(Tendril)	Pilu	(Elephant)
Oli	(Row)	Chhalli	(Bark)
Mukkha	(Foolish)	Guchchha	(Cluster)
Tunda	(Tummy)	Gunda	(Gum)
Mandukka	(Frog)	Kidi	(Pig)
Biralio	(Cat)	Chandam	(Boiled rice)
Khaiya	(Moat)	Bukka	(Fist)
Lancha	(Bribe)	Lattham	(Beautiful)
Mattha	(Lazy)	Jauna	(Yamuna river)

New derivative suffixes and their meanings are also mentioned at the end of the lexicon, e.g.

(i) Possessive	:	Illa, Itta, Aala.
(ii) Habitual	:	Ira.

A majority of these words are not known through other sources. In this lexicon we also find some words that are popular in the new Indo-Aryan languages. For instance, Prakrit 'Mattha' is 'Moth' (dull) in Kashmiri; in Lahnda 'mattha' (lazy); in Nepali 'matha' (slow); in Assames 'math' (slow); in Bengali 'matha' (slow); in Oriya 'matthar' (slow); in Bhojpuri 'matthar' (slow); in Gujarati 'mathu' (bed); in Marathi 'math' (dumpy).

Take another word 'Chhalli' (bark) which is supposed to be of non-Aryan origin. We have the same word in Pali-Parkrit, and it has practically the same meaning in several languages: in Kumaoni 'chhal' (skin); in Nepali 'chhali' (skin on milk); in Assames 'chhali' (bark); in Bengali 'chhal' (bark); in Oriya 'chhala' (bark); in Bihari 'chhal' (leather); in Maithili 'chhal' (skin); in Bhojpuri 'chhal' (bark); in Hindi 'chhal' (bark); in Gujarati 'chhal' (bark).

PAINNAGA (Prakrit) or 'Painna' is a generic term for the miscellaneous works of the Jaina canonical order. The Sanskrit term for it is Prakirnaka. The number of these texts varies from time to time, but according to the final classification of the Jaina Shvetambara canonical texts ten is ordinarily the accepted number. According to Nandisutra, most of these ten Prakirnakas are included in the sub-class called Ukkaliya (Utkalika) of the Angabahira (Angabahya) class, viz., Devindatthao (Devendrastava), Tandulaveyalia (Tandulravaicharika), Chandavejjhaya (Chandrvedhyaka), Ganivijja (Ganividya), Maranavibhatti (Maranavibhakti), Aurapaccakkhana (Aturapratyakhyana) and Mahapaccakkhana (Mahapratyakhyana). Out of the generally accepted list of the ten Painnas, Chausarana (Chatuhsharana), Bhattaparinna (Bhaktaparijna), Santhara (Sanstaraka) and Gacchayara (Gacchachara) are not mentioned here. Maranasamadhi and Maranavibhakti may be identical. It may be noted that Chandravedhyaka and Virastava are accepted in the alternative list of ten, dropping from the general list Maranasamadhi and Gacchachara. There is also another alternative for these ten. This shows that there was no consensus regarding the authenticity of the Painnas, and it is quite clear from the fact that the Jaina Shvetambara Sthanakavasi and Terapanthi sects dropped all of them from their list of the canonical texts.

Some of the Painnas are attributed to an author like Virabhadra who wrote Arahanapadaya in A.D. 951 but others say that he was a direct pupil of Mahavira.

Maranavibhakti, Aturapratyakhyana, Mahapratyakhyana, Chandravedhyaka, Sanstaraka and Bhaktaparijna deal with the problem of death and how to be ready for it without fear. Tandulaveyalia deals with the science of embryology. Ganividya is concerned with aspects of astrology, such as auspicious and inauspicious days. Devendrastava is in praise of the 32 Indras of heaven and their heavenly quarters.

Chausarana deals with the four-fold refuge, viz., Tirthankara, Siddha, Sadhu and Dharma. Gacchachara deals with the rules of conduct for monks and nuns who belong to a gaccha, the community of ascetics.

PAIS (Marathi) is a collection of literary essays written by Durga Bhagwat on miscellaneous themes. These essays, thirteen in number, were published earlier in different periodicals. Pais got the Maharashtra Government Award (1970) and the Sahitya Akademi Award (1971). Durga Bhagwat is a renowned scholar and anthropologist, and has done her research in folk literature. The first essay 'Swachhanda' is written in the spirit of introspection, tracing the development of her creative process as a writer. Her approach is disarmingly simple and honest. 'Paisacha Khamb' is philosophical in mood, marking her loud thinking on some aspects of Jnaneshwari. 'Pandharicha Vithoba' offers a new introduction to Vithoba, the presiding deity of Pandharpur. In 'Jogwa' she records her impressions on the tradition of prostitution. 'Dwarakecha Rana' and 'Yamuna Kalindi' are her reflections on the life of Krishna and river Yamuna respectively. 'Maheshwarchi Mahashweta' is her tribute to Ahilyabai Holkar. 'Dongarmathyawari', as the title suggests, is written in appreciation of the beauty of nature. 'Oonpalakhi' is her appreciation of Ajanta caves. 'Asannamaran kali rani' and 'Buddha pralobhana' are her musings on the life and philosophy of Buddha written in a meditative mood.

Her essays are marked by refinement of perception and subtlety.

PAKA (Sanskrit). In the Nyaya-Vaisheshika systems of Indian philosophy, the term 'paka' is used to connote a specialized method. According to Tarkasamgrahadipika of Annambhatta, 'paka' means contact with 'tejas' ('pakastejah samyogah'). Further, Govardhana Mishra comments in his Nyayabodhini (commentary on Annambhatta's Tarkasamgraha) that it means application of external heat ('Pako nama bijatiya-tejahsamyogah').

Annambhatta writes in the twentythird section of his widely-studied work, Tarkasamgraha, "The four qualities, beginning with colour, are products of heat and are perishable in the earth-substance, that is, 'pakaja'. Elsewhere these are 'apakaja', that is, natural (not produced by heat) and either imperishable or perishable. Those inhering in eternal (imperishable) things are eternal, while those inhering in non-eternal things are non-eternal." ('Rupadichatushtayam prithivyam pakajamanityam cha. Anyatrapakajam nityamanityam cha. Nityagatam nityam. Anityagatamanityam'). We may as well refer here to two particular aphorisms in the Nyayasutra (iii. 2.48.49) and also to the commentary on it by Vatsyayana. Besides, there are Nyayavarttika of Uddyotakara, Nyayavarttikataparyatika of Vachaspati Mishra and Vritti of Vishvanatha.

From Annambhatta's commentary, i.e. Tarkasamgrahadipika, we come to know that of the nine substances recognised in the Vaisheshika system, earth possesses four specific qualities, viz. colour, taste, odour and touch. These are both eternal and non-eternal; these are sometimes produced by heat, while sometimes they are natural. They are said to be produced by heat and are consequently non-eternal, but elsewhere they are natural and are both eternal and non-eternal. The eternal is confined to the eternal atoms, while the non-eternal belongs to non-eternal products. From a further explanation, we may say that in the Vaisheshika school, water possesses only colour and taste; tejas has only colour and touch, while air possesses only touch. But Tarkasamgraha points out that there is a basic difference between the position of the above-mentioned four qualities in the earth-substance as these or some of these are found in other substances. In the case of the earth-substance, the four qualities are induced by 'paka' or heat, while in other cases, this is not so. That is why the four qualities found in the earth-substances are perishable. Bhashaparichchheda (105 Karika) has also stated: 'Etesham pakajatvam tu kshitau nanyatra kutrachit'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Thus the distinction between 'pakaja' and 'apakaja' appears to be that earth can change its qualities by the application of heat, while none of the other three substances, viz., water, tejas (light) and air, can change them. It does not mean that water and air, having contact with heat, cannot become hot but in their case the touch of heat cannot affect the material since it partakes of light which is blended with them. Annambhatta elaborates the notion of 'pakajaguna' or heat-induced qualities and introduces the doctrinal differences between the schools of Vaisheshika and Nyaya regarding the objects which undergo transformation of qualities under the influence of heat. The Vaisheshikas are called 'Pilupaka-vadinah' since they explain the transformation of colour in the unbaked jar by the separate baking of individual atoms. On the other hand, the Nyaya school is known as 'pitharapakavadinah' because they thought the change of colour was accomplished in the jar itself.

If we take these effects into consideration, they may be described as of various kinds, viz. one changing colour only as in a baked jar; another changing colour, taste and odour as in an artificially ripened mango, and so on and so forth. In the definition quoted above, the word 'vijatiya' excludes a change by heat in metals because these, being 'tejas', are 'sajatiya'. According to the Vaisheshik School, the old black jar is destroyed just when it is baked and its several compounds are also destroyed. They argue that the action of fire produces red colour in separate atoms; then these are joined by the same action of fire into new compounds, and consequently a new red jar comes into existence. It is pointed out that such a complicated process of dissolution and reconstruction of the jar is essential if all the atoms in the jar are to be fully baked. Because if the jar remains in tact, the fire can never penetrate to the interior portion to bake the atoms positioned there. However, since the process of dissolution and reconstruction occurs in great rapidity, we cannot perceive it. Many a philosopher of this school has sought variously to compute the time consumed in that process; some have computed nine moments, others ten or eleven, and a particular school five only.

Some modern scholars have raised a point or two regarding the very important process of 'paka' itself. Though it means 'contact with heat' and 'pakaja' means 'heat-induced', they argue that from the Vaisheshika viewpoint, heat is a quality of 'tejas' and is not itself anything of the nature of a 'substance'. Therefore, literally, the term 'pakaja' would mean 'induced by contact with tejas' and not 'induced by heat'.

At any rate, it seems that 'paka' is a process of chemical change, and thus here we have a glimpse of the keen observation of the ancient Indians. It also appears that science and philosophy joined hands in the weltanschauung of the Vaisheshika system. According to this school, things directly affected by 'chemical change' are only the ultimate or atomic constituents of an earth-substance in its grosser form. The tejas particles induce motion in the earth atoms and thereby bring about a separation of the two atoms which had formed a binary particle ('dvyanuka'). Then the binary particle disintegrates and causes the destruction of the tertiary particle ('tryanuka') which was formed out of the conjunction of these binaries. Thereafter, the destruction of the tertiaries leads to the destruction of the jar through similar phases. The jar is nothing but the ultimate effect in this casual series which started with the earth-atoms. Therefore, it is the atom's 'paka' or contact with tejas which finally culminates into the destruction of the unbaked jar. The earth-atoms freed from their binary particles change their colour from black to red under the identical influence of heat and through the same process.

The Nyaya School, i.e. the 'pitharapakavadin', raises objection on the ground that the identity of the jar can never remain in tact if the first jar is destroyed and a new one is substituted. They argue that one can recognize the jar to be exactly the same jar as before and one can also observe it through all the stages of baking. Moreover, other pots placed over it do not tumble down which ought to have happened if their support were destroyed even for a moment. Besides, the Nyaya theorists argue: how do the number, the shape, and even the lines on the jar remain the same? These strong objections notwithstanding, the Naiyayikas had also to answer some counter-questions. The followers of the school accept the simpler and arguably the more reasonable theory of the transformation of colour being accomplished without total dissolution and reconstruction of the jar. However, the Vaisheshikas have also tried to counter the aforesaid position of the Naiyayikas. Thus the controversy between the adherents of the theories of 'Pilupaka' (i.e. baking of atoms) and 'Pitharapaka' (i.e. baking of the pot) has been ever raging in Indian philosophy. The twofold doctrine about 'paka' has, however, become one of the most reliable tests to distinguish a genuine Vaisheshika from his Naiyayika rival.

PAL, BIPIN CHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1858, d. 1932), a patriot, orator, teacher, preacher and critic, born in the district of Sylhet, now in Bangladesh, rose to eminence in the days of the Swadeshi Movement. Early in life, he took to journalism and teaching. In 1886, he joined the Congress. Later, he went to England and the U.S.A. for giving talks on religion, temperance and India's political aspirations. When he returned in 1900, he joined the Swadeshi Movement. He was imprisoned in 1907 for contempt of the Court. Soon he became critical of the methods of the Non-cooperation Movement and dissociated himself from the mainstream of the Nationalist Movement.

He was a thinker and a prolific writer. He contributed on various topics to numerous periodicals and journals, both English and Bengali. He was the founder-editor of the New India (1901), an English weekly, the Bandematram (1906), an English daily, the Hindu Review (1913), an English monthly. He professed the cult of 'composite patriotism', and the doctrine of 'passive resistance' and the theory of 'federal imperialism'. He was a versatile writer and a man of wide interests which is evident from his writings on various subjects.

His first publication Shovana (1884) is a Bengali patriotic novel. His other noteworthy works in Bengali are: Jailer khata (Prison diary, 1910), Satya o mithhya (Collection of short stories, 1916) Markine charimash (1955), Nabayuger Bangla (1955), Rastra-niti (1956), Charit-chitra (1958), Sahitya o sadhana, Vols I & II (1959, 1960), Sattar batsar (1962). These last six had appeared first in periodicals in his lifetime and were published in book form after his death. His works in Englsih include The Basis of Political Reform (1883), The New Spirit (1907), An Introduction to the study of Hinduism (1908), The Soul of India (1908), Nationality and Empire (1916), The World Situation and Ourselves (1919), The New Economic Menace to India (1920), Memories of my Life and Times, Vols. PALA PALA JO PARLAU (Sindhi) is a collection of selected poems by Hari Dilgir, published in 1977. It received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979.

The collection contains various forms of poetry such as wai, troilet, geeta, rubai, bayt, ghazal, free verse, etc. During his long career as a poet, Dilgir proved his mastery over various metres. This compilation also proves that various forms included in it are perfect in themselves.

Pala pala jo parlau in Sindhi means sounding of each moment. As such the poems included in it depict various moments when the poet hears the echo of life in everything around him and imprisons it in verse beautifully. During these moments the poet observes many natural situations as well as conditions created by the people in this world.

We find the description of bird, pond, seasons, etc. which are full of natural beauty. At the same time abstract objects like death, faith, time-span, smile, laws, change, shadows also present the philosophy of the poet whereby he describes that life is a prison in this world and is waiting for freedom from imprisonment after which it will enter the realms of happiness where it will establish oneness with God.

We also find that the poet is very much alive to the socio-economic changes taking place in the present-day world. He has tried to present certain solutions. In the present-day world of perpetual war, he invites all to a life of peace. Today when people in authority have become inhuman, the complaints of the common man who suffers fall on deaf ears. The vicious circle moves like wheels within wheels whereby caste, creed, religion, colour, sex, etc. play an important role to make the mighty more mighty and greedy. The sycophants make gods of ordinary people and when they obtain a tall stature they turn against those very people who have created them.

All said and done, the poet is, however, not dejected and suggests that life is really worth living in this world. We cannot escape the situation as it is. Hence we must live the life laughing heartily instead of showing resentment and bitterness. The poet claims in its preface that in spite of all sorrows and sufferings, he looks upon the world as full of sweet songs; it is an ocean of lyrics, the music emanating continuously from it. He would like to live in it laughing.

PALAMOLI NANOORU (Tamil) is a work which contains four hundred songs on four hundred proverbs, popular among the masses. Palamoli nanooru is one of the eighteen collective works called Padhinen kil Kanakku.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The author of Palamoli nanooru is Munthurai Arayanar which means the lord of Munthurai. Munthurai is one of the sacred places of Shiva.

Like all other works, Palamoli nanooru also starts with a prayer song. This very first poem talks about the greatness of the devotees who had shed all the impurities (malas) and acquired the wisdom to have a vision of the feet of God. Such 'nirmala' souls are described as jivan muktas. This very first poem expresses the philosophy of Shaiva Siddhanta that leads to the feet of God. The other three hundred ninety- nine poems are on thirty-four topics of some social values and guidelines.

The four hundred proverbs are explained with examples. The events in the life of kings and heroes, and puranic episodes are referred to as examples for these proverbs. The Chola kings Sembian, Manuneedhi, Karigal, Valavan, the Pandiya kings Porkaip-pandiyan, Seran Senguttuvan, Pari, Pegan and daughters of Pari, are mentioned in these poems. The great king Mahabali's offering everything to Vamana, the Mudhukaitapa's failure in killing Vishnu, Pandavas' escape from the wax house burnt by Kauravas, Yudhishtira's gambling with Shakuni are also referred to in these poems.

In one of the songs, the Chola king Sembian is praised with the deed of Tripurai (Shaiva) who burnt the three castles flying in the air.

An introductory poem by a Jain is added to Palamoli nanooru which could have been a later addition.

PALASIR JUDDHA (Bengali), which means the battle of Plassey, is a verse narrative by Nabinchandra Sen. It was probably the first poem in Bengali which was based on an event in the recent history of Bengal. The story recounts the events of the last days of Sirajuddaulah, the last independent Nawab of Bengal. The vicissitudes of the Nawab form the main content of the five cantos into which the poem is divided. The poem begins with the conspiracy afoot to dethrone the Nawab. Jagat Seth, Mir Jafar, etc. are the villains of this conspiracy. It was because Clive got the help of these traitors that he could with only a handful of soldiers easily defeat the Nawab's army which was much larger in number. The poem ends with a description of the defeat and the murder of the unfortunate Nawab and the victory celebrations of the British. Mohanlal, a faithful soldier of the Nawab, is depicted as a burning example of patriotism. The thoughts of the patriotic Bengal of that time find an echo in the pathetic dying words of Mohanlal.

The work exhibits Nabinchandra's patriotic fervour. A few historical inexactitudes here and there do not detract from the intrinsic artistic merit of the work.

PALLAV (Hindi) is a collection of poems by Sumitranandan Pant, published in 1926. It includes the poems written during 1918-1925, published earlier in Saraswati and Sharada, the two leading Hindi journals.

The poet's own introduction to Pallav is as significant as the poems themselves. It is an important document of literary theory in modern Hindi poetry. In it Pant presents his theory of diction, pleading for the rejection of the traditional Brajboli as the language of poetry and the acceptance of Khariboli in its place. He also speaks of the theme and content of the traditional poetry in Braj and Avadhi, rejecting them summarily. He finds this poetry rather repetitive and full of stock expressions and images, as also replete with excess of sensuality and decadence. He finds certain qualities of Sanskrit language and its poetry useful in his effort to launch 'new' poetry. The significance of Pant lies in his ability to achieve a breakthrough in Hindi Poetry.

As regards the poems themselves, there is a tendency in Pallav to avoid the use of verbs, and therefore these lyrics look like Sanskrit compositions. Further, there is a certain quality of incantation about them. Instead of the speech syntax found in a poet like Prasad, we find in Pant the setting of words like diamonds. What he wrote about Sanskrit diction in his Introduction applies to his own practice: "Each word has an independent heart-throb, distinctive gesture and respiration".

Pant has a fine sensitivity for sound effects and has created a new word music. He is able to produce in his poems the effect of symphony, changing his metres with the change of moods or emotions. This gives his poems a tremendous operatic tonality, though it deprives them of the conversational rhythm. But Pant, perhaps, regarded conversational rhythm as something prosaic. Being primarily a lyrical poet, he seeks refinement, replacing the familiar words with chaste Sanskrit equivalents.

Pallav abounds in images of the changing sights of nature. No other poet in modern Hindi has presented such ever-changing forms of the sky and the mountain during the seasonal changes. Pallav sharpened the appetite of the reader for the beauty of nature as an end in itself. Even when nature is used as a backdrop for human drama, the backdrop holds our attention much more than the human drama itself.

Pallav gave a distinct identity to Hindi poetry. It laid the foundation of the new lyric and made the forging of a new idiom possible even for the epic. Artistically, these lyrics are emblems of beauty, and yet one may hear in many of them a gentle moral voice, a voice of inner discipline, though dissolved in the music of poetry. The publication of Pallav is, indeed, a literary event of great significance in the history of Hindi poetry.

PALLIYELUCHCHI (Tamil). It was Tontaratippoti Alvar, a devotee of Lord Vishnu, who first sang a 'palliyeluchchi' on Him, a type of prabandha in Tamil, during the eighth century A.D. The theme of this genre of prabandha deals with the waking up of the Lord from His sacred couch.

The palliyeluchchi was evolved from the nucleus of a poetic element called 'tuyil etai nilai' mentioned by Tolkappiyar in his grammar. By this, a poet praised the king or his patron by way of awakening him from his slumber. This belongs to one of the branches (turai) of Purattinal.

The palliyeluchchi consists generally of ten poems in the metre called 'enchir achiriya viruttam'. Each stanza will have eight four-foot lines; the poem will end with the words 'palli eluntarulaye', i.e. 'please awake from your couch'. This is a way of pleading for the grace of the Lord.

One of the ten verses of Tontaratippoti Alvar in the 'Tiruppaliyeluchchi', which incidentally is a part of the collection Nalayira divya prabandham, runs as follows:

> The sun has reached the eastern peaks!
> The great darkness is gone and the time is dawn!
> Honey is flowing from the beautiful flowers!
> Along with them come the herds of dark elephants,
> Which together with the she-elephants and the drums
> Clamour like the ocean waves everywhere!
> O, Lord of Tiruvarangam! please awake from > your sacred couch!.

In the next century, the Shaiva saint Manikkavachakar sang an 'awakening song' in praise of Lord Shiva which also is in ten verses. This has been translated by K.M. Balasubramaniam and also by some others.

Sivappiraksar of Turaimankalam, who is famous for his purana work Pirapulinka lilai, has also written a palliyeluchchi on his mentor, Shivagnana Baliah Desika Swamigal. This work contains just four poems; the rest might have been lost. The poet belongs to the Virashaiva cult.

Ramalinga Swamigal alias Vatalur Vallalar of the nineteenth century sang a palliyeluchchi in praise of Lord Nataraja of Chidambaram temple.

Poet Subramanya Bharati has written a palliyeluchchi on Bharat Mata (Mother Bharat), soliciting her to wake up to establish a new India.

V. Muthusami Iyer's 'Tiru Anechar tiruppalliyeluchchi', K. Balasundara Mudaliar's 'Tiruvenkatavan tiruppalliyeluchchi', Perunchitranar's 'Tamilar tiruppalliyeluchchi' and A.K. Parantamanar's 'Tamilpperuntevi tiruppalliyeluchchi' are some of the modern palliyeluchchi poems written by contemporary poets of the day.

In one of his collections, the poet Kannadasan has written a palliyeluchchi addressed to Lord Narayana in prose.

PALLU (Tamil). Tamil is rich with a large number of prabandha works which are usually called chirrilakkiyam (minor literature). They are ninety-six in number. One among them is Pallu prabandam. Pallu is a literary genre in verse dealing with the life of peasants—the people who belong to the fertile region called marutam (pastoral region).

Pallu is generally addressed to a god or a benefactor. The best of the pallu works, Mukkutar-pallu, written as early as the seventeenth century by an unknown author, stands as a typical example of this literary form.

Pallu has invocation songs in the beginning. Then comes the Kattiyakkaran who announces the arrival of the other characters. He acts more or less as a 'sutradhara'. We have the elder palli (the first wife of the pallan), the younger palli (the second wife of the pallan) and the pallan (a tiller) as the central figures of this literature.

The pallan is very much infatuated with the younger wife and neglects both his first wife and the farm work. The pannaikkaran (the landlord) searches for the pallan after the fresh rains have come. Learning from the elder palli that he is staying in the house of the younger one, he goes over there, scolds him and orders to commence the work at once. The pallan once again fails, drinks and stays with the younger palli. Enraged by this, the landlord brings him again and puts him in fetters. The elder wife who is behind this move at first is later moved and pleads for his release. All the work in the fields is attended to by the pallan and his men and women, the result of which is a bumper crop. The paddy is distributed among the tillers and others. There erupts a wordy duel between the two wives—one belongs to the Vaishnava sect and the other to the Shaiva sect—which ends in reconciliation.

Pallu is in verse with songs set to music; it is also at the same time a dance-drama. Since it is enacted on the threshing floor of the fields and since it contains colloquial words and phrases, pallu is usually classified as a folk play.

The verses are beautiful and rhythmic in the Mukkutar pallu in which the life, habits and customs of the peasant community of the seventeenth century are very well portrayed. Full details regarding the cultivation of the farm, the kinds of bulls, the varieties of paddy and also those of fish are given in the work.

The rural background and atmosphere, the popular style of language, the music and the dance, the humour and the pathos, the religious bent of mind of the pallan and others all go together to make the work quite interesting and realistic.

Gnanappallu, Katraimalaippallu, Tantikai Kanakarayanpallu, Chenkottuppallu and Mokanappallu are some of the notable works of this genre, all of which have the same stereotyped story element, but differ mostly in religious view and presentation technique.

PALOOR, M.N. (Malayalam; b. 1932), born at Parakadavu in Ernakulam district, is one of the post-modern poets in Malayalam. He had no formal education at home. Passionately interested in Kathakali, he learnt the art form for four years, but later he got trained in motor mechanism and became a car driver in the Indian Airlines at its Bombay office.

A gifted poet with a simple and straightforward style, Paloor started writing very early. He has written more than a hundred poems. His first collection of 22 poems was published in 1962 under the title Petittondan (Fool or a coward). There is a poem with the same title in the collection. In it Paloor imagines God as a coward because He keeps Himself inside for fear of human beings. The poet says that the only way left to God to get out of this awkward situation is to incarnate Himself as a human being on the earth. Certainly Paloor is not an atheist. Perhaps it is the innocent humour of the Nambuthiri tradition that motivated him to write the poem.

In another poem 'Vimanattavalattil oru kavi' (A poet at the airport) he says that the modern man has made anacin the main food in order to get relief from the chronic headache caused by city life.

Even though Paloor can laugh at the helplessness of God, he is not able to bear with the transformation in the 'awakening country', where all the merits of the countryside are disappearing. He says that just by mentioning T.S. Eliot men pose as scholars. The pity is that the poet has to live among such hypocrites with all his suffering and anguish.

Tirthayatra (Pilgrimage, 1972) is a collection of Paloor's twenty poems. The poem 'Tirthayatra' in it is his imaginary voyage together with the Muse. He fears whether he and his poetry can make the journey safe where the great poets fear to tread. 'Valiya Hotel' (Big hotel) included in this collection is a very interesting piece.

Bhangiyum abhangiyum (Beauty and ugliness, 1987) is another collection. It contains thirty-two poems. Most of the poems in this group show the poet's deep feelings on the cultural heritage of India and human wisdom. Among them 'Adhikaprasangam' (Irrelevance) and 'Oru kattu' (A letter) express the poet's approach to life.

PAMPA (Kannada; b. 902 A.D.), known as 'Adimahakavi', is the first great poet in Kannada. In his two celebrated works the 'champu' form, an admixture of prose and a variety of verse, is found fully developed. The poet avers that his works eclipsed all the previous ones and that no poet depicted the Mahabharata story as he did. For about three centuries Pampa was the model and standard for composition in the champu form. This period is, therefore, known as 'Pampayuga'.

Tracing his genealogy, Pampa tells us that his great grand-father's father Madhavasomyaji of Shrivatsa gotra was a versatile brahmin who was a 'Sarvakratuyaji' (one who had performed the Sarvakratu sacrifice). It was Pampa's father (son of Komarayya) Abhiramadeva who had embraced Jainism. Pampa, who had great respect for brahmins, was no religious fanatic, though he was a devout follower of Jainism.

Attracted by Pampa's poetic genius and heroic nature, Arikesari II (925-955 A.D.) of Vemulavada Chalukya dynasty, invited him to his capital Bodana to accept the honoured place of a court-poet and conferred on him the title of 'Kavitagunarnava' after his own title 'Gunarnava'. At the instance of the prince, Pampa composed two works, Adipurana and Vikramarjunavijaya, popularly known as Pampa Bharata. From the details found in Vikramarjunavijaya, it appears that the poet and his patron admired each other. The poet saw in his patron the noblest virtues of the legendary heroes of the Mahabharata. With love and respect for him, the poet composed his Bharata identifying Arikesari II with Arjuna, immortalising the name and fame of his patron. Pampa, as an army-commander, took active part in the battles and put his enemies to flight. With his exquisite qualities as poet and warrior, he came closer to his patron and they became ideal friends.

Pampa seems to have had his education under the venerable preceptor Devendramuni of Kondakunda. He studied the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and other great epics in Sanskrit and Prakrit. He specialised in all the branches of knowledge, viz. poetics, grammar, prosody, music, dance, architecture, medicine, economics, politics, astronomy, mathematics, art and technique of war. Devendramuni, according to the Shravanabelgola inscription, had settled in Shravanabelagola, and Pampa probably, came to stay with him for education. During this period, perhaps, he came in contact with the beautiful regions of Danavasi.

In the poet's plan, Adipurana is an 'agamika'—a religious work—and 'Vikramarjunavijaya' a 'loukik'—a secular one. The plan of producing two works of this character had been established as a tradition among the Jaina epic-poets long before Pampa. The fact that Adipurana was written first within three months, and later, Vikramarjunavijaya within six months, testifies to his unfailing poetic inspiration. He completed Adipurana in 941 A.D. or, according to some, in 942 A.D. at the age of thirty-nine as per calculation done on the basis of the details furnished by the poet in his Adipurana. Later, he took up the writing of the greater epic Vikramarjunavijaya. Pampa chose for the epics great themes from Sanskrit works, one from the Purvapurana of Jinasena, and the other from the Mahabharata of Vyasa. Though adaptations of the great Sanskrit classics, the two epics have the distinctive stamp of the style of Pampa. Besides, the Purvapurana and the Mahabharata are in verse, whereas these two works are in the champu form in which the poet wields a masterly hand. In these two works, especially the Vikramarjunavijaya, the poet exhibits exceptional ability as an epic-poet in his skilful manipulation of plot-construction, his vivid characterisation with extraordinary insight into the human heart, his exquisite handling of nature, and above all in his marshalling of human conflicts and problems. Jaina literature too has a Bharata story as part of Harivamsha, but Pampa chose to adapt his Vikramarjunavijaya from the Mahabharata of Vyasa, which is a testimony to his liberal attitude as a true poet. On the celebrated release of the epic Vikramarjunavijaya (about 950 A.D.), Arikesari II showered honours on Pampa with rich presents and donations inclusive of a special copper-plate grant of an 'agrahare'.

It must be conceded that in both his compositions Pampa wrote under constraint—in the Adipurana the constraint imposed by the need to conform to the dictates of a religion, and in Vikramarjunavijaya the constraint imposed by the indentification of his hero with his patron. But yet he has given two great works and influenced subsequent poets profoundly. He has a total vision of the great potentiality of human life which informs the two epics. He has profound respect for mankind—in one place he asks, 'Manushya jaathi thaanondevalam?' (Is not all mankind one?)—and, even as he recognizes the evanescence of earthly existence and glorifies renunciation and 'tapas', can recognize the beauty of this life and the richness of human relations. He creates vivid and living characters and memorable situations. As his description of 'kavya' testifies, he had a sense of architecture and the organic nature of poetic composition. His language is the elitist language of the 'Puligere' area of Karnataka, but he can use colloquial language appropriately. Restraint, dignity and a sense of propriety characterize his style. Occasionally (particularly in his first work), there is excessive use of Sanskrit. But on the whole it is majestic language, and, as he himself said, 'hita, mitha and mridu' (pleasing, economic and gentle).

Pampa has been an acknowledged model for succeeding poets. Ranna, Nagachandra, Durgasimha, Rudrabhatta and a host of later poets have paid high tributes to his achievement. He has influenced Kumaravyasa, and his influence has been recognized in Nanniah Bhatta's Bharata in Telugu.

PAMPA YATRE (Kannada), written by V. Sitaramiah (pseudonym, Visi), is a travelogue describing the author's brief excursion in the company of four elderly friends to the ruins of Hampi, once the seat of the glorious Vijayanagar Empire. The author's first work and the first of its kind in Kannada, its literary quality won immediate recognition and set up a standard in that form of writing. Written about sixty years ago, the work continues to claim appreciation by virtue of qualities that transform it into a work of art which otherwise would have been only a catalogue of description of places and things.

A travelogue for all its details and accuracy would not be different from a guide book if it were not to record the author's individual responses to the places visited and the sights seen; and equally, an excursion would be less than interesting if it were not full of intensely engaging experiences. The place the good companions chose to visit was difficult to reach and devoid of convenience. The sights to be seen had historical associations and architectural attractions; and the companions were men with distinct temperaments and aptitudes. All this made for a combination that could be trusted to yield experiences both rewarding and trying. These evoke from the author, a man of poetic sensibilities, responses that light up the pages of Pampa yatre.

The vista was magnificent even in its ruin. The extensive landscape, divided by the river and bordered by rocky hills, was studded with temples, palaces and royal courts in ruins—all in various stages of dilapidation. The place was strewn over with sculpture disfigured by relentless vandalism. The builders never seemed to know doing things small. If in one temple only the feet of the deity remained, as if all that could be vouchsafed to man at best was Lord's feet, in the famous Vitthala Temple, the sanctum sanctorum was empty as if the presiding deity, unable to bear the surfeit of architectural grandeur, had migrated elsewhere. The temple with its imposing facade, spacious halls in the middle and on the sides lined by columns of sculptured stone, with guarding angels and mythological figures carved all over on pillars, cornices and ceiling, was like a piece of magnificent music frozen into stone, mutilated by the predator's hammer, yet bearing mute witness to the glory that it once was.

The palaces were full of associations. Here was the abode of Vidyaranya who inspired the founding of the empire, and there the birth-place of Hanuman. Farther away and beyond the river, Sabari waited for Sri Rama and nearby spread the placid waters of the famous lake whose beauty kindled in Rama's heart longings for his lost love and brought tears to his eyes. Not far away was the spot where Vali and Sugriva had fought for Kishkindha. History, legend and mythology seemed to have acquired an endless lease of life in the midst of those ruined monuments.

These elevating experiences were, however, preceded by an almost sleepless night for fear of oversize scorpions and their kin. Subservience to the austere and abstemious regimen of personal cooking by the revered eldest of the group meant little or no coffee, but doing instead the unwelcome jobs of cleaning up. The guide slipped away and joined only after the party had lost and found its track through bush and bramble; and, at dusk, overtaken by darkness and driving rain, the group, struggling with upturned umbrellas and broken mud-heavy chappals to the chagrin of some and the amusement of the rest, heaves back to the comfort and safety of the night's shelter. The experience was not less memorable than the sights of succession of dreams. Elaborate preparations were made for ceremonial worship at the temple. Soon Krishna-devaraya with his royal entourage arrived in pomp and splendour, worshipped the deity and returned. Next it was the royal harem where damsels of enchanting beauty were either sporting or singing or displaying their charms to catch the king's eye. The scene of riotous loveliness shifts to the royal court in magnificent assembly. The last of the monarchs, stiff and roused in spite of his years, sounds a clarion call against the threatened Muslim invasion. The vision melts into another full of wails and cries and confusion in the midst of fire and destruction all round. With this most eloquently described dream sequence which recaptured the vanished glory of the empire, the travelogue concludes and the companions bid a tearful farewell.

PAN LAKSHAT KON GHETO (Marathi) is one of the most popular social novels written by the famous Marathi novelist, Hari Narayan Apte (1864-1919).

The novels before Pan lakshat kon gheto were broad tales, simple in conception and composition. Their aim was entertainment and instruction. They told an unending story to satisfy the curiosity of an average reader wanting to know what happened next. The story was arranged in a strict chronological order. Haribhau's novels marked a sudden and significant development in the form and purpose of the novel. Haribhau Apte wrote this novel to expose the contemporary social problem of child-widows. The novel is not merely the tragic tale of a woman called Yamu, but it is a story of the sad plight of a typical middle class Maharashtrian family and a cluster of such families.

These families are different from one another. Through this difference the novelist throws light on the different aspects of the institution of marriage. Haribhau is equally interested in individual characterization as well as realistic portrayal of the situations.

The novel opens at a point when Yamu's family is under great tension as her father is facing a serious charge. He works as head-clerk in the office of the Collector, getting a salary of Rs. 150/- per month. The tension is described from the little Yamu's point of view. The family shifts to Yamu's grandparents in a village near the town. The grandparents are a little queer and their relation with their son is rather peculiar. Both the families try to cope with the crisis in their own ways. Other neighbouring families too come into the picture by and by. Life for Durgi's family is much more tragic. Haribhau follows the course of fortunes of these two families through a tragic sequence of events. The family of Yamu's husband is described in minute details. All the members of this large complex family are presented with deep understanding and skill. To live in such a family is a sad, frustrating experience for young Yamu.

The story of the novel covers a period of fifteen to twenty years. The number of characters is nearly forty. Incidents happen at several places. There are many ups and downs, and many passions and moods are aroused. It would be really difficult to maintain unity of purpose and impression in an extensive narration of this kind, but Haribhau has succeeded in maintaining it in spite of the inevitably sprawling nature of the narrative.

In those days, child marriage was a popular practice. The childhood of girls was abruptly cut short; they were deprived of education and rushed into marriages. They were saddled with motherhood and other domestic responsibilities at a young age. Many became widows and were blamed for the untimely death of their husbands. They were condemned to lead a life of mute suffering and suppression, made unseemly by the practice of their heads being tonsured. The joint family was a collection of individuals with diverse tendencies and dispositions, forced to live together and tread on the toes of one another. The elderly women took sadistic pleasure in humiliating tender aged daughters-in-law and widowed girls in the family. The women in general were subjected to all kinds of humiliations and deprivation. All these aspects are forcefully revealed in the novel.

The novel uses modes of expression and language which are characteristically feminine with its appeal bordering on sentimentality. On the whole it is realistic in its approach and in spite of its expansiveness it has an ability to make the ordinary life of the ordinary men vividly alive.

PAN PHUL (Hindi), published in 1954, is the first collection of short stories by Markandeya. It has historical importance in the development of the Hindi short story in as much as it expresses the sentiments of the common massess in a new idiom in short stories.

There are twelve stories in this anthology, such as 'Vasavi ki maa','Sangit', 'Ansu aur insan', 'Ramlal', 'Rekhayen', 'Kahani ke liye nari patra chahiye'. They attract the reader not only because of their technique but also because of their being free from artifice. The events and situations are not imposed from outside but are an integral part of the plot. So are the characters who seem to emerge from situations.

The writer has drawn situations from his familiar rural setting and atmosphere. Earlier, Premchand had also written stories on rural situations, but his strength lay in the narrative element. Markandeya mingles 'atmosphere' with the 'narrative'. The minutest details of human relations are knit so finely with the atmosphere that Markandeya is said to have prepared the ground for the 'Nai kahani' movement which started in 1955.

Markendeya has the art of weaving the narrative with the most tender feelings of the human heart. The stories 'Gulara ke Baba', 'Sabaraiya', 'Pan phul' and 'Sat bachchon ki maa' are specially worth mentioning from this point of view. The experiences of rural life and the workings of human psyche have been presented with natural ease. What is important is that the author does not go to the rural characters out of any intellectual curiosity. They seem, rather, to be part of his personality. From this point of view the approach here is different from that in Phanishwarnath 'Renu'. Renu to some extent is sentimental towards rural life, but Markandeya goes to the rural reality with a feeling of austerity. The reality presented here is based upon the honesty and authenticity of living experience.

These are two factors which make these stories so living and aesthetically appealing. Their language has a local colour which helps create a typical atmosphere. Secondly, they present a stark human reality which is able to communicate social inequity and personal suffering. In some stories the author even tries to present the psychoanalysis of characters. The stories of the collection have often been discussed in the context of the 'Nai kahani' movement. Markandeya has, indeed, given a new dimension to the tradition of Premchand and his impact on the later writers of short stories has been quite considerable.

PANA (Malayalam) is a ritual performed in connection with the worship of the goddess Kali in Kerala. The hymns employed in pana are called 'panattottam' or 'panappattu'. Some of these pana hymns are considered the earliest specimens of Malayalam poetry. Changes might have crept into them during the oral transmission from one generation to another of the illiterate professional caste who practised them. One of the Kali songs known as 'Darukavadham' is assigned to the 5th or 6th century A.D.

Pana hymns are also found in the literature of the Sanghakkali. This semi-religious, comic stage performance of the Shastra Nambutiris (a subcaste of Nambutiris who had renounced Vedic studies in favour of the science of weapons) is very ancient. Historians have assigned the origin of Sanghakkali to the period 300 B.C.—800 A.D. The songs associated with it, especially the nalupadam, which have a religious significance, might be as old as the pana hymns. In Sanghakkali also there is an item called pana. Pana hymns are also common to 'tiyyattu', another ancient form of Kali worship performed in Kerala.

Pana also indicates the metre, viz. 'drutakakali', which is employed in many of these hymns. It may be that from the ritual the name was transferred to the metre of those songs. Most of the later pana songs had no connection with the pana ritual. But pana or drutakakali, because of its melodious charm, has become one of the most important and widely used metres in modern Malayalam poetry. This metre is allied to 'kaliviruttam' in Tamil poetry. The most famous among the pana songs in Malayalam is the 'Jnanappana' (song of wisdom) of Puntanam Nambutiri. The following lines show the construction of the metre.

Innaleyolamentennarinheela,
Ini naleyumentennariveela
Innikkanda tatikku vinasavuminna neramennetumariveela.

Some other pana songs are 'Parvatiswayamvaram', 'Krishnalila,' 'Santanagopalam,' 'Gurudakshina,' 'Dutavakyam,' 'Nalacharitam,' 'Sundarakandam', 'Bhadravataram' and 'Misihacharitram puttanpana'.

PANCHADASHI (Sanskrit). About the authorship of the Panchadashi there is a controversy among scholars. It is traditionally believed that it was written by Vidayaranya Swamin and Bharatitirtha, but the riddle of the identity of Vidyaranaya and Bharatitirtha is still unsettled. However, it is an acknowledged fact that the Panchadashi is a post-Shankara Advaita Vedanta classic of great celebrity. It is so named because it consists of fifteen (Panchadasha) chapters which have been named as follows: 1. Differentiation of the real principle (tatvavivekah); 2. Differentiation of five elements (mahabhuta-vivekah); 3. Differentiation of the five-sheath (pancha-kosha-vivekah); 4. Differentiation of duality (dvaitavivekah); 5. Fixing the meaning of the great sayings (mahavakya-vivekah); 6. Lamp of the picture (chitradipah); 7. Lamp of perfect satisfaction (tripti-dipah); 8. Lamp of Kutastha (Kutasthadipah); 9. Lamp of meditation (dhyana-dipah); 10. Lamp of theatre (natakadipah); 11. Bliss of yoga (Brahmanande yoganandah); 12. Bliss of self (brahmanande atmanandah); 13. Bliss of non-duality (brahmanande advaitanandah); 14. Bliss of knowledge (brahmanande vidyanandah); 15. Bliss of object (brahmanande vishayanandah).

The author has grouped all these chapters into three quintads, viz. 'Viveka-panchaka' dealing with the discrimination of the real from the non-real; 'Dipapanchaka' expounding the nature of the self as pure consciousness; 'Anandapanchaka' dealing with the bliss-nature of the Brahman. It has been stated that the above mentioned three quintads have for their theme the three aspects of Brahman, 'sat' (existence), 'chit' (consciousness) and 'ananda' (bliss) respectively.

The central objective of the Panchadashi is to provide guidance to the seeker of truth through instruction. This object of the book has clearly been specified by the author at the very beginning of the work. He says. "This discussion about the discrimination of truth (Brahman) from untruth is being initiated for the easy understanding of those whose hearts have been purified by service to the teacher." Thus the subject matter is the identity of jiva and Brahman and the attainment of supreme bliss and destruction of nescience. But for the understanding of the supreme truth it has adopted a different approach. Unlike other logicians, the author of Panchadashi has full faith in the words of the scriptures. He preaches that in Vedanta the nature of the truth is sought to be expounded on the triple basis: scripture, reasoning and experience (Shrutyukti-anubhutibhyah, Vol. 56, XI 89).

Besides, in this work various methods, by means of which discrimination could be achieved, have been discussed at length. One important method discussed here is the vivarana view of Vedanta which explains the three states of experience, viz. waking, dream, and deep sleep. As a reuslt of this analysis, one realizes that even in our dreamless condition, there is no moment when there is no consciousness, i.e. the self persists in all states while the objects vary and are inconstant. The ever present and unchanged light of consciousness is, therefore, to be regarded as ultimately real. Moreover, explaining the nature of self it states that it is pure consciousness, constitutes one essence and does not undergo any change. Also it is non-dual, self-illuminous intelligence (Samvidekarupa na bhidyate, 1. 4; nodeti nastameti-eka samvidesa svayamprabha, 1.7). Time can bring no change in it, nor can space. The self is indivisible, the plurality of objects cannot split it. The analysis of five sheaths (pancha-kosha, ch.3), viz. the physical (anna), the vital (prana), the mental (manas), the intellectual (vijnana), and the blissful (anandamaya) also brings us to the same conclusion.

Futher, Panchadashi tries to explain the state of consciousness through the analogy of a lamp in a dramatic performance (nataka-dipaka) or a lamp and a painting (chitra-dipa) in which various animate and inanimate objects are painted. There the white canvas stands for the pure Brahman, the white paste for the inner controller (antaryamin), the dark colour for the dispenser of the crude element (sutrataman) and the coloration for the dispenser of the concrete elemental world (virata); and all manifest figures are the living beings and objects of the world. According to this and other explanations presented on the various aspects of 'maya' it is pointed out that all objects of the world are but a complex of it. The existence or being of all things is the Brahman and all that appears identified with it is the Maya. The false appearance of the individual selves is due to the false identification of subjectivity–a product of maya with the underlying pure consciousness, i.e. Brahman.

The bliss-nature of the Self, Brahman, has been explained in great detail in the last five chapters. The teaching of Yajnavalkya to Maitreyi in the Brihadaranyaka-upanishad constitutes the basis for explaining the bliss-nature of self, though he profusely quotes from other Upanishads as well.

"The chief and important feature of Vidyaranya's Panchadashi is the continual repetition of the well established Vedantic principles in a clear, popular and attractive way, which is very helpful to those who wish to initiate their minds into the Vedantic ways of self realization" (Dasgupta).

PANCHALI (Bengali). The term 'panchali' in Bengali signifies a type of literary compostion in pre-modern Bengali literature which is genetically connected but chronologically separated. Its early type is now better known as 'Mangala' poetry; these poems are long narratives, to be chanted or sung, or both chanted and sung-poems which extol some popular deities and puranic gods. The later type, known as 'panchali' is of much shorter length; these poems are also sung and chanted (or more sung than chanted) but vary in content. Some, like the panchali of the older type, extol popular deities and puranic gods, others deal with amusing subjects from life and society. The manner of performance is also different. The early type, the mangla, has a ritualistic flavour, and in the early days, that is from the fifteenth century to the eighteenth century they were chanted and sung as part of a religious celebration. The later type was performed as addendum to religious ceremony, or entertainment for social gatherings and private assemblies. The pattern of music was also different. The early panchali followed the style of the 'kirtana', while the later panchali freely used both the kirtana and the non-kirtana styles.

The word panchali came from Sanskrit 'panchali, and 'panchalika', meaning a doll (puppet) as well as a style of music. There was also a literary style, named panchali, recongised by the medieval literary critics of Sanskrit and Prakrit poetry; but here the term is probably territorial like Vaidarbhi and Lati. Originally such poetical and musical performances were accompanied by puppet-shows and were sometimes named panchali or panchalika. Actually we find narrative poems with this name in Avahatta as well as the old Gujarati and Rajasthani in the fifteenth and later centuries. In Bengali, panchali or panchalika poems have been known since the last decade of the fifteenth century. It may be noted that the actual title of such Bengali poems contains the name of the deity or god extolled, followed by the word 'vijay' (victory) or 'mangala' (benediction), but the genre is always mentioned as panchali or panchalika.

From the very beginning the panchali compositions were also of two varieties according to the content. The older variety was concerned with the popular puranic stories of Krishna, Rama, and other deified lovers and heroes. The earliest specimen known to us is Jayadeva's Gita-govinda, and from the Brihad-dharma-purana we know that its performance was accompanied with puppet show. The author also has named it a mangala work. The story of Krishna was always popular for the early and late forms of Bengali panchali. The reason was no doubt the immense influence of Vaishnavism initiated by Chaitanya and his followers.

The other group of panchali poems belonged to the Manasa and Chandi cults. The earliest poem on Manasa was written by Bipradas, a Brahmin. He had started writing around 1494 when Hussain Shah was on the throne of Bengal. Bipradas was followed in the sixteenth century by Narayana Dev, a Kayastha, whose family had migrated to East Bengal from Radha (West Bengal). The Manasa panchali became very popular in East and North-East Bengal and a host of writers followed Narayana Dev. In West Bengal the most successful writer of the genre was Ketakadas Kemananda who belonged to the middle of the seventeenth century. North Bengal had a slightly different version of the Manasa story and the most notable writer was Tantra Bibhuti; Jagajivan Ghosal and Jiban Maitra followed Tantra Bibhuti.

The best, and one of the oldest, panchali (mangal) poem was written by Mukunda Kavikankar who had started writing it about 1555. He is by far the most outstanding poet in pre-modern Bengali. Other well-known poets are Madhava from East Bengal and Manik Datta from the North. They belonged to the late sixteenth or seventeenth century.

Dharma-mangala panchali did not originate before the seventeenth century.The oldest and best known poet was Ruparam who had given up his soical status and formed a troupe of his own for the performance of his composition. He wrote his poems in the mid-seventeenth century when Suja was the Governor of Bengal.

Of all the panchali poems on the Rama story, Krittibasa's work has put in the shade the works of others. His poem is still very popular in panchali performances, but there is no real evidence to assign the poet to a period before the middle of the seventeenth century.

For Bharata panchali poems on the theme of the Mahabharata, Kashiram'a work has overshadowed all attempts by others, but we are not sure whether Kashiram wrote the entire poem. It should be noted that the Mahabharata was never popular for panchali poetry and Kashiram's poem was never sung as such. The earliest panchali poem on the Mahabharata was written in the first half of the second decade of the sixteenth century by Parameshwara Das. His patron was a general of Hussain Shah.

It is also notable that most of the writers on the Mahabharata story were not Brahmins. 'Krishnamangala panchalis', from the very beginning, followed the Bhagavata-purana, but the narrative rarely proceeded beyond the killing of Kansa and the rescue of Devaki. The oldest such work is Sri Krishnavijay of Maladhar Basu, a revenue officer of Bengal, upon whom the court had bestowed the honorific title of Guniraja Khan (i.e., Lord Virtuoso.) He was not a Brahmin and wrote the poem between 1473 and 1480. He followed the story as narrated in the Bhagavata-purana. Basu's poem became very popular among the Vaishnavas of the upper classes and, around the beginning of the sixteenth century, the poet's village became a centre of Vaishnavaim.

In the sixteenth century two or three good poets wrote Krishna mangala poems which were more lyrical than Basu's. It is evident that they had followed closely the kirtana tradition. Shyamadasa and Madhava are the outstanding poets of the genre in the sixteenth century. As the performance of such poems was not always strictly connected with a ritual, they became more popular and were frequently performed so that the other forms of the ritualistic panchalis began losing popularity owing to the seeping influence of the kirtanas. So, it gradually became shorter during the subsequent centuries, turning into the typical later Bengali panchali, called 'Krishna mangal jatra'. In the performance of the former generally one character, the singer, played also the role of other characters whereas in the performance of the latter at least three actor-singers were necessary; the Intermediary (duti)– also the lead– was often the only singer, two boys playing (some time mutely) Radha and Krishna and the theme, often an episode, came from the love story of Radha and Krishna.

From the middle of the seventeenth century there appeared a tendency to write very short poems extolling the graciousness of some domestic and popular deities who had never been honoured by an elaborate mangala or panchali poem. Among such deities by far the most eminent was Satyapir or Satyanarayana. He was the united Hindu-Muslim conception of the supreme God-Narayana of the Hindus and the omniprudent Allah of the Muslims, appearing as an angel or saint (Pir). The fashion of writing short, often very short, Satyanarayana or Satyapir panchalis remained unabated until the middle of the eighteenth century and it was stopped only by the popularity of Rameshwar Chakrawarti's work which appeared repeatedly in print. Rameshwar belonged to the later half of the eighteenth century.

The best writer of the popular varities of late Bengali panchali was Dasarathi Ray (d. 1857). He was one of the best composers of the early nineteenth century and the melodious compositions created by him were highly appreciated. They influenced Tagore in his early age. After Ray some credit for works in the panchali genre may be given to Rasikchandra Ray with whom panchali poetry and music as productive artistry died in the closing decades of the century.

PANCHALI SAPATHAM (Tamil) or 'Draupadi's vow' was described by its author Bharati as a translation of some episodes from Vyasa's Mahabharata. It is a modern version of the episode wherein the writer highlights its contemporary significance. Avoiding the pedantry of the existing epic style in Tamil, Bharati chose "simple phrases, simple style, easily understood prosody, and rhythms liked by the common man" for his narration. The first part of Panchali sapatham appeared in 1912 and was hailed as a poem of great significance. But the second part was published only after the author's death. The poem concentrates on a single crisis in the Mahabharata, yet this is the pivot of Vyasa's epic. All the earlier events lead the reader to the terrible moment when Duhshasana rises to disrobe Draupadi. The heroine invokes a superhuman power and the miracle occurs; Panchali utters the terrible vow that leads to the destruction of the Kauravas.

The characters of Duryodhana and Draupadi stand out in sharp focus. The former is verily a son of darkness, the blind Dhritarashtra, the latter a child of light, the sacrificial fire tended by King Drupada. At the critical moment Draupadi's voice rises in a mighty crescendo of prayer, piercing through the dense fog of evil. Bharati's words seem to carry the weight of the sorrows endured by woman through the aeons past, calling for an end to the tyranny of man, power-mad, lustful, egocentric. Draupadi's uncompromising vow forecasts a new chapter for Indian womanhood when every woman would become a Mother Power, the human representative of 'Mahashakti'. Panchali sapatham is also a projection of Draupadi as Mother India, now in shackles, but containing the will-power to destroy the foreign aggressor.

PANCHARATRA (Sanskrit) is a play attributed to Bhasa, the renowned Sanskirt dramatist, who is said to have belonged to the fourth century BC.

Pancharatra (The five nights) is a play in three acts, and is a 'Samavakara' according to the traditional classification of drama into ten varieties. Pancharatra deals with an episode from the 'Virataparva' of the Mahabharata, but Bhasa has taken many liberties with the epic story. The play presents a highly dramatic situation. Twelve years have elapsed after the exile of the Pandavas, who now live incognito in the city of Virata. The play opens with King Duryodhana after the performance of a sacrificial rite. Drona, the preceptor, requests Duryodhana to settle the quarrel between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, and offer half the kingdom to the Pandavas. After much deliberation, Duryodhana agrees to the request on condition that the identity of Pandavas is revealed within five days (Pancharatra)—this 'catch' gives the play its title. Meanwhile, tidings from Virata city arrive that Kichaka and his brothers have been killed single-handed by an unknown person. Bhishma, suspecting Bhima's hand in the killing, incites Duryodhana to raid Virata's cattle. The incidents that follow—the cattle raid, Prince Uttara's taking up the challenge to fight the Kauravas, accompanied by Brihannala, the disguised Arjuna, and the overpowering of the Kauravas—closely parallel those of the epic story; but Bhasa deviates from the epic to include Abhimanyu in the Kaurava camp. The disguised Bhima bodily lifts Abhimanyu and brings him to the Virata court. Here Bhasa has introduced a touching scene between Arjuna and Abhimanyu, though spiced with humour and comic irony.

Meanwhile, Prince Uttara reveals the identity of the Pandavas, and King Virata is overjoyed. He desires to give his daughter Uttara in marriage to Arjuna, but Arjuna accepts her as daughter-in-law. The news of the Pandavas ultimately reaches the Kaurava court, but since the condition of five nights has been fulfilled, Duryodhana gives half of the kingdom to the Pandavas.

In Pancharatra, Bhasa has presented the character of Duryodhana in a favourable light, as a king with heroic and noble qualities. The humour in the play gets expressed in radically comic situations, when Abhimanyu is brought to Arjuna. The irony arises from the fact that the son fails to recognise the father, and mistakes Arjuna's merry banter for sarcastic taunts. For example, when Arjuna asks him about his mother's well-being, Abhimanyu retorts: 'Are you King Dharmaja, Bhimasena or Arjuna that you act like a father, and ask about the ladies in my house?' Next Arjuna asks about 'Keshava, the son of Devaki', which infuriates Abhimanyu, who sarcastically replies that if Krishna happens to be his (Brihannala's) friend, indeed, he must be doing well. Bhasa also depicts a scene of low comedy in the interlude of Act II, in the merry-making of the cowherds who indulge in singing and dancing.

Pancharatra depicts Drona as a catalyst to effect a truce between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, and by contriving a happy ending, Bhasa has omitted the Kurukshetra war which is the pivotal incident in the epic Mahabharata. It is possible that Bhasa consciously deviated and gave his own dimensions to the epic story, but it is also possible that several versions of the Mahabharata story were current at the time when he wrote his plays and that he based this play on one of the existing versions.

PANCHASAKHAS (Oriya; 16th c.), the five saintly poets who had appeared in the sixteenth century at different places in Orissa, initiated a religion of devotion and thereby enriched Oriya literature. In the first decade of the sixteenth century Sri Chaitanyadeva of Nadiya visited Puri and was accompanied by his disciples, Rupa Goswami and Jiva Goswami among them, who propounded a Vaishnava philosophy that preached 'samkirtana'.

At that time Sanskrit was favoured as a medium for literature and theological discussions but the five saints Balarama Dasa, Jagannatha Dasa, Achyutananda Dasa, Yasovanta Dasa and Ananta Dasa, began to teach 'bhaktidharma' and 'grihasthadharma' in Oriya instead of Sanskrit. They undertook to translate the religious books into Oriya and to communicate the profound significance of the Vedas, the Vedanta and the Upanishads to the people. The 'bhajanas' of the Panchasakhas in honour of Sri Jagannath, Sri Krishna and the Sunybrahma were almost similar to those of Sri Chaintanya's samkirtana. Sri Chaitanya was greatly moved by the devotional work of his five associates. The wonderful 'shastric' knowledge of Balarama Dasa, his keen devotion to Lord Jagannath and his unprecedented popularity among the common masses created a sensation among the Sanskrit pandits of Puri as they struck at the root of their false reputation. He composed books against untouchability and the existing shams and took up the cudgel for women against all social evils. Sri Chaitanyadeva was extremely pleased with the work of Balarama as a devotee and social reformer and accepted him as his preceptor.

Jagannatha Dasa will always be remembered as another stalwart of the Panchasakhas for his translation of the Bhagavata into Oriya with expository comments. Son of Bhagavana Dasa (a Puranapanda), he was a great devotee of Sri Jagannath.

Sri Chaitanyadeva bestowed upon Jagannatha Dasa the epithet 'Atibadi' (greatly great) in recognition of his saintly character and high spiritual qualities. He left behind a 'math' at Puri and the Atibadi sect, glorifying the Oriya Vaishnavite thoughts, mostly centring round Lord Jagannath. Jagannatha Dasa composed his songs in both Sanskrit and Oriya with the intention of educating the common people against religious fanatics who created confusion in the name of religion. His writings like Tulabhina, Jnanasaragita, Bhaktichandrika, Brahmanda bhugola, etc. express his ideas in a very simple and lucid manner. He accepted Balarama Dasa as his spiritual mentor. Since there are many similarities of thought in most of their writings, they are considered two pillars of Oriya Vaishnavism.

There are few books in the whole of Indian literature which compare in terms of depth and pervasive influence with the Oriya Bhagavata of Jagannatha Dasa. B.C. Majumdar in his introduction to The Typical Selections from Oriya Literature says, "I cannot too highly speak of what Jagannatha Dasa has done to raise his countrymen to a higher level of moral existence. No poet of old time enjoys so much popularity as poet as Jagannatha Dasa does."

The third Panchasakha was Achyutananda Dasa. Born in a Gopala family, he was devoted to Lord Jagannath from his childhood. He was living at Puri when Sri Chaitanyadeva went there in AD 1509. His Harivamsha, like the Ramayana of Balarama Dasa and the Bhagavata of Jagannatha Dasa, is almost an original work. This book describes the life-story of Krishna, the Lord of the Gopala community. It was probably his intention to bolster the social status and social consciousness of the cow-herds of Orissa, of whom he still remains the patron saint. Through this book he made all the esoteric teachings accessible to the common Oriya who had no knowledge of Sanskrit. He also wrote Gurubhakti gita, Surya samhita etc. He advocated the worship of Surya and the Alekha and laid emphasis on discovering the 'Lord of the world' in the Self. Against the social evils of the age, he wrote bhajanas bringing out the transitoriness of human life. In these he advises people to be extremely devotional in their attitude towards friends, acquaintances and preceptors. The establishment of a 'math' at Nemal in Cuttack district is a measure of his popularity among the masses of Orissa.

Yasovanta Dasa, the fourth of the Panchasakhas, composed books like Loi gita, Premabhaktigita, Brahmagita, Govindachandragita which became very popular. In Govindachandragita, he stressed the transitoriness of the world and the worship of Parameshwara. In his Atmaparachegita Yasovanta emphasised the importance of realising one's own self and held that performing one's duties was of utmost importance. He also composed a number of bhajans for edification.

Ananta Dasa, the last of the Panchasakhas, composed books like Bhajanatattva and Anakarashabda eulogising Sri Krishna and the Sunyabrahma. The five associates appeared between the second half of the fifteenth century and the early years of the sixteenth. Together the five made a unique band of writers in the Oriya language. They wrote ballads to carry their message of ideal living and right attitude to life even to the illiterate people in the remote parts of the state. They were akin in their spirit and goal for which they were designated Panchasakha. All that is moral, cultural or holy in rural Orissa even today owes its origin largely to the missionary work of these five friends. The seventeenth century devotional poet Baligaon Dasa mentions in his book Bhavisyamalika that the five bhaktas were close associates having Lord Jagannath as their presiding deity.

PANCHASTIKAYASARA (Prakrit) is the oldest and the most comprehensive work on Jaina metaphysics. The text is ascribed to a great saint, Acharya Kundakunda. Among his twenty-two works, Panchatthiyakaya sangaha sutta is a key to the understanding of the basic principles of Jaina philosophy. It is not a mere compilation but includes some of the finest compositions of the author. It was published in Roman script in the Giornale della Societa Asiatica (Italiana) in 1901 by P.E. Pavolini. The text comprises 173 verses in lucid language.

The work mainly deals with six 'Dravyas' and five 'Astikayas'. 'Dravya' denotes an existence which persists despite changes. It is permanance in change. In modern thought, Hegel introduced such a conception of reality.

The Dravyas are six in number: (i) Jiva or soul, (ii) Pudgala or matter, (iii) Dharma or the media of motion, (iv) Adharma or the media of rest, (v) space and (vi) time.

The author also describes the three characteristics of Dravya: (i) quality of sat or existence, (ii) quality of permanence, (iii) substratum of attributes and conditions. Though there is a difference between substance and its mode in terms of significance, quality and utility, one cannot exist separated from the other as the difference is not fundamental. Dravya or substance has the quality of identity and difference. The relation between Dravya and Paryaya is the same as the relation between matter and form. Dravya is capable of taking different forms. No matter is without form and no form is without matter. Dravyas can live in the same place. They can also occupy the same space because of their mutual accommodating nature. These six build up the cosmos.

The 'Astikayas' are described in these words: "Those things which have the essential nature of manifesting themselves severally through their numerous qualities and modes are the Astikayas". In other words, they have an existential nature as well as a spatial quality. There can be no quality without substance or substance without quality; the two are inseparable in their nature. Hence an Astikaya is a substance which has the characteristics of existence as well as that of a body composed of pradeshas. The substance Kala (time), though it has the characteristics of existence, is not included amongst the Astikayas, because it does not have many pradeshas. Pradesha is the unit of space occupied by one indivisible atom of matter and capable of being occupied by other fundamental particles. The time consists of units which never mix with each other but are always separable. The whole universe (excluding the pure space) is full of grains (like heaps of jewels) of time; no part of the space within it is without them. Time has no spatiality or extensive magnitude. Since the five entities mentioned above are capable of occupying space, they are called 'kayas' (corporeals); the term kaya implies relation to many spatial points. Existences that can be so related to space are called by the author, Astikayas. Since these are real, they are 'asti'. Since they constitute the world they have the space quality, hence they are kayas.

Since time has neither potentiality nor reality, the possibility of such space relations is denied the name Astikaya. It is purely an entity of a mono-dimensional series. Though it is not Astikaya, it does not cease to be a real entity; after all it is a reality and not a form of experience. This view is more or less akin to the idea of Realism linked with Bertrand Russell.

The whole text deals with Reality. The substance and its mode are described in the seven forms of prediction about reality. The Dravyas are further distinguished for their qualities and modes. After describing them in general the author examines them in detail. First of all, he explains Jiva. Jiva has the following attributes: life, consciousness, upayoga (knowledge and perception). It is potent, performs actions and is affected by their results. The spiritual qualities of Jiva are infinite. It assumes different forms through the manifestation of the infinite attributes. Jivas are of two kinds: (i) the incarnate of the world and (ii) the liberated of heaven. Sansari Jivas are again two-fold: Trasa (moving) and Sthavara (fixed). Vitalised by Jivas are the following bodies: earth, water, fire, air and even vegetation.

The second book mainly treats the nine padarthas: (i) Jiva or life, (ii) Ajiva or non-life, (iii) Papa or sin, (iv) Punya or virtue, (v) Asrava or flow-in of Karmas, (vi) Samvara or the prevention of the incoming Karmas, (vii) Nirjara or eradication of Karmas, (viii) Bandha or bondage and (ix) Moksha (liberation) or emancipation.

Before introducing the other padarthas the author emphasizes the fact that consciousness should not be associated with Ajiva or non-life. Space, time, matter, the media of motion and rest have no life in them. They are absolutely without consciousness.

Though matter in the form of Karma and non-Karma is intimately related to Jiva, it is quite distinct in nature. Form, structure, colour, taste, touch, smell and sound are the physical attributes. Each of these is again of various kinds.

Asrava means the fountain source of righteousness or sin. In a Jiva who has noble desires and thoughts based on love and sympathy and who is free from evil impulses the pure Karmic matter flows as conditioned by springs of righteousness. Evil thought and sin are the cause of misery as they lead to suffering, but action which leads to pleasure and stimulates desire is also a hindrance to self-attainment and therefore must be avoided. It is possible only in the state of meditation. Meditation on the self is therefore shown as the main condition of 'Nirjara'. It leads to the state of emancipation which is the inner perfection of the soul (Bhava Moksha).

PANCHATANTRA (Sanskrit) is a collection of animal fables and tales known for its antiquity and importance. From the literary point of view it is the most important and interesting work in this branch of literature. It has travelled throughout the world, and has gone through various phases in its long course over centuries.

We do not know for certain at what time the text of Panchatantra (it can better be called a sequence of texts) assumed definite shape. The text of Panchatantra existed in the first half of the sixth century AD, as it is known to have been translated by the orders of King Khosru Anoshirvan (531-79 AD) into the Pahalvi language, the literary language of Persia at that time. A considerable time must have elapsed before it became so well-known that a foreign king desired its translation. As early as AD 570 a Syriac translation from Pahlavi was ready. The fifth century AD can, therefore, be set as the lower limit for the Panchatantra. The date and the authorship of this work are no doubt uncertain but it is generally assigned to the third century BC. Hertel, who has done a monumental work on Panchatantra, is in favour of assigning the first composition of the Panchatantra to the second century BC. According to Winternitz it is one of the oldest works of Indian ornate poetry. He thinks that the date of writing of the Panchatantra can be approximately between 300 and 400 AD, but he agrees that the age of the primary constituent of the Panchatantra has to be placed earlier than that.

The authorship and the original name which the first text of the (so-called) Panchatantra bore is also uncertain. Vishnusharman, the proposed author of the text in the existent work itself, appears to be as much a fictitious name as King Amarashakti of the city of Mahilaropya in South India for whose spoiled sons the author is said to have composed this series of moral tales. Whosoever was the author of the original text, which is unfortunately lost, it is certain that he was a man of taste and aware of the literary genres of his time, although he perferred simplicity for his prose. He was an author gifted with a rare sense of humour and wit.

In the preliminary stanzas, at the opening of the first book, the author has expressed his veneration for the gods, the teachers and the masters of politics—Manu, Vachaspati, Shukra, Parashara, Vyasa and Chanakya 'the great'. After that, it is said that Vishnusharman, the author of the Panchatantra, collecting the essence of all the Arthashastras existing in the world, composed these five books comprising delightful lessons in polity.

Benfey had suggested a Buddhist origin of the fables and tales included in the Panchatantra. Macdonnel says that the original book of the Panchatantra must have been called after the two jackals of Book 1, namely Karataka and Damanaka, for the title of the Syriac version is Kalilag and Damanag, and that of the Arabic translation is Kalilah and Dimnah. Hertel, however, thinks that the original title was only Panchatantra. Tantrakhyayika is supposed to be the oldest recension, but it is doubtful whether the original name was Tantrakhyayika. The meaning of the word 'Tantra', suffixed or affixed in the various current names of the text, is in itself inexplicable.

The Panchatantra developed, existed and survived in a number of recensions, some of them lost. These versions have been classified into the following five heads:

(1) The Tantrakhyayika: It is preserved in two recensions, the older and the younger.

(2) The text translated into Pahlavi in the sixth century: Both the original and the translation have been unfortunately lost. The translations from the Pahlavi translation into Syriac and Arabic languages do throw some light on the original and its first translation.

(3) The Kashmiri version as preserved in the recensions of the Brihatkatha in Kshemendra's version (Brihatkathamanjari) recounts the Panchatantra tales briefly without interruptions, while Somadeva (Kathasaritsanara) has added a fool's story at the end of each book. The form in which these versions of the Brihatkatha preserve the Panchatantra appears to be at a great disagreement with the original in its objective and treatment, as it has been transformed into light literature. These versions of the Panchatantra do not have any independent value.

(4) The South Indian Panchatantra: It is an abridged selection 'for the instruction of the boys who have learnt little', based on a north-western abridgement made after the seventh century (according to Hertel). The text preserved is close to the Tantrakhyayika, hence it is quite valuable as it can be used for the reproduction of the original text. A large number of recensions were produced on the basis of this abridgement, many of which are still extant, contributing thus towards the circulation and popularity of this work.

(5) A Nepalese selection of the stanzas very close to the South Indian Panchatantra goes back to the north-western text.

Hertel has made comparative studies of all available recensions of the text falling in the above five groups. The source of the Tantrakhyayika and of the two Jaina versions is common. The source of the Southern Panchatantra, the Nepalese version, and the Hitopadesha is also common. Of all these versions the Tantrakhyayika is the oldest. Hertel has rightly traced all extant versions to a common source and from the correspondence among them, he draws the conclusion that the Tantrakhyayika provides the best picture of the original work and it can be said to stand next only to the original Panchatantra. S.K. De, however, finds Hertel guilty of exaggerating the claims of Tantrakhyayika and is of the opinion that none of the versions entirely represents the primitive text.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Panchatantra was originally designed to teach polity, statecraft and the fundamental principles of 'Arthashastra' and 'Nitishastra' to the youngsters, but this fact does not mar its achievements and beauty as a book of fascinating stories, which essentially it is. Each of its five parts dealing respectively with the themes of separation of friends (mitra-bheda), winning of friends (mitra-prapti), war and peace (samdhi-vigraha), loss of one's gains (labdha-nasha) and hasty action (aparikshita-karaka) is a narrative unit in itself; but taken together, they all form a perfect whole fitting into the frame of introduction, occurring at the beginning of the work. The stories are told in rapidly moving narrative and the language used is particularly suitable to the plan of the work; it is simple and chaste but elegant. Even the inclusion of verses occurring at the beginning, the middle and the end of the stories does not hinder their progress or the increasing tempo in the technique of story-telling. The well-known characteristics of the narrative art are (i) the use of a basic narrative frame in which other stories are fitted, (ii) interlocking of tales, mixing stories within the stories, (iii) mixture of prose and verse, where verses are adopted to underline the moral, (iv) stanzas introductory to the coming story, and recapitulatory stanzas, summing up its moral which, in most cases, is identical with each other.

The original plan of the work must have been conceived by a genius, for in the realm of the ancient Indian literature it is perhaps the only work that achieves a miraculous effect in transferring human nature and human affairs to the animal world, making the text evince a piquant and deeper sarcasm. We find a donkey lecturing scholastically on sexual art and sex as the fundamental basis of life and, next, meeting his death from a lion, when a jackal lures him away under the temptation of arranging a meeting between him and a beautiful she-ass. The story becomes very piquant when we find that the donkey, seeing that there is a lion in the guise of a she-ass, runs away, but soon he is trapped again by the same jackal and killed by the same lion. There is also the story of another donkey, who feels like singing on a full-moon night, while eating secretly at a farm with a friend. He is advised by the latter not to practise his art, lest the owner of the farm should wake up and kill them, upon which the donkey takes him to task for having no taste for music and art and, as soon as he begins braying the owner of the farm is awakened by the noise and, consequently, the donkey is beaten mercilessly by him. More delightful is the story of a puppy of the jackals, found deserted, brought up and raised by a lion-family. When he is grown up, he regards himself as the elder brother of the lion cubs which had just come after him. Once the sons of the lion had begun to roar they were ready to attack an elephant, but the son of the jackal ran away out of fear. The lions, seeing their 'elder brother' run away, also withdrew. Afterwards, when the son of the jackal began to complain before his adopted mother, the lioness, against his younger brothers' daring in roaring before such a mighty thing as an elephant, the lioness thought it proper to disclose his identity, and advised him to leave the place and join his own community.

Not only the political motives, crookedness and foolishness are attributed to the animals but the world of the animals itself is built up with a wider perspective. The tenderness, wisdom and sympathy of human nature is delineated in a touching manner. In the second book, dealing with the winning of friends, the characters of the crow, the mouse, the deer and the tortoise are very lovingly portrayed, showing their affection for each other, their endurance, their patience and a subtle sense of humour and understanding of human affairs. Equally moving is the tale of their woes and their sharp intellect which saves them from fatal calamities.

One of the interesting features of Panchatantra is that it does not move in the narrow circle of fables only. There are several stories of our world, the world of mortal men, characterised by a penetrating insight into human affairs and a deep sense of humour. There are pictures of Indian rural life, portrayed authentically. There is a tale of the washerman, who is unable to feed his donkey properly, so he lets him eat in disguise at the farms of other men. There are several stories revealing the social consciousness of the author. Devasharman, the master of a monastery, sells the clothes donated by saints, and thus becomes very rich. Finally, he is deceived by Ashadhabhuti, a very cunning man, and is deprived of his wealth. Some of the stories deal with love affairs and woman's treachery.

A greater effect is produced by interlinking and mixing the tales of human beings and animals, in which the different species are brought into contact with one another. A man who is saved from death by some wild animals like the bear is deceived by his fellows. There is a very intelligent story of a she-rat, transformed into a beautiful girl and raised by a sage. When she reaches the marriage age, the noble sage is at a loss to find a suitable husband, as she rejects everyone. Ultimately, she selects a mouse for her husband and, luckily for her, the sage again turns her into a mouse. By bringing the humans and the animals together the Panchatantra gives new dimensions to the interpretation of life and the world.

There are also several very simple stories which appear to have been framed only to teach some moral. Such is the story of a foolish monkey, trying to warm himself by the light of the glow-worm and killing the bird which had tried to bring him to his senses; or the story of the greedy jackal, nibbling the bow-string, and getting transfixed; or the story of a wise hare, sent to a lion as his food by the community of hares which had agreed to send one hare every day to the lion to prevent him from promiscuous carnage. The hare arrives very late and excuses himself by saying that he ran into another lion. Outraged that he has to fight a rival, the lion jumps into a well and meets his death. In a good number of stories the rogues are brought to book, or are able to deceive the simple who fall into their trap. Some of these stories are current even now: for example, the story of the three rogues befooling a brahmin carrying a calf. A person, however small his or her stature be, can solve the worst of the problems by applying his wisdom and talents. Some of the fables bring this out brilliantly. A crow, whose eggs are eaten by a snake, steals a necklace from the royal palace and drops it in the serpent's burrow. The attendants of the king find the jewel and kill the snake.

The Panchatantra has enjoyed immense pupularity in India and abroad. It has been taught in the traditional curricula of the pathashalas (schools) for centuries and even now it is prescribed for various Sanskrit courses up to the University level. It is considered an essential text to attain maturity, worldly wisdom and knowledge. The Simhasandvatrinshika says that a minister to a king should read the Panchatantra along with the works of Chanakya and Kamandakiya. Also, among the world classics the Panchatantra scores the highest number of translations. Hertel has recorded as many as two hundred versions of it in fifty different languages. We can hear its distant echo in La Fontaine's charming fables written as late as the seventeenth century. It had started travelling beyond the Indian frontiers from the fifth century and Benfey, in the most elaborately prepared introduction to his translation of the Panchatantra, shows how it had impregnated the literatures of three continents for many centuries and particularly influenced the European narrative literature of the medieval period. Besides the two very old versions in Arabic and Syriac referred to above, another Arabic translation of AD 570 by Abdallah Ibn Almoqaffa, with the title Kalila and Dimna, is important because it was this source which led to the numerous translations of the Panchatantra into European and Asian languages and also to the very foundations of comparative literary history. At the end of the eleventh century it was translated into Greek by Symeon, and several translations—one by Giulio Nuti into Italian (1563), two into Latin, one into German and several into Slavonic—were based upon it. More important is the Hebrew translation of Rabbi Joel of the twelfth century. In about 1480, editions of a Latin translation, based on it, appeared. In 1483 a translation was repeatedly printed for a German edition.

The importance of the Panchatantra can also be appreciated from the high tributes paid to it in different ages. The Pahalvi translation has a statement indicating that King Anoshirvan, who had ordered the translation, passionately wished that this book be not only the root of all culture, the sum total of all wisdom and a guide to every kind of profitable work, but also serve as a guide to the journey to the other world. Ph. Wolff, the German translator, remarked that the Panchatantra was, 'probably next to the Bible, translated into the largest number of languages in the world', and called it a book 'that inspired the entire mankind and held in reverence by kings and princes.' The observation of Max Mueller is perhaps more to the point: 'The history of the march of Indian tales from the east downwards the west is indeed wonderful, more wonderful and more instructive than many stories themselves.'

PANDA, ANANTAPRASAD (Oriya; b. 1906), novelist and short story writer, was born in a village called Kalyani in the district of Balasore. His childhood was spent in his ancestral home amidst rural surroundings. After doing his B.A. with Honours in English from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, he became a Sub-Deputy Collector. Later, he worked for the State Cooperative Department and finally became its Joint Registrar. In 1953, he went abroad, travelled widely and on his return, wrote Pashchatya anubhuti, in which he recounted his experiences abroad.

Anantaprasad's first short story, 'Atripta basana' appeared in 1925 in Utkal sahitya. His next story, 'Basanta tripti', also appeared in it. The story created a sensation and from that moment he never stopped writing. He wrote one story after another which were compiled later in such collections as Trin guchcha, Sabhyatar tale, Manas bhuta, Barmaja, Naisha-sundari and Joga-rahasya. He also wrote novels which included Bhagyachakra, Nua dunia, Kuli and Mukta akashar bihanga.

For his subject Anantaprasad turned to the cross-section of life in Oriya villages. His broad theme is the varied, and sometimes contradictory, popular response to feudal exploitation and oppression. His stories are remarkable for their precision and centrality and the kindness with which their author treats every individual. In the stories such as 'Sagada' (The bullock cart), 'Raj bhag' (Royalty), 'Goposahoor dokan', 'T.T.I', 'Station Master' and in the novels like Bhagyachakra (1928), the simple men and women folk of rural Orissa come to life in all their vividness and variety.

PANDA, RAJENDRA (Oriya; b.1944), a poet-administrator, is profoundly contemporary in his poetic creation. He started writing in the mid-sixties and several volumes of his poems have been published since 1975. They are rich in quality and provide a substantial structure to the new poetry in Oriya. His representative volumes are Gauna devata, Anabatara o anya anya, Nija pain nana baya, Ghunakshara, Satadru aneka, Chaukathare chira kala, Shaila kalpa and Anya. All the collections are characterized by innovations in both form and subject and set a pattern for experiments in style and versification.

Rajendra's poetry can be broadly divided into two groups, metaphysical and socio-political, and his subjects range from love to joys and sorrows of life. He concentrated on philosophy and mythology in the first few volumes, while the later volumes, by and large, take up the themes of despair and hope. In the first four collections he interweaves his philosophic notions and myth into most of the poems. Initially, he was interested in the presentation of Advaita philosophy, the concept of 'Shunya Brahma' as depicted in poetry by Bhima Bhoi (1855-1894) and the mystical experience of God which surpasses all other earthly experiences. He gives a feeling of the ultimate union of the soul with God, and seems to have affinities with the English metaphysical poets.

In subsequent collections he is more interested in the presentation of contemporary social themes. They disclose the predicament of man and express disgust at the hollowness of modern society. But he can also be optimistic and think of a solution to the individual's problems. As a whole, hope, despair, failure, fear and death are the major themes in his poetry. Fear of death is a recurring theme. At the very moment of his perception of beauty, he seems to be haunted by death.

What most attracts attention in Rajendra's poetry is its form. It is partly lyrical and partly dramatic. In some poems there is a rhythmic pattern; in others only a few lines bear musical quality. In most of his poems he prefers free verse to the regular, and a significant feature is the sudden emergence of short lyrical lines after long prosaic ones. He has at his command the choicest words which are really used everyday. As his thought became matured, he felt it necessary to use traditional language and go back to ancient literature like Charya pada, Rudra sudhanidhi and Madala panji for inspiration. Besides, he has used words out of their ordinary run and from dialects, and has even invented strange compounds. The use of myth and symbolism is an integral part of his poems, while his images are pictures rather than descriptions. As a poet he seems to have been influenced by ancient literature, Sanskrit classics and western myths.

PANDAV YASENDU CHANDRIKA (Rajasthani) was composed by Swarupdas, a follower of Dadu sect, during the year 1835. The poet states in one of the 'duhas' in his Hrinnayanjan that for ingenuity of expression one should see his Pandav yasendu chandrika. This goes to explain the validity of the book's second title, Ukti chandrika. The book consists of 3000 shlokas, telling the story of the Mahabharata in brief. At the very beginning of the book the poet briefly discusses the various elements of poetry, such as rasas, figures of speech and metres. His poetry is very simple and presents a good combination of the loftiness of subject and the beauty of sentiments. It also reveals his mastery over the language. The poet has rightly observed that he has composed the poem in a mixed language, containing Pingal, Dingal and Sanskrit words, so as to reach out to a larger reading public. The book was very popular in Rajasthan and Gujarat in those days, and was published thrice from different places, Indore, Bombay and Delhi. It has had three commentaries too, one known as 'Rasal', two copies of which have been traced at the Indragarh Pothikhana (State Library); the second written by Jiyabhai Gajabhai and Doleji Misan of Gujarat; and the third, a Gujarati commentary, published by Rajkavi Sankardan of Limbadi.

PANDAVODYOGA VIJAYAMULU (Telugu) are the most popular plays in Telugu written by Tirupati Venkata Kavulu, i.e. by the twin writers Diwakarla Tirupati Sastri (1872-1920) and Chellapilla Venkata Sastri (1870-1950) The plays brought name and fame not only to the writers but also to the artists who enacted them.

Tirupati Venkata Kavulu wrote, in all, eleven dramas of which the plots of six are based on the story of the Pandavas. It appears that Tirupati Sastri wrote Pandava vijayamu in 1903 and published it in Saraswati patrika. When staged, the play received applause from the spectators, but the artists had to withstand the strain of acting throughout the night. Venkata Sastri wanted to reduce the size and by adding some more acts he converted it into two plays viz., Pandavodyogamu and Pandava vijayamu. There are six acts in Pandavodyogamu and eight in Pandava vijayamu. It may be noted that the second and the third acts in Pandavodyogamu and all the acts except the first one in Pandava vijayamu were written by Tirupati Sastri and the rest by Venkata Sastry. Diwakarla Venkatavadhani rightly remarks that it is immaterial to know who has written which act, since the readers get the impression that all the acts in both the plays are written by a single individual. It was possible because both the poets had the same command of subject, character-delineation and language.

It may be interesting to note that Pandavodyoga vijayamulu were a source of inspiration for evoking the spirit of patriotism in those days. Ponangi Srirama Appa Rao, in his article 'Natakalu', rightly remarked that the Swaraj resolution passed at the Calcutta Congress in 1907 had its impact on Telugu drama for the reason that writers even in their historical or puranic plays like Rasaputra vijayamu and Pandavodyoga vijayamulu indirectly propagated patriotism.

The plays are aptly named Pandavodyoga vijayamulu. In Pandavodyogamu the efforts for war and peace are effectively described. In Pandava vijayamu the victory of the Pandavas is well dipicted. The source of the plots is the Mahabharata itself, with slight modifcations here and there to suit the requirements of drama. The imaginative skill of the poets is well established when they made Hidimba utter the words 'Ashwatthama hatah kunjarah' imitating the voice of Dharmaja. 'Vira' (valour) is the main 'rasa' in Pandavodyoga vijayamulu, the other rasas being 'karuna', 'hasya', 'shanta', 'roudra', 'bibhatsa' and 'bhayanaka'. Tirupati Venkata Kavulu are second to none in characterisation. They gave graphic descriptions of the individual qualities of Krishna, Dharmaja, Bhima, Arjuna, Duryodhana, Karna, Ashwatthama, etc.

The poems in Pandavodyoga vijayamulu are simple but effective. It may not be an exaggeration to say that there is no Telugu man, whether literate or illiterate, who cannot recite at least one or two poems from these dramas.

All the plays written by Tirupati Kavulu were comedies. They did not follow the technique of dividing the acts into scenes. As per the established rules of drama, scenes of war were not staged. So, at several places they gave the details of war either through a prologue or through characters like Karandaka and Bakotaka. They maintained uniformity in diction irrespective of the status of characters. The dramatic discourse in Pandavodyoga vijayamulu is so effective that even today these plays are staged regularly.

PANDAVPRATAP (Marathi) is a long narrative poem by the noted poet Shridhar. In the history of Marathi literature, the period from 1680 to 1800 was a period of long narrative poetry. Though the rule of the Peshawas gained in stability, poetry showed a certain sluggishness. The spirit which moved the Bhakti poetry of the earlier age was lost sight of, and poets of the period wrote only bulky volumes of narrative poetry. Shridhar exemplifies this tendency, though with a difference.

Before Shridhar, poets like Vishnu-Nama and Mukteshwar in the sixteenth century had translated the Sanskrit epics into Marathi. Mukteshwar's Mahabharata with its scholarship, intensity and embellished style was widely acclaimed. It was a classic in epic composition and the first of its kind in Marathi poetry. It ushered in a new form for the Pandit-poets.

Shridhar's Pandavpratap belongs to this kind of narrative composition of enormous length. It contains 64 chapters and nearly 13397 couplets. The poet repeatedly declares that his model is Vyasa's Bharata. We find him imitating the narrative devices used by Mukteshwar especially in his rendering of 'Adi', 'Sabha', 'Van' and 'Vrat' cantos. On the one hand, Shridhar upholds the tradition of Sanskrit poetry, on the other he imitates the Prakrit narrative tradition. Pandavpratap is not an epic in the proper sense of the term. It is a compilation of stories about Pandava's valour and heroism. The book mainly narrates how the Pandavas got out of the calamities successfully and showed their bravery in the war against the Kauravas. Krishna-worship is one of the significant themes of the book. The Pandavas' devotion to Krishna and Krishna's guidance to them are the highlights of the book. Consequently, it is as much a record of the Pandavas' valour as a record of Krishna's miraculous feats. It is Krishna who seems to be the prime mover in Pandavpratap.

Mukteshwar reduced his Bharata to a compact form, doing away with various sub-stories and philosophical commentary. Shridhar carried this art of condensation even further by avoiding exaggeration and restraining amorous descriptions.

The Prakrit adaptations of Bharata made before and after Shridhar's time received a set-back in spite of their literary excellence. Pandavpratap, however, is an exception. It survived, partly because of the intimacy it established with both the urban and the rural societies. Even today Pandavpratap is recited in the temples of towns and villages alike. Shridhar's narrative skill, which is reader-oriented, is the secret of the book's popularity. By bringing the Pandava story down to the level of day-to-day life, the poet brings it closer to people. But at the same time he keeps us aware of the uncommonness of the story by presenting the marvellous deeds of the Pandavas. It has a special entertainment value. Further, describing the Pandavas' unflinching devotion to Krishna and Krishna's deep love for them, Shridhar makes it an occasion of Krishna-worship. Another reason for its popularity is its simple and natural style. No where do we find the poet making a parade of his scholarship. He communicates with the masses in their own language and his narration has a rare emotional appeal.

PANDE, RUDRARAJ (Nepali; b. 1900, d. 1986) worked

as Head Master, Durbar School, Kathmandu, for sometime. Later, he worked at Trichandra College (Kathmandu), the first undergraduate college in Nepal established in 1919.

Rudraraj Pande's first literary contribution had been poetry for Suktisindhu, an anthology of poems published in the early part of this century. The anthology included twenty-three other contributors and all exhibited a sudden break in thought and theme, if not in form, in their introduction into Nepali poetry the idea of eroticism.

The emergence of Sarada, a literary magazine, in 1934 in Kathmandu heralded a new era in Nepali literature. An altogether new kind of stories, poems and essays began to appear in its pages, and was patronised by the Nepali writers in Nepal and India. This issue of the periodical included Rudraraj Pande's 'Krishna Kumari', a short story founded on the annals of Mewar, and 'Ramechhapko kenchha magar', a story in the nature of a folktale. About forty-four different short story writers contributed stories that were social, historical, psychological and humorous and sometimes based on legends and folktales. An intellectual awakening and a preoccupation with socio-political problems, reform and intellectual development moulded the contributions in this periodical.

It was in 1934 that Rupmati, a social novel by Rudraraj Pande, appeared. It was published by the Nepali Bhasa Prakashini Samiti of Nepal. In his foreword to the book Balakrishna Sama, the noted writer and playwright, said that this novel really augured a new era in the Nepali Novel.

Rupmati depicts the life of a middle class household in Nepal under the Rana regime. In fact, the writing of this novel may be considered a bold literary work which appeared in the face of political and social strains. The principal character is Rupmati, an ideal daughter-in-law who survives in spite of the nagging and irritating behaviour of her mother-in-law and other relatives. It is a social novel with a realistic approach to a traditionally superstitious society.

Pande's second novel Chappakaji (1936) exhibits the same preoccupation of the novelist with social problems. It tells the story of a rich man who falls into the hands of undesirable people who lead him to a life of vice and the protagonist in the end has to suffer the consequences of living an immoral life. The message in the novel is given to the parents of children and they are advised to bring up their children with care, inculcating in them a sense of moral values.

Prayaschit (Repentance, 1938) is Rudraraj Pande's third novel which is concerned with the moral and spiritual development of an individual in society. As Pande wrote in his preface to the novel, it is concerned with the presentation of what is real in life and society but it is also necessary, at the same time, to eradicate the evils of life for the advancement of man as an individual. Prem (1948), the fourth novel by Pande, also deals with society at large and discusses the place of women at home and the necessity of educating them for the eradication of superstition. As a writer of social novels Rudraraj Pande thus made a valuable contribution to the Nepali novel.

PANDEY, CHANDRABALI (Hindi; b. 1904, d. 1958) was born at Sathiaon in district Azamgarh (Uttar Pradesh). A critic and researcher, he was a staunch protagonist of Hindi, and Varanasi was primarily the centre of his literary activities. He did his M.A. from the Banaras Hindu University in 1931 and came into close contact with Acharya Ramchandra Shukla and Maulavi Maheshprasad who inspired him to undertake further study and research. From 1931 to 1934 he studied Sufi literature. He had a good knowledge of Sanskrit, English, Urdu, Persian and Arabic. The problems of Hindi as a language and Nagari as a script engaged his attention and he spent most of his time in propagating their cause. He was elected President of Hindi Sahitya Sammelan (Allahabad), and served as Chairman of Nagari Pracharini Sabha (Varanasi) for many years. He was a man of strong convictions and wrote with zeal and fervour, and his style was sharp and analytical.

His better known works are Bhasha ka prashna (1939), Urdu ka rahasya (1940), Rashtrabhasha par vichar (1945), Tasawwuf athva Sufimat (1954), Keshav Das, Tulsi ki jivan-bhumi, Nagari ka abhishap, Nagari hi kyon, Shudrak, Sahitya-sandipni, Anurag bansuri. His book Swapana-sidhanta was published posthumously in 1977.

PANDEY, MUKUTDHAR (Hindi; b. 1895, d. 1989) was born at Balapur in district Bilaspur, Madhya Pradesh. He started writing poems and essays at an early age under the inspiration of his elder brother, Lochan Prasad Pandey. His early anthologies Puja ke phul (1916) and Kanankusum (1916) bear the marks of 'Chhayavad' and 'Rahasyavad'. He laid more emphasis on human values than on preaching morals in his writings, and tried to awaken the inner sensibilities of his readers by emotive means rather than by mere reporting or narration. His poems foreshadow the chhayavad movement since they inhere elements of self-revelation, suggestiveness, lyricism and spiritualism. Most of his poems are, indeed, lyrics. This prompted Acharya Ramachandra Shukla to call him the harbinger of a new trend (chhayavad) in Hindi poetry. Mention may also be made of his other works like Shailbala (1917), Samaj-kantak, Lachchhama (1918), Parishram (1919) and Hridayadan. Mishrabandhus have referred to two more books by him, Kartika mahatamya and Italiya yuvak.

The articles he wrote at the advent of chhayavad throw much light on the nature and characteristics of this movement of which he was a pioneer.

PANDEY, RUP NARAYAN (Hindi; b.1884,d. 1958) was born at Ranikatra, Lucknow (Uttar Pradesh). He was long an editor of Nigamagam Chandrika, Nagari Pracharak, Indu and Madhuri. At first he wrote poems in Brajbhasha, but later in Khariboli under the influence of the 'Dwivedi Age'. In his anthology of chhayavadi poems, Parag, he moved away from the didacticism of his times and expressed his inner feelings in an emotive language. His Van vaibhav is an anthology of lyrics of new poetic sensibililities. His Van vihangam, Ashwasan and Dalit kusum are quite popular works. To him goes the credit of translating into Hindi the plays of Dwijendra Lal, the Bengali playwright. His important works are : Poems : Parag (1924), Van-vaibhav, Shrikrishna-charit; Plays: Murkh-mandali (1918); Khan Jahan (1924), Samrat Ashok (1939); Translations : Durgadas, Us Par, Nurjahan, Sita, Pashani; Novels : Rama ya pishachpuri (1905), Bhayanak bhul (1906); Kamala (1932), Kapati (1934); Miscellaneous: Ekanki samalochana rahasya (1913), Guru-vakya (1914).

PANDIDURAI THEVAR (Tamil; b. 1867,d. 1911) was the founder of a Tamil Sangam in Madurai. His father Ponnusamy Thevar was himself a leading luminary in the promotion of the study and development of Tamil language and literature. He died during the early childhood of Pandidurai. Equipped with a profound knowledge of religion, philosophy and music, Pandidurai was an ardent student of Tamil literature and a connoisseur of arts, with a deep attachment to the philosophy of Shaiva Siddhanta.

At the Madras Presidency Political Conference, held at Madurai in 1901 under the presidentship of P. Anantacharlu, Pandidurai Thevar expressed his desire to establish a Tamil Sangam at Madurai. The establishment of the Sangam was acclaimed as the Fourth Tamil Sangam by those present. Simultaneously came into being the Setupati Sentamil College, the Pandyan Library and Research Centre. In 1903, the monthly journal Sentamil made its debut and carried research articles of a very high order. For printing the literature of the Sangam, a printing press was also set up. A first class library was built, as also a collection of palm leaf manuscripts of inestimable value.

Pandidurai Tevar also gave scholars financial assistance. But for him, Singaravelu Mudaliar's Abhidhana chintamani, an encyclopaedic work, might not have seen the light of day. Tamil research was put on solid foundation because of his zeal and energy. Steeped in scholarship himself, he could have authored many works, but he kept himself in the background by inducting scholars drawn from all parts of the Tamil speaking world to contribute their mite to the field of Tamilology. Besides being a promoter of Tamil studies, he was a good speaker and scholar, with a sound knowledge of philosophy, religion and literature.

PANDIT, BHAVANI SHANKAR SHRIDHAR (Marathi; b.1906, d.1978) was an eminent critic and poet. He graduated from Morris College, Nagpur in 1929, and did his M.A. in Marathi from Nagpur University in 1931. He started his career as a teacher at Nagpur and Chandrapur, and later taught at Hislop College (Nagpur), Vidarbha Mahavidyalaya (Amaravati) and Nagpur Mahavidyalaya (Nagpur). He headed the Post-graduate Department of Marathi at Nagpur University since its inception in 1958. He was President of the Vidarbha Sahitya Sammelan held at Khamgaon in 1953. He delivered six lectures in the N.C. Kelkar lecture-series at Pune University in 1968, which were published in book form under the title Maharashtrachya jivanatil sthityantare (1969). He was well versed in different languages and literatures such as Marathi, Sanskrit, Hindi, Urdu and English.

He started as a poet in the tradition of the well-known Marathi poet B.R. Tambe. His Kusum-karandak (1958), Shri Kabir-vachanavali (1961) and Meghdut Marathi chhaya (unpublished) belong to this period.

His first collection of poems, Pichalela pava, was published in 1933. He also wrote essays. In the later phase of his writing he distinguished himself as a researcher, editor, and critic of modern Marathi poetry. His books of criticism are Adhunik Marathi kavita (1952, 1968), Samagra Keshavsut (1961, 1970, 1978); Keshavsut panch chintanika (1961); Sant-samagam (1961); Sannichaya (1972); Tambe yanche gitikavya (1972).

His other important works are: Poetry: Pichalela pava (1933), Unmesh ani udrek, Suvas ani ras (1953); Prose: Adhunik Marathi kavita (1952, 1968), Santsamagam (1961), Sanchaya, Maharashtrachya jivanatil sthityantare (1969), Adhunik kaviteche pranete, 2 vols. PANDIT, BHUPATI (Oriya). During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries there was an outburst of poetical compositions dealing with the love of Krishna and Radha.

These poetical works were genuine expressions of the devotional feelings of the Vaishnavites. Bhupati Pandit was a bhakta poet. His Prem-panchamrita is an outstanding 'kavya' dedicated to the portrayal of 'rasalila' of Radha and Krishna and to the exposition of the theological import of Vaishnavism. He classifies the Gopkanyas as Vedkanya, Devkanya, Munikanya and Gopkanya, and their number is estimated at sixty-four thousand. Apart from its thematic importance, the chief merit of the work lies in its use of simple, chaste and elegant Oriya idiom in the manner of the Bhagavata, the classical work of the great saint poet Jagannath Das. Bhupati Pandit came from northern India on a pilgrimage to Puri and met the king of Orissa, Sri Dibyasingh Dev. Dibyasingh Dev granted him some land. This may be the reason why Bhupati Pandit preferred to stay in Orissa and settled in a place called Rathipur, situated between the present Bhubaneswar and Jatani. Bhupati was initiated into Vaishnavism by Chaitanya Das, a devout Vaishnava in the line of Gopibhava. Accordingly, Bhupati wrote Prema-panchamrita highlighting the significance of Gopi worship and composed several 'chautisa' and 'chaupadi' lyrics. It appears that Prema-panchamirita was completed in 1699, the eighth year of the rule of Raja Divyasingh Deva.

PANDIT, PRABODH BECHERDAS (Gujarati; b. 1923) is a linguist of international repute. He had some sort of apathy for grammar during his school days, but his mother reminded him that he was the son of a grammarian, and must therefore, strive to become an eminent linguist himself. He lost one year of his graduate studies when he participated in the freedom movement of 1942 and was jailed for six months. He did his B.A. in 1944 with Sanskrit and Ardhamagadhi as his subjects, securing a first class, and his M.A. in 1946 in Sanskrit and Linguistics. Later, he went to London and worked on 'Shadubashyak-balanubodh' under the guidance of the distinguished linguist, Ralph Turner, for his doctorate. His interest in linguistics brought him into contact with Jules Bloch who inspired him to study various dialects.

After returning to India, Prabodh Pandit joined L.D. Arts College, Ahmedabad, as a Lecturer in Sanskrit. In 1957 he shifted to Gujarat University as Reader in Linguistics until he moved to Delhi University as Professor of Linguistics.

His area of research was historical linguistics, dialectology and phonology, and he later turned to sociolinguistics, applied linguistics, etc.

He published ten books in Gujarati and a number of research papers in journals in India and abroad. His important works are A and O in Gujarati (1955), Nasalization, Aspiration and Murmur in Gujarati (1957), Historical Phonology of Gujarati Vowels (1961), Borrowing: A Study of Linguistic Expression of Social Distance (1961), Phonemic and Morphenic Frequencies of the Gujarati Language (1968), Some Observations on Perception Studies in Speech Analysis (1971), Language in a Plural Society (1976).

Prabodh Pandit was the recipient of many honours. His book Gujarati bhashanun dhvaniswarup ane dhvaniparivartan received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1967, and the prestigious Ranjitram Gold Medal was awarded to him in 1974 for his contribution to the study of Gujarati language and linguistics.

PANDIT, RAGHUNATH VISHNU (Konkani; b. 1917) is a photographer, journalist and poet. He graduated from the University of Poona in 1941. He began his career as a journalist-cum-photographer and won several prizes in All India photography competitions. He edited Bharati, a Marathi magazine devoted to Inter-provincial amity (1952-54). After Goa's liberation (1961) he devoted himself to writing poetry. His main collections of poems are: Ailem tashem gailem (I sing as I please), Mhajem utar gavdyachem (I sing like a Gaudo), Urtalem tem rup dhartalem (What remains will take shape), Dhartarechem kavan (The song of the earth), Chandravall (Moons—all in 1963); Lharam (Waves), Reventlim pavlam (Footprints on the sand), Nach re mora (1975). He edited an anthology of Konkani poetry, Ratnam-har (Necklace of jewels, two volumes, 1976) and an anthology of Goan poetry in English (1976, two volumes). Some of his poems have been translated into English, Hindi and Kannada. His poetry written in free verse brought novelty and freshness to Konkani literature. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979 for collection of his poems entitled Dorya gazota.

PANDYA, CHANDRASHANKAR N. (Gujarati; b. 1884, d. 1937) was a writer and orator. He did his B.A. from Bombay University in 1906 and LL.B. in 1913. Around 1906, he took up the editing of a literary magazine, Samalochaka. He was the founder of a literary institution, 'The Union', which was later named 'Gurjarasabha'.

Active both in literature and in politics, he was a much sought-after speaker. His opinions about Gandhiji's life and work were controversial.

Pandita Gurudatta vidyarthinum jivancharitra, a biography of an Aryasamaja leader, was his first published work. Snehankura and Kavyakusumanjali are the two collections of his poems and Pancha premakathan, a collection of his short stories. Most of his prose writings still remain unpublished.

PANDYA, CHHAGANLAL HIRALAL (Gujarati; b. 1859, d. 1936) was a scholar and translator. He did his B.A. in 1880. After working as a teacher in government schools, he was appointed Director of Education, Junagadh State. He was a scholar of Sanskrit and English. In his time, he achieved a unique position as a translator of classics into Gujarati. His prose, though Sanskritised, is easily comprehensible.

His Gujarati version of Kadambari, a composition of the Sanskrit poet, Banabhatt, is considered authentic and reliable. Likewise, his Bal-kadambari, meant for children, also became equally famous and popular. Other major translations done by him are Sankshipt kadambari and Vasavdatta, rendered from Sanskrit into Gujarati.

His other works include a number of translations published under various titles, the original subject-matter having been selected either from English novels or from prose-writings. They are: Christ-nur anukaran, Vols. I and II (1915), Ek apporva lagna (1916), Manoranjak vartavali, Parts 1 and 2 (1918); Corbettno updesh (1918), Vishuddha sneh (1919). These works acquired a tremendous popularity among contemporary Gujarati readers mainly for their variety of themes and styles.

PANDYA, DOLATRAM (Gujarati; b. 1856, d. 1916), a Sanskrit scholar and poet, born and brought up at Nadiad, had his higher education at Ahmedabad. Impressed by the qualities of Sanskrit epic, he undertook the task of writing an epic in Gujarati, conforming to the characteristics of the classical epic. For his theme, he chose the episode of Indrajit, the son of Ravana, who was a great warrior and a person of extraordinary ability. Indrajit's assassination is the central incident around which the edifice of the epic has been constructed, and hence 'Vira' rasa is the pervading sentiment in the epic. The poem is divided into twenty-six cantos (sargas), and gives us vivid and picturesque descriptions of cities, seas, mountains, seasons, gardens, water sports, and love sports. There is a variety of metres, each metre being appropriate to the delineations of the subject concerned. The poet excels in depicting the lament of Sulochana, the wife of Indrajit, on the death of her husband.

Dolatram has also written a novel on the model of Banabhatta's Kadambari, named Kusumavali (1889). Here also one can see the influence of Sanskrit classics on the author. His collection of poems Sumanguchha (1899) contains descriptive and reflective poems, depicting various emotions. He has tried his hand at drama also. His Amarsatra natak is a historical play.

Dolatram will, however, be best remembered for his innovative attempt at writing an epic.

PANDYA, KANTILAL CHHAGANLAL (Gujarati; b. 1886, d. 1958), nephew of the eminent novelist, Govardhanram Tripathi, was a biographer of repute.

He did his graduation in Science (1904), followed by a Master's degree in 1910 and later a Ph.D. degree. After working at various educational institutions, he joined the famous St. John's College of Agra as Professor of Chemistry which he served long until his retirement. He settled at Nadiad after retirement.

His book, Shriyut Govardhanram (1910), is a biography of Govardhanram Madhavram Tripathi, author of the great epic novel Saraswatichandra. In this biography, he has presented in an impartial manner the events and episodes of the life of Govardhanram, based on documentary materials. A perfectly logical and authentic narration, without slipping into eulogy and exaggeration, is the special feature of this biography. Another peculiarity of this eminent biographer is the way in which he has abstracted the inspiring and supporting forces responsible for moulding the personality and the thinking processes of Govardhanram.

PANDYA, NATWARLAL (Gujarati; b. 1920) is better known by his pen name 'Ushanas'. He taught Gujarati literature at several colleges and later worked as Principal of an Arts College in Gujarat. He inherited his love of poetry from his parents, and cultivated his literary taste by reading classical literature. He is known both as poet and as critic, but he is more impressive as a poet. He is an outstanding sonneteer, though no verse-form is alien to him. His metrical experiments are well-known. The Sanskritized diction of his poetry has its own charm, though at times it is marred by uncouth phrases. His verbal coinages, however, are noteworthy. He was awarded the Ranjitram Suvarna-Chandrak and the Sahitya Akademi Award for poetry (1976). In the first phase of his creative life he published four books of poems. Prasun (1955) contains some striking poems on nature and the cycle of seasons. 'Valavi ba avi' is the best known sonnet of this book and depicts the agony of a lonely mother. Nepathye (1956) is a collection of eight narrative poems, seven of which treat mythological themes in a language rich in dramatic nuances. One of the poems, 'Anurahasya', treats of the war-theme in the modern context. Manomudra (1959) presents complex facets of life. Ardra (1960), though it does not strike any new poetic note, contains some descriptive verses on seasons. The sonnet sequence on Indian places and persons is another feature of the book. Trunno graha (1964) marks the beginning of a newer phase of creative writing. A series of sonnets in this book centre round the themes of life, death and unfulfilled love. 'Vali pacha vatanama' is the best known sonnet sequence of the volume, depicting the metamorphosis of time. Like a blade of grass, time vanishes but it reappears. His next major work is Spanda ane chhanda (1968). In this book 'Anhadni sarhade' is a memorable sonnet sequence—an excursion in time. The pilgrim finds himself between the stars and the grass. Bharat darshana (1964) is a notable collection of poems. Kinkini (1971) is a collection of the poet's representative songs, while Asvattha (1975) is a highly acclaimed anthology of poems which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976. Rupnalaya (1976), again, is an important collection of poems, while Vyakul vaishnava (1977) is an anthology of devotional songs. Be adhyayan (1952), Rupa ane ras (1966) and Upsarga (1973) are critical studies.

PANDYA, YASHWANT SAVAILAL (Gujarati; b. 1906, d. 1955) was essentially a playwright. High academic tradition in the family encouraged him to start writing from his student days. He wrote short stories, satirical poems, sketches of his contemporaries in the journal Sahitya under the pseudonym Jagjivan Shivshankar Pathak. He also edited the annual literary numbers of Veena and Sharad and wrote plays like Padada pachhal (1927), Triveni (1929), Madanmandir (1930), A. Sou Kumari, Rasajeevan, Sharat-na ghoda (1943) and Gharadivadi (1960). Because of his stage consciousness, witty dialogues and tendency to indulge in irony and satire, it has often been concluded that he was influenced by Shaw. Jhanjhwan (1925), published in Sahitya under the pseudonym 'Sakshar', is said to be his best play. Yashwant Pandya is an important playwright who did pioneering work in the field of one-act plays and children's writings.

Yashwant Pandya's creative activity seems to have slackened when he moved to Delhi as the chief executive of the Bombay Life Assurance Company. However, he continued to take interest in literary and cultural activities. While in Bombay, he took keen interest in the establishment of the 'Kalam mandal'. At Ahmedabad he was actively associated with the establishment of 'Nutan Rang Mandal', and in Delhi he was President of the Gujarati Samaj for three consecutive years. He was also president of the Arts and Crafts Society of Delhi.

PANEGYRICS (Kashmiri)
See under QASIDA

PANEGYRICS (Sanskrit) are laudatory expressions, either realistic or idealistic. In Sanskrit literature one comes across such praises by poets in order to glorify their benefactors. These praises often refer to the benefactor as having contributed to the well-being of society. A careful analysis of panegyrics reveals that the poet's appreciation aims at recognising the merits of the benefactor, but while doing so the author also displays a self-assessment, which is his ability to recognise a virtue in others, as Bhartrihari observed, 'Paragunakathane svagunan khyapayantah'.

Panegyrics may be traced back to the Vedas, which contain 'Narashamasis', praises of the mortal beings. The general attitude of the ancients, however, was to refrain from praising the mortals. This accounts for the preponderance of gods and mythological figures in Sanskrit literature as either heroes or active participants in human deliberations. Sometimes the human characters themselves are invested with the qualities of gods. This trend seems to have been derived from Buddhist and Jain works.

The trend is clearly discernible in Sanskrit epics and inscriptions. The glories of Rama narrated in the first canto of the Ramayana, of Yudhisthira and his brothers in the Mahabharata, and of Krishna in the Bhagavata and Harivamsha, prove the point.

The authors of inscriptions reveal their admiration for their patrons. From this distant time we are prone to view their praise as fantastic or idealistic. Here is an example of a panegyric in honour of king:

> Nyayvarjane, rthasya kassamarthah... > am jnatam ekah khalu Parnadatto
> bharasya tasyodvahane samarthah
> (Junagarh Rock Inscription of Sakandagupta)

Sometimes we find the author of an inscription referring to his patron as a prince among poets (e.g., Harisen's paneygric on Samudragupta). In another inscription, king Rudradaman is praised as being skilful in poetry, music, logic, etc.

> Shabadarthagandharva nyayadyanam vidyanam > mahatinam, parana, dharana vijnana
> Prayogavapta vipulakirtina.
> (Girnar Rock inscription of Rudradaman I)

Here is a list of great many virtues said to be possessed by Yashodharman Vishnuvardhana:

> Dhiman daksho dakshinah satyasandhol > hriman suro vriddhasevi kritajnah > baddhotsahah svamikaryeshvaravedi
> Nirdoshoyam patu dharmam chiraya.
> (Mandasor stone pillar inscription of Yashodharman)

In literary compositions, the trend of panegyrics has been of a varying nature. The Mahakavyas, especially the five popular ones (Panchamahakavyas), praise their horoes for all their accomplishments and deeds. Some of the dramas too describe their heroes as endowed with all the virtues.

Shudraka's Mricchakatika, considered to be an elaboration of Bhasa's Charudatta, records in detail the virtues of Charudatta as follows: 'Dinanam kalpavriksho svagunanatah sajjananam kutumbi...'

The laudations heaped on Agnimitra in Kalidasa's Malavikagnimitra are in the superlative:

'Na cha na parichito nachapyagamyah' and 'Tejobhirasya vinivartita drishtipataih', etc. (Act I), later, 'Parighagurubhir-dorbhih prasahya cha Rukminim', etc. (Act II) sound wasteful since Agnimitra did not deserve it. On the other hand, the praise showered on Dushyanta has credibility: 'Kakatha banasandhane... Sahivighnanapohati' (II.1); 'Svasukhanirabhilashah khidyase lokahetoh' (V.7); and 'niyamayasi vimarga prasthi tanattadandan, etc. (V.8). Bana, in his Kadambari, presents his conception of an ideal king in Shudraka, in the following words: "Asit, asheshanarapati shirassamabhyarchitashasanah, pakashasanaivaparah... agamah kavyamtitarasanam... sakalaratikutachahah... Shudrakonama raja". The mythological allusions here serve the purpose of a pictorial presentation of the king to the readers.

Yet another trend is seen in some of the panegyrics. The author does not hesitate to praise himself for the powers he professes to have. Introductory verses in all the three dramas ascribed to Sri Harsha have the following words:

"Sriharsho nipunah kavih..."

A perusal of colophons in some of the 'champus' reveals to us what a panegyric meant to later writers. The champu writers seem to have held the opinion that their literary productions would gain in weight if their parents and grand-parents were also praised for their attainments.

PANEGYRICS (Telugu) are eulogies usually in praise of a king or a wealthy man. They are called 'stuti kavyas' in Telugu.

This practice of writing panegyrics is very common in Telugu literature, because the kings used to give 'agraharas' (villages) to poets who praised them. Sometimes kings gifted even a lakh of rupees for a single panegyric, if they were pleased. This convention is called 'aksharalakshalu'. It encouraged poets to praise the king in the role of 'Sashtyanthas'. Not only the king but the members of his family were also, at times, included in the praise.

Gradually this practice of writing eulogies lost the sense of proportion and poets started writing entire books praising the king. This is the origin of panegyrics. Starting from Nannaya (the Adikavi) many poets wrote panegyrics on kings. This convention has continued from Nannaya's to Nayakaraja's period. Later, the small kings and subsequently the zamindars also encouraged the practice.

King Rajarajanarendra and Krishnadevaraya were two prominent kings who had many panegyrics addressed to them. Among poets it was Srinatha who eulogised kings on a large scale, mainly for the purpose of getting material benefits. Rangajamma, a prostitute turned poetess, wrote a kavya Raghunathavilamu on the great king Nayaka Raghunatha. In some cases kings were almost equated with gods. The poets believed that unless someone had God's power in him, he could not have become a king.

Panegyrics have sometimes stooped to low levels. Pothana, the great poet, stands out as an exception, because he refused to praise kings and never craved for petty gifts.

Panegyrics did not become popular as they mostly dealt with sycophancy and with details of a king's victories in wars, along with his amorous triumph over the ladies of the court. Kings were sometimes even compared with Manmatha, Indra and Vishnu, thus deifying them out of all proportion.

In modern times a few stutikavyas have been written by poets, praising Mahatma Gandhi. Even though they are panegyrics, they are written to pay tribute to the Father of the Nation.

PANGARKAR, LAKSHMANA RAMACHANDRA (Marathi; b.1872, d.1941) was a literary historian, biographer and critic in Marathi. He studied at Fergusson College, Pune, and took his B.A. degree from Bombay University in 1899. He taught at several schools at Pandharpur, Pune and Amaravati till 1907. He was deeply interested in Marathi classical poetry, most of which he knew by heart. Bhaktimargapradip (1904) is his compilation of 'stotras', 'aratis', 'abhangas' and 'padas'.

Pangarkar was a keen student of ancient Marathi literature and history, and devoted himself to the task of popularising the classics in a simple language among the masses.

A prolific writer, he contributed several hundred articles to Mumukshu on spiritual subjects and issues of contemporary socio-political relevance. He edited this journal himself for a number of years. His biographies of saint-poets like Jnaneshwar, Ekanath, Tukaram and Mukteshwar won wide applause. The most significant among his biographies is Moropant: charitra va kavyavivechana (Moropant: Biography and poetry, 1943). Marathi vangmayacha itihas (History of Marathi literature, 1932-39), published in three volumes, presents a detailed account of the growth and development of Marathi literature with special stress on the saint-poets. He discovered the manuscripts of 'Sauptika parva' of Mukteshwara's Mahabharata and the autobiography of PANHINJE EE GHAR MEIN (Sindhi), a compilation of short stories by Ishwar Chander, was published in 1973. Ishwar Chander belongs to the post-modern era and has more than a dozen collections of short stories to his credit. His short stories in the collection under review are the work of a sensitive mind slowly unhinged and a howl against the human condition today—a totally dehumanised condition. The author rejects super-impositions and his characters are motivated from within.

The compilation includes seven short stories. Obvious as it is, Ishwar has never had much patience with furtive symbolism. His fine fictional instrument is perfectly tuned to the dissonances of the times and the unheard but strangely felt music of a seductive eternity. After reading Ishwar's stories one feels that the Sindhi fiction writers have to make up their mind about the view that existence is meaningless.

The excellent thing about the short stories compiled in Panhinje ee ghar mein is that the author does not take it upon himself to make statements over which he has no mental or emotional control. He goes with his deepest inclinations and tells about his experiences. He observes the situations with a cold eye and captures the aimless, rootless and heartless situation of the lost generation.

Ishwar is a major writer gifted with a unique and orgininal talent, even if sometimes his humanism is grisly. One can touch the unhappiness of the whole world in his characters.

PANI,BAISHNAB (Oriya; b. 1882, d. 1956) was born in the village of Kothapada in the district of Cuttack. He was compelled by poverty to discontinue his studies after the sixth class at the age of seventeen, but by then he had got Amarakosha, grammar, and several Sanskrit and Oriya kavyas by heart. At the age of 21, he wrote his first play Meghanadabadha which was followed by a number of dance-dramas such as Ravanabadha, Rangasabha, Brajalila, Dhruba-charita, Prahalad-charita and Kichakabadha. He directed his own plays and sometimes himself appeared on the stage.

Pani was influenced by his predecessor Jagannath Pani of Balasore and knew several languages, such as Sanskrit, Oriya, Bengali and Hindi. Pani wrote nearly one hundred operas and dance dramas. Most of them were based on mythology and history. Apart from these, he also produced nineteen farces, twelve collections of lyrical poems, a number of bhajan collections like Jagannath bhajanamala, Trinath-mela bhajan, and Bhagwat bhajanmala. He also wrote a good number of 'choutisas'. The Saptaha Bhagwat mahatmya and Laudi Gita composed by him are very popular among the common masses of Orissa.

Baishnab Pani in his writings reflected the hopes and disappointments, joys and sorrows of the common people and was popular as 'Ganakabi' of the people.

A.P.

PANICKER, RAJANI (Hindi; b. 1924, d.1974) was born at Lahore, and did her M.A. in both English and Hindi. She was pre-eminently a fiction writer. In her anthology, Cigarette ke tukare, we have, by and large, two types of stories, those dealing with the problems of family life, and those which are charged with intense emotion. In the first category, we have such stories as 'Bhagawan jal gaya', 'Do deep' and 'Aap'. In the second group, we may include stories like 'Cigarette ke tukare', 'Murtiyan', 'Sulekha' and 'Kusum'. Rajani has a good insight into women's psychology. She feels that the true significance of a woman lies not in renunciation but in acceptance of life. Her novels such as Mom ke moti, Pani ki diwar and Kali laraki show a much firmer grasp of life of the Indian woman. Life of the Indian woman has undergone a tremendous upheaval under day-to-day stresses and pressures, and she lives in a state of perpetual conflict or tension. Rajani's novel Badalte rang is a study of this conflict. In Mahangar ki Mita, Mita is unhappy in spite of her love-marriage and she bravely seeks a divorce. In another novel Duriyan, Namita and Charu break away from social taboos; they are rebellious by nature and bear the brunt of poverty and unwed motherhood in place of a rich and prosperous life. They do not accept defeat; it is life that bends before them. A novelist with a modern sensibility, she made a distinct contribution to the Hindi novel.

PANIGRAHI, KALINDICHARAN (Oriya; b. 1901), an eminent poet, novelist and essayist and one of the leading members of the Sabuja movement, graduated from Ravenshaw College. He served as an officer in the cooperative department for some time, and later edited Bhanja pradipa from Baripada, Mayurbhanj. In the beginning he used to write poems and short stories in Utkal sahitya and Sahakar, two outstanding journals of the day. He was also one of the co-authors of Basanti, a novel written by a group of writers. Bhakta kabi Madhusudan, a critical biography of a nineteenth century poet, was his first published book. In 1931, with his friends of the Sabuja group, he published an anthology called Sabuja kabita which presented some outstanding poems of the period. His novel, Matira manisa (1931) written in a fluent colloquial style and permeated with Gandhian idealism, became popular. Besides this, he wrote Muktagadara kshudha (The hunger of Muktagarh, 1932), Amara chita (The pyre immortal, 1933), Luhara manisa (Iron man, 1947) and Ajira manisa (To-day's man). The first two depict the 1866 famine against the contemporary setting. The last two are the continuation of the earlier novel. Matira manisa. His short story collections such as Sagarika (Lady of the sea), Dwadashi (Twelve stories), Shesharashmi (Last rays), Rashiphala (Astrological predictions) and Mokathati sarinahim (My tale is not yet over) are unique in their field. The story 'Mansara bilapa' depicts the unending love and friendship of two animals, a grey hound and a deer, with deep pathos.

Kalindicharan is also noted for his essays in criticism, found in works like Netritwa o netritwa (1949) and Sahitika He also wrote Ange yaha nibhaichi (1973), his autobiography. His contribution in the field of poetry is quite commendable. The collections are Manenahim (Not remembered, 1947), Mahadipa (Great camp, 1948), Kshanika satya (Transient truth, 1949), Churitie loda (A knife is needed, 1950) and Mo kabita (My poems, 1950). The first three collections contain poems of sensuous beauty, romantic love and youthful joy, and other collections have poems on various problems of society. In the poem 'Agami' (The future, 1942) he tells us that his future poetry would be about a society where everybody should have a room to live in and a standard meal to eat. This realistic outlook is depicted in many of the poems of Churitie loda and Mo kabita. Hence in the later period Kalindicharan is no longer green in his outlook and copes with the burning problems of life and society. 'Mirza miya riksa tane' (Mirza Mian pulls rikshaw) is an example of his love for the downtrodden.

PANIGRAHI, KRISHNACHANDRA (Oriya; b. 1909, d.1987), eminent historian and essayist, took an M.A. in history and subsequently a Ph.D. from the University of Calcutta, and served as college teacher, Curator, Deputy Superintendent of the Archaelogical Survey of India and Professor of History at Gangadhar Meher College and at Berhampur University. He struggled his way up in life since childhood. His father, who was a priest with a progressive outlook, used to perform rituals for the downtrodden. As a result the family was made outcast but refused to bow down before orthodoxy. Panigrahi started his education late, but being a brilliant student, got the royal patronage of Mayurbhanja. He received archaelogical training and specialised in the study of pottery. He was a historian of high calibre. His Archaelogical Remains of Bhubaneswar (1961) is an outstanding contribution. He contributed seventy research papers and three books on history, namely, Chronology of Bhauma Karas and Somabanshi of Orissa, History of Orissa (1981) and History of Orissa Architecture. His historical studies and findings were scientific and based on documentary evidence. His contribution to Oriya literature is worthy of mention. His book Itihas o kimbadanti (History and Legend, 1964) is a masterly combination of historical research and literary art. Sarala sahityare aitihasika chitra (Historical element in Sarala literature, 1976) ushered in a new dimension in the critical assessment of Sarala literature. He also wrote a monograph on Sarala Das for the 'Makers of India Series' of the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. Orissara sanskriti o itihasare Biraja kshetra (Place of Biraja kshetra in the history and culture of Orissa, 1973) is an account of Jajapur (Biraja kshetra) which is the Holy seat of goddess Biraja. Prabandha manas (The mind of the essayist, 1972) deals with different thoughts and feelings of the author. These essays are invariably charged with poetic flavour. Panigrahi has also written a book called Mo samayar Orissa (Orissa of my time), an autobiography which gives an account of contemporary Orissa, and is one of the best written works in Oriya in this genre. He is, indeed, a master of prose style, and has received a number of awards like Orissa Sahitya Akademi Award, Vishub Award and Sarala Upanayan Award.

PANIKKAR, K.M. (English/Malayalam; b. 1894, d. 1963), a distinguished historian, administrator, diplomat, and educationist, was born in Kavalam in Kerala. After his schooling in India, he left for Oxford in 1914, where he spent four years studying history. During this time he came into contact with the Malayalam poet Vallattol Narayana Menon, chiefly through correspondence.

On his return from Oxford Panikkar became Professor of History at M.A.O. College (now Muslim University) at Aligarh. Next, he became the editor of the English nationalist daily Swarajya at Madras in 1922. This gave him a chance to develop his penchant for political journalism. In 1924 he resigned the editorship and went to Bombay to see Gandhiji, who awakened his interest in political activities. The same year he founded The Hindustan Times. In 1925 he went back to England to enrol at the Middle Temple.

Panikkar wrote both in Malayalam and in English. In English his earlier works are Problems of Greater India (1917), Essays in Educational Reconstruction (1920) and Sri Harsha of Kanauj (1922). Besides them, he also wrote two important studies on Kerala history, Malabar and the Portuguese (1929) and Malabar and the Dutch (1931).

On his return from Europe Panikkar joined the Government of Kashmir and worked there for some time. Later, his experience in Patiala and Bikaner brought him into the thick of the problems of princely states. He had a stint at the United Nations too and then served the Nehru Government as ambassador to China, Egypt, and France. The last offices he held were the Membership of the Rajya Sabha and the Vice-Chancellorship of the Kashmir and Mysore Universities.

Panikkar's works in English seem to have been the direct result of the offices he held from time to time. But his interest in Kerala history, Indian history, and International Affairs was a life-long passion, which helped him produce about forty-six books in English covering a very wide range of subjects. These include a Survey of Indian History (1947) and Asia and Western Dominance (1953), his most celebrated work. These books reveal his idea of history as an account of the efforts of a people to achieve a civilization. Panikkar's major contribution to English is in the field of historical writing, but he was also a master of style and wrote with literary flavour and great felicity of expression.

K.A.P.

(MALAYALAM) Panikkar's works in Malayalam are the products of his leisure hours, and represent the second string to his bow. Starting with a collection of poems entitled Apakvaphalam (1915), and ending with a collection of devotional songs, titled Kirtanamala (1963), the period of his literary career spans five decades. Panikkar wrote eighteen books of poetry, five plays, eight novels, three volumes of autobiographical writing, a book of literary criticism and a book on political science in Malayalam, apart from seven books of translation from Greek, Chinese, English and Sanskrit.

Panikkar's poetry in Malayalam is mainly based on the style that was in vogue when he grew up; it is difficult to say that his best gifts found their expression in it. Pankiparinayam reveals his talent as a satirist; Rasika-rasayanam shows how well he absorbed the carpe diem philosophy of the Rubaiyat. His plays like Mandodari and Noorjahan show his interest in the puranas and in history. His Kavita tatva nirupanam (1935) which deals with the principles of poetics, both eastern and western, is also popular. Atmakatha (1957) is his autobiography.

Panikkar's best works in Malayalam are undoubtedly his novels, especially his historical novels. His first novel is Dorassini. Keralasimham (The lion of Kerala) tries to recreate the life of Kerala Varma, the Raja of Pazhassi in North Kerala, one of the early freedom fighters who not only took to guerilla tactics, but actually won many victories against the British. In Paranki patayali (The Portuguese solider) Panikkar tries to use his knowledge of the Portuguese attempts to gain a foothold on the coast of Malabar, but there he could produce only a pale romantic version of history. Punarkottu swarupam is more legend than history. Panikkar's own assessment of his work as a writer in Malayalam is: 'Although I have written poetry, drama and novels in Malayalam, I realize that I have not been able to give creative writing its due place in my life. My other ambitions and preoccupations have not allowed me to devote myself assiduously to this pursuit.' Nevertheless, his contribution to the language and literature of Malayalam is quite substantial.

PANINI (Sanskrit). Legendary accounts of Panini's life are found in Somdeva-Bhatta's Kathasaritsagara. Kshemendra's Brahat katha-manjari, Hsuan-Tsang's Memoirs, Buston's History of Buddhism and Taranatha's History of Buddhism in India. These materials about Panini's life were fabricated at a much later date. Thus Pingala, an authority on Sanskrit metrics, is said to have been Panini's younger brother. Upadhayaya Varsha is said to have been Panini's teacher (guru). Katyayana, commentator on Panini's Ashtadhyayi, is said to have been Panini's senior contemporary. King Nanda, son of Virasena is said to have been a friend of Panini. The age-old tradition has it that Panini practised penance on the Goparvata, propitiated Maheshvara and mastered extraordinary proficiency in Sanskrit grammar. Vishnu Sharmana's Panchatantra tells us that Panini was killed by a lion.

It is certain that Panini was a monk of supernatural talent. He is looked upon as Avalokiteshvara by the Buddhists. Panini enjoys a world-wide renown (iti-Panini).

We learn from Hsuan Tsang's Memoirs that he saw at Shalatura a statue erected in memory of Panini still existing in the first half of the seventh century AD.

Panini the monk-grammarian (muni vaiyakarana) has to be distinguished from Panini the romantic poet, author of an ornate epic (maha-kavya) in classical Sanskrit, entitled the Patala-vijaya or Jambavati-vijaya or Jambavati-jaya or simply Jambavati or Vijaya, some verses of which are found cited in several works on Sanskrit grammar, poetics and dramaturgy, commentaries on the Amarakosha and anthologies of much later date. This Panini apocrypha, which has not been quoted as an authority by the earlier grammarians, uses words of questionable formation and as such is marred by solecism (chyuta-samskaratvadosh).

However, the grammarian Panini's magnum opus is his Ashtadhyayi. A close study of the rich cultural materials and references to the veil-wearing monks (Ajivikas), nikayas (Buddhist assemblies), Kumari sharmanas (Buddhist maiden nuns), chivaras (Buddhist monk's robes), Parshus (Persians), Parashava (a military community of the Persians), Yavanas (Iranians ruling in Gandhara), Yavanani (Iranian script), etc. determine conjointly the date of Panini as c. 500 BC.

Panini's Contribution: Panini had at least sixty-four predecessors whom he referred to in his Ashtadhyayi and innumerable successors, but he continues to be unparalleled for his comprehensiveness, insight and rationality. While the earlier grammarians dealt with the Vedic phase of the language and most of them concentrated on the idiom of particular recensions of the Vedic texts, Panini's mighty intelligence not only grasped and digested the niceties of the etymology, accentuation of the Vedic language and its syntactical peculiarities but also described and explained the classical (laukika) phase of the language used in the post-Vedic literature and the spoken Sanskrit of his time. He took note of all the aspects of this later phase of the language, prevalent in the different regions of this vast country. He fully compared the Vedic and classical languages and brought them together under the same formulations. While analysing the etymology of the Vedic and classical Sanskrit words, he perfected the system of 'prakriti' (verbal and nominal bases) and 'pratyaya' (suffixes) along with the additional letters to be elided (it-s) and their bearings, which not only explained the formation of millions of words in use in his time, but opened up the avenue of generating new words whenever necessary. This explains the unique phenomenon in the history of languages that though strictly regulated by the rules of Panini, the language developed till recent times. By reforming (samskritya), Panini gave immortality to it.

Some of Panini's predecessors theorized that all words are derived from verbal roots (sarvani namani akhyatajani), while others held that not all are so derived (na sarvani itieke). Most probably Panini belonged to the latter school. His followers tried to reconcile to the former view by supplementing his Ashtadhyayi with the Unadi-sutras which present derivation of hundreds of nominal bases from verbal roots, quite a number of such derivations being fanciful. Panini seems to be most rational in this matter.

It is to be noted that Panini's grammar does not consist of the Ashtadhyayi alone. He wrote four auxiliary works, viz. (i) Dhātupātha, (ii) Gaṇapātha, (iii) Paribhāshas and (iv) Lingānushāsana. The Dhātupātha is a register of verbal roots; the Gaṇapātha comprises lists of words referred to in the sutras of the Ashtadhyayi indicated by such terms as 'Prabhriti', 'adi', etc.; the Paribhāshas are governing rules for correct interpretation and application of the sutras and Lingānushasana formulates rules for determining genders of nouns on the basis of the suffixes.

PANINIYAPRADYOTAM (Malayalam) is a work on Sanskrit grammar written by I.C. Chacko, first published in 1944. Its second revised edition appeared in 1955. The book is a commentary on all the important portions of Panini's renowned grammatical text Ashtadhyayi. The style of writing is so lucid that even a lay reader can understand the complex principles of grammar easily. This is quite in keeping with the title—'Paniniya' being a synonym of Ashtadhyayi and 'Pradyota' meaning 'light'. The author thus considers the commentary in Malayalam a beacon light, illuminating the secrets of the original Sanskrit work.

Of the 3977 aphorisms contained in the Ashtadhyayi the author has chosen only 1670 for critical examination. All the aphorisms relating to Sandhi, Prakriya, Krit and Taddhita suffixes, Samasas, Dhatus, Karakas and Stri-pratyayas are dealt with. Again, he has not blindly followed the order in which the aphorisms are presented in the original work. He has suitably rearranged them so as to meet the learner's special needs. The uniqueness of his approach could be seen in rejecting some of the theories advanced by the veteran grammarian Melpattur Narayana Bhattathiri in his Prakriya sarvasvam. The book received the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1957.

PANJWANI, RAM PARTABRAI (Sindhi; b.1911, d.1987) was an eminent man of letters, poet and fiction writer. He was born in an educated family at Larkana (Sindh). He attended D.J.Sind College, Karachi, for higher education and graduated in 1934. He worked as lecturer in Sindhi at the same college from 1936 to 1947, and after the partition he was appointed Head of the Sindhi Department at Jai Hind College, Bombay. He was Reader in Sindhi in the University of Bombay (1970-77), and Honorary Professor for cultural activities for the K. C. Group of colleges, Bombay. His reminiscences Anokha azmuda (Unique experiences, 1964) won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1965.

Panjwani's first literary work was a novel entitled Padma (1939), an adaptation of Thomas Henry Hall Caine's The Eternal City, which went into four editions. His other novels are Qaidi (1943), Sharmila (1944), Latifa (1945), Asanjo gharu (1946), Chandia jo chamko (1947), Zindagi ain maut (1952), Ahe na-ahe (1955), Shala dhiaru na j'amani (1957). Among the collections of his short stories are Anokha azmuda (1962), Vichitra vaqia (1964), Ajib akhanyun (1966), Tunhinja munhinja tajurba (1975). Among his plays are Sindh ja sata natak (based on Sindhi folk stories immortalized by Shah Abdul Latif, 1952), Purab jyoti (based on the life of Lord Buddha, 1954), Yad kanda (translation of the Gujarati play Patta-ni-jod by Prabodh Joshi, 1968) and Ayo naon zamano (1978). Among his collections of essays are Adabi ghuncho, Sindh ji sukhri (1953), Sika ji soghat (1959). His translation of Dale Carnegie's How to Win Friends and Influence People (Dosta kian kajani ain dilyun kian khenchijan) has gone into three editions. Besides, he has contributed numerous articles on literary, social and philosophical subjects to various literary and social magazines.

The distinguishing feature of Panjwani's literary works is the positive approach to life, its purposefulness and meaningfulness, as against the doctrine of alienation and futility preached by many a contemporary writer. His style is simple and direct, free from twists and turns and involved constructions. Some of his stories and essays have been published by the Sindhi Times in varied collections like Sippyun (Essays, 1976), Yadgiryun (Essays, 1980), Chunda kahanyun (Selected short stories, 1981) and Gad'janyun (Interviews, 1982).

PANT, DINU BHAI (Dogri; b. 1917) is an eminent Dogri poet and playwright, and one of the founder members of the Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, which spearheaded the Dogri literary movement in the mid-forties of this century. He was born in the village Painthal, district Udhampur of Jammu and Kashmir State. After formal education up to the middle level, he left school when his mother died, and spent the next four years at home, taking part in dramas staged by the local Ramlila Club. At the age of eighteen, he ran away from home to Haridwar where he led the life of a vagrant for about two years, associating himself with the sadhus of different types. Returning home, he passed his Sanskrit and Hindi proficiency examinations, obtaining 'Visharad' and 'Prabhakar' respectively in the two languages.

In 1938-39, he started writing poems in Hindi which were well received. In 1940-41 he switched over to his mother tongue Dogri. His poems written between 1940-41 and 1944 were published in his first book Guttulun (Titiliation) which was an instant hit with readers and the audience at the 'Dogri Kavi Sammelan'. It not only tickled and pleased them, but also tempted poets, old and young, who were composing poems in Hindi and Urdu, to write in Dogri.

Keenly observant of social foibles and grassroot realities of life, his poetry represents on the one hand the old feudal world, eulogising rajas and the valour of heroes, and on the other the new emerging values of social change and reform. Vir Gulab, a long poem on the valour of Dogra heroes, Mian Mota and Gulabsingh, is an example of the former, and Mangu di chhabil, another long verse narrative, is an example of the latter. Guttulun contains poems of mild social satire and humour, and its main poem 'Shahr paihlo paihl ge' is perhaps, one of the most popular poems in Dogri with a wide appeal to rural populace and urban elite alike. His last collection of poems, Dadi te maan (1956) contains poems of total social commitment, exhorting the poor and the working classes to rise in revolt against social injustice and exploitation and create a new society. Some of these poems were written under the influence of the socialist ideology to which the poet was drawn during his active participation in political activities.

Among his plays, Sarpanch and Ayodhya are best known for their stage worthiness. The former, based on a folk ballad praising the panchayat system of justice and the sacrifice of a popular folk hero Data Ranu, has been successfully staged several times. The latter, his last published work, is based on an episode from the Ramayana and has been hailed for its innovativeness of approach to the character of Kaikeyi, and its social relevance, and it won the poet the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1985. He has also translated from Sanskrit a play Pratima written by Bhasa.

PANT, SUMITRANANDAN (Hindi; b.1900, d.1977), one of the most outstanding poets of our times, was born at Kausani, district Almora, Uttar Pradesh, He lost his mother six hours after his birth. Called Gosaindatt by his father, he took the name Sumitranandan when he was ten years old. He wrote a novel, entitled Har, at the age of fifteen which is included in the first volume of Sumitranandan Pant granthavali. He joined the Muir Central College, Allahabad, in 1919, where he was initiated into English poetry by Shivadhar Pandey. In 1922 he published a long poem 'Uchchvas' which was favourably reviewed by Shivadhar Pandey in the journal Saraswati, then edited by Padumlal Punnalal Bakshi.

In 'Uchchvas' the poet gave Hindi diction the elegance, sonority and rhythmic charm of Sanskrit. It introduced a new kind of expression and strengthened the movement of chhayavad which was started as a revolt against the prosaic diction of early Hindi poetry. Prasad and Nirala had already launched the movement; Pant strengthened it.

Pallav (1926) established Pant as a major force in chhayavad poetry. In his introduction to this book he declared that only modern Hindi was a fit vehicle for poetic composition, and the traditional Brajbhasha had ceased to be effective. What the preface to Lyrical Ballads did for English Romanticism, the introduction to Pallav did for Hindi Poetry.

Pant's earlier poems came out in an anthology, entitled Vina (1927). In 1929 a love strory in verse, called Granthi, was published. In 1932 appeared Gunjan, followed by Jyotsna (1934), a verse-play which brought his association with chhayavad to an end. In his earlier poems Pant excels in depicting the moods and beauty and spirit of nature. In a deep sense this poetry marks a return to nature, unfolding its beauty and grandeur and bringing out the spiritual harmony underlying it. As for his love poems, they have a touch of pristine purity and a sense of inner bliss, transcending the mundane. Yugant (The end of an age, 1936) announced the new turn his poetry was to take henceforth. Perhaps the English poetry of the thirties influenced Pant's approach to poetry, or perhaps P.C. Joshi, his friend, who was then Secretary of the Communist Party of India, influenced his thinking. The poet now moved towards social realism. The ripest fruit of this new thinking and involvement was his Gramya (1940). It used a living language to describe living people in situations which show the individual within the framework of the community.

After a spell of seven years and a long, protracted illness, Pant came out with Swarnakiran, a new collection of poems, From this book onwards, the poet came progressively under the spell of Aurobindo. Under this influence he wrote a large number of poems, published in such books as Swarnadhuli and Swarnarashmi. In these poems he expresses his spiritual aspirations, and we find here a happy blending of philosophical concepts and nature symbols. Some of these poems reach heights of poetic excellence.

In 1965 Pant got the Soviet Land–Nehru Award on Lokayatan, an epic of about 452 pages which presents the ideal of a poet, and one wonders if Nirala was the ideal in Pant's mind at the time of its composition.

Pant started as a romantic poet; within eight years he became a social realist; another eight years and he sought refuge in Aurobindo's philosophy. Another abiding association was with Uday Shankar, the master of classical Indian dance. In 1960 he was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for Kala aur Buddha Chand. In 1961 the Government of India conferred on him the title of 'Padmabhushan'. In 1969, his selection of poems, Chidambara, received the prestigious Bharatiya Jnanpith Award.

PANTHOIBI KHONGUL (Manipuri) is a fiction in ancient Meitei script and language, believed to have been composed in A.D. 736 by one Akoijam Tomboi. It has been translated into the current Manipuri language and written in the current Bengali script by M. Chandra Singh. It was first published in this form in 1963 and a second edition was brought out in 1972.

Panthoibi khongul (The footsteps of Panthoibi) is an important work coming down to us from the early period of Manipuri literature. The ancient manuscripts written in different versions in Meitei script are in the possession of individual pandits. The work is regarded as authoritative on Manipuri dance and related community festivals of Manipur. It relates the fictional story of the marriage of Panthoibi to one Khaba Khoinucha much against her will. She had been already in love with one Nongpok Nighthou who lived on the hills of Nongmaijing. Even after her marriage to Khaba Khoinucha, Panthoibi continued to meet Nongpok Ningthou and ultimately eloped with her, and they settled permanently at Nongmaijing. This is the bare outline of the story. Besides the story, there are other striking elements in this work. We come to learn about the beginning of Manipuri dance, the different features of Manipuri marriage, the introduction of agriculture, and such important aspects as are relevant to Manipuri culture. As it is, the story has similarity with the story of Shiva and Parvati and a few scholars would prefer considering Panthoibi khongul another Manipuri version of the story of Shiva and Parvati. For its literary quality a number of scholars call it the Manipuri Kadambari. The description of nature, the development of plot, characterisation, and the imaginative power of the author make Panthoibi khongul a great ancient Manipuri literary text.

Some scholars hold the view that Panthoibi khongul may have been composed in or about the eighth century AD, as Panthoibi has been mentioned in historical documents that are related to the reign of Maharaja Khongtekcha (A.D. 763-773), but this does not hold out to be a fact. R.K. Jhaljit Singh in his History of Manipuri Literature (1965) writes that it must have been composed towards the end of the seventeenth century. This contention is supported by the presence of certain words in the text and the popularity of a cult of Panthoibi in the later part of the century, particularly during the reign of Charairongba (1698-1709). Cheitharol kumbaba records that in 1686 a temple to Panthoibi was built and an idol also made in 1969. Her worship must have been popular during the decades following. But with the ascension of the Vaishnava King Garibniwaj to the throne of Manipur, the popularity of Panthoibi declined and she was gradually relegated to background. Her last recorded temple was built in 1700. It is, therefore, quite reasonable to suppose that Panthoibi khongul was composed during the period of her popularity in the last two decades of the seventeenth century.

Panthoibi khongul has references to other Indian gods and goddesses as well. The language, though very archaic, has some Sanskrit elements. During the days of her popularity Panthoibi khongul must have been recited by her devotees the way the Chandi is recited by the Chandi followers. The book shows that at one time the Meiteies who were her followers must have come under the influence of the Shakta cult. This evidence has been emphasized by the practice of attributing many of the faculties of Durga to Panthoibi and of Shiva to her husband, Nongpok Ningthou. Panthoibi khongul is consi-

PANWALKAR, S.D. (Marathi; b. 1928, d. 1985) was born at Sangli in Maharshtra. He did not have the benefit of collegiate education; because of his father's death he had to take up a job to support the family. He joined the Excise Department of the State and served at small places. In 1949 he joined the Bombay Customs and rose to the position of superintendent.

Five collections of his short stories, Gajaga (1953), Audumbar (1963), Surya (1968), Eka nratyacha janma (1975) and Chinab (1978) have been published so far. His novelettes, Jambhul, Audumbar and Surya, have won the Maharashtra State awards. A collection of his selected short stories has been published by the Sahitya Akademi.

Panwalkar is one of the leading writers of the modern short story in Marathi. The remarkable vitality of his stories sets him apart. He has brought into literary focus a part of his professional experience—the life in the Customs House, the world of smugglers, Arab ship-owners, boozers, hagglers, the shady hangers-on, the slogging constables on the beat, and the hierarchy of Customs officials. Yet his writing did not become commercial or documentary. Panwalkar is, indeed, a master story teller.

PANWAR, BAIJNATH (Rajasthani; b. 1924) was born in district Churu (Rajasthan). His first book Akal bina unt ubhano (The camel goes bare-foot for want of wisdom) was published in 1955. A collection of short stories, Ladesar (The most beloved person), was published in 1971 by the Rajasthan Sahitya Academy, Udaipur. Another collection, Nainan khutyo nir (No tears left in the eyes), was published in 1980. He got the Vishnu Hari Dalmia Award in 1979, and the Prithviraj Rathod Puraskar from the Rajasthani Bhasha Sahitya Sangam (Bikaner) in 1980. In 1987 the Rajasthani Bhasha, Sahitya and Sanskriti Academy honoured him for his contribution to literature with a cash award.

Being associated with the rural life of Rajasthan during government service in the Co-operative Department and also because of his flair for social service, he acquired an intimate knowledge of the life-styles of the village people and their socio-economic conditions. Though the medium of literature suited him best to voice their sufferings, he was no less active personally to take up their cause and bring about amelioration of their miseries. His realism is blended with idealistic fervour.

PARADKAR, BABU RAO VISHNU (Hindi; b. 1883, d. 1955) was born at Varanasi. His real name was Sadashiv, but his father used to call him 'Babu'. He acquired mastery over Hindi, Sanskrit, Bengali and Marathi. His nationalistic urge made him take active part in 'Swadeshi' and Freedom movements. He was an ardent follower of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, and was a close associate of Aurobindo Ghosh and Rasbehari Bose. Because of his revolutionary activities, he had to spend a few years in jail.

Paradkar's first stint as a journalist was with Hindi Bangvasi in 1906. This newspaper was published from Calcutta and edited by Hare Krishna Johar.

Hindi Bangvasi was hardly a nationalist paper in the eyes of Paradkar. So he joined a weekly, Hitvarta, as editor in 1906, but soon moved to Bharatmitra edited by the doyen of Hindi journalists, Ambikaprasad Vajpeyi. In 1920, Paradkar decided to return to his home town Kashi. By now his reputation as a leading Hindi journalist was firmly established. Babu Shivprasad Gupta, a philanthropist and keen Hindi lover, decided to launch Aaj, a Hindi daily on modern lines. He requested Paradkar to join its staff as Assistant Editor, while his son was Chief Editor. Its first issue came out on 5 September 1920.

Hindi journalism and literature meant a great deal to Paradkar. No other editor, except Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, enriched Hindi language so much. His articles, notes and editorials published in Aaj and Sansar were of great value. His forewords to a number of books, written by authors of repute, bear the stamp of his erudition. Paradkar was a great protagonist of Hindi which he wanted to be the national language of India.

Paradkar has coined many words and initiated the use of many others. 'Shri' and 'Sarvashri' were honorofics which he started using in place of 'Mr' and 'Messrs'. His other coinages include 'Mudrasfiti' (inflation), 'Loktantra' (democracy), 'Naukarshahi' (bureaucracy), 'Swarajya' (self-government), 'Vatavaran' (atmosphere), 'Karyavahi' (proceeding), 'Antar-rashtriya' (international), etc.

He encouraged new writers with his constructive criticism. This endeared him to many up-coming Hindi writers. He introduced Pandey Bechan Sharma 'Ugra' to Hindi readers. Shivpujan Sahay, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Jainendra Kumar, Jaichandra Vidyalankar, Nand Dulare Vajpeyi, Radheyshyam Kathawachak and others received great encouragement from him.

Although Paradkar did not publish much, two of his books are worth mentioning. His translation from Bengali of a revolutionary book Desh ki katha created some sort of a history in those days. His another remarkable contribution is a treatise-cum-translation of Srimad-bhagavatgita published in 1924.

Hussain Shah (1493-1519), Sultan of Bengal, is remembered today for his patronage to Kavindra Parameshwar Das who had written the earliest version of the Mahabharata in Bengali and who informs us that Paragal was a commander in Hussain Shah's army. He was appointed the military governor of Chittagong where he later settled permanently. Paragal was fond of the Mahabharata read in his court but, as he did not know Sanskrit well, Kavindra was asked to prepare a version in Bengali. Kavindra states that Paragal's father was Rasti Khan; and Makht-ul-Husain of Muhammad Khan, a descendant of Rasti Khan, informs us that Rasti Khan had also been a governor of Chittagong. Towards the close of the fifteenth century Chittagong was captured by the Maghs of Arakan and Rasti Khan's sons fled to Gauda, the capital of Bengal. Probably after recapturing Chittagong Hussain Shah appointed Paragal to the post. Some manuscripts of Kavindra's Mahabharata found in North Bengal mention Paragal, without referring to Chittagong, indicating Paragal's service there prior to his governorship and Kavindra's place of composition. Srikar Nandi composed his version of the Mahabharata in Paragal's lifetime and he mentions Charu lol Giri, a beautiful place a little north of Chittagong in the Chandrashekhar hills, as Paragal's homeland.

PARAJA (Oriya). The year 1946 saw another masterly work by Gopinath Mohanty, the eminent novelist of Orissa. His novel Paraja centres round the Paraja clan of Koraput district in Orissa, depicting their culture, social customs, traditions, rituals, and above all their problems. The novel hovers round the village of Sarasupadar. Starting with the meeting of Jili and Zaman on the banks of the Nirabjhola, till Sukrujani and Takra are bonded in the house of the village money-lender, Sarasupadar is an eye-witness of everything.

From a structural point of view, we may divide the sequence of events in Paraja into two parts. First, the oppressed story of Sukrujani and second, the fading melancholy of Jili's love. Sukru has been the victim of treachery and conspiracy at the hands of Jangal Zaman, Gaon Naika, Faul Domba, Dhepuchalan, and he and his son are made to render bonded service at the house of the Sahukar (money-lender). Mandiajani, on the other hand, bonds himself as a 'Goti' to the Sahukar in an attempt to pay off the penalty imposed on him while distilling wine unlawfully on the eve of 'Pushparab'. Besides, the love affairs of Jili-Bagla and Kajodi-Mandia steadily run parallel to each other. The author has also taken care to present the free life of the Adivasi boys and girls, their love, and their marriage system. He also shows how Jili is compelled by circumstances into a life of deterioration. Along with Bili she falls a prey to the illicit desire of the Gumasta.

The introduction of such characters as Rami and Moti is particularly important for the articulation of the sequence of events. Things have taken a centripetal turn for all the characters such as Sukru, Bili, Jili, Nandabali and the Sahukar. Sukru's return to Sarasupadar marks the turning point for his family as he frees himself from the bond and picks up his two daughters from the labour colony. In course of time Nandabali is betrothed to Jili and stays at Sukru's house. Jili, who is seduced by the Sahukar with the assistance of Madhughasi, finds herself thrown out by Sukru's family, and she takes shelter at the Sahukar's house in Kadambajhola village. The repeated requests of Sukru and Mandia to get their land back is turned down by the Sahukar. Helpless, Sukru knocks at the doors of the court, but in vain. Once again he goes back to the Sahukar and begs for the land but the Sahukar kicks him with contempt. This is enough for Sukru; one blow of his axe finds the Sahukar's head rolling on the ground.

Paraja, in fact, is a theme-based novel. The flow of events is uninterrupted. The sub-plots are used to build up the theme, and an absurd casting of characters is avoided. Internal conflict has been given priority over external conflict. The clash between Sukrujani and characters like Zaman and the Sahukar has been well presented. Jili, Bagla, Jangal Zaman, Kau contractor and Ram Chandra Bisoi have been effectively delineated.

The novelist is a skilled technician and can invest literary ardour in the spoken language. Moreover, he can present the life history of the tortured, neglected and downtrodden people of Orissa in a realistic way. The use of mixed speech forms is another salient feature of the novel. The tribal characters such as Sukru, Tikra, Mandia, Kajodi, Jili and others use the tribal language, but others like Ramchandra Sahukar, Jangal Zaman, Faul Domba and Gumasta use the common language of the people. In other words, Paraja is a confluence of the tribal speech and the simple Oriya language. Either in their mutual dialogues or in a long speech by a sole character, the author makes clever use of a mixed mode of speech.

Although the style of Paraja is mostly descriptive, and at times pictorial, filled with poetic enthusiasm, it is also dramatic on several occasions. Events, scene after scene, have been effectively cohered in the novel as in a full-fledged drama. The thoughts of Sukru, Mandia and Tikra have found a vivid and colourful depiction at the hands of the author. Before entering into a bond with the Sahukar, Sukru takes a long time to decide. He broods over the bygone days and thinks of Sambari—his wife. Sukru is helpless and dejected. But the very next moment he makes up his mind to face the circumstances bravely. And Jili, who is betrothed to Bagla, restlessly dreams of a 'golden tomorrow'.

Paraja is an epic of tribal life, a saga of the life of the aboriginals, their hopes and aspirations, faith and dreams, customs and traditions, music and dance. Further, it gives a distinct regional flavour as it deals with the lives of a specific clan of people and, with all its regional uniqueness, it is remarkable for its poetic suppleness, deep insight and sureness of form.

PARAJIKA (Pali). The Suttavibhanga, which is the first book of the Vinayapitaka, is subdivided into 'Parajika' and 'Pachittiya'. The literary meaning of 'parajika' is 'defeat'. There are certain grievous offences which, if committed by a monk, deprive him of his right to live as a monk in the Buddhist church. As a punishment for his offence or offences he is expelled from the Sangha and never allowed to lead a monk's life. In the literal sense this means a great defeat for the concerned monk since he is regarded as a fallen man ('Parajiko hotiti parajito hoti parajayam apanno').

If a monk or nun commits a parajika offence he or she is regarded as a person whose head has been cut off, or as a withered leaf fallen from the tree, or as a stone slab split into two.

Four parajikas are mentioned in the 'Bhikku patimokha', while eight in the 'Bhikkuni patimokha'. Parajikas in the 'Bhikku patimokha' comprise (1) sexual intercourse, (2) theft, (3) murder of a human being or abetment of murder, and (4) exaggeration of one's supernatural power to perform miracles. In the 'Bhikkuni patimokha' there are four additional parajikas: (a) enjoying the contact with a male person between the collar-bone and the knee, (b) concealing the parajika offence of another Bhikkuni, (c) becoming the follower of a monk who has been suspended, and (d) possessing such dispositions as are tinged with sexuality.

Both the Parajika and the Pachittiya deal with 227 rules divided into eight sections as follows.

1) Parajika dhamma (rules for acts leading to defeat), 2) Sanghadissa dhamma (rules for the formal meetings of the order), 3) Aniyata dhamma (rules concerning undetermined matters), 4) Nissaggiya Pachittiya dhamma (rules involving forfeiture), 5) Pachittiya dhamma (rules requiring repentance), 6) Patidesaniya dhamma (rules requiring confession), 7) Sekhiya dhamma (rules of etiquette), and 8) Adhikaranasamatha (rules requiring settlement of cases).

In the section on Parajika the four rules of Parajika and thirteen rules of Sanghadisesa and the two rules of Aniyata have been very elaborately discussed and analysed.

Parajika dhamma also contains the list of persons who are unfit for ordination and cannot be admitted to the Sangha.

PARAKH (Hindi) is the first novel by Jainendra Kumar. It was published in 1929, and in a very short time it established Jainendra as a novelist. Parakh is regarded as a new experiment in Hindi novel. Its plot structure has been influenced by experiments made in the area of psychology and psycho-analysis. Instead of documenting external events, Jainendra concentrates on probing the minds of his characters and analysing their inmost thoughts and feelings. This is the reason why Parakh and its heroine Katto became remarkable among the early psycho-analytical novels of Hindi.

The author has taken liberty on two levels—ideas and creativity. At the same time the credibility of plot, characters and technique has been maintained. Sometimes the writer, instead of narrating a situation, makes a few bare suggestions, and the reader has to apply his own imagination to fill in the details. Sometimes a very simple emotion is treated at length; at other places a wide gap is left out. The author himself says that he has been intentionally very precise at times, while on other occasions deliberately careless. His images take on the colours of emotions and his language becomes symbolic. The author's voice may be heard in the characters of Satyadham, Katto, Garima and Bihari. As regards love, we find the sentiment rising from the physical level, gradually absorbing the mind and heart, and touching finally the highest point of sublimity.

The novel depicts the predicament of a child widow in the context of human psychology. As such the emotions, desires and social problems of the characters have been highlighted. The author takes the rational step of getting the widow married to Bihari. Thus it is not an individual world in isolation but the whole society with its norms and conventions and changes that finds its expression in the novel.

PARAMAL RASO (Hindi), also called Alha khand, is a famous work by Jaganik Bhat, the court poet of Raja Paramal, king of Mahoba. It is basically a ballad which has gradually taken the form of an 'epic of growth'. It tells the story of two warriors, Alha and Udal. Virtually, the poem belongs to the masses rather than to the scholars, and is very popular in a large part of northern India. The professional singers or reciters of the poem are called 'Alhets'. Divided into 52 parts, it is a living account of different wars. The original work of Jaganik is not extant, but songs based on it are widely available. In the absence of a manuscript, it is difficult to ascertain the actual length of the poem. It was for the first time in 1863 that Charles Eliot, the Collector of Farrukhabad, got it jotted down on the basis of the recital by four Alhets. He then had it published. Later, Grierson collected various versions of Paramal raso available in Bundelkhand and published the translation of one of the versions, sung in Bhojpuri, into English in Indian Antiquary (Vol. XIV, 1885). Grierson's translation was a prose translation, while W.Waterfield, another antiquarian scholar, rendered it into a ballad, published in Calcutta Review (Vols. XII-XIII, 1815). Thus the work of writing, translating, and publishing the Alha khand started in the later half of the 19th century. Afterwards in 1923 Grierson published the work in a prose translation under the title The Lay of Alha. In 1919 the Kashi Nagari Pracharini Sabha published Paramal raso, edited by Babu Shyamsundar Das.

Part of Paramal raso is about the battle between Prithviraj Chauhan and Paramal Dev. We should, however, bear in mind that Paramal raso is not history but folk literature, reflecting the life and culture of the people of its time. Its language shows the influence of Kannauji, Brajbhasha, Bundelkhandi and Bhojpuri, yet it does not belong to any one of these languages exclusively. Basically a social document, besides being a poem of feudal chivalry, in its popularity it stands perhaps next to Ramacharitmanas.

PARAMANAND (Kashmiri; b. 1791, d. 1879), also known as Nandram Paramanand, was born in a middle-class family of Kashmiri Pandits. His first teacher and preceptor was his father, Krishna Pandit, who was a Persian scholar. Later, Paramanand acquired knowledge of Sanskrit, Hindi and Persian, which is evident from some of the poems written by him in a mixed language. On his father's death he succeeded him as 'Patwari', but after sometime he gave up the job. In the first phase of his poetic career, he composed some poems in Persian, using 'Gharib' as his pen-name, but his Persian compositions are not extant.

Paramanand's poetry is the spontaneous outpouring of his spiritual experience. His use of mythological and yogic terms speaks of his deep understanding of Hindu scriptures. The impact of his poetry can be easily seen in the poetry of all the bhakti poets of Kashmir who followed him. He is the founder poet of 'thematic' poems in Kashmiri. His 'Amarnath yatra' (Pilgrimage to Amarnath), 'Karma bhumikai' (The world of action) and 'Kul ta tsa' (The tree and the shade) are some of the best poems in Kashmiri. He has used the form of 'Vatsun' which has added lyricism to his poetry. His longer compositions like 'Radha svayamvara', 'Shivalagun' and 'Sudamacharitra' are based on themes taken from the Bhagavata and the Shivapurana, but the poet has treated the themes imaginatively.

Jnan-prakash (Light of knowledge, 1912, 1933 and 1955) contains the major portion of his poems. Paramanand (1943-44), edited in three volumes by Master Zinda Kaul, is in Devnagari script with an English rendering of the poems. Paramanand (1960), edited by S.K. Toshakhanai is published in Nastaliq, with Urdu translation. Paramanand (1962), edited by Madhup, contains the information about his life, some poems and their Hindi version.

Kulyat-i-Paramanand (1972-74) in two volumes, edited by Master Zinda Kaul, S.K. Toshakhani and Motilal 'Saqi', contains almost all his compositions. The first volume includes, besides a comprehensive life-sketch and critical appreciation of poetry, forty poems and two long narrative poems, 'Sudama charitra' (Life of Sudama) and 'Shivalagun' (Wedding of Shiva). A glossary of technical and yogic terms has been appended at the end of the volume. The second volume includes the celebrated poem 'Radha-svyamvara' also. Besides, it contains a long preface discussing the various schools of Bhakti, and three short lyrics, one in praise of Ganesh and the other two in the sufi strain. In the compilation of this work the compilers have made use of all the printed material, i.e. Jnan-prakash and other editions of Paramanand. The novelty of the critical edition is that besides other manuscripts, the compilers have made use of the only reliable manuscript of Paramanand's works prepared by Lachhman Raina Bulbul (1812-1898), his disciple and, as claimed, the co-author of 'Radha svayamvara'. Raina had written the manuscript in the life-time of Paramanand , and the use of this manuscript has authenticated the critical edition.

The theme of the poem 'Radha svayamvara' has been taken from the Bhagavata, but the poet has treated it in such a way that it looks like his own creative work. In a way, he belongs to the 'Bhakti school' founded by Vallabhacharaya (1479-1531) and Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (1486-1532). Paramanand, as 'Radha svayamvara' reveals, was a poet of the 'Sagun' cult.

Paramanand considers Shiva and Krishna the same reality. In 'Radha svayamvara' he explicitly says that Shankara is none other than Krishna. It is this conception that made him write 'Shivalagun', a major poem on the theme taken from the Shivapurana. Paramanand's handling of the theme is so marvellous that one cannot help praising his poetic genius. His poetry is rich in thought-content and is technically perfect.

In the realm of Bhakti poetry, Paramanand's contribution is epoch-making. He ranks with Hindi poets like Surdas and Mirabai.

PARAMANAND DAS (Hindi; b. 1493, d. 1583) was a major poet of the Ashtachhap group of poets. His dates of birth and death are not known, but, according to the traditional belief of the 'Pushti marg', he was younger than Vallabhacharya by fifteen years and died after the death of Kumbhandas. Hence 1493 is generally taken as the year of his birth, and 1583 as the year of his death. According to Chaurasi vaishnavan ki varta, Paramanand was born in a poor family of the Kanyakubja Brahmans of Kunnauj. He got his early education in his village and started singing kirtans in praise of his Lord. He was not interested in wordly life and hence became a devotee of Lord Krishna. He was formally initiated by Vallabhacharya into Pushti marg in 1519. Later, Paramanand went to Braj along with Vallabhacharya and was appointed at Kirtankar (devotional singer) at the temple of Shrinathji in the village of Govardhan.

Following are the works attributed to him: Parmanand dasji ke pada, Dan-Lila, Parmanand-sagar, Dhruvacharita.

It seems that Paramananad Das did not write any book but composed padas when he sang in praise of the Lord. These padas were later collected and compiled under different titles as given above. Vidya vibhag, Kankrauli (Rajasthan) has published a collection of his padas under the title Parmanand-sagar, and this may be regarded as an authentic anthology.

Paramanand Das was a great devotional poet and described the various 'lilas' of Krishna as a child or as a boy. His poetry is simple but charming and is characterized by the spontaneous outflow of devotional feelings.

PARAMANANDA SARASWATI (Bengali; b. 1915, d. 1980), born in a fairly well-to-do middle class family of Sylhet which belonged to Assam (now in Bangladesh), was known in early life as Mrinalkanti Das. His poems began to appear in well-known literary journals such as Kavita edited by Buddhadev Basu and Purbasha edited by Sanjay Bhattacharya. Early in his life, in collaboration with a number of his friends he published an anthology, named Kabipranam, to commemorate the death of Rabindranath Tagore. He was chiefly instrumental in bringing out Balaka periodical, that made its impact on the public. Mrinalkanti also organised the Sylhet branch of the Progressive Writers' and Artists' Association of Bengal and in its several successive annual gatherings drew such eminent journalists and litterateurs of Bengal as Ramananda Chatterjee, Buddhadev Basu, Manik Banerjee and Bibhutibhusan Banerjee. Apart from his literary activities he was also deeply involved in social work.

The four books of poems which appeared in his earlier name when he had not been a sanyasin were Akash (1941), Diganta (1944), Uttarbasanta (1951) and Ishara (1953).

But a time soon came when he became intensely religious and renounced the world, became an ascetic and came to be known as Swami Parmananda Saraswati. He drew around him from different sections of society quite a large number of disciples who felt attracted by the purity of his heart, his piety, his simple mode of living and his dedication to high ideals. But such was his ardour for literature and poetry that even the life of renunciation could not wean him away from his first love. To his followers he was no doubt first a sanyasin, but to a larger circle of his friends he was principally a poet. He was as much at ease with mystic poems as with devotional poetry. His Nirjan prahar (1965), Punarbasu (1968) and Basantabahni (1969) seem manifest with a longing—a longing of a love-lorn heart. He also wrote a number of books of what may be described as aphoristic poems, apparently didactic in nature but pregnant with deeper spiritual meaning. Nirjan swakshar (1965), Ahitagni (1967) and the two parts of Akshar (1965) belong to this category of publications, later incorporated into one volume under the title Nirukta (1973). His Panchamukh (1969) is, however, a wholly different type of book of poems, replete with enjoyable banter and wit, and revelling in social criticism.

His prose works include Ashram katha (1963) and Uttar-mimangsa (1980).

PARAMAPPAYASU (Apabhramsha) or Paramatmaprakasha (the revelation of the Supreme Self) is composed by Yogindu in two sections, containing 127+226=353 verses in the 'doha' (distich) metre in response to the enquiry made by his pupil about the nature of the Supreme Soul. It was composed some time between the sixth and the tenth centuries AD. It deals with the soul, the Supreme Self, and liberation from the cycle of life. The author gives at places some symbolic descriptions of mystico-religious experiences. There are moral and disciplinary lessons too with apt illustrations. The Jaina metaphysics is also discussed, but on the whole the outlook is non-sectarian.

The author explains to us that the Supreme Soul is the embodiment of knowledge, distinct from the body, untainted by passions and karma, eternal in nature, beyond the comprehension of the scriptures and the senses, and realisable through meditation by saints in 'samabhava'. All physical, social and religious distinctions have nothing to do with the pure soul. External aids like teachers, other divinities, temples, statues, holy places help little in realising the Supreme. When a man develops a perverted attitude, he grasps the reality in a perverted form. Liberation is superior to the pursuits of dharma, artha and kama and attained through the right faith, right knowledge, and right conduct. The author despises greed and attachment, the sinful family life and the Yoga that does not separate the self from other things. He emphasises the ephemeral nature of all material things and looks down upon the harm (himsa) done to the living beings. Elimination of all mental distractions is regarded as the greatest meditation (paramsamadhi).

The work is written in an easy and vivid style. There are repetitions, but they are made on purpose, as acknowledged by the author. The book does not parade learning but preaches in a homely manner. There are similes, metaphors and illustrations drawn from everyday life, e.g., the soul in meditation is compared to a lake, the vision of the Supreme Self to a swan, and the senses to camels. He says that the Brahman and the woman cannot engage together the same heart, for two swords cannot be accommodated in the same scabbard.

There are two commentaries available on the book, one in Kannada by Balachandra and the other in Sanskrit by Brahmadeva, and a Hindi paraphrase of the latter by Daulatram.

PARAMARTHA KURU KATAI (Tamil) or Paramartha Gura kathai was written by Joseph Constantine Beschi, (a European missionary), better known as Viramamunivar, while he was in Tamil Nadu during 1710 to 1747. He had written in Latin also. He used legends which were kept alive orally by the Tamils and others to weave a short story, the first of its kind in Tamil prose. It was meant to be a text book for Catholic students. A portion of it was used to attack the Lutherans also, though it was in general, an attack on all priests who were fakes, whatever their religion. Beschi has woven satirically eight episodes into one story centring round the priest and his five followers. The sum and substance of the story is given briefly here.

Paramartha Kuru and his five disciples Matti, Mataiyan, Pitai, Milechchan and Mutan were returning home after a journey. On their way they had to cross a river. The priest asked Milechchan to ascertain whether the river was awake or in slumber. He placed a hot cinder in the water, and the hissing sound made him report that the river was awake. One of the disciples remarked that it was unsafe to cross when the river was awake, because many a time when merchants carried salt in gunny bags on donkeys' backs, on coming ashore they found their bags empty, the river having consumed the salt. After a while, the priest asked Mataiyan to ascertain the status of the river. Mataiyan placed a dead cinder in the water, and as there was no reaction he reported that the river was asleep. They then crossed the river and counted if everyone had reached safely. As they counted, each one of them excluded himself, thereby misinterpreting their number. A prudent man who came by understood their problem and offered a solution. He would hit each one with a rod, and the men hit would immediately stand up. The solution proved successful and the six of them proceeded on their journey back home.

The story goes on like this, the teacher and his disciples confronting similar situations, and everytime engaging themselves in a ridiculous, knockabout comedy. The story ends with the guru meeting his death under absurdly comic circumstances.

This story has been translated into many European and Indian languages for its lively and hilarious situations. It is however, difficult to comment on the style or language used in the story. The several editions of the book differ widely since the editors have taken liberty with both the language and the style to suit their narration.

PARAMESVARA BHAT, VIDYARANYAPURA SADASIVARAO (Kannada; b.1914) is a critic and translator. Born at Malur in Shimoga district, he received his early schooling at Tirthahally and higher education at Bangalore and Mysore. After taking his Master's degree in Kannada, he joined the Mysore University as lecturer and retired from there as Professor and Director of the University's postgraduate centre at Mangalore in 1974.

Paramesvara Bhat's first collection of love-poems (Ragini) appeared in 1940 and since then he has published ten more collections of verse, eight collections of critical and elucidatory essays and sixteen works in translation from Sanskrit, besides a collection of proverbs of his own coinage. He has edited two of Muddana's works.

Love of nature and of humanity at large have been the recurring themes of Bhat's poetry; but what makes his love poems different from the common run is his detached outlook which, while being closely observant, avoids excessive sentiment and invests his observations occasionally with a touch of humour. Homeliness of diction and imagery give authenticity to his experiences which the reader is made to recognise invariably with a sense of surprise. Another distinction of Bhat's poetry is that he has revived the use of some older forms of Kannada verse like the two-line 'ele' ('Tumbe huvu'), the three-line 'tripadi' ('Suragi surahonne') the four-line 'sangatya' ('Chandravidhi'), each with its own distinctive syllabic structure. The brevity of these poetic forms suits his peculiar talent for crisp comment which brilliantly epitomises the experience and reveals the extraordinary in the ordinary. The vachana is another older semi-poetical form which he, with a few others, successfully revived and used, because its earnest eloquence as a vehicle for a variety of thoughts and emotions lends itself to lyrical expression. His Uppu kadalu which collects seven hundred of these vachanas is remarkable for the variety and intensity of the varied emotions which the sea evoked in him.

Bhat's outstanding contribution also consists in his voluminous body of translated work. To him goes the unique credit of having translated, verse for verse and prose for prose, the entire works of Kalidasa, Bhasa and Ashvaghosha, in addition to Bhartrihari, Amaruka and others. Essentialy a lover of literature and an able teacher, Bhat by his translations as by his critical and elucidatory prose writings has done much to bring home to the common reader the truly great in literature, whether Kannada or Sanskrit.

PARAMESWAR KAVINDRA (Bengali) was the first to write a version of the Mahabharata in Bengali. His real name was Parameswar Das, and Kavindra was his title. He served under Paragal Khan.

We do not know much about his identity and place of origin. Some scholars identify him with Shrikar Nandi, which is unlikely as the latter mentions Kavindra as his predecessor.

Parameswar's Mahabharata was composed in the reign of Alauddin Hussain Shah. Paragal Khan, one of the commanders of Hussain Shah's army, was appointed Laskar (a military governor) of Chittagong and eventually settled there. He was fond of the Mahabharata which used to be read in his court, but he did not know Sanskrit well and asked Parameswar to prepare a Bengali version of the book. Parameswar accordingly wrote the complete Mahabharata consisting of eighteen 'sargas' (cantos). His Mahabharata was very popular in East Bengal. Syed Sultan, a Bengali Muslim poet of the seventeenth century states that Parameswar's Mahabharata was read by the Hindus and the Muslims alike.

Some scholars think that Sanjaya, another writer of the Bengali Mahabharata, was Kavindra's predecessor but it is also unlikely, because if it had been true, instead of listening to the Sanskrit Mahabharata, Paragal Khan would have read Sanjaya's work.

Kavinchandra Shankarkinkar Misra, a poet, coming from the village of Balanda in the Satgaon area of West Bengal, states in his Gauri mangala, written in 1497-98 (this work also mentions Hussain Shah as the reigning king), that one Parameswar Das asked him to write this poem. A manuscript of Gauri mangala has been found in Chittagong. So, in all probability Kavindra Parameswar Das was the person who asked Shankarkinkar Misra to compose Gauri mangala. From the statement of Shankarkinkar Mishra it appears that Balanda was the homeland of Kavindra Parameswar. Probably he was employed by the government of Hussain Shah and was tranferred to Chittagong.

In some manuscripts of Parameswar's Mahabharata found in North Bengal, Hussain Shah and Paragal Khan are named, and Paragal's orders to Parameswar to compose a Bengali Mahabharata are mentioned, but there is no mention of Chittagong. So, it is quite possible that Parameswar was at first transferred to Hussain Shah's capital in North Bengal where he came in contact with Paragal Khan and composed the Mahabharata under his orders. Later, both Paragal and Parameswar were transferred to Chittagong. Afterwards Parameswar included in his work the portions relating to Chittagong.

PARAMESWARA IYER, ULLOOR S. (Malayalam; b.1877, d.1949), was an eminent Malayalam poet and scholar. Born in an orthodox Tamil brahmin family, he was initiated into Sanskrit studies at an early age. After graduating in Philosophy, he studied Malayalam and Tamil for post-graduation. He also took a Bachelor's degree in Law. He entered government service in the erstwhile State of Travancore and retired as Commissioner of Land Revenue. He acted as Chief Secretary to the Government of Travancore for sometime. He also held several posts like the Curator of Malayalam publications, Director of State Archives and Dean of the Faculty of Oriental Studies at the University of Travancore. He was also President of the Samasta Kerala Sahitya Parishad, an organisation of Malayalam writers, and edited its organ Sahitya parishad traimasikam.

Ulloor (the name by which he was more popularly known), began writing poems at the age of twelve. He was mainly influenced by classical poets like Kerala Varma Valia Koyil Tampuran during his formative years. Adherence to classical traditions prompted Ulloor to try his hand at composing a champu and a mahakavya during the first phase of his poetic career. Sujatodvaham champu (1908) follows the Sanskrit pattern of champu kavya, both in style and in structure. In this work he uses stereotyped figures and jaded narration, couched in pedantic phraseology. The theme of the champu is the tragic story of King Prithviraj of Indraprastha. Umakeralam (1913), his next major work, is a mahakavya in nineteen cantos and deals with a turbulent period in the history of Travancore, when the might of the people turned against the King, bringing in its wake aggression from external sources and consequent counter-moves. Set against this dark background of conflicts and conspiracies, Ulloor weaves a tender romantic love story between the King's daughter and his minister. Kerala Varma in his introduction to Umakeralam says, 'In the vividness of its imagery, in the grandeur of its conception, and in the exquisiteness of its workmanship, this great poem of Parameswara Iyer, with its lengthy cantos may not be ineptly compared to that admirable masterpiece in Sanskrit literature, the Naishadhiyacharita of Sri Harsha, and will be seen not to suffer in the least by the comparison.'

Soon after composing this mahakavya, Ulloor found that the literary climate was fast changing; neo-classical techniques proved to be out of date and romanticism was ready to take over. He lost no time in adjusting to the changed situation, and soon brought out a series of lyrics and short narrative poems in quick succession. Of the short narrative poems and 'khandakavyas', three are well-known, Karnabhushanam (1928), Pingala (1929) and Bhaktidipika (1933). Karnabhushanam depicts the dramatic encounter between Karna, who stands firm on his principle of charity, unmindful of his fate, and his father Surya, who entreats him not to give away his armour and ear-rings, two of his vital protections in the battle-field, to Indra, the father of Arjuna. Pingala deals with the story of a renowned courtesan of Mithila, whose life of sin undergoes a miraculous transformation to that of piety through spiritual awareness. Bhaktidipika portrays the power of constant and pure spiritual devotion (bhakti) that brings salvation even to Chattan, a boorish hunter, who excels the sophisticated devotee Sanandanan in his single-minded attachment to God. Ulloor has written about a hundred and fifty lyrics, collected together in nine volumes, during the last phase of his poetic career. Many of them are didactic in nature and a few deal with contemporary social problems such as caste, poverty, untouchability and the plight of women.

Ulloor was essentially a scholar-poet. His contribution to literary research in Malayalam is tremendous. But for his laborious investigations into the ancient palm-leaf manuscripts in Kerala, many valuable Malayalam works of antiquity would have remained shrouded in oblivion. He wrote about them and published critical editions of several of them. His research papers are collected together in the four volumes of Vijnanadipika. His crowning achievement was the monumental History of Kerala Literature in five volumes which he finished just before his death. It was the result of painstaking research extending over five decades and the scholar in Ulloor found fulfilment in this magnificent work which was a fitting finale to a life of total dedication to literature.

PARAMESWARAN NAIR, P.K. (Malayalam; b.1903), born at Kuttanad, is a well known biographer, literary historian and critic. He took his degree in 1928 and was in Government service, working in the Transport and Lexicon Departments. After his retirement he served as the editor of Gandhi Sahitya Granthavali and was also on the editorial board of the Vishwavijanakosham published by the Sahitya Pravarthaka Cooperative Society. Altogether Parameswaran Nair has written eighteen books.

Napoleonum Josephinum (Napoleon and Josephine), Sahitya Panchananan, C.V. Raman Pillai, Mahatma Gandhi, Thunchatt Acharyan, Premagautaman Voltaire and Napoleonte jivita sayahnam (The last days of Napoleon) are biographies written by him. Among them Sahitya Panchananan (1944) and C.V. Raman Pillai (1948) are important contributions. He has based his studies as far as possible on recorded data and has tried to trace the development of the heroes with the passing of time. He was awarded the Maharaja Martanda Varma Prize for the former and the Manorama Diamond Jubilee Prize for the latter.

Parameswaran Nair's Adhunika Malayala sahityam (1954) is a work which treats of a specific literary epoch. It covers the literary figures, movements, and major works from Tunchat Ezhuttacchan down to Kerala Varma and deals with the evolution of literature against the background of sociological tendencies. In his Malyala sahitya charitram (1958) he has made a survey of Malayalam literature from the very beginning down to 1956.

His critical studies and essays have been compiled and published in four books: Bhavarashmikal (1948), Sahitya samikshakal (1954), Valarunna sahityam (1957) and Vikshana viharam (1967). Bhavarashmikal contains essays on Shakuntalam, Gandhiji, Karuna of Kumaran Asan, Marthanda Varma Maharaja, Dharmaraja Ramavarma, Jawaharlal Nehru and some sages of India. Sahitya samikshakal is a collection of essays on art and literature with emphasis on style, aptitude and environment in modern Malayalam literature. His critical studies of various forms of literature such as biography, essay, autobiography, music in drama, modern novel, historical novel, romantic poetry and modernism in poetry are included in Valarunna sahityam and Vikshana viharam.

PARAMESWARAN PILLAI, PULIMANA (Malayalam; b.1949) was a prominent short story writer. His short stories stand out from the stories of other writers by their intense emotional appeal and highly poetic presentation. He won the acclaim of literary critics and connoisseurs by the originality and brilliance of his literary output. In personal life misfortune haunted him even from his college days and failure dogged his footsteps till the very end. Falling a victim to tuberculosis, he spent the last years of his life in great agony.

Parameswaran Pillai's collections of short stories include Kamuki and Mazhavillu. Apart from these stories, he wrote Samatvavadi, an expressionistic play. He wrote some poems too, and the bitter, tragic events of his life find their expression in them. His literary output was small but part of it, indeed, deserves recognition.

PARAMPARA KA MULYANKAN (Hindi) is a famous collection of twenty essays by Ramvilas Sharma, published in 1981. These essays take up the problems of evaluating tradition in literature. For a proper evaluation of literature a critic must have at least some knowledge of society, culture and history. India being a multi-lingual country, we have rich literature in different languages in diverse regions. Some understanding of these languages and their literature is also necessary for an adequate evaluation of tradition in literature. As Ramvilas says, 'The traditions of language and literature cannot be separated. In some essays of this book the traditions of language and linguistics have also been analysed.'

The book deals with the literature of the Hindi speaking area. The first essay 'Parampara ka mulyankan' establishes that those who want to create rational and revolutionary literature, with their minds open, need to be conversant with the tradition of literature. The tradition of literature has the same importance for criticism as history has for historical materialism. Historical materialism develops through the knowledge of history and progressive criticism develops through the knowledge of tradition. The knowledge of the progressive tradition of literature can change the tradition of literature and free it from conventional and conservative elements. The progressive approach is based on solid knowledge of tradition and has no room for the vague or the intangible. While evaluating the tradition of literature Ramvilas stresses the importance of a through study of folk traditions also.

The essays which have been written with the object of identifying the progressive tradition in Hindi literature are 'Hindi jati ke sanskritik itihas ki ruprekha', 'Natakkar Bhavabhuti', 'Sant sahitya ke adhyayan ki samasyayen', 'Tulsi ki bhakti', 'Tulsi sahitya ke samant virodhi mulya', 'Bhakti andolan aur Tulsidas', 'Ritikalin kavya ki parampara', 'Bharatendu Harishchandra', 'Shailikar Balmukund Gupta', 'Nirala: Aparajey vyaktitva', Sahitya mein lokjivan ki pratishtha aur Jaishankar Prasad'. 'Premchand' etc. Four detailed essays, 'Hindi shabdanushasan aur bhasha shastra ki parampara', 'Acharya Shukla 'Hindi bhasha', 'Sahitya aur Firaq' are important for understanding Hindi language and the linguistic tradition.

What is special about this book is that all its essays have a unity of thought and a refutation of the degenerating values of the Ritivadi tradition.

PARANAR (Tamil) is one of the major poets of the Sangam Age. He is the author of eighty-five verses, of which twenty-three deal with the puram theme and the rest with the akam theme. He has written ten poems in praise of the Chera king, Chenkuttuvan, in Patirruppattu. Of his poems, thirteen are found in Purananuru, thirty-four in Akananuru, sixteen in Kuruntokai and twelve in Narrinai.

Kapilar and Paranar are mentioned together owing to their close association with each other. Both of them have sung verses addressed to the chieftain Pekan, beseeching him to go back to his forlorn wife.

Paranar is considered a Shaivite as well as a brahmin. There are many objective references to chieftains and kings of his period in his verses. He has written on Ilanchetchenni, his son Karikalan, and on Chekuttuvan. There have also been many poets with the same name, Paranar, but they are of less importance.

PARANJAPE, SHIVRAM (Marathi; b. 1864, d.1929) was a journalist, scholar, critic and orator. He did his M.A. in Sanskrit from the University of Pune in 1895, receiving the 'Gokuldas' and 'Zala Vedant' awards. He taught Sanskrit at Maharashtra College, Pune (1896-97). He gave up his job to join Tilak in the freedom movement. In 1898 he started Kal, a political weekly. He was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment. He had to close down the publication of Kal eventually. Ten volumes of his essays written during 1900-1908 were confiscated. Later on, all those essays were, of course, released. After Tilak's death in 1920, he started a new weekly Swarajya. He presided over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan in 1929. His use of rhetoric and irony made him a powerful orator.

A collection of his literary essays, entitled Sahitya sangrah (Vols. 1,2,3, pub. 1922-46) includes articles on literary criticism. His critical appreciation of Thakursingh's painting 'Pranayinicha manobhang' is regarded as a trend-setter in creative criticism. His criticism of the classical Sanskrit plays, Nagananda, Abhijnanshakuntala and Mrichchhakatika are noteworthy. He wrote two romantic novels also, namely Govindachi gosht (1918) and Vindhyachal (1924), which however did not make much impact.

He wrote a few plays, mostly adaptations from the classics, such as Sangit Kadambari (1897) based on Bana's Kadambari; Manajirao (1898) based on Shakespeare's Hamlet, and Ramdeo Rao (1906) based on Addison's Cato. Pahila Pandav (1931) is his original play based on the life of Karna, a prominent character of the Mahabharata. This play makes a powerful patriotic appeal but lacks dramatic impact. His style is pedantic. He also translated Annasaheb Kirloskar's Sangit Saubhadra into Sanskrit. A versatile writer, Paranjape tried his hand at short stories too to project his political philosophy, of which Prabhakarpantanche vichar and Ek karkhana are examples.

Ahalyajar is his long poem. He authored a few poems and lyrics also for plays, and wrote a comprehensive account of the Maratha battles in Marathyanchya ladhayacha itihas. He helped V.K. Rajwade in editing the magazine Bhashantar. He died while he was still working on the translation of Rousseau's Politics.

PARANJOTI MUNIVAR (Tamil; b.1650, d.1725) was a major poet, whose work Tiruvilaiyadal puranam became an immediate classic. Son of Minakshisundara Desikar, he was born at Vedaranyam in the Tanjavur district and had his early education under Velliyambalavana Tambiran of Dharmapuran. Coming from a deeply religious family, he wrote Vedaranya puranam in 1171 verses in praise of Shiva. In the course of his visits to temples in the south, he reached Madurai, where the devotees of Shiva requested him to sing of the glory of Minakshi and Lord Sundaresha in the form of a purana. In response to this, Paranjoti composed Tiruvilaiyadal puranam in 3363 verses detailing the exploits of Shiva as Lord Sundaresha. The book became very popular, both because of its supreme sentiment of devotion and the fine lyrical quality of its poetry.

The book is in three cantos describing the deeds of Lord Shiva at Madurai in sixty-four stories. All these stories tell us not only of the glory of Shiva but also of his kindness even towards the worst of the sinners. The book became widely popular because of its message of hope and redemption. Apart from this, the author expounds here the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy also, wherever the occasion permits. The book also throws light on such diverse topics as music, gems, horse-breeding, etc. The popularity of the book was such that the pandits immediately translated it into Sanskrit and called it the Halaeya mahatmyam. In the later centuries, this large book was also produced as a serious musical poem (called 'natakakkirttanai') and expounded to the public in musical-cum-dramatic expositions.

Paranjoti Munivar was held in great esteem by Sokkanatha Pillai, a contemporary poet, and Supradipakavi, another great poet of the period, was his disciple.

PARAPPURATTU (Malayalam; b.1924, d. 1981), real name K.E. Mattayi, was a novelist. After completing his school education, he joined the army. In 1965, he retired from military service and devoted himself to literature. His first novel Ninamaninja kalpatukal is a novel about the life of a soldier. Anveshichchu kandettiyilla is about the life of a nurse. She joins military service in order to support her parents and younger brothers and sisters. But when she returns from military service, no one is willing to marry her. She is no longer young, and people refuse to believe that she is chaste. Their argument is that a military nurse, living in the midst of soldiers, cannot remain chaste.

Parappurattu has written nineteen novels. Perhaps, Ara nazhika neram is the best among them. It unfolds the story of a large family through the recollections of Kunjenachchan, a ninety-year old man awaiting death. He frequently says, 'I will live only for a few more minutes.' The title Ara nazhika neram literally means 'a few more minutes'. He frequently lapses into a dreamy state, and scenes from his early years pass before his mind's eye. He had five sons, but now there are only four. Kunjoma, the eldest, died in a fight with the powerful Nayars. The remaining four sons, Kivaritu, Pilippos, Kunjucherukkan and Mattukkutti are married, and have plenty of children. Thus Kunjenachchan has many grandsons, some of whom are married and have become parents. The novel is full of spicy incidents. Kunjenachchan cheerfully recollects his affair with a beautiful woman who once gave him food and shelter, and how one day he was beaten by her husband, when he discovered the affair. Pilippos has an affair with his maidservant, and his son marries her secretly. Mattukkutti's second wife Dinamma gets involved with Shivarama Kurup, who supplies opium to Kunjenachchan. Kivaritu's daughter Kuttiyamma elopes with her lover Thomas. One day Kunjenachchan discovers Dinamma's adulterous relationship with Kurup. But the old man dies before he gets time to talk to Mattukkutti about it.

The characters are life-like, and the situations realistic. The author has used the stream-of-consciousness technique. The biblical strain that runs throughout the novel gives it an added strength.

Some of the other important novels that Parappurattu wrote are Akasattile paravakal, Adyakiranangal, Nanmayute pukkal, Anveshichchu, Vilakkukal vilangukal, Ninamaninja kalpatukal and Prayanam. Apart from novels, Parappurattu has written several short stories which have been collected together in Teranjedutta kathakal. He has also written a play, titled Velichcham kuranja vazhikal.

PARASHARYA, MUKUNDARAI VIJAYASHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1914) is the pen-name of the Pattani Mukundarai Vijayashankar, a Gujarati poet. After his graduation, he studied the Ayurveda system of medicine and is now a practising physician. His subjects of interest are philosophy, education, history and poetry. Genuine sentiment and musical quality are the two characteristics of his poetry. His poems in Sansruti belong to the first category and those in Phul Phagananan to the second. His devotional poems reflect genuine 'bhakti'. His poems

PARASHURAM (Bengali)
See under BOSE, RAJSHEKHAR

PARASHURAM DEVACHARYA (Rajasthani) was the disciple of Hari Vyasdev of Nimbark cult. He was the founder of Nimbark seat at Salemabad in Ajmer district. He is placed between 1393-1538 or between 1543-1623 by different scholars. The first claim is based more on guess work than on hard facts. No attention is paid to internal evidence which mentions poets like Surdas, Paramanandadas, Chaturbhujadas, Krishnadas, Swami Haridas, Hariram Vyas and Miran Bai. On the strength of the internal evidence, his period may be safely put between 1530 and 1620. His birth place is village Thikariya, near Khandela in Sikar district. He was a Gurjar Gaud brahmin by caste. His 'vanis' are very important from the point of view of subject-matter, language and structural elegance. It is believed that the first collection of his writings was made about 1620, which contained 'sakhis' (sayings), 'charits' (life-sketches) and 'lilas' (worldly deeds of the Lord). His 'padas' (songs set to music) were excluded from this. In 1780 one Manasaram compiled his complete writings, including sakhis, charits, and lilas, as well as 630 padas, under the title Parashuram sagar. He himself prepared two copies of the text; and the printed Parashuram sagar (4 parts) is a faithful copy of Manasaram's manuscript. It cannot, however, be said with certainty that all the padas of Parashuram have found place in this edition, as several manuscripts contain many more of his padas which do not appear in this print.

His vanis have been divided into four different categories, depending on their forms: Sakhi (2225 couplets), Charit granth (15 small works in various metres), Lilagranth (13 works in chaupai and duha), and lastly Padavali (630 songs). The subject-matter of his vanis is mainly the same as that of Nirgun saints in which the importance of God and Guru, devotion to the Nirgun (formless), etc. are emphasised. The sakhis are deeply impressive and striking. He has named composite sections of his vani as 'Jodo'. whereas other saints have called them 'Anga'. His language represents simple, folk-parlance. The charits include 'Das avatar charit', 'Raghunath charit', 'Shrikrishna charit', 'Sudama charit', 'Prahalad charit', 'Draupadi ko jodo', 'Gajgrah ko jodo', etc. The metres used are chappaya, sawaiya, payar, etc. 'Prahlad charit' is the longest of them all, having 105 stanzas, while others are smaller ones. The language used is Pingal. 'Lila granthas' have been written in duha and chaupai metres in Rajasthani language and deal with the glory of God, His deeds on the earth, devotion to the Lord, self-realization, dos and dont's etc. The Padavali consists of devotional songs set to music, which compare well with those of Sur, Miran, Kazi Muhammad, etc. They are simple compositions and touch the chords of heart. Written in Rajasthani, they cover a wide range of devotional writings.

Parashuram has gained wide popularity with the masses. He communicates the eternal truth in unadorned language. The Nimbark cult believes in the philosophy of Dvetadvaita (Dual and non-dual nature of Reality), but Parashuram has also described Advaitavad, Ekeshwarvad Sarvatmavad, etc. In fact, he explains the existence of the cosmic reality in terms of his own self-realisation. The Nimbarks treat Shrikrishna as Lord Supreme. Though a devotee of Shrikrishna, he describes the lilas of Rama also. Though by faith, Parashuram believed in Sahchari and Nikunj forms of devotion, he kept them restricted to himself, since they were too personal and esoteric as forms of worship. What finds expression in his poems is, rather, the larger, the more tender form of the Gopi bhav of devotion. Thus he was a Vaishnava devotee of liberal disposition. Besides composing sakhis in praise of the Nirgun Lord, he also sang of the glorious deeds of God-Incarnate. The natural beauty of Rajasthani language may be seen in almost all his writings. This makes him a first-rate poet in Rajasthani literature, besides being a poet of no less importance in Hindi.

PARATI PARIKATHA (Hindi) is a regional novel by the well-known Hindi novelist Phanishwarnath 'Renu', published in 1957. It differs from his first regional novel Maila anchal in various respects. The village Paranpur represents the transitional nature of an Indian village—transition not merely in terms of the physical expansion of the village but also in terms of values and social ethos.

The tragic story of this barren land of Paranpur is made up of various contradictions in rural life—individual interests, social conventions, petty greeds behind lofty ideals. Plans for rural uplift like land survey, Kosi project, Sarvodaya, etc, are also interwoven in the fabric of these tensions. The social life of the village too is seen from various angles. Hence the life of the village is projected in varied colours and hues—social, historical, political, economic, cultural, geographical, ecological. The traditional rural pattern is strained under the wave of socio-political influences and the process of modernization, but one wonders if there is a real change at the grass-root level. Vast chunks of land enclosing Paranpur have been converted into barren land. This harsh reality is used as a symbol to suggest that the rural culture which reflects real India is in the process of turning barren. As a foil to it, the rhythm of life goes on in the countryside. The full moon rises, the songs of Tajmani and Malari resound like birds flapping their wings, Raghu Ramayani's tale goes on with the whole village absorbed in its enchantment. The author seems to say that this folk life with all its joys and woes, its merriments, its music and drama, its arts and crafts is a precious heritage.

In the changing socio-economic relations we see the barriers of the worn-out castes and creeds slowly crumbling down. The affair between Jiten and Tajmani symbolises this aspect of life, but Renu also reminds us of the power of age-old conventions, faith in traditions, and fear of bureaucracy.

Language has always been an important instrument for creating the atmosphere of a particular region. So is the case here. The dialect used by various characters brings out in sharp relief the collusion between the traditional and the modern. With all its diffusion, the plot has a structured fabric and a symphony in its variations.

PARAY, ASSAD (Kashmiri; b. 1860, d. 1916) was a mystic poet of Kashmir. He lost his father in childhood and was totally illiterate. In those days peasants were tyrannized by rulers. His widow-mother left Hajin where the family lived and remarried at Srinagar. Here the boy learned to make Kashmiri caps. From his early age he had a tendency towards mysticism. He associated himself with saintly people, and finally became a disciple of Mahada Sahib, a learned dervish. To get peace of mind from the din and bustle of city life, he moved to Ganastan (Sonawari), eleven miles away from his birth-place Hajin. Seven years later, one of his own disciples invited him to Salur (Ganderbal) for permanently settling down, and it was here that he died. His Kalam-i-Assad Paray, consisting of 40 poems of mysticism, depicts pure sufism. Assad, though illiterate, had his own style and diction, though his devotional poems are like those of other mystic poets of Kashmir, who were influenced by Lal Ded or Sheikh Nur-ud-Din Nurrani. The main thrust of Assad's poetry is to ask people to rise above material desires and to keep away from all worldly filth. Then only will they be able to recognize the Lord.

PARAY, WAHAB (Kashmiri; b. 1846, d. 1914) was an eminent Kashmiri poet. He lost his father in his childhood and was brought up by his mother. He studied at a local Maktab (school) and acquired a good command of Persian language. At the age of 25, he became a 'patwari', besides acting side by side in various capacities as Tashkhes Dar (ascertainer of crops), Kardar (Manager of plots of land) and Naib Tehsildar (Assistant Collector). The period he lived in was one of tyranny. Being sensitive, he wrote poems, showing the high-handedness of autocratic rulers. He also translated a Persian book, Haft Qisa Kakrizan (Craftiness of women folk), into Kashmiri. He wrote Akbarnama which depicts the tyranny of the British government. He brought out a Kashmiri version of the versified Urdu fiction, Naunihal Gulbadan, and translated Qisa chihar darvesh of Amir Khusrau. He also gave a Kashmiri version of the Punjabi 'Behramgoro'. At the age of 54, he wrote a versified life-history of Sheikh Hamza, an exalted saint, entitled Sultani, in three volumes. He even translated Shahnama of the Persian poet Firdausi, and composed Shamayil-i-Muhammadi (pen-picture of Prophet Muhammad). Further, he wrote Sailabnama (Flood devastation) and a travelogue-cum-criticism on the then rulers and bureaucrats, entitled Durvishi. Besides, he composed 166 lyrics full of sensitive perception and at times symbolic expression.

PAREKH, HIRALAL TRIBHUVANDAS (Gujarati; b. 1882, d. 1938) was a historian and critic. He did his B.A. in 1908 from Gujarat College with History as a subject, and was appointed a 'Dakshina Fellow' in the college. He joined the Secondary Teachers' Training College in 1909, and later associated himself with the Gujarat Vernacular Society (now known as Gujarat Vidyasabha) as Assistant Secretary. He worked for the growth and development of Gujarati language and literature through this society. He also contributed to the periodical Buddhi prakash and gave it a regular shape.

Coming under the influence of Mahatma Gandhi, he edited a bunch of patriotic poems, Deshbhaktina kavya. The influence of Gandhi is reflected again in the anthology, Prabhubhaktina kavya (1919), edited by him. Here he explains the significance of prayer and devotion to God.

His Sahityanun digdarshan (1917) offers a critical evaluation of Gujarati books. Likewise, Granth ane granthkar, running into nine volumes, shows his deep critical insight and brings out the contribution made by traditional Gujarati writers to the development of various literary forms.

In Arvachin Gujaratnun rekhadarshan (Parts I-III) he makes an appraisal of the political, educational, literary and journalistic progress of Gujarat during the years 1801-1936. His conclusions are based on data and documentary evidence, and as a result his book leaves on our mind an impression of authenticity.

Some of his edited works, important as reference books, are, Lady Vidyabahen mani-mahotsav granth (1921), Vasant rajat mahotsav smarak granth (1927) and Narsinh Mehtanun akhyan (1923).

PAREKH, NAGINDAS NARANDAS Gujarati; b.1903) is a renowned professor, scholar and translator. After obtaining a 'Snataka' degree from Ahmedabad, he went to Santiniketan for the study of the Bengali language and literature. During his stay and studies in Bengal he was greatly influenced by the writings and personalities of Rabindranath Tagore and Saratchandra. After completing his studies he joined Gujarat University as a teacher. He participated in the non-cooperation movement launched by Gandhiji and suffered imprisonment thrice.

In 1947 he joined the Gujarat Vidyasabha. When Sri Ramananda Mahavidyalaya was founded to impart higher education through the medium of vernacular languages, he joined it as Professor of Gujarati. He had good command over Sanskrit, Bengali, Marathi, Hindi and English. He translated into Gujarati a large part of Tagore's literature and many novels of Saratchandra. His translation of the Bengali novel Na hanyate by Maitreyidevi has been widely read and appreciated in Gujarat. One of the best books of Maitreyidevi, Mongpute Rabindranath, was also translated by him into Gujarati. In addition to these works, he translated into Gujarati books on aesthetics written by great Sanskrit scholars. Mammat no kavyavichar and Anandavardhan no dhwanivichar are the best fruits of his ripe scholarship as a translator. His translation of the Bible from English into Gujarati is also regarded as a great contribution. He has also translated two books of literary criticism, Principles of Literary Criticism by Abercrombie and Judgement in Literature by Worsfold.

Swadhyaya ane samiksha, parichaya ane pariksha, Viksha ane niriksha and Abhinavno rasavichar are his books of criticism. The last of these works won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1970). His literary criticism bears testimony to both his scholarship and critical acumen.

PAREKH, PRAHLAD (Gujarati; b. 1912, d. 1962), the well-known poet, studied at Dakshinamurthi, Gujarat Vidyapith and Santiniketan. 'Gulab ane Sivali', a prose tale, and 'Ruperi sarovarane kinare' (translation of Laura Ingall Wilder's 'By the Shores of the Silver Lake') are his early publications. Baribahar (Out from the window) and Sarwani (The spring) are his anthologies of poems. Parekh came early under the influence of Rabindranath Tagore's musical metrics and the old tradition of Gujarati bhajans. He excels in sound combinations and exploits the resources of alliteration and assonance. In his poetry, the meaning finds its form in crystallized simplicity and directness. His prepossession with flowers, and particularly with the olfactory sense, is apparent in both the collections. Sometimes he calls a child a singing flower and compares the feelings of the heart with intangible fragrance, or he beholds the smiling flowers on the earth and the smiling stars in the sky in juxtaposition, or he feels the fragrant darkness and smells the aroma coming from the stars afar. In Sarwani the poet's unsual preference for the monsoon, instead of the spring, makes him the singer of the monsoon. Out of fifty-six poems in this anthology forty-six are songs, amongst which twenty-three are on the monsoon. In all of them the influence of Tagore is obvious both in their rhythm and in their style, though in their content they are rooted in their own soil. In short, he is the forerunner of the purely aesthetic tradition that has developed during the last few decades in Gujarat.

PAREKH, RAMESH (Gujarati; b. 1940) is one of the conspicuous modern Gujarati poets. His anthology of poems called Kyan (1970) has established him chiefly as a singer-poet. His works show the influence not of earlier traditional poets but of major modern poets like Niranjan Bhagat and Rajendra Shah. Nevertheless, the form of song he employs does not develop structurally, though the language and devices he uses are innovative. The poet derives his diction from his Saurashtrian milieu. The nostalgic pastoral tone and the traditional feminine charm depicted in the backdrop of village-settings and folk tunes add to the musical dimension of his poetry. In his poems the invariable nuances of agony, originating from the poet's estrangement from something that he does not name, are achieved mostly by placing in different situations and context his own name Ramesh, his village Amreli, and his imaginary beloved Sonal. His love is erotic and each of his poems shows a new perspective in his experience of alienation. 'Lakha sarakhi varata' is the poet's favourite poem which exploits the richness of folklore, keeping at the centre the hero's struggle with the falcon. The elegiac strain in 'Rani Sonandenun maras iun', the caricature of impotent sovereignty in 'Hitopadesh', the force of slang and colloquialism in 'Maranottar', the magnifying dimension of the crow symbol in 'Kagado mari gayo' draw the attention of the reader immediately. He is a poet of considerable power and potential.

PAREKH, RASIKLAL CHHOTALAL (Gujarati; b. 1897, d. 1981) was a renowned scholar, indologist, playwright and critic. His father was a reputed lawyer, and mother an avid reader of Sanskrit and Gujarati literature. Rasiklal inherited his father's intellect and mother's literary taste to a great extent. After passing his matriculation examination he went to Pune and joined Fergusson College for higher studies. In 1918 he passed his first degree examination with Sanskrit and English, and was appointed a fellow at the same college.

While studying for a Master's degree, he worked at the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute which provided him with an opportunity to come in close contact with the great indologist and research scholar, Muni Shri Punyavijayji who gave him some insight into the subject of Indology and the history of Gujarat. While at college he made an intensive study of English and Sanskrit literature as well as Indian and Western philosophy. About this time Rasiklal met Indulal Yagnik, renowned worker and leader, who impressed upon him the need of serving an institution in Gujarat which imparted national education. Rasiklal put aside his post-graduation and left for Ahmedabad to join Gujarat Vidyapith established by Mahatma Gandhi. He dedicated himself as a teacher to the cause of education. His association with the late Ramnarayan Pathak contributed to his development as a creative writer. He took up the editing of Puratattva, a quarterly.

Rasiklal was both a brilliant scholar and a creative writer. His creative instinct led him to cultivate various literary forms such as drama, poetry and short story.

In 1938, Anandshankar Dhruva, Chairman of the Gujarat Vernacular Society (now known as Gujarat Vidyasabha) invited him to join the Society as assistant secretary. Rasiklal served this institution till the end. From his college days, Rasiklal had a flair for dramatics, and he wrote Rupiya nun zad and Pahelo kalal for the students of Gujarat Vidyapith. During the years at Gujarat Vidyasabha, he published a unique play, Sharvilak, for which he got the Sahitya Akademi Award (1960). He also published Menan Gujari, a remarkable musical play which became extremely popular with both scholars and common people.

Jivananan vaheno, a collection of short stories, shows his creative ability as a short story writer. Smriti is his famous anthology of poems. Purovachan ane vivechan, Akash bhashit and Sarasvatichandra no mahima are the ripe fruits of his critical power. Anand mimanse, Gujarat-ni rajdhanio, Itihas padhdhati ane swaroop are some of his other famous books showing his deep scholarship in various branches of learning.

In 1942 the Gujarat Sahitya Sabha awarded him the coveted Ranjitram Suvarnachandrak for his invaluable contribution to Gujarati literature.In 1963 he was President of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad at Bombay, and for two years (1966-68) President of the Gujarat Itihas Parishad.

In 1977 the Sangeet Natak Akademi awarded its fellowship to him in appreciation of his contribution to the field of drama.

PARIBHASHA (Sanskrit). The Sanskrit-English lexicon, compiled by V.S. Apte, explains the term variously. First, the term 'paribhasha' ordinarily signifies a speech or discourse as found in Bhagavata Purana: 'gramavaidagdhyaya paribhashaya'. Secondly, the word may mean any of the following: censure, reproof, blame, or abuse. Thirdly, it may simply mean an explanation. Among its specialized meanings we come across the following: (a) Terminology, technical phraseology, technical terms used in a particular work or genre and defined as 'ahunikasanketah paribhasha, taya arthabodhakam padam paribhashikam.' Accordingly terms like 'guna, vriddhi, samprasarana' are examples of 'paribhasha' in grammar; likewise, 'upadhi, vyapti, pakshata, samkara' in Nyaya are instances of technical terms. It should also be noted that as 'paribhasha' is relevant only with reference to a particular genre, a term may have a connotation totally different from its use in another school of thought as 'guna' is related to euphonic combination in grammar, while in the Nyaya-Vaisheshika systems of philosophy it stands for 'rupa, rasa', etc. Further, it signifies 'sattva, rajas and tamas' in Samkhya, and 'dravya, devata', etc. in Mimamsa. In this connection, we may refer to the observation of Kaiyata, the famous commentator of ancient India: 'Adhikarashabdena pararthyat paribhashapyuchyate. Kashchit paribhasharupa iti'. (b) From the above discussion, it follows that 'paribhasha' means a general rule or precept or definition which is applicable throughout. It is expressed thus: 'aniyamanivarako nyayavisheshah'. (c) The term also signifies a comprehensive list of abbreviations or signs used in a work of particular genre and (d) an explanatory aphorism in grammar, mixed with other aphorisms of Panini, which clarifies the method for their perfect application. (e) In medical science, it stands for prognosis. In fine, paribhashas may be described as canons of interpretation. As evident, these have been variously used in the works of different genres and those used in the Shrautasutras are the earliest. The access to the inner meaning in the Shrautasutras lies only through their paribhashas for the texts to be properly interpreted. With their assistance not only the spiral ways towards a deeper meaning of the aphorisms are illuminated, but the readers are also provided with the essential clues to fill the vacuum of unspecified details. They also enable the readers to weigh the relative strength or weakness of the contradictory concepts and succeed in removing other possible ambiguities. That the Shrautasutras were, indeed, trend-setters in evolving many more paribhashas that might suit the specific requirements of various genres is evident in any analysis of the different streams of post-Vedic literature. However, the authors of the Shrautasutras did not classify their aphorisms into samjna, paribhasha and others. Some aphorisms or collections of aphorisms have been described as paribhashas by the commentators and one may refer to the following:

(i) Balakrishna Mishra's commentary, Manava Shrautasutravritti, (ii) Dhurtasvamin's commentary on Apastamba Shrautasutra, (iii) Agnisvamin's commentary on Latyayana Shrautasutra, (iv) Dhanvin's commentary on Drahyayana Shrautasutra, (v) Narayana's commentary on Ashvalayana Shrutasutra, (vi) Siddhantibhashya on Ashvalayana Shrautasutra, (vii) Ashv Prayogadipika on Ashvalayana Shrautasutra, (viii) Mahadeva's commentary on Hiranyakeshi Shrautasutra, (ix) Anartiya's commentary on Sankhayana Shrautasutra, (x) Vidyadhara's commentary on Katyayana Shrautasutra,

Some scholars have rightly pointed out that when the commentaries on various Shrautasutras were formulated neither a difinition of those paribhashas was worked out nor was there scope for strict adherence to them. A close analysis would show that if certain general rules fulfilled the criterion of offering guidance towards proper interpretation and correct application of aphorisms, they were also accepted as paribhashas. At the same time, some minor rules with restricted application were also included in the technical phraseology. Even some aphorisms with little relevance were collected. We may now, therefore, take into consideration various derivative meanings and suggestions dealt with by Shabdakalpadruma, Vachaspatyam, Mahabhashya, etc.

The term is derived from 'pari-bhāsh' (Pari-bhāshach, stāp'-, suggesting a rule that narrates emphatically, deals with a whole work in general and explains and illuminates the total conceptual frame. In the Katantra-paribhasha vritti, Durgasimha observes; 'paritah sarvato bhashyante'rtha abhir iti paribhashah' Further, Haribhaskara syas in the Paribhasha-bhaskara; 'bhasha vyaktayam, vachityasmat parito bhashyate iti vyutapatteh'. Chandidasa writes in his commentary on the Kavyaprakasha: 'Parishkritam bhashanam padartha-vivechakacharyanam yuktiyukta vak.' Again, Durgadasa observes in his commentary on the Mugdabodha 'granthasya samkshepanivaharthasanketa-visheshah'.

Patanjali observed rather poetically in his Mahābhāshya: 'paribhasha punar ekadeshasthā sati kritsnam shāstram abhijvalayati pradipavat; tad yathā pradipah suprajvalita ekadeshasthah sarvam veshamabhijralayati' This view is explained thus in the Vachaspatyam: 'Subuddhijananandvàra sarvasastropakārakamiti tattātparyam'. There is indeed much ingenuity in Patanjali's observation, since he compares the method of clarifying the meaning or significance of an entire text by a paribhasha with the process of illuminating the total area of a room by lighting a lamp in a particular corner. Nagesha too quotes in his sub-commentary (Uddyota) > parito vyapritam bhasham paribhasham prachakshate.

Here we may also refer to another comment of Nagesha in the Shabdendushekhara : 'Paribhashanam aniyame niyamakaritvat.

But Bhairava Mishra remarks in the course of his comments on the Paribhashendushekhara:

> Yadapi aniyame niyamakaritvam ityeva tadapi na, atrakhyata-niyamartha-sutreshvativyapteh.

Mallinatha's comments on Shishupalavadha are well known : 'paribhasha aniyamanivarako nyayavisheshah'.

The school of Nyaya also formulated its own opinion on paribhasha while discussing the relationship between words and objects. According to the Nyayasutra, the aforesaid relationship is established by divine will and hence it is conventional, not natural. This very convention is referred to by the Nyayakusumanjali as a reason for inferring God's existence. Again, this convention fashioned by divine will is described as shakti by the Tarkasamgraha: 'Asmat padat ayamartho boddhavya itishvara-sanketah shaktih'. According to the older Nyaya, shakti can exist only through divine will and when the meaning sought for is permanent, it does not operate in proper nouns and technical terms. On the contaray, the new Nyaya proposes that the relationship between words and objects is not always established by divine will and that shakti is acceptable in all cases. Thus the Siddhantamuktavali says: 'Adhunikasanketite tu na shaktiriti sampradayah, Navyastu ishvareccha na shaktih, kintu icchaiva tenadhunikasanketite'pe shaktirasatyeva ityahuh'.

But the Shabdashaktiprakashika declares that when the relationship is not permanent and also not controlled by divine will but is established by the will of man it is called paribhasha. With reference to the two types of relationships, Bhartrihari observes in the Vakyapadiya : 'Sanketa or conventional relationship is of two kinds, viz., ajanika or permanent and adhunika or modern. While the former denotes the permanent primary relationship, the latter refers to the technical terms having specialized and well-defined meanings. One may now formulate the opinion that the technical meaning of the term 'paribhasha' was extended during the post-Vidic times to prepare the names like Vedantaparibhasha or Vaidyakaparibhasha. With reference to the latter, the Shabdakalpadruma quotes: 'Avyaktanukta-leshoktasandigdharthaprakashikah / paribhashah pravakshyante dipibhutah.'

As we have already stated, the paribhashas came into being for fulfilling the specific needs of the exegetical literature of the Vedic Aryans. These were conceived as general principles which would facilitate the correct interpretation of the texts of the Shrautasutras concerned. That is why the chief characteristic of the paribhashas is stated to be 'pararthya' or subservience which means that those paribhashas subserve the injunctive aphorisms of the text by being their auxiliary. Kapardisvamin calls them 'sarvakarmashesha' in his commentary on the Apastamba Shrautasutra. The paribhashas cannot serve any purpose if they are dissociated from the texts; in other words, the injunctive texts unfold their real import only when they are interpreted in the light of the paribhashas. These may be classified either according to their function or the scope of their application. If we take their functions into account, we would find that they try to clarify or specify the scope of different aphorisms; they also seek to modify or restrict the rules. Secondly, several paribhashas furnish us with clues to the abbreviations used in an aphorism for the sake of brevity. Thirdly, some paribhashas supply the details not mentioned in an aphorism for economy of words. Fourthly, in cases of conflict some paribhashas determine the relative predominance of a deity, oblation, its embellishment and purpose. Fifthly, some paribhashas supply the rules governing the extended application of sacrifical details by analogy. Sixthly, some paribhashas determine whether the components of a sacrifice are having principal or auxiliary status.

Besides, the paribhashas may be classified into the following two categories according to the scope of their application; (a) applicable to a particular aphorism, or (b) applicable to various texts.

Further, the paribhashas may also be classified into three categories according to their origin; viz. shrauti, jnapita, and sautri.

We may conclude with an information note on the importance accorded to paribhashas by different Shrauta sutras. The Ashvalayana Shrautasutra, unlike later texts of the sub-genre, does not have a separate section on paribhasha aimed at formulating general rules on interpretation; but these rules are stretched over the whole text, appearing in accordance with the context. But the Shankhayana Shrautasutra has a separate section on paribhasha. The Apastamba Shrautasutra, belonging to the Taittiriya school of Yajurveda, has a separate paribhasha section together with patriarch lists. The first chapter of the longest Shrautasutra of this school composed by Satyashadha Hiranyakeshin, contains a separate paribhasha section. The Vaikhanasa Shrautasutra of the same school also has a chapter on paribhasha.

The Varaha Shrautasutra of the Maitrayani school is conspicuous by its omission of the paribhasha section. The Katyayana Shrautasutra of the Vajasaneyin school has, however, a separate chapter on paribhasha.

The Shrautasutras originated in a society in which the ritual had been fully developed in all its complexities; moreover, different schools had already existed for same centuries. The rules were codified into aphorisms thereafter, the need to conduct rituals correctly according to conventions was increasingly felt. Out of this practical exigency, the paribhashas arose in the priestly manuals to dispel doubts and enigmatic obscurity. The preference for extreme conciseness and straining after brevity were successfully negotiated in those Shrautasutras; the devices of anuvritti and paribhasha were invented from the same psycho-social reasons both to ensure correct interpretation of the exegetical legacy and to sharpen a new intellectual tool for posterity.

PARICHAI (Rajasthani) is a short biographical poem on the life of a saint, written by his disciples and grand-disciples. Parichais are not literary compositions but they throw light on the lives of the saints and their times. A large number of parichais are available in Rajasthani, out of which only a few have been so far published. A brief account of some of these parichais may be given here.

Anantdas, who was a pupil of Agardas and grand pupil of Krishnadas Payohari, composed Bhakta ratnavali which lists fifteen saints such as Kabir, Raidas, Trilochan, Namdev, Ranka Banka, Dhanna, Miran and Pipa. Anantdas is said to be the grandson of an eminent saint Pipa, brother of Achaldas Khichi and the ruler of Gagaron (Rajasthan). There is a mention in Pipaji ki parichai and Raidasji ki parichai that he was inspired by his guru Agardas. He must have drawn inspiration from the writings of eminent saints like Nabhadas and Priyadas also who were the spiritual brothers of his guru.

According to Parashuram Chaturvedi, Anantdas was the disciple of Krishnadas and came from western Rajasthan. He lived in the first half of the 17th century. We learn from him a number of details about the lives of the saints, some of which are authentic and the others mixed with legends.

Khemdas, the pupil of Rajjab, composed Gopichandji ki parichai in which he tells us both about the early prosperous life and the later ascetic life of Gopichand, but he does not tell us anything about the date of the composition of his work. Only at one place he refers to the blessings of Rajjabji from which we can infer that he was the pupil of Rajjab and might have composed his work in the last quarter of the 17th century. Parashuram Chaturvedi thinks that he belonged to the Niranjani sect. Then we have Jangopal, one of the disciples of Dadu who composed Dadu janma-lila parichai. According to Swami Mangaldas, it was composed in the 17th century. Jangopal was born in a Mahajan family in Fatehpur (Sikar) of Rajasthan. Later, he migrated to Didwana and settled there. Nothing is known about the date of his birth, but the works of his contemporaries put him in the later part of the 16th century.

The Dadu janma-lila parichai is divided into sixteen chapters. It is highly appreciative of Dadu's ideals and character, and records several of his supernatural feats and the transformation of his body into camphor at the time of his death. It also refers to a couple of historical events about his life—his visits to Maharaja Mansingh of Amer and Emperor Akbar. This parichai is written in 'duha' and 'chaupai' metres in a language nearer to the common dialects of the regions of Ajmer, Hissar, Alwar and Shekhawati.

Raghunathdas composed Swami Haridas ki parichai around 1689 which tells us about the Swami's birth, his life of devotion, his profound knowledge and insight, his indifference to worldly desires and his self-realization.

Swami Rupdas, pupil of Swami Amardas Niranjani, composed Swami Sevadasji ki parichai in 1775. Amardas was a disciple of Swami Sevadas, and Rupdas first pays his respects to God and the earlier saints, and then extols the character and personality of Swami Sevadas, full of extraordinary supernatural powers.

Ramrup wrote Charandasji ki parichai about 1783 which is a very lengthy composition. He was initiated by Charandas as a disciple in the year 1754, when he was only eleven years old. He was given a new name, Bhaktanand, by his guru. Highly influenced by the character of Charandas, the disciple composed this parichai.

Sukhsharan composed a number of parichais on the lives of women-saints like Miran Bai, Mugati Bai, Karama Bai, Phuli Bai, Rana Bai, Sivari Bai. All these parichais are available in a manuscript of 1870 in the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute, Jodhpur. Nothing is known about the life of Sukhsharan except that he belonged to Kudaki village, near Medata, in Marwar (Rajasthan) and lived in the 18th century. Kudaki is said to be the birth-place of Miran Bai also. Mugati Bai belonged to Maharashtra and was perhaps the pupil of Sant Jnandev, while Phuli Bai was a Jat from Marwar and lived during the reign of Maharaja Jaswant Singh of Jodhpur. She died in 1678.

A few more parichais like Ghata parcho by Hariramdas, Pipaji ki parichai by Agardas and Sona Lohari parichai by an unknown author are also available at the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute and other manuscript-libraries in Rajasthan.

Bhaktamal by Nabhadas, its commentaries by his fellow brothers, and a few other compositions of this nature may also be included in the category of parichais. In Bhaktamal itself Nabhadas narrates the life-histories of hundreds of saints from the puranas down to the 18th century.

PARICHHA, GOURAHARI (Oriya; b. 1794, d. 1893) was born in Paralakhemundi in Ganjam district, Orissa, and was a contemporary of the renowned poets, Gopal Krishna (1785-1862) and Kavichandra Raghunath Parichha (1795-1872). A staunch Vaishnava by faith, he composed a great number of beautiful poems depicting the love of Radha and Krishna. Apart from being a poet, he was also an expert in 'veena' recital. Vyasakavi Fakirmohan paid a tribute to him in his poem, 'Utkal Bhramana', mentioning in particular his command of music on veena.

Not much is known about Gourahari's life or writings. His poems appeared in the last decade of the nineteenth century in Damodar Patnaik's Sangita sagar o sangita sarbasara. Some of his poems were also published in Preeti sudhakar by Gopalaballava Das.

Gourahari was an honest scholar, and his deep philosophical thoughts, detatched love and spiritual leanings are reflected in his writings. His work may be classified into three divisions: Chaupadis (depicting the love sport of Radha and Krishna), Astakal seva (in Bengali), and Bhasa sangita vinoda (translation of Gitagobinda).

Gourahari's Chaupadis are remarkable for their devotion and music, and his translation of Gitagobinda tries to capture the magic of the original, and its language is simple to understand. Apart from these, he also wrote a drama, entitled Prahlada nataka, under the name of Rama Chandra Chotray, the then king of Jalantara.

Gourahari was the disciple of Govindadas Rasikananda. He had deep regard for his guru as well as for the six exponents (Sada Goswamis) of the Vaishnava 'raganuraga' bhakti cult. In this cult love for 'parakiya nayika' plays an important role. Gourahari composed thirty-four poems, arranged alphabetically, but unfortunately only three of them on 'dha', 'la' and 'ch' are available. Gourahari's poems have been set to different ragas. He has used figures with depth of emotion. He also composed a number of chaupadis on the love of Radha and Krishna and portrayed Radha in eight types of nayikas (heroines). His use of dialogue in the chaupadis is also impressive. The dialogues are usually between Radha, Krishna and a 'duti' (messenger). The duti's modes of worship and religious practice are described in 'Astakal seva'. The chaupadis are, indeed, the prized possession of Oriya literature, and Gourahari is an important name in Oriya literature because of his poetic excellence and philosophical thoughts.

PARIDA, DURGA CHARAN (Oriya; b. 1929) did his M.A. from Santiniketan, West Bengal. A poet of post-Independence Oriya literature, his poems composed in couplets and short stanzas, speak of his deep sense of involvement and personal love. The first collection of his poems, Indrayudha (1961), bears the imprint of his passionate love, intimacy of experience and romantic vision of life. Most of the poems included in this volume are pure lyrics and are rich in visual imagery and symbols. Primarily a lyricist, he also wrote some prose-poems in the sixties. Though he moved away from the pursuit of poetry under the pressure of his duties as Government servant, his earlier compositions bear a testimony to his romantic sensibility.

PARIJATAHARANA (Maithili) is an excellent medieval Maithili drama in the kirtania style. It immensely influenced Maithili playwrights for generations. A number of dramas were produced on its model. The dramatic troupes of medieval Mithila, called 'Kirtanian' (literally, singers of devotional songs in concert), gained great popularity by staging it in public as well as in the private courts of local elites. The tradition of its performance continued as late as the beginning of the present century. The writing of plays on its model ended with the disappearance of the Kirtania troupes and with the advent of the modern period in Maithili literature. This drama was first published in 1893 and more than ten editions have since appeared with translation into English and other Indian languages. Its manuscripts are found scattered all over Mithila.

The author gives his name in the text as Kavi Pandita Mukhya Umapati Upadhyaya, but the identification of this name has been a subject of controversy for long. Now it is accepted, almost unanimously, that the writer belonged to a noble Maithila Brahmana family, called 'Darihare Amaravati'. He was the son of Ratnapati Jha, and was said to be the Guru of the great scholar Gokulanatha Upadhyaya. He was a native of village Koilakh in the district of Madhubani (Bihar). He lived under the patronage of Hindupati Hariharadeva of the Sen dynasty who ruled over a small kingdom called Makmani or Makwanpur in the North-East Nepal terai. As this king is known to have ruled from 1623 yo 1674, the author may have flourished between 1570 and 1670. It is said that he wrote this drama in his old age.

The above information about the author is solely based on the recent study made by Ramdev Jha. Earlier, some scholars held different views about the author. Grierson held him to be a contemporary of the Karnataka king Harisimhadeva (1296-1324), considering the latter to be identical with Hindupati Hariharadeva. Jayakanta Mishra identifies Hindupati with Hindupati Singh of Bundelkhand.

The plot of the drama is drawn from Harivamshapurana, Vishnupurana, and Srimadbhagavatapurana. The first book is the main source. The story is short and simple. Sage Narada comes to see Krishna and presents him a 'Parijata' flower found in the garden of Indra only. Krishna gives it to his senior wife Rukmini. When the news reaches Satyabhama, the second wife of Krishna, her jealousy knows no bounds. Krishna tries his best to soothe her, but finding her adamant, he attacks Indra and brings a parijata flower from his garden and offers it to Satyabhama, who plants it in her garden. Narada appears again to rejoice at this happy turn of events, and asks Satyabhama to gift him something she liked most. For her, it was only Krishna she liked most, and so she gifted him to Narada, who accepted him as his slave. Thereafter Narada sold his valuable slave to Satyabhama for a cow. Thus she regained what she liked most, and the comedy ended there.

Parijataharana, like other dramas of Kirtania type, is a unique combination of three-in-one. It may be acclaimed as a fine piece of poetry. It may be regarded as an opera in as much as it abounds in dance and songs. And above all it is a drama with a well-knit plot, effective characterization and witty dialogue. Unlike the later dramas of this kind it is not deficient in any element essential for a play. In respect of language it shows the author's equal command of Sanskrit, Prakrit and Maithili. Most of the Sanskrit shlokas have been rendered into Maithili songs. The merits of the play have been attested not only by scholars, but by the common people as well with whom it has been popular for so long.

PARIJATAHARANA (Sanskrit) is a 'mahakavya' in Sanskrit by the poet Karnapura of the sixteenth century and based on a story given in Harivamsha. This poem tells of Krishna's attack on Indra in order to get the celestial 'Parijata' tree to be given as a gift to Satyabhama, Krishna's queen, who was earlier offended because Krishna had given away to Rukmini, another queen, a Parijata flower brought to him by the sage Narada. The poem describes with imaginative excellence the different regions of India. It was published in 1956 by Mithila Sanskrit Vidyapitha, Darbhanga.

PARIJATAHARANA-NATA (Assamese). Lakshminath Bezbarua ascribes all the dramatic compositions of Shankaradeva to the saint's final fourteen years' stay at his Patbausi centre. This is perhaps true with the exception of Patni-prasada. Even the detailed Guru-charita-katha is silent on the point of the composition of Parijataharana. The saint's biographer, Ramacharana, however, tells us that a little after his return from the second pilgrimage Shankaradeva wrote and produced on the stage two dramas Janma-yatra and the 'great and peerless' Parijata-harana. Parijataharana is Shankaradeva's masterpiece with its well-developed dialogue, bold and almost realistic characterization, finely developed plot, and humour woven into the very texture of action. The lyrics of the drama, especially the initial bhatima (panegyric, almost an ode) to Krishna, have also a remarkable quality about them. This is possibly the penultimate dramatic composition of the saint, the last being Rama-vijaya. Parijata-harana, like the earlier three dramas written at Patbausi (Kali-damana, Rukmini-harana, and Keli-gopala), was written by him at the suggestion of his cousion, Sri Jagatananda Dalapati.

The full title of the play is Naraka-vadha Parijata-harana-lila-yatra and embodies two incidents in the life of Krishna: the killing of demon Naraka to save the gods from constant consternation and the carrying away of the divine Parijata tree from Indra's garden in order to appease Satyabhama. These two interconnected stories are recounted in the Vishnu-purana, V. (chs. 29-31), the Harivamsha (Vishnu-parvan, chs. 63-77), and the Bhagavata-purana (ch. 59), with slightly differing details. The whole story of Naraka's life is, moreover, given in the Kalika-purana (chs. 36-40). Shankaradeva takes the slender account of the Bhagavata as his main datum and stuffs it full with details from the Harivamsha. He has also accepted several useful suggestions from Shridhara Swami's Bhavartha-dipika.

In the Bhagavata-purana the story of the killing of Naraka is a bit more prominent than the carrying away of the Parijata tree. Krishna goes to heaven with Satyabhama after killing Naraka only with the intention of handing over Aditi's ear-ornament back to her, and wrests the divine flowering tree at his wife's instance. This relation between the two incidents in the plot is a bit altered, and the dramatist relegates the killing of Naraka to the position of a sub-plot or an excitant (Pratimukha) to the main action. It is the character of Satyabhama, the heroine, that welds the two incidents together. In his commentary Shridhara explains that Satyabhama accompanies Krishna in his military expedition against Naraka's capital only out of curiosity, which is roused by Indra's recounting of the miseries of gods to Krishna in her presence. Krishna had told goddess Earth on an earlier occasion that Naraka could not be killed without her permission. The presence of Satyabhama, who is no less than the earth goddess incarnate and whose presence is taken as tantamount to a tacit sanction, is, therefore, necessary. Thirdly, the commentator refers to the Harivamsha account of Krishna's promise to his beloved consort to fetch her the whole Parijata tree. In the drama the two plots are woven together with much skill from the very beginning. In the Harivamsha Satyabhama's jealousy on this account is roused by reports from her handmaids. Shankaradeva did not like to multiply the number of dramatis personae, women characters in particular, and preferred to utilize the services of the intriguing Narada for this purpose. When Satyabhama undergoes indignation, the quarrel-loving Narada informs Krishna that Satyabhama is dying of grief. As the hero tries to appease the heroine in a well-worked-out dialogue, Narada amuses himself by calling Krishna his 'wife's page-boy' tied to her apron-string.

All the details from the original Sanskrit works of the Yadavas' war with Naraka and the asura army concentrate in a few payara verses to form a striking libretto for drama and dance joined in action. When Narada is sent by Krishna to Indra with the request to send the tree for the sake of Satyabhama, 'the lover of quarrels' only succeeds in developing the matter into a tussle between Krishna and Indra, ending in Indra's reverses. Shankaradeva provides a greatly amusing wordy duel between Satyabhama and Shachi, in which the combatants do not refrain from making explicit references to the private life of each other's husband. The Harivamsha describes how the divine tree performs miracles while it is at Dvaraka, how Krishna is tied with a garland of flowers to the Parijata tree and is gifted as a present to Narada, and how the sage, expert at jokes, returns this precious gift to Satyabhama for a milch cow. The story there ends with the return of the tree to heaven and Shankaradeva stops, as does the Bhagavata-purana, with Krishna planting the tree very close to Satyabhama's apartment.

Shankaradeva, it seems, takes much liberty with Narada's character, and his intriguing sage becomes the most prominent character in the drama and even dims the central theme of Krishna's love-quarrel. Satyabhama and Shachi also contribute much to the general hilarity of the play by revealing what is intrinsically feminine, jealousy and lack of tolerance in them. Even Krishna, the sublime hero of the plot, provides some amusement by slipping off his promises.

PARIJATAPAHARANAMU (Telugu) is one of the early prabandhas composed by Timmana under the patronage of Krishnadevaraya. Timmana seems to have derived the basic structure of the story from the Sanskrit original, Harivamsha (chs. 68-76). His contribution to the emergence of the prabandha style lies in the changes and modifications he made to the original. The devoted scholar, Nagapudi Kuppuswamayya, in his introduction to an edition of the work in 1929, brought out the originality of the work by comparing it with the Sanskrit original.

The story of the prabandha commences with the arrival of Narada at the palace of Lord Krishna. Narada presents Krishna a divine flower, 'parijata', and asks him to give it to the wife he loves most. Krishna offers it to Rukmini. When Satyabhama learns about it she is visibly upset. Krishna tries to cajole her, but does not quite succeed. He then promises that he will get her not a mere flower but the parijata tree itself. He sends word to Indra that he will visit Indraloka to return the ornaments of Aditi which Narakasura had stolen from him. On arrival in Indraloka Krishna uproots the parijata tree and tries to take it away. On receiving this news Indra engages Krishna in a war but is routed in the battle. Reaching Dwaraka, Krishna plants the parijata tree in Satyabhama's garden. Narada enters the scene again and advises Satyabhama to perform a 'Punyaka vrata' (a ritual). At the end of the vrata, Narada tells her that, as laid down in the Vedas, she will have to gift him the parijata tree as well as her husband. After a little hesitation, she obeys him. Finally, Narada returns the gifts back to Satyabhama and sings in praise of Lord Krishna.

At variance with the practice of the other poets of his day, Timmana employed easy and familiar language, instead of a remote, high-flown one. The prabandha is also marked by novel features, uncommon in the works of his time. It does not suffer from an overdose of eroticism, as the other poems of the age do. Though he too dwells on details of sex acts, etc, he shows an admirable restraint in dealing with the subject. The work is also rich in dhvani (suggestiveness), considered the hallmark of poetic achievement.

The real asset of Timmana's work is the simplicity, raciness and near conversationality of the style employed. The poet uses effectively words and phrases found in common parlance. Yet another strength of the book is its vivid characterisation. The most memorable character is Satyabhama, who is at once regal, affectionate and self-confident. Krishna is portrayed as a divine and yet a human personality. No less impressive are Narada and Rukmini. All in all, the work has won admiration from discriminating critics for its unity of theme, technique of narration and skill in dialogue, and is considered one of the 'Pancha kavyas' in Telugu.

An early edition of the text with commentary by Nagamaheswara was published in 1861 by Vavilla Ramaswamy Sastrulu. Another edition was brought out by Vedam Venkataraya Sastry. Nagapudi Kuppuswamayya edited the work with Parimalollasa commentary in 1929, reprinted by Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Academy in 1978.

PARIK, SURYAKARAN (Rajasthani; b. 1902, d. 1939) was born at Bikaner, educated at Banaras Hindu University, and worked as Vice-Principal, Birla College, Pilani. He was one of the foremost scholars who worked for the cause of Rajasthani during the initial years of its renaissance. He was a versatile scholar and creative writer. As he believed in team work, he worked in collaboration with two of his colleagues, equally proficient and talented. The old texts edited by this team were Beli Krisna Rukminiri and Dhola maru ra duha. The scholarly introductions, appendices, and variant texts as found in different manuscripts earned these editions wide recognition. Parik also did pioneering work in the field of folk literature. A collection of choicest folk-songs, arranged subject-wise and duly accompanied with a Hindi translation along with a highly informative introduction, was brought out in two parts under the title Rajasthan ke lok git. He also wrote a few articles pertaining to various disciplines of literature. In the field of creative writing, apart from miscellaneous writings, he attempted a one-act play Bolawan, which was highly acclaimed by critics and reproduced in several collections. He has left behind him at Pilani a sound tradition of scholarship in Rajasthani language and literature.

PARIK, SURYASHANKAR (Rajasthani; b. 1922) belongs to Ratangarh in district Churu of Rajasthan. Being a religious preceptor of the 'Jasnathi' school (Nath sampradaya), he is well versed with the tenets of the sect and possesses a considerable knowledge of saint poets, some of them still unknown to scholars. He joined the Bharatiya Vidya Mandir Shodh Pratishthan as a research scholar and was associated with it for over twenty-five years. While working at this Institute, he edited its research journal, Vaichariki. He also edited two texts known as Siddhacharta and Gaura bayavalo. Besides being a scholar, he is a poet of standing and has two collections of poems, Suraj kundalo and Sirloko, and a descriptive poem Dharati to his credit. The cultural ethos of rural Rajasthan has come alive in this long poem. Apart from being a poet, he is also a story-writer and has contributed a number of stories to contemporary periodicals. He has also written a few caricatures and satire. He has been honoured by a number PARIKH, NARAHARI DWARAKADAS (Gujarati): b.1891, d.1957) was a Gujarati prose writer, social and political activist, and a close associate of Mahatma Gandhi. He graduated in 1911 from Gujarat College, Ahmedabad, and took his LL.B. degree from the Government Law College, Bombay. He started practising as a lawyer at Ahmedabad along with Kishorelal Mashruvala, another close associate of Mahatma Gandhi. Both decided to learn the Bengali language in order to translate some works from Bengali into Gujarati, and by 1923 they were able to translate three works of Rabindranath Tagore, namely Chitrangada, Vidya abishapa and Prachina sahitya.

In May 1917, Parikh joined the Mahatma's 'Ashram' at Ahmedabad. He took a leading role in the administration of Gujarat Vidyapith as its first registrar and was responsible for initiating a movement for standardization of spellings in the Gujarati language. He also undertook to propound the Gandhian thought through his books. This led him to write Samyavada ane sarvodaya (1934), Lokapothi (1939), Vardha kelavanino prayoga (1939), Yantrani maryada (1940),Manava arthasastra (1945), and Grama vidyapithani bhumika (1951). In these books he dealt with many economic, social, educational and cultural problems of the day from the Gandhian viewpoint. His major contribution to Gujarati lies in the field of biographies. His Mahadevabhainum purvacharitra (1950), Sardar Vallabhabhai (1950-1952) and Sreyarthini sadhana (1953) are the most authentic biographies of Mahadevabhai Desai, Sardar Vallabhabhai Patel and Kishorelal Mashruvala. His other works include Atalum to Janajo (1923), Purvaranja (1923), Kanyane patro (1933), Sarvodaya samajani jhankhi (1955-56) and Bhudana prashnottari (1955). He has also edited the speeches of Sardar Vallabhabhai Patel and A.M. Desai, and the first six volumes of Mahadevabhaini diary. He was also the editor of Navala granthavali (Selected works of Navalaram Pandya).

PARIKSHA GURU (Hindi), one of the earliest Hindi novels written by Lala Shrinivas Das, was published in 1882. The oft-quoted remark by Acharya Ramchandra Shukla that 'it is the first Hindi novel written after the model of the English novel' has only an iota of truth. Both in its content and in its technique it is more in the tradition of the old moral tales than a work based on the real social and economic problems of society. The title as well as the theme brings home the well-known dictum, "A friend in need is a friend indeed". A rich businessman of Delhi, Madan Mohan, is misled and duped by his selfish friends. Flattered by their eulogies he becomes a debauch, spends money lavishly on wine and women, and turns a pauper. He neither heeds the warnings of his sincere friend, Braj Mohan, nor the earnest pleas of his devoted wife. For insolvency he is put behind the bars and the dishonest friends desert him. Rescued by his true friend and faithful wife, Madan Mohan now sees the truth and repents for his indiscretion and past misdeeds.

The author does not depict life in all its vicissitudes. Impelled by a reformist zeal, he considers society a patient who needs to be cured of his disease. His canvas is narrow and his vision circumscribed. On the one hand he criticises the social and economic evils which are eating into the vitals of society, on the other he suggests a prescription for curing the malady. And being an idealist, he brings the hero back to the right track. In spite of this traditional approach, the novelist does not paint a world of make-believe, romance and chivalry. He is conscious of the world around him. If the hero and his way of life represent the young generation, his father symbolises the old order and the extravagant ways of the upper business classes.

The characters of the novel are stereotype. They are not individuals but types exhibiting the characteristics of their class. Most of them are flat characters, except perhaps the hero who is a round character. The change that occurs in him is neither sudden nor abrupt and though motivated by the writer's faith in old moral values, it has some psychological basis.

The dialogues in the novel are lengthy and didactic and are designed to give moral sermons. They neither serve to throw light on the characters nor do they help to develop the plot. As regards technique, however, the author deserves praise for making use of scenes and situations to develop the plot. Though he does not present the whole plot through scenes, as Tolstoy does in Anna Karenina, yet the few scenes employed by him give a dramatic effect. Looking at the age in which Pariksha guru was written, it was certainly a bold attempt and gave a new direction to Hindi fiction.

PARIMAL (Hindi), a collection of Suryakant Tripathi Nirala's poems, has a historical importance in the development of modern Hindi poetry. Published in 1929, it introduced a new idiom in the poetry of the chhayavadi era. It breaks away from the prosaic narrativeness of the early twentieth-century poetry and combines creative imagination with a message of human liberty. The sensibility of these poems is formed by the desire for freedom, love of nature, self-conflict and self-realisation, and experiment in free verse. The creativity of Khariboli poetry reveals itself with great intensity and warmth of feeling in Parimal. Here we have such poems as 'Tum aur main', 'Yamuna ke prati', 'Vasanti', 'Tarangon ke prati', 'Bhikshuk', 'Vidhava', 'Sandhya sundari', 'Juhi ki kali', 'Badal rag', etc., which made a tremendous impact on Hindi poetry. In these poems we see Chhayavad and Pragativad breaking their frontiers and coalescing with each other. In the preface to Parimal Nirala discusses the new trends of poetry, and expresses his ideas about the 'openness' of content, free flow of poetic consciousness, creativity and tradition, and innovations in verse (mukta chhanda). Historically, the preface to Parimal has the same importance in Hindi literature as Sumitranandan Pant's preface to Pallav has.

The poems have been grouped in three sections. The poems of the first section—'Maun', 'Kheva', 'Nivedan', 'Prarthana', 'Khoj aur upahar', 'Yamuna ke prati', 'Priya ke prati', 'Bhramargit', 'Paras', 'Tum aur main', 'Jalad ke prati' etc.—have a perfect harmony of emotive power and imagination and the beauty of lyrical poetry. In the poems of the second section—'Bhar dete ho', 'Swagat', 'Dhwani', 'Vidhava', 'Kavita', 'Bhikshuk', 'Sandhya sundari', 'Git', 'Din', 'Sharat purnima ki vidayi', 'Prapat ke prati', 'Badal rag'—the note of self-expression is mingled with social and political consciousness, though their lyrical quality remains unhampered. The poems of the third section are in 'Mukta chhand'; the very first poem here, 'Juhi ki kali', was regarded as a pioneer of free verse in Hindi poetry. The other important poems of this section are 'Jagrati main supti main;, 'Shephalika', 'Rekha', 'Jago phir ek bar', 'Kavi', 'Smriti chumban', 'Maharaj Shivaji ka patra', 'Panchavati prasang' and 'Jagaran'.

The poems like 'Badal rag', 'Yamuna ke prati', 'Sandhya sundari' and 'Jago phir ek bar' reflect the voice of the renaissance directly, while the poems like 'Bhikshuk' and 'Vidhava' are an impassioned plea against social inequalities. For Nirala, freedom from the bondage of metre was synonymous with human liberty. He argues that in the free verse of Vedic literature one can see the liberated human mind of the age. In the later ages conventions dominated poetry. When the mind is free it is able to create infinite beauty. Therefore, he tries to give new dimensions to the content, imagery, language and metre of poetry. Parimal is, indeed, a landmark in the development of Hindi poetry. It enshrines the voice of liberty and ushers in a new awakening, a new sensibility towards nature, a new vision of man, and freedom from bondage of poetic conventions.

PARIMALA (Oriya; 16th c.), is a famous 'akhyaika kavya' by Narasimha Sena and is probably the longest literary work of that period. Named after its heroine Princess Parimala of Kanchi, described as an incarnation of Tilottama, the celestial nymph, the poem is in twenty-four cantos written in different metres. A child, the princess is betrothed to Makaraketu, the Prince of Dharmavati, but as she grows up, she comes under the charm of Gandharva Chitraratha, her celestial lover, who had arranged for her journey every night to and from his heavenly abode. She however, vows to Makaraketu that she will accept him as her husband if he produced evidence of his own visit to heaven. After marrying the princess, Makaraketu, who had accepted her condition, is in distress. Unnoticed by Makarketu, Parimala still continues with her nocturnal journey to Chitraratha's abode. At last the unhappy prince pleases a mendicant by telling him the truth, who advises him to bear with his wife's conduct in his own interest and gives him a charm which can turn him into a black-bee. He boards Chitraratha's chariot and flies to heaven, from where he returns with a 'parijata' flower as evidence. Thus the two are united, but soon at the close of the period of her curse, Tilottama returns to heaven, still pining for the prince. Many curious supernatural events follow, and finally, through the good grace of Lord Krishna and his own powers as musician, Makaraketu is able to please Indra, king of gods, and win Tilottama in the guise of Parimala and bring her back to earth again.

The complicated fiction on which this voluminous kavya is made is a testimony to the poet's power of imagination. The dramatic and supernatural events follow in quick succession to create suspense while, with the final aim to produce 'shringara rasa', the poet utilises every occasion to dwell on the details of mirth and pangs of love, rendering his narrative grossly sexual at places. Parimala is an unconventional character, simultaneously satisfying her two lovers, who strangely tolerate the other's intimacy with her. The poet's inspiration for working upon such a theme of 'parakiya nayika' was evidently derived from his religious devotion to the cult of Radha-Krishna. But the detailed analysis of love, the descriptions enriched with simple figures of speech of the ornate type, the depiction of the beauties of seasons and nature affecting a lover's life were great pioneering trends, the influence of which can be easily seen even in the highly developed 'riti kavyas' of the later centuries.

PARIMELALAGAR (Tamil; 13th c.) wrote his famous commentary on Thiruvalluvar's classic Thirukkural, a small work of maxims or aphorisms on ethics, polity and love, written sometime between the 2nd and the 6th century AD. Thirukkural, acclaimed as a 'Marainool' (Veda) is known for its precision, brevity of expression and choice of diction. It encompasses within its small canvas of three chapters of 1330 kurals (two-line verses) a wide expanse of topics ranging from norms of ethics, statecraft and pre-marital love. It presents a synthesis of all religious philosophies into a weltenschauung, adapting Kautilya, Manu, Vatsyayana and a host of others to Tamil ethos, with a genius all his own, a magic of transforming a Vatsyayana's erotics into a refined teaching full of grace and delicacy, a Kautilya's cold and calculating statecraft into one of an ennobling human concern and the hierarchical order of Manu into a philosophy of human brotherhood.

Ever since its appearance, Thirukkural took the Tamil literary and scholastic world by storm. Valluvar was acclaimed and venerated as a Daivapulavar (divine poet); an anthology of eulogistic verses Thiruvalluva malai came out in the eleventh century, and Valluvar became a personification of wisdom, a teacher par excellence.

When Parimelalagar, an orthodox Brahmin scholar came to work on his commentary in the later half of the thirteenth century on this work of Valluvar, a Jaina, as many as nine commentaries had already been written and Parimelalagar's was the tenth. Of these old commentaries only five have survived and the rest have been lost. And Parimelalagar's is far superior to the rest, having been the most talked about, widely read and quoted. It has been largely responsible for the widespread dissemination of Valluvar's couplets and his ideas. No other commentary in Tamil history has this unique distinction.

Parimelalagar, whom his parents named Vanthuvarai Perumal Dadar, was a Vaishnavite priest at the Ulagalandar Perumal temple in Kanchi. There is inscriptional evidence that talks of him and his service at the temple. It also seems, he lived in Okkur, somewhere near Madurai, in his early days as there is literary evidence to show that he was honoured by the Pandya king of his time.

His commentary shows that he took up his task well equipped, possessing all the qualities for which Thiruvalluvar himself is famed. His knowledge of the world of letters and of life on earth was of encyclopaedic dimensions. He could talk extensively and in depth on army formations, Yoga, Aghamas, dietary norms, ragas, farming, statecraft, polity, love, etc. Talking of love, he can refer to the Sanskrit work, Shringara prakasha of Bhoja, the king of Dhara. When talking of army formations, he is capable of reeling: it consists of seven constituent units, from 'uram' to 'kodi'; it is of four kinds, and there are thirty ways of organizing a formation. Talking of religion and yoga, he can talk of 'sankhya','arahat', 'vaisheshika', 'aghamas', 'ashtanga yoga' and so on. He can command at will the entire accumulated wealth of knowledge on philosophy, grammar, religion and literature available in Tamil and Sanskrit while writing his commentary.

Like Valluvar's work, Parimelalagar's commentary also is characterised by qualities of clarity, economy in expression, precision and choice of diction, and above all a masterly effort at compressing a wealth of details. In a large measure he would incorporate in his commentary lines of other poets, works which serve the twin purpose of illustration as well as brevity of expression, besides giving us the pleasure, the rhythmic flow of poetry.

He was a devout orthodox Vaishnavite. He lived at a time marked by religious animosities. Sanskrit had made its deep inroads into Tamil language and literature, stepping beyond the point of a synthesis. Use of Sanskrit words was carried to the extreme in the 'manipravala' style. Though Veera choliyam, a grammatical work of eleventh century, sanctioned it, which goes to show that it must have had an earlier beginning, yet from the 11th century onwards it was made into an obsession by the Vaishnavite Acharyas for their commentaries on Alwar hymns. But Parimelalagar stood apart from these dominant influences. His catholicity made him feel at home with Shaiva Aghamas, Jaina philosophy, etc. His reverence for Valluvar, a Jaina, was immense. He wrote in a natural flow of vibrant Tamil. One may of course see that he was but a product of his time as may be discerned in some minor respects, though largely he rose above his time. One may strain oneself to pick holes in his commentary, the holes that look repugnant to men of our times. But then, Parimelalagar was of the thirteenth century , writing about a work of the sixth century, trying his best to understand the ethos and the thought processes of a sixth century Valluvar and in that he famously succeeds in communicating it to us in the twentieth century.

Parimelalagar is credited with commentaries of two more works: Paripadal and Thirumurugattrupadai.

Paripadal, a seventh century work, is one of the eight Sangam anthologies grouped together as Ettutthogai; it was originally a collection of seventy long lyrics by different poets, meant to be sung. In a colophon under each lyric is given the name of the raga in which it is set and the musician who set it to music. Of these only twenty-two have survived and the fragments of a few of the rest have been culled out from the commentaries of other works found there as illustrations. They were composed in praise of Vishnu, Murugan, Kali, Madurai, and river Vaigai. Who were the authors of these lyrics and who collected them into an anthology is, however, not known.

These lyrics are in the nature of songs to be sung by the wandering bands of musicians. The prefatory verse to this anthology speaks of the neglect these lyrics suffered, the corruptions and interpolations that had crept into them and the threatening conditions of their imminent and irretrievable loss. It also talks of how Parimelalagar rescued them from obscurity, retrieved their original version while editing them and also wrote a commentary with his characteristic stamp of scholarship.

But only twenty-two of these seventy lyrics have come down to us with Parimelalagar's commentary. When U.V.Swaminatha Iyer once again sought to rescue them from obscurity towards the end of the last century, he could get only twenty-two of them. These songs give us a panorama, rich in detail, of the social life of the Tamils, their customs, daily chores, rites, etc. This time was particularly marked by a meeting of two cultures of North and South and was in the process of evolving a synthesis, and Parimelalagar's commentary throws open a window on the ongoing process of that synthesis.

Thirumurugatru padai was the next work on which he is said to have worked. This long poem of 317 lines in 'ahaval' metre (blank verse) belongs to the Sangam anthology of ten idylls (Pattuppattu). Not all the ten are of the same period. Thirumurugatru padai seems to be a later addition to the anthology. Though Atrupadai as a genre of poetic composition is dealt in Tolkappiyam, the kind of work Thirumurugatrupadai is, was not contemplated in Tolkappiyar's scheme of things. 'Atrupadai' means 'setting one on the path'. It is in the form of one band of wandering musicians who, upon encountering on their way another band of starving musicians, extol the munificence of the king from whom they have just returned loaded with gifts and direct them to that patron-king to receive a similar shower of gifts. Here in Thirumurugatru padai, the author Nakkirar (different from his homonymous author of Nedunalvadai, another work in the Pattuppattu collection) instead directs a devotee to his favourite deity, Murugan on the Hills of Thiruparankundram. Besides, this is the only work of Sangam period that has been included as one of the Shaiva 'Thirumaraigal' (Shaivite sacred works). This canonization came about centuries later in the eleventh century.

Some scholars dispute the attribution of this commentary to Parimelalagar. Could he, a devout Vaishnavite, work on a Shaivite devotional poem? But then, Parimelalagar has shown his catholicity with his monumental commentary on a Jaina's (Valluvar) work. There is another ground advanced that this commentary on Thirumurugatrupadai does not equal those of Paripadal or Thirukkural in scholarship and depth. However, this is of only historical interest as this work has been overshadowed by the commentary of another distinguished fifteenth century commentator, Nachchinarkkiniyar.

PARINDE (Hindi) is a collection of short stories by Nirmal Verma, published in 1960. Its historical importance lies in the fact that it gave a new idiom to the 'Nai kahani' movement in Hindi fiction. The collection contains seven short stories, namely 'Diary ka khel', 'Maya ka marm', 'Tisara gavah', 'Andhere mein', 'Picture postcards', 'Sitambar ki ek sham' and 'Parinde'. Most of these stories are subjective, showing the mental torture and alienation of the modern individual. The intensity of emotions and experiences of human life are finely woven into symbols. The most successful short story from this point of view is 'Parinde'.

Nirmal's writings have often been charged with exoticism; basically, in fact, they belong to the Indian psyche. The subtle reality in the story 'Parinde' originates from the agony of human heart. The plot skirts round the hostel of a convent school, military cantonment and the Christian environment of a town in which every character seems to be anglicised. In this setting Latika, the heroine of the story, passes her life in anguish with a certain nostalgia for the past. Her past so dominates her present that she cannot—she will not—get out of her self-torture. The story does not have many events. Basically it catches a mood, a feeling of loneliness which deepens her belief that the birds that fly in the sky will reach out to unknown lands, but for her there is no movement beyond. Thus the story centres on a single and profound emotion which creates a lasting impact on the reader.

The other stories of the collection create almost the same impact. This impact in itself is so overwhelming that one tends to overlook the plot and characters. Apparently, the author concentrates on the unity of effect: the plot and characters are there to build it up. The atmosphere absorbs them.

These stories also bring out a certain correspondence between men and nature. In 'Parinde' the chattering of the playing girls and the sound of the cascade are mingled in an effect which takes Latika into a flashback of memories. Music plays an important role in most of these stories. It is not only a device for creating atmosphere, but rather a part of the artistic process of the story itself by creating a sense of harmony with the situation.

All the stories in the collection are based on the memories of the past. In some of them the character recalls them after several long years. At the end of 'Diary ka khel' the narrator says: "Aaj is baat ko beete anek sal guzar chuke hain" (Many years have passed since this happened). The narrator of 'Tisara gavah' also tells the tale of his youth after years have passed. It seems that the author uses the device of time-gap in order to reduce the impact of immediacy, so that the intensity of emotion, as it reaches out to the reader, gets decanted. The narrator in 'Diary ka khel' says: "Atit samay ke sang jura hai, isliye chetana nahin deta, kewal sentimental banata hai. Jo chetana deta hai vah kalatit hai". (The past is linked up with time. It does not give consciousness, only makes you sentimental. What creates consciousness is timeless).

In the stories which are not reminiscences of the past, the narrator is absolutely the witness of the whole situation. The narrator of 'Andhere mein' is a small child who tells the sad story about his mother. 'Maya ka marm' and 'Sitambar ki ek sham' have events of the near past. Here the narrator is a part of the event but he is not emotionally involved in it. What is especial about these stories is that in moments of deep emotion the characters become silent. Their silence is like the silence of an organ which can be broken by a delicate touch of fingers. When Nirmal talks about something pathetic he is not sentimental. Rather, he tries to achieve a balance between language and emotion, keeping himself objective. In his art of story telling there is an emotional as well as an artistic equilibrium. He is not a mere formalist but a fiction writer who communicates the depth of emotion in a language which moves the reader through an inter-texture of imagery, symbols and unity of effect.

PARIPADAL (Tamil) is one of the eight collective works, called Ettuttokai, and is a collection of seventy poems by poets from the first to the third century A.D. Out of these seventy songs thirty-one are on Muruga, the younger son of Shiva, eight on Vishnu, one on Durga, four on the temple city of Madurai and twenty-six on the river Vaigai in Madurai. Out of these seventy songs only the first twenty-two are available—eight on Muruga, eight on Vaigai and six on Vishnu.

The author of the very first paripadal is unknown. The other twenty-one poems are composed by thirteen authors. Some of the poems on Murugan and Vishnu are composed by the same author which exhibit the formation of Shankara Narayanam (the Hindu credo) in the ancient time itself. Some of the authors made their contribution to other collective works like Kalittokai, Kuruntokai, Natrinai and Purananooru.

The six poems on Vishnu describe the various births of the Lord as Varaha, Vamana, Narasimha, Rama, Balarama and Krishna and his wars with the demons. His incarnation as Narasimha is described in detail. Many other puranic stories like Garuda's bringing the pot of nectar to relieve his mother from bonds of slavery and Adishesha becoming the string for the mountain bent as bow by Shiva while destroying the Tripura are described at length. These paripadals bring out the philosophy of Shaiva Siddhanta that the Almighty resides in everything but also transcends everything. He is beyond the perception of words, thoughts and deeds; and that all the worlds originated in Him and will end in Him.

The songs on Muruga give a detailed account of the deity from His birth to His marriage with Devasena and Valli, and His killing of Tarakasura and Padmasura. According to the Tamil tradition Muruga was born from the fire of the third eye of Shiva. But in Paripadal the author seems to have accepted the version given in the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. The war with Indra is also derived completely from the Mahabharata.

The songs give a detailed account of temple worship. Except the fifth one, all other poems are on the temple at Thirupparangundram near Madurai. Apart from details like the king's worship at the temple and devotees performing sacred rites and offering prayers, we find descriptions of festivals, rituals, tree worship, animal worship etc. as well. These paripadals also tell us about the paintings in the temple where scenes from the Ramayana and other puranic stories are delineated.

The paripadals on Vishnu and Muruga exhibit pure devotion to God. Some of the incidents, described in the poems, reveal the popularity of the epics, sometimes even disregarding the native tradition.

There are eight poems on the Vaigai river. They describe the flow of the river carrying flowers, sandal wood and many other objects from the mountain, and tell us about people bathing in the river and offering prayers. Several festivals like Thiruvadirai, Thiruvembavai and Aviniavittam are also described. The movement of the planets and the position of the zodiac signs are also described at length and one of the poems explains the sanctity of the Vaigai river.

PARITHIMAR KALAIGNAR (Tamil; b. 1870. d. 1903) was born in Vilacheri near Madurai. He learnt Sanskrit under his father, and Tamil under Madurai Sabapati Mudaliar. He was educated at the Madras Christian College and took his B.A. degree in 1892 in Tamil and Philosophy. The then Principal, Miller, recognised his capabilities and offered him a lecturer's post in Philosophy.

Parithimar was a poet, dramatist and journalist of no mean order. Even as a student, he contributed literary articles to the Viveka chintamani. He composed random poetical pieces under the pseudonym Parithimar Kalaignar, in the Sangam classical pattern. These sonnets were compiled later as Thani pasura tokai. Many of these pieces were rendered into English by G.U. Pope. The Poets' Feast or Pavalar virundu is a collection of his poetic pieces on various subjects. Many of his 'chitra kavis' have been collected and published. M.S. Purnalingam Pillai and he were joint editors of Jnana bodhini, a Tamil monthly.

Some of his famous works are History of the Tamil Language, History of Tamil Poets and Essays in Tamil. Having felt the need for a book on dramaturgy in Tamil, he seriously applied himself to the task of writing it. After making an in-depth study of drama in English, Tamil and Sanskrit, he brought out a book called Nataka iyal.

His plays are three in number—Rupavati, Kalavati and Mana vijayam. The first two have a judicious mixture of prose and poetry, and the last is a one-act play, based on the story of Kala vazhi narpathu. His other works include Maniya Sivanar charitram, Malapanchakam, Mathivanan and Mudrarakshasam. His devotion to Tamil is evident in his works. He even changed his Sanskrit name Suryanarayana Sastry to Parithimar Kalaignar. He had his admires in G.U. Pope, F.W. Kellett and Miller.

PARIVARA (Pali) is the third book of Vinayapitaka and is a code of monastic rules and regulations. It is a kind of manual compiled in the form of questions and answers. As Rhys Davids observes: "Parivara provides a very interesting evidence of early methods of education."

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The text in question appears to be of late origin and is believed to have been the work of a Singhalese monk called Dipa.

The literal meaning of the word 'Parivara' is family, circle, or brief exposition, but in the real sense it should be understood as an appendix to the monastic rules discussed in all the four texts of the Vinayapitaka, namely 'Mahavagga', 'Chullavagga', 'Parajika', and 'Pachittiya'.

There are two editions of the book in question, viz., in Roman and in Devanagari scripts. In the Roman edition, this book has nineteen chapters which reflect the subject-matter of the Vinayapitaka in a lucid and simple style. However, the Devanagari edition contains twenty-one chapters dealing with a particular subject of the Vinaya.

The authorship of Dipa is, however, doubtful, since the exact time and period of the composition of the work is still undecided. According to Bhikshu Jagdish Kashyap Parivara brings out the fact that scriptures were subsequently reduced to writing in 'sutta' form.It also reveals the name of twenty-nine Singhalese monks who explained Vinayapitaka in the island and propagated the code of discipline as laid down in the Dharma.

In short, Parivara comprises nineteen brief texts, catechisms, indices, appendices, lists and so on, very similar to the 'anukramanika' and 'parisishta' of the Veda and Vedanga texts.

PARMANAND MEWARAM (Sindhi; b. 1865, d. 1938) was born in an enlightened Hindu family of Hyderabad, Sindh. Parmanand had from the very outset Christian virtues and leanings. He joined government service but resigned after a couple of years. He also served as a school teacher for a short period. It was out of conviction that he chose to embrace Christianity which, according to him, was a religion of love, charity, selfless service and tolerance. With a kindly countenance and reverential beard, he looked like a portrait carved out of the Old Testament. He preferred to remain celibate throughout his life and lived in a simple style in a small and humble house, going for prayers regularly to Church even in his advanced years.

The adage 'Style is the man' was truly applicable to him. As his life, so was his style—simple, chaste and unadorned and yet so beautiful. 'Here is our Addison', proclaimed Bherumal Meharchand, another immortal in Sindhi literature. This perhaps was due to Biblical influence. The language of the Bible, it seems, had penetrated his soul, its reflection manifesting itself in his style.

The Sindhis owe an eternal debt to him because of his two dictionaries, Sindhi to English Dictionary (1910) and English to Sindhi Dictionary (1933). The latter was recently reprinted by the Sahitya Akademi in 1971, and the former by the Ministry of Education and Social Welfare in 1977.

Parmanand started his famous literary fortnightly Jote in 1986. Unique was its literary flavour and no less delightful were its contents. For full four decades this literary patriarch bestowed on us his learned and moral beneficence through the medium of his Jote, which literally means 'Light'. This light lasted till there was life in him. Its Golden Jubilee was celebrated in 1946 in Hyderabad (Sindh) by one of his disciples who continued to edit it.

Parmanand brought out two volumes under the title Gula Phula, the first in 1925, and the second in 1936 just before his death. These two volumes are literary essays of rare value.

As early as 1912, Parmanand had also collected his writings in Jote and published them in four volumes under the title Dil Bahar (Heart's spring). They really made the hearts of men, women and children bloom because of their humorous jokes, delightful anecdotes, and literary and philosophical reflections of a very high order.

Parmanand's Christian zeal and spiritual fervour are truly reflected in his Sindhi version of The Imitation of Christ (Thomas-a-Kempis). It appeared in 1923 under the title Christa ji pairavi. Another brief volume, Lady of Lourdes under the title of Loord ji nari, was published in 1923.

Parmanand used to move about in the countryside to understand the language spoken by the village folks. Thus, he widened his knowledge of language and cultivated the simplicity of the common people.

PARMAR, DESHALJI KAHANJI (Gujarati; b. 1884, d. 1966) was a poet. He got his B.A. degree from Bhavnagar in 1916. He worked as a teacher for a very long time at Vanita Vishram (Ahmedabad) and made a significant contribution to the growth and development of the institution.

Some of the better known collections of his poems are Galgota (1930), Tahouka (1931), Gaurina geeta and Uttarayan (1954). These songs for children are marked by melody and metrical perfection.

The range and style of his poetry show the influence of such technicians as Nanalal and B.K. Thakore, as also the impact of Sri Aurobindo and Gandhiji. His poetry is remarkable in view of his efficient handling of metres and apt use of similes and metaphors, vivid description of nature, colourful imagination and the element of music.

PARNAKUTI (Kannada) is a prose work (1947) by Siddavanahalli Krishna Sharma. A masterpiece of modern Kannada prose, the book defies classification. It is about Mahatma Gandhi; it is neither biography nor pen-portrait. It recreates the very world of the Mahatma. It captures the personality of Gandhiji with its many facets and its baffling combination of gentleness and firmness. It sees him against the background of Indian religious and cultural heritage, illuminated by Buddha, Rama and Krishna. Prayer is seen as the very source of Gandhiji's being and work. It recreates for the reader the integrated personality of the Mahatma. Krishna Sharma has the rare art of presenting abstract thought through concrete images. The style is vivid, evocative and concrete.

PARODY (Bengali) or 'Lalika' as it is sometimes called in Bengali is an imitation, in humorous or ludicrous style, of a serious writing. It is normally a kind of caricature and is regarded as an inferior form of writing. Though there are innumerable parodies in Bengali, most of them are inconsequent, for only a few of them fulfil the conditions of a genuine work of art. A parody writer often performs the task of a literary critic, and underlines the oddity of a writer whom he seeks to parody. An author often consciously or unconsciously indulges in mannerism of one kind or another. Such mannerism often forms the target of a parody which exposes or ridicules it.

The first significant work of parody is possibly Chhuchchhundari badh kabya by Jagadbandhu Bhadra who imitated Meghanadbadh kabya. Its object was to ridicule the blank verse (amitrakshar) which Madhusudan had forged for his epic. Chhuchchhundari badh, first published in Amritabazar Patrika, is not altogether devoid of literary merit.

The next important writer of parody was Indranath Banerjee (1849-1911) who wrote Bharat-uddhar kabya with the same intention of ridiculing the use of blank verse which had assumed a ridiculous proportion in Bengali literature of his time. Indranath Banerjee is more known by his pseudonym Panchananda or Panchu Thakur.

Yet another poet, who assumed the pseudonym of Mahakabi Dhurjati, wrote his work Ekadash avatar to ridicule the style of Meghnadbadh. No more details are available about the poet.

Amritalal Basu (1853-1929) wrote a number of parodies, but in most of them farcical elements predominate. Though attributed the title of 'Rasaraj', Amritalal's ability as litterateur was limited.

Even poet Rabindranath could not escape imitation by the parody writers. When Kadi-o-komal was published, Kaliprasanna Vidyabisharad ridiculed it through a satirical version entitled Mithey-kada (1888). Kaliprasanna used Rahu as his pseudonym which intends a dig at Tagore's name Rabi. Rabindranath was much hurt by this overture.

The same Kadi-o-komal again became the subject of a satirical attack by D.L. Roy, when the latter wrote his farce, Ananda Bidai (1912). The admirers of Tagore were much infuriated when the drama was staged, and because of their violent protest the performance was abandoned.

Taking the cue from D.L. Roy, Satish Chandra Ghatak followed the tradition of writing satirical parodies. The first poem in his Ranga byanga imitates D.L. Roy's 'Dhana dhanye pushpe bhara.'

Banabihari Mukherjee (1886), a physician by profession, was a litterateur as well as an artist. He has a number of satirical poems to his credit, of which a parody of Tagore's 'Madan bhasmer par' is worth mentioning. This piece of parody was published in Bangabani Patrika.

Mention should also be made of Bipin Chandra Paul who earned reputation as a severe critic of Tagore. In 1914 Sabujpatra published Tagore's short story, 'Strir patra' which boldly propagated the cause of liberation and self-assertion of women. Bipin Chandra did not like the theme and countered by writing 'Mrinaler patra', a short story published in Narayana in the same year. In the story Bipin Chandra portrayed a subdued Mrinal who had to come back to her family, which she had left in disgust. Bipinchandra added Browning's poem—'In a Balcony' to the story to augment the satirical effect, and even Tagore's name is used in the story to affront him directly.

Jatindranath Sengupta was the foremost amongst the group of young poets who deliberately shunned the poetic tradition of Tagore. In fact, a group of young poets used the anti-Tagore stance as a gimick to emphasise their spirit of self-assertion. Jatindranath, though at heart an admirer of Tagore, could not help identifying himself with this young group. He earned the praise of the anti-Tagore camp by satirically imitating a famous poem of Tagore. In his poem Jatindranath ridiculed Tagore's attempt to romanticise the autumnal nature.

In 1915, a literary circle came into prominence in Calcutta. Foremost amongst its members were Ajit Chakravarti, Kalidas Nag and Sukumar Roy to be joined soon by some other like-minded people. The circle came to be known as 'Monday club'. Centring around this club a literary atmosphere grew where caricature, farce and satire occupied a distinguished position. Sukumar Roy was the central figure of this circle and he wrote a nice parody of Tagore's famous song, 'Megh balechhe jaba jaba', where Tagore's romantic depictions were replaced by a number of edibles. 'Kyabaler patra' is another parody of Sukumar Roy.

Pramatha Choudhury initiated a noble prose style essentially stuffed with some discernible mannerisms. This also became a target of Sukumar Roy's parody.

Satyendranath Dutta ventured to write satirical prose and poetry with the determined resolve to affront the anti-Tagore camp. He did not spare D.L. Roy, Bipin Chandra Paul and some other followers. Hasantika, an anthology of his satitical and humorous poems, is the last published work in his life-time. The poems essentially deal with contemporary happenings and characters. With the passage of time the appeal of most of them has already got faded. However, an imitation ofJayadeva's 'Dashabatar stotra', 'Ambad-sambara kabya' is a parody of Madhusudan's blank verse. Sarbashi, a humorous imitation of Tagore's Urbashi and some parody songs incorporated in Madiramangal and Gandhamadan still deserve to be mentioned.

Shanibarer chithi, a Bengali periodical, was published in 1924. Sajanikanta Das was its editor and the sole guiding spirit. The main objective of Shanibarer chithi was to launch a sustained aggressive campaign against the modern group of contemporary writers. Some of his parodies were quite a success, and they served the purpose they were meant for. Shanibarer chithi inspired Balaichand Mukhopadhyaya (Banaphul) and some others. But they are more satires than parodies.

In Bengali literature, the tradition of parody writing has failed to leave behind a permanent legacy. In fact, in contemporary Bengali literature parody is a forgotten form of art.

PARODY (Hindi) is an English term adopted as it is in Hindi literature. It connotes, as Webster remarked, a literary work characterized by the reproduction of the stylistic peculiarities of an author and his work for comic effect or ridicule. The comic effect is produced ordinarily by giving a light turn to a serious mood. It is a kind of 'Vidamban' kavya, and can be fully enjoyed only by one who has read the original. The easiest kind of parody is literal; the other kinds relate to form or sentiments.

Bharatendu Harishchandra (1850-1885) wrote a parody on the style of a 'churanwalla' (one who sells digestive powder): "He who eats this churan can digest heavy bribes; all businessmen eat it and so they digest money deposited with them." Ishwariprasad Sharma wrote a parody on the style of Tulsi's Ramacharitamanas, e.g: "The clouds are roaring in the sky, and without money my heart is beating loudly." Even Harishankar Sharma parodied Tulsi. Another poet, Kantaprasad Pandey 'Chonch' (1914-1972), made a significant contribution as a parodist by parodying both the ancient and the modern Hindi poets. His parody of Haldighati is quite well-known. Brajkishore Chaturvedi, under the pen-name of 'Mister Chukander' wrote parodies. 'Bedhab Banarasi' (1895-1968), Mohanlal Gupta 'Bhaiyaji Banarasi', 'Bedhadak Banarasi', Vijaydev Narain Sahi, Barsanelal Chaturvedi, Shrinarayan Chaturvedi, Shardaprasad Verma 'Bhushandi', Om Prakash 'Aditya', are some of those writers who have enriched this form. Take for example the parody by Barsanelal of a few lines from Yashodhara by Maithilisharan Gupta. In Gupta, Yashodhara is unhappy because her husband left the palace without even telling her. Barsane parodies:

> Lakhana cinema pati gaye, nahin acharaj ki baat
> Par chori chori gaye yahi bara vyaghat.
> Sakhi ve mujhese kahkar jate.

(I am not surprised if my husband went to see a film, but what pains me most is that he went away stealthily. He could have at least taken me into confidence)

Ba.C.

PARODY (Kannada). The term originally comes from Greek, which means 'counter-song', or a burlesque song or poem. In modern times it has come to mean a humorous or satirical imitation of a serious piece of literature, musical composition, person, event, etc. It refers to the comic art, especially, literary and dramatic, in which something is made to look ridiculous by ludicrous exaggeration. The main feature of parody is the disparity between the theme and the treatment. The earliest example of parody in Kannada, perhaps, is S.G.Narasimhachar's 'Nagegadalu'. The story of the foolish Guru and his simpleton disciples, like Cervantes's Don Quixote is a take-off on the popular romances of the time. Its greatness is evidenced by the fact that the comic imitation has endured the test of time while the 'original' has been forgotten. This comic form seems to have attracted writers from Kailasam onwards to those who contributed to the columns of Koravanji, a monthly (1942-66). T.P. Kailasam's 'Namkampni' or 'Shoorpanaka kula vaibhava', and Sriranga's 'Sampushta Ramayana' were deliberate burlesques meant to ridicule the melodramatic excesses of the popular professional theatre. Some of the famous poems of Kannada poets were parodied much to the amusement of the poets themselves. Since the parodists meant no disrespect to the original, no offence was taken. In fact D.R.Bendre parodied his own poem 'Hakki harutide nodidira', when he composed its comic counterpart 'Bekku harutide nodidira.' While writers like N. Kasturi, Dasarathi Dixit, T.S.R. Rao and others kept up the 'Koravanji' tradition, G.P.Rajaratnam brought out his unforgettable piece, Mahakavi purusha saraswati. It was occasioned by the trivial controversy raised by some writers about the appropriateness (or otherwise) of using the letter 'na' in the word 'Karnataka', Rajaratnam's 'Karnanatakapurana' or 'Nathwodhara' shook the incident out of sense into glorious nonsense. What began as an exercise in triviality ended up as a display of virtuosity.

PARODY (Kashmiri). Burlesque imitation of verses in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kashmiri is more than 150 years old when two contemporary writers, Rasool Mir and Abdul Ahad Nazim ridiculed each other's verses to exhibit their excellence. Nazim's parody of a famous poem of Mahmood Gami (d. 1855) 'Tamsil-i-adam pritshom, hubabas rindu chuk zindu kethu alias suty', has been recorded by Abdul Ahad Azad in his Kashmiri jahan aur shairi. Azad has also written parodies of the popular songs of Mahjoor. Literary parodies are an old phenomenon in literature. The Kashmiri equivalent for parody is 'Laugun', a sub-genre of wit and humour. 'Bait-baazi' is yet another term used to carry the meaning of parody to some extent. Wit and humour are the basic elements of parody. Maximum possible results are obtained by a minimum possible use of words. A burlseque imitation is but natural and instinctive. A parody can be a literal one, just playing with words, satirical, humorous and entertaining. It cannot be aimless or ambiguous without any directive. It has to be subtle and precise. A standard parody is a good means of breaking the monotony of life. It can serve as constructive criticism and get one to the right track.

There are some writers worth mentioning, whose contribution may be scanty quantitatively, but qualitatively significant. Qazi Ghulam Mohammad (b. 1937), known for his subtle wit and humour in Urdu, has written some successful parodies in Kashmiri, such as 'Gagras' 'Chhas Khotsaniye', 'Nazr-e-Mahmood Gami'. Here is an example of his parody of Abdul Ahad Azad's lines: 'Qadman ha chashumu wathrawai madno/Lalan ha malu Karanawai madno'. Abdul Rehman Azad (b.1934), is another talented poet who shows elements of satire and irony in his poems. He has many excellent parodies to his credit on the verses of Abdul Rehman Rahi (b. 1924), Gulam Nabi Gauhar (b.1934), D.N. Nadim (1916-1988) and Amin Kamil (b. 1924). Makhanlal Mahav (b.1926), a Kashmiri poet turned Urdu journalist, is essentially a humorous poet, who has written parodies of the verses of some renowned poets, of Abdul Ahad Azad in particular. Mahav is a poet, however, with social commitment.

Zarif Ahmad Zarief, erstwhile Saleem Zarefi (b.1943), has also tried a parody of the verse of Amin Kamil. Syed Sharif-ud-Din Parvaz (b.1930) too has composed a number of good parodies of the verses of Mashal Sultanpuri (b.1936), G.A. Mahjoor (d.1952), Swachhi Kral (d.1854) and Rasool Mir (d.1870). Gulam Mohammad Shad (b.1938) has an element of subtle humour in him. He is not a humorous poet, but he has some successful parodies to his credit of the verses of Amin Kamil, Fazil Kashmiri and others. G.R. Santosh (b.1929), a reputed Kashmiri painter and poet, has refreshingly written parodies of Kamil's verses. Abdul Rahim Sheikh alias S.Razi, a non-humorous poet, has published a collection of parodies, entitled Daph shabash (1987), including his own attempts on the verses of some renowned poets such as Amin Kamil, Rehman Rahi, Mahjoor, S.R. Pampur (b.1940) and others. This is, perhaps, the first notable attempt on the subject for which Razi deserves appreciation. We have also Muhammad Ahsan (b.1937) who has a good sense of humour revealed, for example, in his parodies of Mahjoor's verses. The Kashmiri language has fortunately a galaxy of humorous poets, including Ayub Sabir (b. 1938), whose attempts could be a valuable contribution to the genre of parody.

S.R.P.

PARODY (Maithili). There is ample use of humour and wit as well as irony and satire in Maithili, both poetry and prose, but parody, requiring a conscious use of the comic spirit to ridicule or arouse innocent laughter with reference to a literary work, is rare. Harimohan Jha (1908-1984), the greatest writer of humour, attempted parodies of several important works of Sanskrit like the Mahabharata, the Ramayana, Durgasaptashati, Satyanarayana katha, etc. and even works of Jyotisha (astrology). But he has never taken systematically a whole work for parodying, only selections from each have been exposed to parody. One of his innovations was to parody traditional lyrical forms, such as Nachari (Hymns to Lord Shiva). In this last category some other poets—Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran' (1906-1984), Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (b. 1911), and Chandranath Mishra 'Amar' (b. 1925) have followed him. Actually, Nachari and its companion Maheshavani have been, since the very early days, prone to humorous, even hilarious treatment—especially with reference to Shiva as an old man aspiring for the hand of a young girl, Gauri, as his consort.

Amar also parodied successfully popular Sanskrit 'stotras' (hymns). His most effective parody has been an 'ashtaka' (eight-verse prayer) called alhuashtak (eight-verse prayer on the sweet potatoes).

Tantranath Jha (1909-1980) wrote fine parodies on English literary forms, e.g. the lyrical ballads, in Musari Jha (Mr. Young Mouse), while Mathuranand Choudhury on the Sanskrit verse forms. Again, Shyamanand Jha's Bengak rashtriya sabha is a parody based on Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls.

PARODY (Malayalam). In Malayalam there was a period when parodying an epic or any masterpiece in classical (Sanskrit) literature was considered a poetic fashion, and many poets were earnestly engaged in this exercise. With the advent of the modern age parody became a popular medium of poetical expression with some writers. After Independence there was a sudden proliferation of humorous magazines which carried parodies to mock at politicians and others and to expose social evils.

Critical and ironic poems having a parodic nature were written by Sanjayan (M.R. Nair), an English Professor and scholar. The Sanjayan magazine invariably contained parodies mostly written by Sanjayan himself, who edited it. Writers like Madhavji, Vamanan and Misan were also parody experts who imitated Kathakali dialogues,'Tullal' and eighteenth century compositions like Patinaluvrittam to depict contemporary issues and personalities.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Two historically important parodies in Malayalam are Chakki Chankaram by Munshi Rama Kurup and Mohanan by Sanjayan. The first was designed to put an end to the fashion of producing sterotyped dramas imitating the Sanskrit models. This was a landmark in the Malayalam theatre movement. Written in 1893 this play was a strong protest in the form of mockery with calculated, vehement attacks, and it soon produced the desired effect. Mohanan was the first major reaction against excessive sentimentalism in poetry. It parodied a romantic poem 'Mohini' by Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, the most popular poet of the time (1930's). The hero, a typical Romantic, adores his beloved in an abstract, emotional style, and realising that age will wither her determines impetuously to murder her so as to save her from disgrace. He does perform the act which is glorified in the poem. To parody this, Sanjayan creates the anti-hero Mohanan who too determines to kill his wife. He is influenced by Changampuzha's 'Mohini'. But the attempt turns unsuccessful as his wife overpowers her cranky husband. It goes to the credit of Sanjayan that he was the forerunner of a critical reaction in poetry against incredible and flimsy fancies. He established, by suggestion, that this variety of imported Western romanticism was not to be blindly imitated by people here.

N.V. Krishna Warrior's 'Kochuthomman' is rather a burlesque, depicting the life of a college youth in Madras, after the fashion of an epic, to bring out sarcastically the utter disarray of sensibility on the part of the youth. His pursuit of pseudo-values of mistaken love and consequent idiocies are at certain places narrated in the grand style of the Malayalam epic poet Ezhuttacchan. 'Kochuthomman' is not a parody, but the art of parody is employed here, with poetic discretion, as a convenient tool.

P.N.K.

PARODY (Marathi). The term established for parody in Marathi criticism is 'vidamban'. In general, parody is a deliberately distorted imitation of a popular serious poem, more particularly of its stylistic features. In contrast to the original poem which deals with a serious topic, its parody is based on a trivial one. Occasionally, prose writings are also parodied from this point of view.

The earliest example of parody in Marathi is Sangeet hajamat (1889) by Mangesh Ramchandra Telang. It includes parodic versions of popular songs in such musical plays as Shakuntal and Soubhadra by Annasaheb Kirloskar. Mukundrao Patil's Kulkarni Leelamrit (1913) and Shetaji Pratap (1924) are parodies written in the style of the classical poetry of Shridhar. In his play Vinod (1916), the comic playwright Madhavrao Joshi offered some excellent parodies of the songs in K.P.Khadilkar's plays. However, the credit for giving inspiration to parody and making it popular goes to the eminent humorist, P.K.Atre. Around 1920s, a poetry group known as Ravikiran Mandal, which comprised poets like Madhav Julian, Yashwant and Girish, had won great popular acclaim.

In order to parody the poetry of this group which was characterized by such faults as triviality of theme, self-centredness of temperament, sentimentalism and eccentricity of style, Atre wrote a substantial number of parodic poems under the pseudonym 'Keshavkumar' and published them in a collection called Zenduchi tule (1925). These parodies became extremely popular. As a result, quite a few well-known and not so well-known poets also practised the parody form. D.V.Dev, in his Uphasini (1936), put together selected eighty-seven poems of this type by different poets. Anant Kanekar's Chandrat, Babulanth's Dhuwadhar, C.G.Dikshit's Bandgul are collections which include some parodic poems. Poems seeking to parody the totally new, modernist poetic idiom of Mardhekar were published in many journals around 1950. S.S.Rege too wrote some good parodies of successful poets like Vasant Bapat, Vinda Karandikar, Mangesh Padgaonkar and P.S.Rege. Some excellent prose parodies have come from P.L.Deshpande who has aimed at hitting the pedantic and conventional tradition in criticism. His fine sense of prose style is reflected in his parodies. Bal Gadgil has also written a few literary parodies. During the last two decades, however, despite the great upsurge of humorous literature, parody seems to have been on the decline.

G.M.P.

PARODY (Oriya). Parody in Oriya literature is found, though not in its perfect form, in the medieval period of Oriya literature. The poet Brajanath in Chatur binod and Baladeva in Rasa kallola expressed their serious feelings in a humorous manner. In Chatur binod the poet, for example, says 'sana sana ghruta' instead of 'Sanskrit' and 'Bedha' (meaning illegal) for the Vedas. In a similar manner the pandit, while blessing the king, blesses in the form of a verse, saying that all kinds of evils be bestowed on him.

Even a casual reading of the verse shows that the pandit is really blessing the king for his welfare. In Rasa kallola the poet Baladeva uses a parody where the priest recites in the form of a purana, glorifying all evil qualities. Fakirmohan has applied the technique of parody in his novels Mamu and Chhamana athaguntha. He has humorously described the beauty of Champa and the status of brahmins in the society of that time. Rama Sankar Roy, a contemporary of Fakirmohan, has used satire, humour and parody in his dramas, dance-dramas and comedies. The use of parody is very frequent in the writings of Gopal Chandra Praharaj. In his Bhagabat tungi re sandhya he satirises social problems like alcoholic addiction.

Kantakabi Laxmikanta has greatly contributed to Oriya parody literature. He developed parody as an independent branch of Oriya literature. He has termed his parody 'hanukarana', meaning imitation in a wrong way. He has written a parody of the popular Kishor chandrananda champu with the title Chataka chandrahasa champu. This is the first complete parody poem in Oriya literature. A champu is a poem with some prose passages. A parody of famous Betala panchabimsati is written by Kantakabi as Modern talabetala. This is also the first prose parody in Oriya literature.

Like the Punch and New Yorker parody literature in Orissa has gradually developed through some such magazines as Rasa chakra, Dagara, Hari bola, Rangia anari, Niaukhunta and Tike hasa. Especially, the contributions to Dagara are noteworthy. Some literary associations, like Sarasa Sahitya Samiti, are also a constant source of inspiration to the parody writers in Orissa.

Sri Nityananda Mohapatra, with the pen-name of 'Rasaraja', has made a parody of Radhanath Roy's Darbar with the title Naba darbar where he has warned the ministers and the members of Legislative Assembly of court-martial in the court of Yama where they will be punished if they are involved in corrupt practices.

Pulin Bihari Roy has made a parody of 'Hai re taruna Kabira asha' in the phrase 'Hai re taruna kiranir asha', where he has ridiculed the dreams of an office assistant. Sri Rama Chandra Mishra 'Phaturananda' is said to be the forerunner of parody in Oriya literature. His first book Kabi ladhei is undoubtedly a remarkable parody in poetry. His drama Kalikati chenka is a satire on the complexities of modern life in cities. Godavarish Mohapatra, the editor of Niau khunta, has written a series of humorous poems, satires and parodies on the public lives of political persons in his magazine. Besides these, there are others like Udayanath Sarangi, Kulamani Mohapatra and Prafulla Chandra Dash who have enriched the genre of parody in Oriya literature.

A.P.

PARODY (Rajasthani) as a genre in Rajasthani literature is not very popular. The two poets who have written a few parodies are Muralidhar Vyas and Buddhiprakash Parik. Parody is a piece of writing intended to amuse by imitating the style of writing used by some other poet. A good parody is one that does not hurt the soul of the poet imitated nor in any way detract from his greatness or nobility; and yet it titillates the reader. There is a simple prayer usually sung in adoration of deities by the circular movement of a lighted lamp before them. In imitation of 'Jay Jagdish Hare' Buddhiprakash has adopted the very style in praise of a fly which measures earth and sky in a trice, which lays lakhs of eggs at a time and which, like a goddess, is noticed everywhere. Even the dirtiest place is not left untouched by it. The parody can be appreciated only when read in the original, a few lines of which are:

Jal thal aur pavan men Visnu si vyape
Jay mankhi mai aum jay mankhi mai
Janhai dekhau tu hi tu pai
Thara sirjan agai Birma sarmave...

Muralidhar Vyas has written parodies in imitation of well-known Hindi couplets. 'In adversity everyone remembers God, but in prosperity none. This line is retained as it is, but the following line is: 'While living in luxury what fool will ever think of God'. Likewise, there is the famous saying of Malukdas: 'The cobra serves none, nor does a bird ever labour for others, since God fulfils the needs of all.' The parody says, 'Remain sleeping care free, for you'll see riches showering from roof tops':

'Thun suto rah shaj men, chhat sun jharasi dam'

'Thlsi kabahum na tyagiye, apane kul ri rit
Ghar becho karjo karo, dharam tani a rit.'

Such are stray parodies, with practically no continuity as in other genres.

Na. Sa.

PARODY (Sanskrit). The exact parallel of the term parody cannot be easily traced in the works of Sanskrit poetics. Remote semblance, if any, of the term parody in the sense in which it is taken and practised today may be found in the works dealing with 'kavi-shiksha' and plagiarism. Poetician Vamana in his Kavyalamkara-sutra (III. 2.7-9) defines 'artha' (meaning) into two types–(a) 'ayoni' (original) and (b) 'anyachchhayayoni' (imitated). Ananandavardhana further developed this idea of the division of artha by Vamana in his Dhvanyaloka (4.12), saying:

samvado hyanyasadrishyam tatpunah pratibimbavat alekhyaprakhyavat tulyadehivachcha shariri nam.

Similarity or resemblance of one with another is 'samvada' (coincidence). It may be like a reflected image, a painted picture of two living persons resembling each other. He advises poets that of these three kinds of resemblances a good poet should avoid the first, the reflected image, because it has no separate life of its own. The second kind of resemblance of a painted portrait also deserves evasion since it gives a different guise to poetry with little originality. The third kind of resemblance, that of two living persons resembling one another is permissible for, here, though the subject in the two works is similar, their presentation and diction are entirely different and they are capable of drawing our attention with their own distinct appearance.

Taking advantage of the theories already existing before him, Rajashekhara (10th c.) in his Kavyamimamsa develops further the concept of poetic resemblance on a scientific basis and elucidates it with apt illustrations. Hemachandra in his Kavyanushasana incorporates all the divisions of artha and corresponding resemblances of poetic works as recorded by Rajashekhara. Among all the terms coined by Sanskrit poeticians with regard to coincidences or reflections in poetic works, the term 'chhaya' (reflection), used by Bhojaraja in his Sarasvatikanthabharana, comes nearer the modern sense of parody defined as literary composition in which the manner, form or attitude of some well-known work is imitated for comic or satirical effect. Thus, parody is a technique generally adopted to expose some social evil or cast some aspersions through the artful and subversive mimicry of some reputed author. The parodist, therefore, chooses famous writers who have a distinctive style so that the reader can easily recognise the subject of parody. A successful parodist is he who has a thorough knowledge of the work he is parodying and, in imitating, demonstrates his own skill also. Take for example, the following parody by Satkari Mukhopadhyaya, imitating the well-known hymn of the Upanishad, "Urdhvam murkho hyadho murkho murkhat murkho vishishyate/murkhasya stavako murkho murkhe murkhan pratishthitah." (Murkhopanishat). (Above a foolish person, down a foolish person. One fool excels another. One fool praises another fool. A fool is established in a fool.)

Murkhopanishat is a poignant satire on a degenerate society where, instead of merit and wisdom, sheer foolishness, sycophancy and flattery flourish.

Sanskrit poets have successfully parodied not only celerbrated poets like Kalidasa and Banabhatta but even fables like the Panchatantra and philosophical works like the Dharmasutras and Vedanta sutras, and the Upanishads and the Bhagavadgita.

In the parody of Krishna Lal's 'China-varnanam' in his poetic collection Urvi-svanah, we discern the imitation of the description of the Himalayas by Kalidasa in his Kumarasambhavam:

prachyam dishayamiha danavatma chiniyadesho' sti kukhyatanama.

The description of China, that it is a country in the east which, while attacking India, became a demon and received censure by its acts of agression, corresponds well to the renowned verse of Kalidasa, 'astyuttarasyam dishi devatatma, Himalayo nama nagadhirajah.'

In the Smriti-tarangam of T.G. Mainkar, the Meghduta of Kalidasa is parodied. It is a lyric poem where the intense grief of a lover is portrayed after the sad demise of his beloved. The whole poem is moulded in the manner of the Meghaduta spirit.

In the monthly journal, Parijatam, many humorous parodies on present-day problems have been contributed by Prashasyamitra Shastri, Abhiraja Rajendra Mishra, Sudyumnacharya, Sarveshvar Rajhansa, Som Dutt Vajpeyi and Vaneshvar Pathak, to name only a few among many. Prashasyamitra Shastri composed a parody, Prashasya-lita, which is a mimicry of the Bhagavadgita, highlighting the corrupt ways of modern society. For example, upakaro' pakaro va rajanitau na ganyate kritajnyabhavam manyante durmatayo naradhamah.

Nandlal Sharma Shastri, too, composed a parody on the style of the famous hymn 'Satyam puram dhimahi', depicting the all-pervading power of money in the form of currency notes:

Bho Bho rupyaka rupamatra bhavato divyam manomohakam
Drstva tvam jagatitale kimapare puchhyanti vishunavadayah

(Currency notes are very attractive. Even gods cannot resist the temptation of money.)

Dr. Rajendra Mishra in his 'Kakolukiyam' beautifully imitates the Panchatantra and casts a sarcastic remark on prevalent bribery:

Asmakam tu kshetrabandhadhikari sakshad Ravanah.
Utkochamantara nanyastadvashikarnopayah.

(Our revenue officer is Ravana in person. He cannot be pleased except by offering bribe.)

Baburam Avasthi has composed a parody on the lines of the famous Gita-Govinda of Jayadeva:

Holim khelati Raghuvirah
Pitaharitanavachirah
Vilasati loko lalitavilasah
Natati janagano harshanirvarah.

Brahmanand Tripathi has artistically imitated the prose style of Banabhatta in his parody, "Chakravartinah palandunripateh sarvatra samadarah", where he describes the supremacy of the onion among the vegetables, using long compounds in the style of Banabhatta.

Another parody on the style of the Panchatantra is 'Dharma sabhayam pasupaksinam artanadah' by Dr. Sarveshvar Rajahansa. Similarly, a parody by Somadutt Vajpayee, entitled Meghadautyam, a play, imitates the Meghaduta in theme.

Vishvambharnath Dwivedi has composed many interesting parodies in the Sutra style imitating the Dharma Sutras of Jaimini in the style of the Bhashsyakaras, e.g.

Jivajantunam gunasamavayad tadrupyam
Asatyahimsapratisthayam purusarthatvam.

His aphoristic style brings out the co-existence of people and their style of work while living in metro cities, confronting everyday problems in earning livelihood.

There is quite some parody literature in Sanskrit. It is only a glimpse presented here. There are many Sanskrit journals where parodies are published from time to time which point out that Sanskrit, like any modern language, is capable of assimilating and expressing new trends in modern literature. A new genre, technique or dimension is developing.

PARODY (Tamil). Joseph Constantine Beschi (1680-1746) alias Viramanunivar is considered the first writer who wrote parodies in Tamil on the model of traditional story-telling. His Paramartha guruvin kathai (The stupid Guru and his foolish disciples) narrates the journey of the stupid guru along with his disciples. Is it a satire on Hindu monks or is it against Protestants? This question still lingers in the minds of Tamil scholars, but it is undoubtedly a parody on the Guru-shishya tradition.

In 1914, C.Subramania Bharati wrote a parody, 'The Fox with the Golden Tail', in English on the model of Aesop's Fables. It was rendered into Tamil by V. Jeevanandam, under the title 'Ponvalnari' (1983). It is a parody exposing the 'colossal spiritual fraud' of the age. The greatness of this parody lies in its Aesopian language and esoteric meaning. Later, Bharati wrote a parody in Tamil also, Chinna Sankaran kathai (The story of Sankaran, the small), first serialised in Gnanabhanu, a Tamil monthly (1913-14), published afterwards in a book form in 1954. Bharati wrote this parody when he was in Pondicherry as a political exile. The entire work in thirty chapters was confiscated by the police and only the first four chapters have survived. In this work, now available in fragments, Bharati tried to portray the life of Sankaran who had become the court poet of Zamin Goundanur. Here one has to recall that Bharati himself spent his childhood in the court of Ettaiyapuram Zamin, and his work is a parody of the life of the court poets during the first half of the 19th century. Bharati was in a way responsible for the creative use of parody in the area of fiction writing in Tamil.

In 30s and 40s a group of writers, who belonged to the journal Manikkodi, extended the scope of parody to many fields of Tamil writing. Pudumaippittan used parody in both his short stories and poems to express his sense of suffering in the external world. In his hands parody attains the quality of artistic expression. His Kattilai vittirankak kathai is the tale of the bedbug family narrated in the style of the Vikramaditya stories. It is a parody of the style and mannerism of the old narrative art so as to ridicule our political life and slavish mentality under the British rule. His poem 'Maha kaviyam' (The great epic, 1946) is a poem in free verse form, parodying traditional epics.

In the post-independence era, many writers have used parody at 'verbal' and 'formal' levels, but we have yet to wait for great works of parody in Tamil.

C.Ra.

PARODY (Telugu). Kuchimanchi Jaggakavi's work entitled Chandrarekhavilapam (18th c) is considered the first parody in Telugu. Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu, who pioneered several literary forms in Telugu, wrote Abhagyopakhyanam as a parody of traditional poetry. But it was only after 1940 that parody as a literary form began to gain importance in Telugu.

Among the major writers of parody Jalasutram Rukmininatha Sastry (Jeruk Sastry) occupies an eminent place. He was so popular that he was often called 'Parody Sastry'. He wrote several parodies of the writings of his contemporary poets like Viswanatha Satyanarayana, Devulapalli Krishna Sastry and Sri Sri. Very recently the Navodaya publishers published the parodies of Jaruk Sastry in the form of a book.

Another writer who engaged himself in writing parody was Machiraju Deviprasad. He wrote a critical essay on parody in the literary magazine, Pratibha, and contributed several parodies too. Machiraju's parody on Sri Sri's well-known piece, Desha charitralu earned wide publicity. For instance, Sri Sri's poem reads thus:

Whichever nation's history we see
Whatever is there for us to take pride,
The history of man in its entirety
Is nothing but an exploitation of others.

The parody reads:

Whatever history of the road do we see
Whatever is there for us to take pride
The history of roads in its entirety
Is nothing but a combination of dust and particles.

Machiraju's parodies collected as Sankranti kanukalu were written in imitation of the poems of Devulapalli Krishna Sastry. When the romantic poets wrote poems on the theme of separation, Machiraju wrote parodies under the name of 'Rajakiya badhitudu' (Political sufferer).

Several parodies have been written of the poems in the well-known Telugu Vemana shatakam and Sumatishatakam. The Andhra political leader Duggirala Gopalakrishnayya, Devulapalli Purnavati, Kaloji, Bandlamudi Satyanarayana, Velidanda Nityananda. Rao and others have written parodies of shataka poems.

In recent times parodies have been written even in prose. Eluripati Anantaramayya and A. Nageswara Rao wrote parodies of the Sakshi essays written by Panuganti Lakshmi Narasimha Rao. Mullapudi Venkata Ramana wrote parodies imagining how it would be if eminent writers like Viswanatha, Chelam, Mullapudi, Malladi, Bucchi Babu, Arudra and others attempted book reviews and love letters.

Emveeyal (M.V.L.) Dwa Na Sastry, Ramakrishna Reddy, Pubha and others have also contributed to the art of parody writing in Telugu.

D.N.S.

PARODY (Urdu). The art of parody came to Urdu from English literature. The satirical and humorous writing in Persian literature was limited, as religious inhibitions did not allow this genre to prosper. Since Persian literature has deeply influenced Urdu literature, parody remained restricted in the beginning to Urdu poetry and prose. The genre as such is not old in Urdu. Yet parody can be and has been attempted in both poetry and prose.

Parody has also been called distortion or misrepresentation, but there is a subtle difference between the two. Distortion is verbal acrobatics, and in it the intention of the writer is to misrepresent the meaning of the original author. On the other hand, parody is written for amusement. 'Amir' says:

How different, O Amir, have they written my verses,
The scribes have greatly misrepresented my poetry.

In parody the words of the original creation and the ideas of the author are changed so as to produce humour and criticism. It is not necessary that the poem or the piece of prose, which is being parodied, should be satirical or humorous. However, the masterpiece selected for the purpose is always well-known and popular. The parodist first of all sees that the creation selected for parodying should be so famous and favourite with the people that the mind of the reader should at once be diverted to the original. It, however, includes elements like irony, jest, allusion, parallelism, contrast and subtlety.

The parodist aims at making fun of not only the original writer's style and manner, but also his attitudes, views and thoughts. Parody is literary re-creation as well as literary criticism. The literal meaning of parody is laughter-provoking imitation.

If the parody appears to have personal spite, it will not be appreciated. For an illustration, Mus-hafi wrote a ghazal, the first couplet of which was:

Your head is made of musk, your neck is made of camphor,
A fairy's hair is no match, nor does a damsel of paradise have such a neck.

Insha responded:

I will break the neck of the pot of wine
And thus, I will slash the neck of the damsel of paradise.

This cannot be called a parody. A parodist must have elegance, grace and spontaneity, and should have a deep study of the original author.

Jafar Zatally was the first poet who worte parodies in Urdu and Persian verse. Since Jafar Zatally was not mainly a writer of very good taste, the critics did not pay proper attention to him.

Then there was the time of the Avadh Panch. The three names, Pandit Tribhuvannath Hijr, Allama Akbar Allahabadi and Pandit Rattannath Sarshar, are prominent in the domain of parody. Hijr wrote the parody of a ghazal by Ghalib as under;

We have been sitting silent for a month
How wonderful is the description of events
No body shall come and sit in the office
Strict orders have been issued to that effect
What should the poor apprentices do
Day in and day out they are occupied in wailing
Sandwiched between retrenchment and taxation
All have cried out and now it is our turn.

One of Momin's couplets is:

If someone said that Momin was dying
He would say "What can I do, it is God's will.

Akbar said:

If someone said that Akbar was dying
He would say, "What can I do, it is my will.

Similarly:

O Nightingale ! Let us wail together
You cry for the flower and I shall weep out my heart.

Akbar, by making use of just one new word, not only produced fineness, but also gave a stroke of irony when he said:

O Nightingale ! Let us wail together
You cry for the flower and I shall cry for the nation.

Sarshar, in his Fasana-e-Azad, has parodied 'Saqinama' and 'Masnavi':

O Saqi, fix a drink of opiate from Malwa
So that I can have a stroll through paradise
Neither is there the singer, nor saqi, nor dulcimer, nor lyre,
Neither 'chandu', nor opium, nor 'ganja', nor poppy
Take pity on the beggar, my dear,
Let me sacrifice myself for you, please come near.

These three satirists and humorists were responsible for popularising parody in Urdu poetry. Other prominent parodists were Pitris, Hasrat, Majid Lahori, Muhammad Ashiq, K.L. Kapur, Ghulam Ahmad Furqat, Gopi Nath Aman, Shafiq-ur-Rehman, Harichand Akhtar, Raja Mehdi Ali Khan, Shaukat Thanvi, Sayyad Muhammad Jafri, Khizar Tamimi, Mahsan Lukhnavi, Rais Amrohi, Dilawar Figar, Haji Laq Laq, Mir Wali Allah. Some of them wrote parodies in verse as well as in prose. The parodies of some of them are very popular with the masses. 'Tuzk-e-Nadri', a parody by Shafiq-ur-Rahman is unique in itself. 'Wazeeron ki namaz' by Sayyad Muhammad Jafri is a parody of Iqbal's poem 'Shikva'. Here are some couplets from it:

We drenched our handkerchief in perfume
We laid our mat for the prayer
We showed our face to the ministers from a distance
We embraced every big man
Still there is a grouse against us that we are not loyal,
Who says we are not fit for the court.

'Punjab ka jugrafia' by Chiragh Hassan Hasrat is a parody of high standard:

The river named Zafar Ali Khan is the biggest river of Punjab, which always keeps changing its course. There was a time when its terrible waves struck against the Alexandrian wall on one side and the mounts of Qadian on the other. But now the united engineers have dammed both its banks and have constructed a grand bridge over it with cement from Wah.

'Ghalib jadeed shoara ki ek majlis men' by Kanahya Lal Kapur is a parody which earned him a place in the rank of satirists and humorists.

Dilawar Figar has presented the grievance of a lecturer in his parody of 'Shikva' as under:

If during his instruction he was reminded of his pay
The teacher forgot the past, the future and the present
The sum written on the blackboard remained incomplete
And instead of grammar he thought of his wife and children
Goethe, Shelley, Khayyam and Wali got mixed up
All became one in the court of hunger.

Shaukat Thanvi has written parodies in both prose and verse. Here is his parody of Iqbal's poem 'Momin':

If the contestant is weak, Momin is like steel
If it is the British Government, he becomes its descendant
He is free from all divine traits like terror, awe, sanctity and greatness
If it is battlefield, he is like a child
But if it is a college, he is a fairy-born.

Majeed Lahori had a great mastery over parody. Here is a specimen of his art:

Karima uncle made this prayer:
You are great and grand
Why did you delay my case
The best would be to get me a ministry
If a ministry is not possible, make me an ambassador
If that too is not possible, make me an adviser
Because I am a prisoner of desires.

Jamal Pashane's essay, 'Kapur, an investigative and critical study', also deserves a mention.

PARSAI, HARISHANKAR (Hindi; b.1924), the noted humorist, was born at Jabalpur and educated up to the M.A. standard. He started his career as a teacher, but gave that up to become a free-lance writer. His first writing was published in 1949. Then came the first collection of his short stories Hansate hain rote hain (1951). In 1954 his novel Tat ki khoj was published. In 1956 he published his essays Tab ki bat aur thi. This was followed by a novel Jwala aur jal (1958), essays Bhut ke panw pichhe (1962), another novel Rani Nagaphani ki kahani (1962) and a collection of short stories Jaise unke din phire (1963). Later, his works Beimani ki paraten, Sadachar ka taviz and Aur ant mein were published.

Parsai is known as a humorist and satirist in modern Hindi literature. His style is simple and direct. He collects his material for writing from incidents and happenings around him. Usually for illustrating his point of view, he cites some examples or incidents which have been part of his life. Even to imaginary characters he gives a living colour and describes them as if they were actual persons. Thus he is an effective writer of modern Hindi prose. His satires deal mostly with the absurdities and hypocrisies of contemporary socio-political life and have a definite and pronounced sympathy for the exploited and antipathy for the exploiter. His book Viklang shradha ka daur (satire) received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1982.

PARSI LITERATURE (Gujarati). Parsis left Persia (Iran), their motherland, to save their lives and religion from the Arabs. They came to India in the tenth century and settled in Sanjan, a small state in south Gujarat. They mixed with the people quickly because of their remarkable adaptability and had no difficulty in picking up the language, social customs, dress etc. of the Gujarati people. During the Muslim rule they learnt Persian, apart from Gujarati, and when the British dominated the country, they came under the impact of the English language. Their language at home, however, remained Gujarati to which they had been long accustomed. Of course, the Gujarati they adopted was a little different from the language spoken by the Gujarati people. The reason was that the Parsis had some difficulty in pronouncing a few sounds and so they changed the pronunciation of some Gujarati words. Moreover, they mixed Arabic, Persian, Urdu and English words in their language.

A small portion of the Parsi community did try to speak and write pure Gujarati, but most of them had a distaste for Sanskritized Gujarati. They preferred their own Parsi-Gujarati dialect for general communication and even for literature. Most of the Parsi writers have written their literary works in this dialect.

In the second decade of the 19th century Gujarat was brought under the British rule. The western thought and culture inspired some enthusiastic Parsis to equip themselves with the new learning and culture. They were pioneers in many fields of life. Fardoonji Marzban was the first man who published Mumbai samachar, a Gujarati newspaper. In the field of drama, some prominent Parsis took the lead. Some of their playwrights adapted the plays of Shakespeare to suit their requirement. Kekhusharu Kabaraji wrote plays based not only on their own celebrities, but also on the religious stories of the Hindus. He also depicted in his social plays the contemporary Parsi society and its problems. Kekhusharu was a great dramatist and also a social thinker who noticed the evil effects of western culture on the younger generation and criticised them sharply in his plays.

Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Bamanji Kabaraji, Khurshedji Baliwala are eminent names in the field of Parsi theatre. Some Parsi playwrights were good actors too. They established various theatre companies and associations to perform their plays. Though they did not publish any outstanding plays, they paved the way for the emergence of drama as a powerful genre.

In the field of poetry, in the late 19th century, some Parsi poets such as Jamshedji Petit, Mancherji Langadana 'Manasukha', Rustam Irani, Dadabhai Doradi, Jabuli Rustom, Jahangeer Talyarkhan and Pahlanji Desai wrote poems on some famous persons or events from Parsi history or on religious and social themes. Some of them wrote poems in the Samal-Dalpat style.

In the 20th century Beharamji Malbari and Ardeshar Khabardar are famous names in the field of poetry. They insisted on writing in pure, literary Gujarati and became popular in the entire Gujarati world.

Anubhavika and Sansarika are famous books by Malbari. The poet Khabardar has shown his genius not only in the field of poetry, but also in that of criticism. His poems revealing national pride and dignity have been widely appreciated in Gujarat. Bharata no tankar, Rashtrika and Darshanika are his well-known works. In our own times Meenu Desai and Bejan Desai have gained good recognition.

In the first half of the 19th century the Parsis had also begun writing short stories. Mostly they translated from the Persian language. In the later half of the 20th century, Sorabsha Dadabhai Munsafna introduced a new form of novel in Gujarat. Of course, the first Gujarati novel was a translation of Indian Cottage, an English novel, itself a translation of a French work. Munsafna was the first Parsi novelist who published the translated novel, Hindustan madhye nun eka zunpadun, in 1862. The fact that three editions of the novel were sold within five years speaks a lot of the popularity of the work.

In the last quarter of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century the Parsi authors published a large number of novels mostly in the Parsi-Gujarati dialect. They found the medium of the novel suitable for propagation of social reforms. A very large number of Parsi novels and dramas are adaptations from English.

Other novelists such as Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Dadi Taraporwala, Jahangir Talyarkhan, Jahangir Marzban tried to write original novels. Phiroz Marzaban 'Pizam', Bamanji Kabaraji, Jahangir Patel 'Gulfam' and many other novelists wrote in the Parsi-Gujarati dialect. Other writers like Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Dadi Taraporwala and Jahangir Marzaban wrote in Gujarati proper and thus reached out to a large section of the reading public.

From the viewpoint of artistic quality the Parsi novels cannot be placed in a very high category. They are just readable and acquaint the reader with the customs, manners and ways of life of the Parsi society.

The Parsi literature, on the whole, may not be very outstanding, but it is creditable that a-community which came from outside and settled in Gujarat and adopted its language and customs should be able to make a significant contribution to Gujarati literature. No literary historian can afford to ignore their literature in Gujarati.

PARSI THEATRE was essentially a professional theatre which developed in 1870s at the instance of some Parsi businessmen who got interested in theatre. They founded the first professional company, which used Hindustani as a language for drama. The first fifty years of the nineteenth century witnessed a number of plays staged by the Parsi Natak Mandalis, most of them being adaptations of the well-known Shakespearean plays. The first Parsi theatrical company, Original Theatrical Company, was launched by Pestonji Framji in 1877. Pestonji was followed by Khurshidji Baliwala who founded the Victoria Theatrical Company in Delhi during the same year. Many Parsi theatrical companies that were floated, developed their own repertoire, and paid appropriate royalties to their staff. A few of the famous companies were Kavasji Khatau's New Alfred Theatrical Company, Old Parsi Theatrical Company, Corinthian Company, Alexandra Company, Prince Theatrical Company and Imperial Theatrical Company. They remained active and gave performances regularly up to the mid-thirties of the present century. The Parsi companies had their own paid production and management staff, and their script writers, directors as well as producers held regular consultations before a play was actually put up on the stage. As the productions were mostly spicy, including songs, alliterative dialogues interspersed with couplets, and dances, their literary quality often did not come up to the requisite standard, nor did they discriminate between dramatic art and rhetoric or melodrama. However, as the number of the companies increased, the sense of competition among them led to a search for good script writers. The scripts, however, were never published for fear of plagiarism.

Most of the themes in Parsi plays were based on the triumph of virtue over evil. In Balwant Gargi's words, "In most plays the themes were Truth, Nobility, Faithfulness, etc., and were based on mythology, history, legends of the middle ages and adaptations of Shakespeare. Because of the need for Hindu-Muslim unity, many companies staged plays stressing this idea." Such plays included Itfaq (Unity) as the centrifugal idea around which the whole play revolved. One of the Urdu-Hindi writers of the period was Agha Hashr Kashmiri. He was rightly called Urdu Shakespeare. For example, his play Sufaid khun (White blood) is modelled on Shakespeare's King Lear, Khwab-e-hasti (Dream of existence) is a mutilated version of Macbeth and Said-e-havas (Victim of desire) is adapted from King John. The plays are full of alliteration and rhymed couplets interspersed with comic interludes. As the time passed, Agha Hashr's scripts matured and in his later years he wrote many original plays like Aankh ka nasha based on his personal experiences in the company of prostitutes. The play depicted amazingly real scenes in the brothel. His other important plays are Achhuta daman, Mithi chhuri, Khubsurat bala, Bhagirath Ganga and Madhur murali. His last play Rustam-o-Sohrab had powerful dialogues, quick movements and very effective scenes. His later plays certainly have a literary value and their impact on modern Hindi drama is considerable.

The Parsi theatre adapted both European stage techniques and native farces, folk theatre, and opera techniques. We can see this adaptation, even amalgam, in their stage setting, play-back effects, background music, etc., and the devices adopted for effects remind one of the nineteenth-century Laceum melodramas and Drury Lane spectacles in London.

The productions of the Parsi theatre were not only mammoth, but they involved big cast and huge budget, sometimes spiralling to more than a million at the present-day value of the rupee. Even after spending huge sums on their productions, the companies never ran into losses, but gained something in the final count up. The popularity of the plays was partly due to the effective combination of the European and Indian techniques of production. For example, the play would open with a prayer song, reminiscent of the Nandi of the classical Sanskrit stage. As usual, the actors will be in the requisite make-up, will line up on the stage with their hands folded, singing a prayer song in praise of god Shiva.

The Parsi theatre had its impact on the plays written and staged in other regional languages. Some of the eminent Parsi playwrights in Gujarat were Kekharhru N. Kabraji (1842-1905) of Nindakhanum, Bholijan and Nanda batriti fame; Jehangir P. Khambata (1856-1916) of Juddin jhagdo, Madhouse and Tit for tat fame; Bomanji N. Kabraji (1860-1925) of Bhulo padelo Bhimbhai, Bholi gool and Gamreni gori fame; P.J. Maizban (1876-1933) of Aflatun, Sukhla Jamasp and Handsome Blackguard fame.

The Parsi theatre had a tremendous impact on Hindi theatre. The playwrights, in the beginning, wrote their scripts in Gujarati, but later they switched over partially to Hindi-Urdu. Various theatrical companies hired the services of professional playwrights like Abbas Ali 'Mashahar', Hussain Miyan, David Joseph, Raunak Banarasi, Munshi Vinayak Prasad 'Talib', Narayan Prasad 'Betab', Agha Hashr Kashmiri, etc. Abbas wrote more than 25 plays which for years were staged by several Parsi companies. Mohammad Mashahar's plays were mythical-historical, while David Joseph directed many plays staged by the New Parsi Natak Mandali, which were adaptations of Shakespeare's plays. In fact, many original plays and adaptations were written in Hindustani by the playwrights mentioned above. Many actors acquired a status of 'cult figure' for their performance in these plays. For example, Miss Gauhar was well-known for the role of Draupadi, Agha Muhammad for Bilwamangal, and Bhagwandas for the role of Krishna. The Parsi theatre continued its uninterrupted theatrical activity in the Hindi belt where no such activity whether professional or amateur had existed for years. Its contribution may not be remarkable for literary excellence, but there is no gainsaying that it marked an important phase in the development of Hindi drama as a whole.

The impact of Parsi theatre on Marathi theatre is also considerable. Kirloskar was very much inspired by the spectacular musical Indra sabha produced by the Parsi theatre. Greatly impressed, he produced Shakuntala which blazed a trail of Sangit Natak. This drama had its sway for almost half a century, and set a pattern for the presentation of a play in which music, incorporated in dialogues, was the dominating factor.

The Parsi theatre had little success in Rajasthan where modern theatrical performances were staged at the Ramaprakash Theatre under the patronage of Maharaja Ram Singh of Jaipur. The Maharana of Udaipur and Maharaja Ram Singh witnessed a play staged by a Parsi theatrical company in 1800. It was based on the life of Emperor Jahangir and most of the artists had come from Bombay to give the performance, but it did not give much impetus to the local talent since no notable performance was given on this luxuriously furnished stage after the Parsi theatrical company had left for Bombay.

There is no trace of a tradition of drama in Sindhi earlier than the nineteenth century. The modern Indian drama was born in Sindh under the secular influence of the West. Parsi theatrical groups visited Sindh during the last decades of the nineteenth century and the early decades of the present century and sowed the seed of Sindhi stage. The Parsi theatre had tremendous impact on Sindhi stage especially in the field of technique and presentation.

Performance of Urdu plays was started by Dadabhai Soharabji's Victoria Natak Mandali, Dadabhai Patel's Alfred Natak Mandali and the New Alfred Theatrical Company in 1870. The performances of the artists of these groups proved to be commercial hits, and therefore the writers of literary standing, like Ahsan and Hashr, were attracted to write scripts for them. The groups toured the entire country to give performances of Urdu plays and the impact of these commercial hits defies imagination.

The Parsi theatre was, therefore, a tremendous force which not only left its impact on the audience wherever the performances were given, but also gave a sense of direction to the theatre all over the country for evolving the genre of drama in the regional languages of India.

PARTHA, SRICHANDANA (Oriya; 16th c.), author of Kalabati was a vassal chief of Banapura and son of a medieval Oriya poet, named Padmanabha Narendra. Kalabati, named after its heroine, is a narrative poem in seven cantos and deals with the story of her love for the Prince of Madhubana, their union, estrangement and reunion through the intervention of supernatural forces. The story is simple and conceived, on the whole, in the puranic style, and though at times it borders on monotony, the treatment of love in separation has some poignancy and makes a direct appeal to the heart.

PARTHASARATHY, N. (Tamil; b. 1932, d. 1988), with the pen-names of Manivannan, Ponmudi, Valavan, Koodalalakan and Ilamupuvanan, was a novelist, short-story writer and journalist. He was born in Nadhikkudi, Ramanathapuram district. He was a teacher for sometime in Pasumalai, near Madurai, which provides the background for quite a few of his novels and stories. He also worked as Editor, Deepam, since 1975.

Parthasarathy became well-known with the publication of Kurinjimalar (1962) which was serialised in Kalki. In this love, the woman is portrayed as a symbol of love, but later she transcends her personal limitations to reach a plane of higher idealism. This tendency is seen both in Kurinjimalar and in later novels like Athmavin ragankal (1969), in which Maduram's love and devotion are contrasted with Gandhiraman's commitment to national cause, and she wins by losing her love. Anichamalar uses flower symbolism negatively—the flower stands for a woman who destroys herself for want of ideals—or by a negative transformation of her creativity into a passion for fame. This novel and quite a few later ones like Sathiya vellam (1973) show the novelist passing from the romantic to the ironic phase. Though in Sathiya vellam satire is linked with nationalistic ideals, the novel sacrifices art for didacticism. The only memorable character in the novel is Annasamy, but he too is more of a type—an ideal character like the Mahatma. Though Parthasarathy sees social evil as part of a larger struggle between truth and falsehood, he is too close to the world he portrays in these novels to transform reality into art. In Sathitya vellam, Varunkala valikattikal and Ponvilanku (1964) the academic life is portrayed, often satirically. He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for his novel Samudaya vidhi in 1971.

His other novels include Gopura dipam (1959) Piranthaman (1960), Manipallavam (1962), Pattuppoochi (1962), Vetrimuzhakkam (1962), Arathin kural (1962), Manakkan (1965), Kabadapuram (1967), Nenchakkanal (1968), Pudiyaparavai, Mahatmavai thedi (1969), Venilmalaikal (1970), Nithiyavalli (1972), Malaichikaram (1972), Nanaivin nizhalkal (1972), Nilanayanankal (1975), Karchuvarkal, Thulasimadam and Seythikal.

. As some of these titles indicate, he is more at home with the ideal world of the hills and the flowers whose silence serves as a symbol of peace and love. His 'lyrical' or 'epic' novels of the early phase, dealing with the nationalistic or idealistic themes, are more artistic than his satirical novels. A ruthless passion for freedom can be seen in his writings.

He has written numerous short stories which run into more than twenty anthologies such as Ithu pothuvalialla. They reveal a sense of irony and give us insights into reality, social and ethical, through flashes. But here again, the emphasis is on idealism and the language is not free from metaphors. 'Ezhuthatha kavaitai' is a long short story in which he deals with the silence of the hills and an uneducated woman providing a basis for creative life.

His other works include—Poetry: Maniyannan kavitaikal, Kadarkarai ninaivukal; Essays: Puthu ulakam kanden, Nanutril nalla katchikal; Research articles: Sollin chelvam, Kavitaikkulai, Mozhiyin valye, Pudiya parvai; Translation: Veresa linkam.

PARTHASARATHY, R. (English, b. 1934) was educated at Don Bosco High School and Siddhartha College in Bombay. Recipient of a British Council Award in 1963, he spent a year (1963-64) at the University of Leeds. He began as a lecturer in English, but soon joined the Oxford University Press as its editor. Parts of Rough Passage (1977) echo the early experience of the poet's life as well as his Tamil heritage and family background.

Parthasarathy's Rough Passage (1977), divided into 'Exile', 'Trial' and 'Homecoming', is a long poem in thirty-seven sequences. It has been acknowledged as one of the finest poems in modern Indo-English poetry, since it received high commendation from the Commonwealth Award Committee. Rough Passage is a single poem with thematic and structural unity. Its theme is the slow unfolding of the poet's awareness of his identity in relation to culture and society in India, and more particularly, in the context of the complex bilingual fate of an Indo-

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

English poet. Reading the first part we became conscious of his 'exile' and later recognise that it is through 'exile' that he realizes his roots : 'You learn roots are deep./That language is a tree, loses colour/under another sky'. Tamil inheritance and English education create conflicts and tensions in the poet's mind out of which his poetry grows. Parthasarthy's skill lies in evoking a state of mind and relating it to external phenomena. For example, the atmosphere of a basement flat is recreated and later related to the poet's youth spent in 'whoring after English gods'. The second phase 'Trial' explores the poet's psyche and the incomprehensible element of life : 'Love, I haven't the key/ to unlock His gates./ In 'Trial' he explores the images of love shaping the growth. The third phase 'Homecoming' articulates the poet's attempt at self analysis marked by an inner conflict : 'My tongue in English chains, I return, after a generation, to you'. He is at the end of his 'dravidic tether', and finally finds - 'My heart I have turned inside out'.

Parthasarathy's poetry is marked by itensity of introspection, sober detachment and a sensitive, selective, precise use of language and a quest for identity. He explores with precision and power the tensions in his awareness of the differences between the past and the present, Tamil heritage and English poetic medium and projects thus in his poems a 'dual vision'.

PARULEKAR, GODAVARI SHAMRAO (Marathi; b. 1908) was the daughter of the distinguished lawyer, L.R. Gokhale. She took a degree in law from the University of Pune, married Shamrao Parulekar, a well-known Communist leader, and joined him in his work in the tribal areas of Thane. She zealously built a strong movement for the uplift of the downtrodden Adivasi Warli tribals, held in bondage by the feudal zamidars. The Warlis fondly called her Godarani. The thrilling experiences she had in the Warlis' struggle for liberation are recorded in her Jewha manus jaga hoto (1970) which won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972. The book is a document of social awakening dealing with people subjected to the highhanded tyranny of feudal lords. This personal record of a socio-political upheaval is not written in the form of a propagandist tract; on the contrary, it is a moving document of human suffering and exploitation, and of people's struggle for their rights and dignity. There is no attempt, whatsoever, towards the glorification of a person or a party. The book received the Maharashtra government award and also the Acharya Atre Foundation award, and has been translated into some Indian languages.

PARVA (Kannada) is a Kannada novel (1979) by S.L. Bhyrappa. It is a retelling of the story of the Mahabharata. In the words of the author, 'I was throughout conscious that I was not writing the story of the characters of the Mahabharata, but the different facets and forms of man's experience, the nature of human relationship, and understanding of these'. The novel makes radical departure from the original, demythifying the epic story. The Gandharvas are a tribe living in the hilly regions. The Devas (like Dharma and Vayu, the fathers of the Pandavas) are another tribe, refined and practising absolute equality.

Whether intentionally or not, the treatment of the epic material makes for a realistic and sociological approach. The novel depicts the disastrous disintegration of an age.

Critical opinion is divided about the success of the novel, covering the spectrum from enthusiastic praise for a new vision and recognition of the application of the dramatic and lyrical mode to suit the epic material, to a questioning of the wisdom of demythifying it. But inspite of these divergent views, all are agreed that it is a unique creative effort.

The novel has been translated into Hindi.

PARVATHAVANI (Kannada; b. 1911) is the pen name of P. Narasinga Rao, a noted Kannada dramatist, actor and director. After his B.A. (Honours) in Economics from Maharaja's College, Mysore, he served in the State Forest Department (1935-66).

Narasinga Rao's first contact with drama was in 1936, when he played the role of Krishna in Shri Krishna parijata, a mythological play. Adaptation of Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer under the title Undadi gunda was a resounding success, and thus he was launched on his career as a playwright.

Parvathavani has written more than eighty plays, including about forty original plays. He has adapted seven plays of Moliere, and among the other dramatists whom he has brought to the Kannada stage are Shakespeare, Sheridan, Chekhov, Gorky, Ibsen, Hauptmann, Gogol and W.W. Jacobs. The adaptation is so brilliant that the plays appear entirely Indian. He has also modified and presented Kalidasa's Shakuntala and Shudraka's Mrichchhakatika. In his original plays he has dealt with a variety of social problems from dowry to capital punishment. The characters are drawn from the middle class. His Kichaka is a tribute to Krishna's omniscience; the traumatic experience which transformed a miser into a saint Purandaradasa is presented in Mukuthi muguthi; Tennala Ramakrishna is the poet-hero of his ambitious play, Kavi bhikshe. The racy dialogue and the lively movement of the action as well as highly theatrical scenes have made his plays immensely popular.

Parvathavani has written plays for the radio and the television. He is a versatile actor and has appeared on the stage and in Kannada films. He has directed plays for the stage, the radio and the television. He is a member of the programme advisory board of both the media. He has been honoured by the Karnataka Government (1983) and several other academic and cultural institutions, among them the Kannada Sahitya Parishad (1970), the State Sahitya Academy (1974), and the State Natak Academy. The state government has also awarded a pension in recognition of his services to the theatre. He was appointed President of the Karnataka Natak Academy in 1990.

He is a Fellow of the Sangeet Natak Akademi, and is the moving spirit of a troupe of amateur actors called Nam Company. His other works include:

Varshikotsava, Kadmansa, Outhane, Bellakki, Adahpatahala, Lanchamrita, Undadi gunda, Sundropasundru, Viparyasa, Bahadaur ganda, Satyameva jayate, Hanahaddu, Ishtartha, Deepa pishachi Deepa, Yahkaschit hengasu, Vishvaranga, Hamlet, Macbeth, Bhoothagalu, Puthali; Modified Versions: Shakuntala, Mirchchhakatika; Original Plays: Thappu hejje, Saptapadi, Kichaka, Kavibhikshe, Pindakkagi, Haggada kone, Mukuthi muguthi, Thinnabeke thindu kudiyabeke, Jenugoodu, Meena maduve, Nayi bala, Nayi bogalithu.

PASANAHA CHARIU (Apabhramsha; AD 10th-11th c.) is an epic written by Padmakirti, who often refers to himself as Pauma. He was the disciple of Jinasena of the Senasangha. Another version of the epic associates the author with Mathur-gachchha which flourished in northern India. This version is found in the Jaina grantha prashastisangraha, Vol.II. The epic has eighteen 'sandhis' covering about 3300 shlokas. The story of Parshva, the twenty-third Tirthankara who flourished 250 years before Mahavira, is narrated in this epic. The first seven sandhis are taken up by the description of the nine previous lives of Parshva. It is a long story of two brothers, one gradually progressing to the stage of the Tirthankara by his good behaviour and the other experiencing torments of hell and animal life due to his bad behaviour. This part of the story mainly follows earlier works like the Uttarapurana. The second and third sandhis discuss the futility of royal pleasures and the duties of householders, while the sixth sandhi has descriptions of seasons and sports as found in Sanskrit epics. The eighth sandhi contains description, in the traditional manner, of celebrations at the birth of Parshva. The next four sandhis seem to be an innovation in the imaginative depiction of valour. The kingdom of Ravikriti, maternal uncle of Parshva, was invaded by a Yavana king who demanded the hand of his daughter. Parshva proceeded to help his uncle and won a fierce battle. He, however, declined to marry and became an ascetic. Once he had been engrossed in meditation, an Asura (his enemy in the previous lives) started persecuting him, which is described in detail in the fourteenth sandhi. The last four sandhis enunciate the Jaina dogma as part of Parshva's preachings. Cosmology, mythology and ethics, as found in the Jaina canon, are presented briefly in the sandhis. The poem reflects the author's erudition in traditional doctrines as well as the poetical conventions of his age. The war episode in Parshva's life is an innovation. The language of the poem is simple in its didactic parts and ornate in imaginative descriptions. The figures of speech are comparable to those found in Sanskrit epics.

PATAKA (Sanskrit). The term denotes the most important and crucial episode in a play.

Derived from the root 'pat' ('to go') with an irregular suffix, the word 'pataka' (literally 'one which goes') has acquired from very early times the meaning of a flag (Amarakosha).

In dramaturgy the word is used metaphorically to mean an episode which, though contained in a part of the play, illumines the whole of it, i.e. helps develop the entire plot of the play, just as a banner on a high flag-staff, posted at one place, inspires the whole army.

'Pataka' is one of the five arthaprakritis, elements of the plot of a play. It is an incidental action but takes the dimension of an episode (pradhanavat). Subordinate in position to the main plot as it is. the 'pataka' helps the whole plot develop (pradhanasyopakaraka). It is limited to a part of the play and is not extended to the conclusion.

Some authorities, with a view to simplifying the definition, say that the 'pataka', as a matter of fact, is the description of the character and the exploits of a subordinate hero (upanayakacharita). It is true that though the 'pataka' episode is employed to develop the main plot to the benefit of the hero, it gives some prominence to the character of the subordinate hero also.

The definition of 'pataka' in the Natyashastra of Bharata is fairly clear and has been exhaustively explained by Sagaranandin (Natakalakshanaratnakosha. ch. 4).

A good example of 'pataka' is the episode of Karna in Bhattanarayana's Venisamhara, Act IV.

S.M.

PATAKA-STHANAKA (Sanskrit). Literally, it means 'place of banner'. It implies an equivocal speech or a situation which, like a place from where a banner is visible at a distance, foreshadows a coming event. It could be either (1) an unexpected but agreeable turn of events, or (2) an equivocal speech as in figures like 'anyokti' (poetic description of the irrelevant, suggesting the relevant), or 'samasokti' (paranomastic adjectives), or (3) an unexpected mixing up of different dialogues alluding to some future event.

PATANANI PRABHUTA, GUJARATANO NATHA, RAJADHIRAJA (Gujarati) is a trilogy in Gujarati by K.M. Munshi. These novels deal with the Solanki rule in Gujarat. There is a chronological continuity in this historical trio, yet each of these novels is enjoyable separately too.

Patanani prabhuta, the first of the series published in 1916 under the pseudonym 'Ghanashyama', has Asmita (self-consciousness) as its theme. Minaldevi, the Rajamata, craves for power at any cost, while Munjal, the amatya (minister) believes in the people's rule. He is interested in the harmony and integrity of Gujarat. Just to gain power, Minaldevi joins hands with Anandsuri but the people of Patana revolt and depose Minaldevi, who ultimately realizes the greatness of Patana. The magnanimity of Munjal and his selflessness are the most impressive parts of the novel. The characters of Devprasad, Tribhuvan and Prasanna are quite interesting. The immature and tempestuous love of Tribhuvan and Prasanna is interestingly narrated.

Gujaratano natha, published three years later in 1919, puts forward the concept of the integrity of entire Aryavarta. There is a four-year gap between the end of Patanani prabhuta and the beginning of Gujaratano natha. The political situation of the novel has two contexts: treaty with Avanti and conflict with Sorath. The novel emphasizes that national unity is essential to face outside invasion and defend liberty. Just to project this idea, the author introduces the character of Kirtidev, who is the child of Munshi's creative imagination. Kirtidev tries to uphold the unity of Patana and Avanti but Munjal opposes this, and the dream of Kirtidev is shattered. Kak also proposes to unite Aryavarta, but by power. He is one of the memorable characters in the Gujarati novel. His adventures, designed to fulfil his political ambitions and to win Manjari's heart, cover the major part of the novel and are narrated in a romantic style. Udayan plays the villain and his clash with Kak for the fair hand of Manjari is elaborately described. The aim of the episode is to add passion to a tale of adventure. The importance of Kak is further heightened in Rajadhiraja, the last of the series. Kak departs for Sorath. In the absence of Kak, Revapal revolts in the region of Lata and declares independence, but the army of Patana crushes the revolt. To bring about a union of Lata and Patana, Kak arranges the marriage of Mrinalkumvariba, the princess of Lata, with Maharaj Jaidev, but fails to establish peace. He struggles hard to win over the disgruntled soldiers of Lata and at last becomes successful. The delineation of the characters of Revapal, Dhruvasen and Liladevi is such that their fidelity towards Lata does not look narrow. However, the writer wants to suggest that in the context of the times geographical integrity is necessary for self-defence. This viewpoint is expressed by Kak.

In this trio, Patanani prabhuta is more compact than Gujaratano natha and Rajadhiraja which are nearer to romance. The plot of the latter two is loose and full of improbable elements. Nevertheless, Gujaratano natha is the best known novel of Munshi. Incidents replete with suspense, and action charged with thrill are so powerful that the reader's attention is immediately arrested. One incident leads on to another and thus maintains the main fabric of the story. Characters are not less living and powerful. Conflicting instincts are found in Munjal. As Taraporewala says. 'Munjal is a great psychological study of human character'. Munjal, Minaldevi, Kak, Manjari, Kirtidev, etc. stand for different viewpoints and yet each one of them is equally attractive. Historical characters and the imaginary ones, both engage the readers. Though there are references to Munjal and Kak in the history of Gujarat, they are quite transformed in the narrative. Kak is very much glorified here and treated as a hero, while Siddharaj Jaisimha, a respectable king of Gujarat, loses his grace. Actually, Munshi does not go strictly by historical facts: his aim is to make the story interesting. The relationship between Minal and Munjal is an instance. Chronological and geographical details often lack accuracy. Dumas, the French novelist, may have stirred the mind of Munshi while he was writing these novels, but as Anandshankar Dhruva says Dumas never enters our mind while reading Munshi. This trio forcefully demonstrates that the story-element is fundamental to the art of narration. Conflict and dramatization of situations, individuality of characters, short and sparkling dialogues, picturesque narration, lucid and artistic prose are the salient features of the trio which contribute greatly to the treasure of Gujarati fiction.

PATANJALI (Sanskrit). Panini, Katyayana and Patanjali are traditionally known as the three sages who gave law and discipline to the science of Sanskrit grammar. Panini in the sixth century B.C. composed Sutras (aphorisms) containing technical terms and rules. His work known as Astadhyayi consists of nearly 4,000 sutras, divided into eight chapters with further sub-divisions.

Probably in the third century B.C. Katyayana wrote his Varttikas, a commentary on Astadhyayi, examining some of the the current views on grammar and criticising Panini occasionally.

Coming after Katyayana and while writing a commentary on Astadhyayi and Varttikas, Patanjali raised the standard of the science of grammar to perfection in his Mahabhashya, defending or justifying Panini and criticising Katyayana.

Patanjali's commentary has been regarded as Mahabhashya or the 'Great Commentary', because it excels subsequent commentaries on all subjects including grammar. An analogy to the use of the qualifying adjective maha, prefixed to 'bhashya' may be traced to the Bhagavata which is called the Mahapurana. Patanjali's book is divided into a number of 'ahnikas' literally, a discourse a day, indicating a lively discussion that makes it interesting. It may be noted that Patanjali's commentary on all the sutras of Panini is not complete. It is also not known if he left some sutras out of his scheme. Many funny stories try to explain the omission and one even tells us that some leaves were eaten up by a goat.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

According to tradition all ancient Indian grammarians such as Varsha, Upvarsha, Vyadi, Panini, Katyayana, and Patanjali lived and worked in Pataliputra, the modern Patna. Historical evidence, however, shows Panini a westerner.

Patanjali was a contemporary of the Shunga king, Pushyamitra, who ascended the throne in 178 BC. Pushyamitra shifted the capital from Pataliputra to Saket in ancient Ayodhya. It is plausible that Patanjali, with the removal of the capital, migrated to Ayodhya. In all probability, he was the priest for Pushyamitra's 'Ashvamedha yajna' (Horse-sacrifice), as he says: "We have performed here the sacrifice for Pushyamitra (iha pushyamitram yajayamah)." He further alludes to the seize of Saket and Madhyamika by a Yavana king (arunad yavanah Saketam, arunad yavano Madhyamikam), identified now as Menander, the Greek ruler of ancient Bactria who had invaded Saket in 156-153 B.C.

It may be noted that while using the past tense for the Yavana invader, Patanjali refers to the sacrifice in the present. Thus, it may be concluded reasonably safely that Patanjali started working on his 'Great Commentary' about 150 B.C.

Patanjali has delved deep into the functional aspect of language. He says, "One just goes to a potter when one needs a pot and asks him to make a pot: none ever goes to a grammarian and asks him to produce words for using." Here the role of Patanjali's grammarian is to regulate the functional use of grammar and explain word-formations scientifically.

Patanjali also deals with the value of word or word-meaning relation. The conception that words objectively denote objects with their own power and are, as a matter of fact, same as the things they denote seems to have originated in Panini, but it is Patanjali who puts it on its logical footing. Bhartrihari, one of the older commentators on Mahabhashya, has further explained the theory. Thus, the school of grammar admits only the direct property of words (abhidhavritti) and does not accept others such as 'lakshana' (indirect elliptical meaning) and 'vyanana' (suggestive, implied meaning) as propounded by the rhetoricians.

Patanjali's Mahabhashya preserves Katyayana's Varttikas on some 1245 sutras of Panini, takes up his criticism, and in many cases defends Panini. He carries further his predecessor's work by examining the other sutras of Panini and by correcting and explaining them. It is clear that Patanjali had many works before him besides Katyayana's, as there had been other Varttikas and Karikas too. Among them Patanjali mentions Vyadi, about whose Samgraha much has been conjectured but very little known. Mahabhashya, apart from being the first comprehensive treatise on the school of grammar, is also a mine of information on the literary, cultural, social and economic life of the time. Patanjali refers to the genre of literature and mentions three prose narratives (Akhyayikas), Vasavadatta, Sumanottara and Bhaimarathi, and two dramas, Kamsavadha and Balibandha. His reference to the avocation of dancer and actor suggests his close association with the artiste. Innumerable allusions in his work, however, make it difficult reading for the students of later times. Nevertheless, Mahabhashya is remarkable for the simplicity of its language and the lucidity of its exposition.

B.S.

PATANJALI: THE PHILOSOPHER (Sanskrit). The Yogasutra is ascribed to Patanjali and the similarity of name has led to the wrong identification of the philosopher with the grammarian Patanjali, the author of Mahabhashya. Except this similarity there is nothing to suggest one identity for the two.

Yoga is a technical term which means restraining the automatic flush of the mind. There were different methods of practising the Yoga in ancient India before the advent of the Yogasutra of Patanjali. Some of these were connected with 'Pranayama' or the science of breath. Patanjali took all the methods and systems into consideration and codified them in aphorisms arranged systematically. Patanjali was probably the most notable person of his time for he not only collected the different forms of the Yoga practices and gleaned the diverse ideas which were or, could be, associated with the Yoga, but grafted them all on Samkhya metaphysics, and gave them the form known as the Yogasutra.

It is for this reason that the Samkhya and the Yoga are clubbed together and the two schools have been regarded as one. The Samkhya is held as an atheistic system while the Yoga is theistic. The Yoga system, embedded in the Samkhya, gave the system a new orientation, and the concept of the 'Purusha vishesa' as God was added. Thus it also became one 'tattva' with the twenty-five enumerated by the Samkhya. Patanjali is not the originator of the Yoga system. He compiled the sutras and is thus a compiler or an editor.

The date of Patanjali is a hotly debated question. With reference to the Yoga in the 'Upanishads' and other old literature his date is pushed back to the third century B.C. or even earlier. On the other hand, with the criticism of the Buddhist and some other views in the fourth part of the Yogasutra his date is dragged down to the third or the fourth century AD. Some scholars hold that the fourth part of the Yogasutra is a later addition to the work, hence the date of Patanjali should not be determined on its evidence. Taking all contradictory views into consideration it is generally held that Patanjali flourished in the second century BC.

The Yogasutra is divided into four parts and each part deals with a specific aspect of the Yoga. The first part known as the 'samadhipada' deals with the nature and aim of the samadhi or meditative absorption; the second part is called the 'sadhanapada', which elaborates the means of attaining the samadhi; the third part is named the 'vibhutipada' because it discusses the super-normal powers which one can attain by practising the Yoga following the prescribed rules; and the fourth part is termed as the 'mokshapada' since in this part the liberation from bondage is discussed and, in the process, theories of other systems are refuted. It has already been mentioned that this part, according to some scholars, is not from Patanjali's pen and in support of their argument they point out that the word 'iti' (here it ends) is found at the end of the third part of the Yogasutra. Though the fourth part may not have been written by Patanjali, the other three parts are taken as his original Yogasutra and their composition is placed in the second century BC. The Yogasutra is commented upon by Vyasa (fourth century AD) and his commentary known as Vyasabhashya is the only source to know the aphorism of Patanjali. The basic doctrine of the Yoga system as enunciated by Patanjali may be summed up as follows:

Ignorance of the true nature of things causes desires and the like, which are the sources of pain and suffering in the world. It is needless to trace the origin of ignorance because the world is without a beginning. Even in 'pralaya' (delusion) the individual 'chitta' (intellect) and 'purusha' turn to 'prakriti' and live within it together with their own 'avidya' (ignorance), and at the time of each new creation or evolution of the world these are created anew with such changes as are due to the individual 'avidyas'.

Further, the Yoga accounts for the creation by two agencies, God and 'avidya'. Through the force of the latter, the ever evolving energy of 'prakriti' transforms into modifications in the shapes of mental and material universe while God, though remaining outside the pale of 'prakriti' removes the obstructions offered by the latter. While the Samkhya holds that knowledge is the means to liberation, the Yoga emphasises the need of concentration and constant striving for it. It is seen that scholars in the medieval period have made an attempt to combine Jnana and Yoga as the means to liberation.

PATANKAR, RAJARAM BHALCHANDRA (Marathi; b.1927) is a critic and scholar of modern aesthetics. After doing his M.A. in English from the University of Pune, he taught at different colleges in Maharashtra and Gujarat during 1951-1964. He wrote his thesis on 'Communication in literature' for the Ph.D. degree. In 1964 he joined the University of Bombay as Reader in English and became Head of the Department in 1978. He has, in fact, taught both Aesthetics and English for several years.

His first book Aesthetics and Literary Criticism was published in 1969. This was followed by three books in Marathi, namely Saundarya mimansa (1974), Croceche saundarya shastra: ek bhashya (1974) and Kantchi saundaryamimansa (1977). Of these, Saundarya mimansa received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1975). Apart from this, he has written a number of articles on aesthetics for different periodicals. Prabhakar Padhye has written a book on Patankar's theories and principles of aesthetics, namely Patankaranchi saundarya mimansa (1977). Recently, Patankar has written a book evaluating Muktibodh's contribution to literature, entitled Muktibodhanche sahitya (1986). He has also published some poems under the pen name 'Ariel'.

PATAYANI (Malayalam) is an ancient folk art-form of Kerala. It is usually a ten-day long ceremony conducted in some temples of Southern Kerala. This ritualistic folk art-form has its own characteristic costumes and make-up. Villages of Central Travancore like Katammanitta, Malayalappuzha and Thakazhi used to have annual Patayani festivals, performed by traditionally trained experts.

Ancient tunes and talas are employed in the Patayani songs which are composed distinctly for each day of the Patayani festival. Dravidian metrical tunes like 'indhisha' are employed in Patayani songs as seem in the line 'Chandanattanalute indisha pativarum kilippenne' (the bird girl who comes through the shades of sandalwood tree, singing indisha). A lot of Keralite talas are also found employed in the Patayani music.

Patayani is a powerful medium for the villagers to keep up purely folk traditions in art, religion and social life. Patayani is a dying art and no exhaustive study seems to have been made so far of this art-form.

PATEL, BHOLABHAI SHANKARBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1934) was a critic, translator and writer of personal essays and travelogues. He did his M.A. in Hindi, and took a Diploma in Linguistics and German language. For his Ph.D. degree he wrote a thesis in Hindi on Agyeya: ek adhyayan, recently published by Gujarat University. At present he is Professor and Head of the Hindi Department, Gujarat University. He is also Secretary of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad and Editor of its organ Parab.

His critical articles are compiled in books like Surdasni kavita (1972), Adhuna (1973), Poorvapar (1975), Bharatiya tunki vartao (1975), Kalpurush (1977), Adhunikta ane Gujarati kavita (1987), These books contain articles on literary works in Bengali, Oriya, Assamese, Marathi and Hindi literature in particular, displaying his method of elucidating the creative writer's point of view and his experience. Vidisha (1980) is a collection of his articles on travels. He has a certain knack of portraying, with the help of literary allusions, his responses to various places. Purvottar (1981) is another travelogue in a diary form, describing his visits to Assam and the eastern regions of India. Similarly, Kanchanjanga (1985) and Radhe tara dungariya par (1981) also make interesting readings. A majority of them contain reminiscences of places visited, topographical details and minute observation, and many of them fall in the genre of the personal essay.

Bholabhai's work as a translator is highly commendable. Chidambara (1969) is the Gujarati version of the work of Sumitranandan Pant, the celebrated Hindi poet, done in collaboration with Raghuvir Chaudhari. Likewise Vanlata Sen (1974) is the Gujarati translation of an anthology of Jibanananda Das, the Bengali poet. Prachin and Nishith are the Hindi versions of the poetry of Umashankar Joshi, the eminent Gujarati poet. His other translations include: Vinayak Athvale's Vishnu Digamber (1967), Gopal Singh's Guru Nanak (1969), Maheshwar Neog's Shankar Deo (1970), Vasudev Sharan Agarwal's Harsha charit, Sunil Gangopadhyaya's Swargani niche manushya and Buddhadev Basu's Tapaswi o tarangini. We get a good idea of his proficiency in translation from these works as well as from his Bengali sahityana itihasni ruprekha (1982) and Samkalin Asamiya kavita (1982).

Among the books edited by him, mention may be made of Jivannun kavya (1982) and Gujarati sahityano aathmo daiko (1982).

PATEL, DHIRUBEN (Gujarati; b. 1926) is a novelist, short story writer and dramatist. She did her M.A. in English literature and taught at Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan's Somani College, Bombay, for a few years. Later, she switched over to journalism and edited Sudha, a women's weekly in Gujarati. As editor, she brought to light many young talented women writers. Subsequently, she gave up editorship and devoted herself fully to writing. She also wrote for Gujarati films and has to her credit the script and songs of Bhavani bhavai, a film produced and directed by Ketan Mehta, which won her laurels at national as well as international film festivals.

Patel's first novel, Vedavanata (1963), is a massive work of about 625 pages. It is an attempt at probing the psyche of its two principal women characters, Rekha and Anjana. The story is narrated from the viewpoint of Rekha, who has been accused of murdering Anjana. While undergoing trial, Rekha puts down in writing her past experiences, involving humiliation and mental torture inflicted on her by Anjana.

Vamshano ankura (1967), her second work, stands in contrast with her first novel. It is a novelette running into 172 pages. Kesava, a young rebellious boy, and his benevolent but autocratic grandfather, Ramanikalal, are the two principal characters of the story. Though indebted to his grandfather for a comfortable upbringing, Kesava, like a fresh bamboo shoot, desires to break new grounds. The book displays the author's deep insight into the workings of a young mind, and is marked by freshness of expression and a fascinating narrative technique.

Simalanam phula (1976), Paradukhabhanjana Pestanaji (1978), Ek bhalo manasa (1979), Vavantola (1979), and Vamala (1980) are her other novels.

Simalanam phula is a delicate love story, Paradukhabhanjana Pestanaji is a light humorous novelette. Ek bhalo manasa deals with the life of a common man who, by circumstances, is drawn to the world of crime. Vavantola depicts skilfully the traumatic experiences of Taja, a destitute girl who was adopted by a well-to-do but broken family. Vamala revolves round complications created in the life of a newly married woman by a sudden resurgence of the memories of her previous birth.

Patel has also to her credit three collections of short stories, Adhuro kola (1955), Ek lahara (1957), and Visrambhakatha (1966), and some collections of plays including Pahelum inama (1957), Pankhinomelo (1957), Mananomanolo (1959), Vinasane punthe (1961) and Namani nagaravela (1961). She has also written some delightful verses for children which have been collected in Mitranam jodakanam and a full-length play for children, namely Anderi ganderi tipari tena (1966).

Patel does not believe in experiments for the sake of experiments, nor is she a blind follower of tradition. Never repeating herself, she tries to delve deep into the human mind and examines the complex fabric of social relations. This has made her works popular with both the discerning critic and the average reader.

D.B.M.

PATEL, GIEVE (English; b. 1940) was educated at St. Xavier's High School and Grant Medical College, Bombay. A doctor by profession, he is interested in painting and writes poetry and plays. His two plays Princes and Savaksa were staged in Bombay in 1970 and 1982 respectively. In 1984, he was awarded a Woodrow Wilson Fellowship to the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D.C. to write a play which, when completed, became Mister Behram.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Gieve Patel is not a prolific writer. So far he has published only two collections of poems : Poems (1966) and How Do You Withstand, Body (1976). The third is likely to be published in 1988. The subjects of his poetry are poverty, loss and pain, mortality, decay and violence. No doubt he is concerned more with the plight of the underdog and the oppressed lepers, servants and others, but he is no less concerned with the sufferings of his fellowmen.

What characterizes Patel's poetry is its precision. He scrutinizes an object or a situation, usually in the Indian scene, the critical exactness and detachment. The poem 'On Killing a Tree' has a strange evocative power and suggestive multiplicity of meanings with a powerful undercurrent of subtle, Swiftean irony making the horrors of the threat of violence a real experience. Such poems have the richness of distilled experience. An object, an incident or a situation acts as a catapult to lead the poet's imagination into meaningful associations with the things belonging to the past or into interesting observations on the future, even though he remains clawed by an invisible force to the present.

Patel does not indulge in writing sentimental lyrics even when his compassion tempts him into it.

His is a compelling but detached voice. Suppressing the impulse of a too personal voice, he approaches the subject cautiously and raises it to the level of universality. He is also not a dexterous craftsman. His hold on the rhyme and the rhythm is far from perfect. Except for an occassional simile or metaphor, he uses imagery sparingly.

In How Do You Withstand, Body, Patel shows again his concern for poverty and violence relating to both the body and the mind, though at times giving an unpleasant impression of a search in an overexplored territory. In such poems, his observation becomes more acute. Quite a few of his poems are fragmentary in nature, giving the impression of splintered and dissipated energy instead of the harnessing of a powerful embodied force. They do not also have the expected polished shapes and contours but seem to have been crudely hacked or torn from the main block of experience, leaving uneven edges, even though the experience behind them is unmistakably universal. Patel's published work is small but within its limit his achievement is considerable.

PATEL, MAGANBHAI BHUDHARBHAI (Gujarati; b.1905, d.1970), the Gujarati poet, wrote under several pen names, such as 'Patil', 'Ikaksari', 'Yashobala', 'Jayasena', 'Neelpadma' and 'Snehanaiya'. He studied up to Intermediate, ran a cloth shop for a few years, worked as a government clerk for sometime, and then taught at various educational institutions at Kadi, Ankalesar and Surat. Now and then he gave up service and took to farming. For a while, he edited the literary page of Gujaratmitra, a daily published from Surat. He began his writing career with ghazals in English. He also translated Tennyson's In Memoriam into rhythmic verse in Gujarati. He experimented different metrical patterns in the same composition. He tried his hand at various verse forms like 'ghazal', 'qasida', 'tarana', 'tarj', 'gatha', 'khayanan', 'ras', 'sonnet', 'katha kavya', etc. Apart from Gujarati, he wrote poems in Persian, Urdu and Hindustani. In addition to poetry, he wrote short stories, humorous essays, playlets in verse and prose, life-sketches of writers, and critical articles. His poetic diction reflects very strongly the influence of Persian and medieval poetry. Love is his favourite theme, and Byron his favourite poet.

His important works are: Pratapsingh (1934), Prabhatnarmada (1940), Vyamoh javanika (1975), Atulianar (1976), Mari urvashi (1976), Patilnan chutelan kavya (1977).

PATEL, PANNALAL NANALAL (Gujarati; b. 1913, d. 1988), is a gifted novelist, short story writer, dramatist and autobiographer. He was born in a village on the border of Rajasthan and Gujarat, and is an example of a man who, in spite of scant formal schooling, rose to be one of the greatest of Gujarati writers. Early in life he worked as a pipe-fitter, an oilman in an electricity company and a common textile mill worker, but his innate creative ability took him to writing. A staunch devotee of Aurobindo and the Mother, he held that 'creative power' is a gift of God.

Manavini bhavai (1947), his magnum opus that won him the Jnanapith Award, is apparently the story of love between Kalu and Raju, but it is the hard and tragic life of farmers in Indian villages that is in fact depicted here. The struggle for existence in an inhospitable land, sharply aggravated by famine and hardships, is the basic fact of their life. The pangs of hunger and, worst of all, the utter humiliation of subsisting on charity, are touchingly brought out. Rarely has the village of Gujarat pulsing with life been so artistically etched as in this novel. The next major novel is his Malela jiv (Souls united), published in 1941. The story narrates the love affair between Kanji and Jivi who belong to different castes. Their mental conflict resulting from caste-barriers is vividly described. The novel has a well-made plot, life-like characterization, apprehension of the tragic in life, and an original style. Patel wrote more than fifty novels, but these two made him a celebrity. Amongst his other prominent novels are Valamanan (1940), Bhiru sathi (1943), Bhagyanan bheru (1957), Ghummar valonun (1947), Na chhutke (1955), Pachchale barane (1947), etc.

In his later years Patel turned to puranic themes, and cast those stories into the narrative form. Perhaps, artistically they are of uneven merit. His Min matinan manavi (1966), however, gives a fresh evidence of his earlier craftsmanship. Like almost all his novels, the story is set in Sabarkantha, his native district; it is a world of people struggling in a corrupt, custom-ridden society, weighed down by poverty, illiteracy, forces of casteism and local politics. Still there are men and women who err, and yet assert their innate dignity in moments of crisis.

Patel's characteristic use of local idiom and dialect lends his novels great charm. The vigour and freshness of his stories do not owe less to such a creative use of the language.

Patel has published more than twenty collections of short stories, prominent among them being Sukh-dukhna sathi (1940), Vatraka ne kanthe (1952) and Morlina munga sur (1966). 'National savings', 'Vatrak-ne kanthe', 'Lakh chorasi', 'Kukadinun Indu' and 'Morlina munga sur' are some of his excellent short stories that linger long in the reader's mind. Besides fiction, he has written plays, autobiographical works, children's literature and some essays also.

Pannalal has won quite a few awards, prizes and medals. He received the famous Ranjitram Gold Medal of 1950 for his contribution to literature. He was elected President of the creative literature section at the 30th session of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad held at Baroda in 1979. He was invited to attend an international literary conference held at Uganda in 1962.

Pannalal, a major Gujarati novelist, is a re-creator of people's life. His is the example of a writer who is dedicated to men and women and whose spiritual goal, to use his own words, is to "search for the sun with the light of the lamp."

PATEL, PITAMBER NARSINHBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1918, d. 1978) was a novelist and short story-writer. He did his B.A. in 1940 from L.D. Arts College, Ahmedabad, and his M.A. in 1942. He worked for the Ahmedabad centre of All India Radio from 1956 onwards. He was Secretary of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad for many years. For some years, he edited Aram, a periodical of short stories.

His novels offer an authentic portrayal of village as well as town life. His works include Rasiyo jiv (1942) Parivartan (1944), Ugyun prabhat (1950), Khetarne khole (1952), Tejrekha (1952), Ashabhari (1954), Antarna ajwala (1960), Chirantan jyot (1960), Dhartina ami (1962); Kevadiyano kanto (1965), Dhartina moja (1966), etc. In a couple of his novels, he has effectively brought out the local colour and regional environment, and therefore, they are noteworthy among the regional novels of Gujarat.

Some of his best short stories are compiled in a number of story-books, such as Vagadana phul (1944), Milap, Shraddha-deep (1952), Kalpana (1954), Shamna-ni rakh (1954), Saubhagya-no shangar (1963), Nil gagan-na pankhi (1964), Ruda Sarvariyani pal (1964), Jhulta minara (1966). Emphasis on regional atmosphere, predominance of social evil, and complications discernible in human relations are the salient features of his short stories.

His book, Bharatna nava yatradhamo, is quite informative, and has richness of details gleaned from personal experience. The book is written in a lucid style and shows the writer's ability to produce thumb-nail impressions of persons and places. Mansaini vato and Mangal vato are his edited works. His other writings, such as essays, are collected in various volumes, namely Chhuta-chheda. Ghar-betha-ganga, Limbdani-ek-dal-mithi, etc.

His forte as a writer is depiction of the toils and troubles of village life.

B.J.

PATEL, RAVJI (Gujarati; b.1939, d.1968) was a poet, novelist and short story writer. He had his schooling at Ahmedabad. The bent of his mind was academic, but he could not go beyond two years of college education due to poor health. At an early age he suffered from tuberculosis and later developed some kind of mental disorder too. Yet by nature he was sensitive, inquisitive and generous. He started writing during his school days. In 1964 he edited a poetry journal, Shabda, in collaboration with poet Mukund Parikh. This experience enriched his creative life. Essentially a poet, he tried his hand at different literary genres, namely poetry, novel, short story and letters.

Angat (1971), a collection of all his available poems, was published posthumously by his friends. The two main emotions depicted in his poems are love of nature and love of man. He apprehends the beauty of nature emotionally, though at times he is conscious of a spiritual power mainfesting itself in nature. Suffering in love, anguish and pessimism are some other recurring sentiments in his poetry which is otherwise marked by romantic intensity, lyrical fervour and rich imagery.

There is yet another aspect to his poetic experience—the experience of peasant life. The dark side of urban life is also depicted by him. He was, however, not a spokesman of westernized modern sensibility, though he does depict the perplexity and suffocation of modern life. He spoke sometimes in the language of a non-conformist, sometimes of a rebel, sometimes of absurd lamentation and often of denial. His poetry possessed a few qualities of traditional poetry also, viz., brevity, concealment and metrical pattern, besides the sensibility, style and experimentation of modern poetry.

His novella, Ashrughar (1966), is a love story, dealing with a patient drawn to death. Though the theme is not new, its treatment and freshness of approach make it interesting.

Zanza (1968), on the other hand, is a full-length novel a story of the inner storm of a young man. After having been tired of the civilized social life, the hero quits his home, is exposed to the world outside, and then returns home with valuable experience. The story is told in the first person narrative form while the narration itself makes use of notes from a diary and tape recorder and such other devices.

Patel wanted to write a long novel to be his magnum opus, but owing to his untimely death, the work remained incomplete. After his death, his unfinished novel and the few short stories he had written were put together and published in a single volume, entitled Vriti ane varta (1977). There are eleven stories altogether, some of which have become quite popular, namely 'Ek ghadina panchoterma bhagno unmad', 'Chhabilkakano bijo pag' and 'Ghetan'. The themes of these stories are sexual instinct and death , and the author has shown great talent in a symbolic and artistic treatment of their challenging themes.

PATEL, SARDAR VALLABHABHAI (Gujarati; b.1875, d. 1950) was born at Nadiad in an agriculturist family, and had his primary and secondary education at Karamsad, Petlad and Nadiad. Owing to the weak financial position of the family, he had to appear at an examination for recruitment as a District Pleader rather than go in for higher educational courses. He started his professional career as a pleader, first at Godhara and then at Borsad. Later, he obtained the Barrister's degree from England, and started his practice as a lawyer in Ahmedabad and took active part in civic and political affairs and eventually became one of the architects of modern India.

Sardar Patel may not be a creative writer but he has a few volumes of lectures, discourses and letters, and a small diary to his credit. He did not plan to write anything for posterity, and therefore all his writing was action-oriented. He applied his mind to a wide range of problems which the country faced at that time and articulated them in his letters. His diary is a precise account of a prisoner.

His prose is terse and his style vigorous. He never tried any ornamentation in his expression. Because of his maturity of thought, striking illustrations, apt similes and metaphors, and sharp wit and humour, his writings are quite forceful. These writings, though topical, are a significant contribution to our culture and literature and are a testimony to the fact that the Sardar was not only a great political leader but also a powerful prose writer.

PATH KE SATHI (Hindi), the collection of literary memoirs by Mahadevi Verma, was published in 1956. Along with details about contemporary writers, we get a glimpse of Mahadevi's own life here. From this point of view we find an autobiographical touch in these memoirs. Sometimes we find in them the element of literary analysis also. Apparently, we have here a mingling of many prose genres.

Starting with Rabindranath Tagore, the fountain source of inspiration for the chhayavadi poets, the book has seven memoirs revealing the creative personalities of Maithilisharan Gupta, Subhadrakumari Chauhan, Nirala, Prasad, Pant and Siyaramsharan Gupta. The speciality of the book lies in the fact that in addition to giving memoirs of literary figures, it presents the events and ethos of the age in which they lived and wrote. The attempt of the writer has been to present a personality objectively, but she knows the difficulty too: "It is not easy to say something about senior or contemporary writers, keeping one's own self absolutely de-linked." Mahadevi had the opportunity of being in close contact with the important authors of her time, and the values and ideals they cherished constantly influenced her. To write about them, she felt, was to express one's gratitude to them and to acknowledge the debt of inspiration received from them.

Why these memoirs are regarded as different from 'sketches' is because one can draw the sketch of a person after a single meeting with him. A sketch tends to offer a momentary glimpe of the person and the writer can be detached from the whole situation, but a memoir demands a deeper and closer contact with the person. The memoirs of Path ke sathi are based upon an intimate association with the authors; therefore we find in them a large dimension of experience and intensity of emotion. The memoir 'Dadda Maithilisharan Gupta' starts with spontaneity of feelings: "Since when have I known Guptaji? Till now I have no simple answer to this question. My memory goes back to a very dim page of the past which has no clear imprint of the lines of year or colours of situations. What I can recollect is the image of myself—a girl wanting to be a poetess." This is how Mahadevi's own life intervenes in the memoir, and she keeps reflecting on the poet in her and the creative processes of her poetry. For example, she tells us that she started writing poetry in Brajbhasha and in the tradition of 'samasya purti'.

Sometimes she gives us the pen-picture of a particular writer; there we have the element of sketch. This is what she writes about Dadda: "In the appearance of Guptaji there was nothing which could mark him out as extraordinary. Average middle height, ordinary head gear or its modernised form the Gandhi cap, 'angarakha dhoti' or

'kurta dhoti', and the expansive Indianness limiting itself to a particular community by wearing 'Tulsi kanthi'."

In addition to bringing out the particular traits in a personality she concentrates upon the circumstances that had a role in the making of an author. For example, the financial hardships and struggles in Nirala's life as well as the generosity of his disposition have been aptly brought out. In Mahadevi's hands the memoirs become creative prose, indeed. On Subhadrakumari Chauhan, it is a friend who comments with intimacy; on Jaishankar Prasad and Sumitranandan Pant it is the tone of reverence. For example, "Whenever I think of Mahakavi Prasad, always the same picture stands out in my memory: a cedar tree standing erect on the slope of the Himalayas trying to compete with its lofty peaks, enduring the blows of the sun, snow and rain, his forehead reared high, his wide branches bearing the strokes of storm and thunder, his roots wet by a narrow current playing hide and seek with them." The memoir on Siyaramasharan Gupta is very touching as it presents the author's struggle with serious disease and his desire to contribute to literature in spite of the stranglehood of illness.

To sum up, we can say that Path ke sathi is a marvellous example of creative, pictorial prose and is a landmark among the works of this particular genre in Hindi.

PATHABHI (Telugu; b. 1919) is the pen name of Tikkavarapu Pattabhirami Reddy, who created a sensation by publishing his Phidelu ragala dozen (1939). He discarded the traditional metre and paved the way for free verse. He revolutionised the subject matter of poetry by writing poems on a call girl, a traffic constable and a 'modern lady'. He saw the world from a new perspective and described the rain and the spring in an altogether new manner. Sri Sri, in his Introduction to Phidelu ragala dozen defended Pathabhi's new thought and approach to poetry.

Pathabhi wrote a few other poems such as 'Nilagiri nilimalu', 'Kaita na daita' and 'Pathabhi phanchangam'. With a slender output of poems he carved a niche for himself in modern Telugu poetry.

Born in a rich agriecultural family in Nellore, he had his early education there and in Madras. Afterwards he joined Santiniketan and studied for his B.A. under the guidance of Tagore. Later, he joined the Calcutta University for an M.A. but did not complete his studies. His outlook on life completely changed when he saw the wretched life in Calcutta slums. He wrote his Phidelu ragala dozen when he was still in Calcutta. Pathabhi went to the U.S.A. for higher studies and took his M.A. degree in English Literature from Columbia University. He took a diploma in 'Motion Picture Appreciation' also.

Pathabhi is a revolutionary in real life. During the time when inter caste marriages were rare, he married Snehalatha Pavell, a Christian girl, who was a writer, dancer and actor.

Pathabhi is a multi-faceted artist. He directed the film Samskara in Kannada, which was acclaimed the best picture and awarded the President's Gold Medal and other international prizes. He is an active politician too.

Pathabhi's impact on Telugu literature is powerful in as much as it opened new vistas. He ridiculed the romantic poets and their escapist ways. He was sensitive to the condition of the poor and the oppressed, and expressed his dissent against the prevailing conditions of society.

Pathabhi writes about the sources of his inspiration in his preface 'Thirty Four Years ago'. The authors who influenced him most were Sri Sri and Chalam, Walt Whitman and Oscar Wilde, Freud and Einstein. Tagore influenced him negatively as he tried consciously to break away from his imagery. In his own words, "For the agitated feelings I had which I wished to convey, I felt I had to find new weapons. I want the readers of these poems (Phidelu ragala dozen) to sit up and take note. I was prepared for even abuse.... It is apathy that kills, only out of friction can progress be achieved. This also explains why I wrote all the poems in the first person singular. Buffoonery, egoism and sex were all part of my arsenal."

Phidelu ragala dozen is all of a piece. It contains twelve poems, each of which is a fine example of deep observation, facility of expression and perfect execution. For example, the poet writes about the season of 'Spring in the city of Madras':

> I have heard that the season of spring
> Has visited the city of Madras
> Where is this season of spring?
> I do not hear the songs of birds
> I only hear the endless uproar of trams and buses
> Is it really the spring?

Pathabhi's skill and mastery of rhymes were revealed in 'Kaita na daita'. His 'Nilagiri nilimalu' describes the beauty of the hills of Nilagiri. 'Pathabhi phanchangam' is humorous as well as satirical, and criticizes modern society for its evils.

Pathabhi achieved a breakthrough in Telugu poetry. He is a forerunner of the progressive poets, and his portrayal of urban life influenced many poets of Andhra.

PATHAK, HASAMUKH HARILAL (Gujarati; b. 1930) was born in Palitana, district Bhavanagar, in Gujarat. He did his B.Sc in 1954, and then took the degree and postgraduate courses in Library Science at Delhi University. Since 1955 he has worked as a librarian in various public institutions at Ahmedabad. He also served as Science Librarian at Haile Sellasie University in Ethiopia for two years. At present he is working at the Sardar Patel Institute of Economic and Social Research.

Pathak is one of the pioneers of the modernist movement in Gujarati poetry which used the imagist and symbolic modes of expression and also 'hinopamas', i.e. similes turned into anti-similes in a degrading sense. He broke the rigidity of the traditional 'matramela' metres and took recourse to irregular repetitions of units of syllabic quantity.

Pathak's poetry, however, was deeply concerned with the human predicament and effectively employed the language of the ordinary human beings around him. Nameli sanja (Evening darkness, 1958) is a collection of his poems written during 1952-57. It was included as one section in Sayujya (Bound together, 1972) with another group of poems called Sira namyum (The bowed head), written during 1962-68. These latter poems, though subtle in thought, are usually direct in expression and employ traditional myths with fresh meanings, revealing a spiritual bent of mind. Pathak has also written a few short stories and some critical essays. The essays, published in Samskriti (1967-68), analyse and interpret, minutely and with original insight, some front-rank poems of Gujarati literature with regard to their diction, structure, stylistic features and poetic thoughts. Pathak has also translated the Czechoslovakian poet, Miroslav Holub, under the title Vastunum mula ane bijam kavya (The root of matter and other poems, 1976).

PATHAK, HIRABEN RAMNARAYAN (Gujarati, b. 1916) was a critic and poet. She was married to Ramnarayan Pathak, the eminent Gujarati scholar and writer. For a number of years she worked as a lecturer in Gujarati at S.N.D.T. University, Bombay. She was a member of the Executive Committee of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. Her doctoral thesis was on 'Apnum vivechan sahitya' (History of our literary criticism) which was published in book form in 1939. She has examined the critics from two angles. First, she unfolds the viewpoints embodied in the critical works of a particular critic, and then she analyses how that particular point of view has contributed to the entire development of Gujarati literary criticism. Her two other important books are Kavyabhavan (Critical appreciation of poetry, 1961) and Vidrati (1974).

Parloke patra (Letters written to the other world, 1970) is a collection of twelve letters written in verse, addressed to her deceased husband. The metre used here is 'Vanveli' suitable for conversational style. The poems are elegiac in spirit, in which she reminisces over the past events with nostalgia. Gavaksha deep (1979) is a collection of articles written in appreciation of Sanskrit poetry. The shlokas are selected from a subjective point of view. Her criticism reveals her as a refined and sensitive critic.

PATHAK, JAYANT HIMMATLAL (Gujarati, b. 1920) is essentially a poet, but has done considerable work in the field of biographies, criticism, translation, editing and compiling. He had been in journalism from 1948 to 1953. After passing his M.A. examination, he taught Gujarati literature at Surat from 1953 to 1980. He was Chairman of the Chunilal Gandhi Vidya Bhavan at Surat between 1965 and 1972.

Jayant Pathak started his literary career in 1938 and is still active in the field. His original works are Marmar (1954), Sanket (1960), Vismay (1963), Sarga (1969), Antariksh (1975) and Anunay (1978). All these are collections of poems. Adhunik kavita-pravah is his doctoral thesis (1963), while Alok (1969), Kavyalok (1973) and Bhavayitri (1974) are collections of critical articles. Bhavayitri (1974) is a book of reminiscences with rich regional touches. His translated works, in collaboration, include Cheleko shreshtha navalikao (1957) and Dhire vale chhe don (1961). In addition, he has edited works like Upayan (1961).

The striking quality of Jayant Pathak's verse is its neatness, besides its delicately depicted sentiments. He has assimilated various types of expressions that characterise new poetry and has adopted them in his own poetry with remarkable success. Clarity of expression, depiction of sentiments, structural perfection and mastery of technique, deserve special attention. He has also tried his hand at other verse forms like songs and ghazals. However, it is in the sonnets that he is at his best. Vagadano shvas is a collection of his selected poems. In Vananchal, a delightful prose work, he gives his childhood reminiscences, besides descriptions of rural tribal life. His critical writings are marked by devotion to scholarly pursuits and elaborations guided by aesthetic discernment. His review of the current trends in Gujarati poetry, after a similar review by Sundarm, is quite useful for the students of Gujarati poetry.

Jayant Pathak has been awarded the Kumar Medal (1957), the Narmad Gold Medal and Ranjitram Gold Medal (1976) for his poetry, and the Soviet Land-Nehru Award for his translation of And Quiet Flows the Don. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for his collection of poems entitled Anunay in 1980.

tion Society) in Ahmedabad, and later joined the Gujarat Vidyapith. A little later he set up a printing press, now known as the Aditya press. About this time he did his M.A. in Philosophy and lectured at Baroda. In a year and a half he gave up that job and started the study of textiles and specialised in weaving. He worked in a number of textile mills and finally retired as the manager of the Lal Mills. His first play Ananta was published in 1922. He made a deep study of Ibsen, and translated A Doll's House into Gujarati as Dhinglighar (1925), which became very famous. He translated into Gujarati a few other major works also, namely Mcdougal's Physiological Psychology, Plato's Republic, and Toynbee's Studies in History abridged by Somerwell. Through the translations of these difficult classics he rendered significant service to Gujarati. He also wrote a few articles in different journals under the pseudonyms 'Aranyak' and 'Ramanuj'.

PATHAK, RAMNARAYAN NAGARDAS (Gujarati; b.1905) is a novelist, who studied formally up to the seventh class only. Later, he studied Sanskrit up to Laghu Kaumudi, and passed the Vineet examination in Hindi. He is a teacher and a writer by profession. He is interested essentially in the study of folk literature and Sanskrit poetry. He came under the powerful impact of Gandhiji and the national movement. The nationalist ideology is, in fact, the mainstay of his novels. Bharatna bhadviro (1928) was his first publication. His translation of Premchand's novel Kayakalpa came out in 1946.

His other important works are : Novels: Chhetan ratejo maabaup (1929), Pachas varsh pachhi (1931), Avati kal (1937), Jagatno tat (1938), Khandani dhar (1941), Manavtanan modi (1941), Salhi (1947), Sohag (1947), Maro parivar (1951), Yashodhara (1975), Suvarni mrig (3rd ed., 1950); Short stories : Vettno varo (1929), Hove bhai saa'b (1971).

PATHAK, RAMNARAYAN VISHWANATH (Gujarati; b. 1887, d. 1955) was a renowned 'Pingalasastri' and creative writer. His father, Vishwanath Sadaram, was a teacher and a Sanskrit scholar. His mother was religious-minded and loved folk songs. During his formative years he had the advantage of studying under ideal teachers like Chunibhai Bhatt, Gijubhai and Nanabhai Bhatt. After a bright academic career, he practised law at Sadra for some time which he gave up under the influence of Indulal Yajnik and joined the Gujarat Kelavni Mandal (Gujarat Education Society) as a volunteer and worked for the propagation of national education. In 1920 he joined the Gujarat Vidyapith which gave him recognition as a man of letters.

Gandhiji's deep impact on the life and thinking of the nation led him to join the freedom struggle and he even went to jail. While at Gujarat Vidyapith, he did some significant work in the field of literature and education in collaboration with Rasiklal Chotalal Parekh. He made an experiment in drama also and his Kulangar ane biji kritio (1959) was performed at the Vidyapith. With Rasiklal Parekh, he translated six chapters of Mammata's Kavyaprakasha, and with Dharmanand Kosambi translated Dhammapada. Apart from that, he edited, with Narhari Parikh, Narsing Mehta's Govindagaman, with Nagindas Parekh two parts of Kavyaparichaya, and with his wife Hiraben Pathak, Samajik kathao. He also edited the works of Anandashankar Dhruv in collaboration with Umashankar Joshi, and independently edited two volumes of Kavyasamchhaya and the second edition of Purvalap by Kant.

During his services at the Vidyapith from 1921 to 1928, Ramnarayan had started contributing to magazines like Sabarmati, Puratattva, Yugadharma, etc. With the launching of Prasthan which he edited for eleven years, he started writing poems, short stories, essays, etc. under pen-names like 'Jatrahi', 'Bhularam', 'Shesh', 'Dwiraf' and 'Swairavihari'.

In his capacity as professor, Ramnarayan was associated with the Gujarat Vidya Sabha at Ahmedabad and the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan at Bombay. During 1937-1946 and 1950-52, he spent some time at Ahmedabad and made a deep study of Pingalashastra. He gave a series of lectures which were later published in bookforms, such as Narmad: arvacheen gadya padyano adyapraneta (1945); Arvacheen Gujarati kavya-sahitya (1933); Arvacheen kavyasahityanan vaheno (1938) and Gujarati pingala navi drishtia (1952).

He received the Haragovindadas Kantavala prize as well as the Narmad Gold Medal (1949) for his book Paracheen Gujarati chhando—ek aitihasik samalochana (1948), and the Sahitya Akademi Award for his book Brihat pingala (1956). His literary criticism is essentially influenced by Indian poetics. Yet, in many places, his acquaintance with the western trends of literary criticism is evident.

Like Navalram he maintained his interest in literary criticism along with his involvement in social activities. In his Arvacheen kavysahityanan vaheno, he examined extensively for the first time various aspects of the development of Gujarati poetry. He reviewed medieval and modern Gujarati literature and discussed parallel literary works in languages other than Gujarati. In this connection, mention may be made of a work like Sharadsamiksha (1980). Ramnarayan's discussion of the short story also deserves to be mentioned.

In addition to the books already mentioned, his works on literary criticism are Kavyani shakti (1939), Sahitya vimarsh (1939), Alochana (1944), Raas ane garaba (1954, with Govardhan Panchal), Sahityalok (1954), Nabhovihar (1961), Akalan (1964) and Kavyaparishilan (1965, with Nagindas Parekh).

Ramnarayan is also one of the major short story writers in Gujarati. With the Dwirefni vato in three parts (1928, 1935, 1942) he has enriched this genre in terms of content, form and style. Some of his short stories like 'Jakshani' 'Mukundarai' 'Khemi' and 'Buddhivijay' are fine examples of his craft as a short story writer.

He has also contributed to the development of various verse forms such as lyric, 'khandakavya', and parody. In his poetry one experiences dignity and joy in life. His contribution to the poetry of love and humour is also noteworthy. In many of his poems he shows a good command of form, style and content.

Ramanarayan's light satirical essays have been anthologized in Swairavihar, Parts I and II (1931-1937) while his serious essays have been collected in Manovihar (1956). Even though his reformist viewpoint finds an occasional expression in it, Swairavihar essentially shows the 'free sojourn' of a philosopher who laughs. In Manovihar it is his composed and contemplative nature that gives his humour a meaning that relates to life.

Even though Ramnarayan was somewhat of an intruder in the field of drama, his serious play Kulangar which deals with the problem of untouchability, and Devi ka rakshasi? which deals with the psychological problems of married life are noteworthy. He partly translated in verse Shakespeare's plays Romeo and Juliet and The Merchant of Venice. He also translated Bhasa's Urubhanga and Karnabhara as well as Bhagavadajjukiya. All these translations show his command of dramatic versification.

PATHAK, SAROJ (Gujarati; b. 1929) is an outstanding novelist and story-writer. She did her M.A. from the University of Gujarat, and studied classical dance at Bharatiya Kala Kendra, Delhi. In the beginning of her career, she worked with Air India (Delhi) and the USSR Embassy. For the last twenty years she has been teaching Gujarati at Bardoli College. She is a columnist for Nari sansar and shree, and the daily Gujarat-mitra and Gujarat Samachar. Her pen-name is 'Vacha'.

Saroj is an experimental story-writer. Though she depends mainly on outer events, she is able to give an artistic form to her narration. The stories in Virat tapakun (Immense point, 1966) created a sensation among the readers. In her earlier collection, Prem ghata zuk ai (Bowed down by love branches), she shows her peculiar choice of theme and originality of expression. Virant tapakun won her the Gujarat State Award and Prem ghata zuk ai the Maharashtra State Award. Already an established writer, Prit bandhani (Knotted by love),Maro rag maro asabab (My love, my everything), Tathastu (Be it so) and Saroj Pathakni shreshth vartao (The best stories of Saroj Pathak) brought her great renown as a story-writer in varied styles. Disharmony in married life and inner conflict in characters are the central points of her short stories. Her analysis of man-woman relationship is quite penetrating, and she probes sexual and psychological problems with boldness. Her trail-blazing themes and pointed delineation give her a prominent place among the short story writers of the post-Independence period.'Nahi ajavalu nahi andharun', 'Sarika panjrastha', 'Ekkshan', 'Virat tapakun', 'Sima bahar nahin', 'Jagat bahar' are some of her memorable stories.

Nightmare (1969-81), Nighshesh (Absolute, 1978) and Priya punam (Dear full-moon, 1980) are her novels. Nightmare, which won her the Gujarat State Award, is a notable psychological novel of our times. The structure of this novel is essentially shaped by three major characters, reflecting different aspects and complexities of human life. With the help of symbols and lucid prose style, the novelist has ably depicted the inner life of the characters.

Samsarika (Worldly lady), which received the Gujarat State Award in 1967, and Arvachina (Modern lady, 1976) are her reflective essays dealing with the problems of modern women. In these essays, she has occasionally adopted the form of letter-writing also.

PATHAK, SHRIDHAR (Hindi; b.1830, d.1928) was born at village Jodhari, near Agra, in Uttar Pradesh. His father, Liladhar Pathak, was a man of a puritanical temperament. His uncle Dharanidhar Shastri was a great scholar of Sanskrit, and the young Shridhar was deeply influenced by him. As Shridhar grew up, he wrote poetry in Brajbhasha, but also contributed to the growth of Khariboli. He wrote excellent poetry describing the beauty of nature and landscape. An example of this is his poem, 'Kashmir sushama.'

Shridhar has mostly written lyrics, besides some miscellaneous poems, on a variety of subjects. Some of his best known poems are 'Bharatshri', 'Bharatprashansa', 'Hindvandana', 'Aryajati', 'Aryasundari', 'Sugrahini', 'Sati Sita' and 'Bhartotthan' (Redemption of India). He gave Hindi poetry new metres and new symbols. He was the first to use the old Lavani stanza. Apart from Lavani, he used Chaupai, Rola, Chhappy, Kavitt and Savaiya. One finds him often defying narrow restrictions of language and expressing the upsurge of emotions in all its intensity.

Shridhar Pathak translated into Hindi the poems of Goldsmith under the titles Ekant vasi yogi (The Hermit), Shrant pathik (The Traveller) and Ujad gram (The Deserted Village). He translated into Hindi Kalidas's Meghaduta also.

Shridhar Pathak may be recognized as a precursor of romanticism in Hindi poetry. His poetic sensibility often resembles that of the poets of the chhayavad school. Also, his original poems and translations made a significant contribution to the growth of the new poetic diction in Hindi.

PATHAKAM (Malayalam) is a variant form of the 'Chakyarkuttu' of ancient Kerala. Pathakam is not performed in the theatre house of Kuttampalam, nor is it performed to the accompaniment of musical instruments as is the case with Chakyarkuttu. In Pathakam, the person (perhaps a Nambiar or a Nair) imitating the style of Chakyar, narrates some episodes from the puranas during festivals or some other functions. In the early period the dialectal 'Nambiantamil' was used in Pathakam. The Pathakam form of story telling may be dated back to the first century. In fact, the age-old story-teller not only entertained the audiences, but also succeeded in making drastic changes in the oral practice. The period of Nambiantamil is between the fourteenth and the seventeenth centuries. During this period the Tamil-influenced dialect changed considerably and the evolution of a theatrical language became possible. Ambarishopakhyanam (14 c.), Nalopakhyanam (14th c.), Brahmandapuranam (15th c.), etc. are the works written in the Nambiantamil style. The language of these texts is a mixture of Tamil, Sanskrit and Malayalam. It is intended not for the educated audience of Chakyarkuttu but for the common man. The language of Pathakam is adapted to serve this purpose.

In the later period the Pathakam style of rendering puranic stories slowly changed and after the eighteenth century literary prose became its medium. Kunchan Nambiar through his Tullal songs established a more popular and lively style of narration of classical stories. The later Pathakam performers also adopted this method and its language became more enjoyable for the common audience. Though there is no text on this art, Pathakam has survived through some able performers and has become a part of festivals in the temples of Kerala.

PATHAN Y.M. (Marathi, b. 1930) has made valuable contribution to research on saint poetry and devotional literature. His father was a scholar of English and Persian literatures and made a comparative study of different religions. This had a bearing on Pathan who was a keen student of Marathi and Hindi since his school days. He did his M.A. in Marathi literature, and took his Ph. D. degree from Pune in 1958 on 'Marathi bakharitil Pharasicheswarup' (Use of Persian language in Marathi bakhar), tracing the role and contribution of the Persian language in the context of the Marathi bakhars. The thesis was adjudged as the best dissertation in Marathi and won Pathan the Paranjape Award. When published in book form, it also received the State Government Award (1972-73). Equally interested in modern Marathi literature, Pathan wrote a number of short stories which were published in different periodicals and journals.

Pathan taught at Dayanand College, Sholapur, till 1959. He joined Marathvada University at Aurangabad as Reader in Marathi in 1960 and was fascinated by the rich tradition of 'santa' literature of the region. He combed different villages in search of rare manuscripts of different religious sects, e.g. Varkari, Mahanubhava, Nagesh, Ramdasi Virashaiva, Jain, Sufi, etc. He dedicated himself to editing and compiling them.

In the course of his explorations he also discovered some writings of the Mahanubhav sect in Hindi and wrote another thesis on 'Maharasthra ke Mahanubhav sahityakaron ka Hindi sahitya ko yogadan' (Contribution of Mahanubhav litterateurs of Maharashtra to Hindi literature). He also made an exhaustive research in edicts found in the different parts of the region, which throw light on the history of Marathavada. His book on the subject is entitled Marathvadyatil Marathi shilalekh (Marathi edicts in Marathavada) which he plans to translate and publish in both English and Hindi. He has edited a number of historical documents also which he found in the course of his research. He has also been actively associated with the Maharashtra State Council for folk-literature and has published an anthology named Marathvadyatil lokakatha (The folk tales of Marathavada). He presided over the sixty-third Marathi Sahitya Sammelan held at Pune in 1990. His other books include Nagesh sampradaya (1963), Mahanubhav sahitya samshodhan (1973), Mahatma Phule ani Satyashodhak samaj and Lokahitavadi: Pioneer of rationalism in Maharashtra. His Sant sahitya chintan won the Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad Award in 1984.

PATHER DABI (Bengali), a novel by Saratchandra Chatterjee, appeared in 1926 and took the whole of Bengal by storm. It is a blatantly political novel that supports armed revolution in the struggle for Independence and deals with the activities of a group of Indian revolutionaries based in Burma. The overriding concern of Saratchandra in Pather dabi is India's liberation from the tyrannical British rule and everything else becomes subservient. The central character, Sabyasachi, can be said to represent Saratchandra's ideal of a freedom fighter who combines knowledge, valour and ruthlessness to an utmost degree. Conceived on a grand scale, he possesses almost superhuman strength, courage and endurance. A genius in assuming disguises, he travels from country to country and carries on with his revolutionary activities under the very nose of the police. 'Pather Dabi' is the secret society formed by him to create an awareness and awakening among the masses, particularly the working classes, and to prepare them for the ultimate struggle against the imperialists. His associates include Sumitra, a woman of invincible courage and steely devotion, Ramdas Talwarkar, who is consumed by the passion of patriotism and has already served his sentence in the British prison for his acts of 'treason', Hira Singh, a retired police officer who is reticent but quick like a leopard in converting Sabyasachi's orders into actions, Krishna Aiyer, an advocate, and Brajendra, a revolutionary killer of grotesque proportions. They help Sabyasachi in various capacities in the task of mobilising resources for revolution and motivating industrial workers. Sabyasachi's views on the relation between the rulers and the ruled, between imperialism and capitalism, and between socialism and the working class have a strong Marxist flavour.

The second strand of the narrative deals with the relation between Apurba, an Indian, who comes to Burma in search of a job, and Bharati, a Christian girl of Indian origin who is associated with the work of the 'Pather dabi'. Through Apurba, Saratchandra shows how dogmatic observance of unjust social customs cripples the mind. In Apurba's relation with Bharati and others the author shows how a Hindu's insistence on 'purity' of caste and sect vitiates his relationship with other human beings. Apurba is shocked to see the brutal treatment meted out to the Indians by the British rulers and tries to stand up against it. Thus he comes to be associated with Sabyasachi's secret society. But he is a weakling who lacks strength of character and conviction and capitulates under pressure. The revolutionary tribunal unanimously passes the death sentence on him, but Sabyasachi intervenes and forgives him and thus earns the wrath of the other members, particularly of Brajendra and Sumitra. Bharati does not share Sabyasachi's blind hatred of the British and his philosophy of violence but, nevertheless, respects his all-consuming passion for his motherland. In fact, the character of Sabyasachi acquires depth and complexity from his readiness to accept criticism from Bharati, and from his sympathetic understanding of Apurba's human frailty. Sumitra's devotion, without prior reflection on its potential, to the cause makes her potentially dangerous and she aligns herself, though temporarily, with Brajendra. There are suggestions that it is through the treachery of Brajendra that the secret revolutionary network of Sabyasachi is detected and almost destroyed by the police. At the end of the novel the secret society in Burma falls in disarray and the members go their own way. Sabyasachi proceeds towards Singapore where he hopes to get hold of Brajendra; Sumitra leaves to settle in Java; Apurba vows to devote his life to working among the rural poor in Indian villages and Bharati decides to accompany and help Apurba in his work by educating the masses.

As a novel, its literary merits are questionable. There is a lack of authorial control and some of the characters lack verisimilitude. The different strands of the narrative are technically weak and are held together only by a strong anti-British feeling.

PATHER PANCHALI (Bengali) is a famous novel by Bibhutibhusan Banerjee. Written in 1928 and originally published in 1929 the work, before its appearance in book form, came out serially in the magazine Bichitra in 1928-29. This book is the first part of the trilogy known as the Apu trilogy.

Since its first publication the book has been reprinted many times. Two versions of the book were especially designed and abridged for children, one of which, entitled Am antir bhenpu, has been prescribed as a school textbook. It has been translated into most of the major Indian languages. Besides, English and French versions, undertaken as part of the Indian series of UNESCO collection of representative works, have also been published.

Based in a large measure on its author's own life, the novel depicts the milieu of his childhood. Harihar Ray, the head of the family, is a prototype of the author's father. Like all fathers of this particular social milieu, he also lives on illusions and day-dreaming, and earns a precarious living, working at times as a family priest and at other times by reciting verses from old religious texts. Sarbajaya, his wife, also true to the type, is often at her wit's end to provide enough food for her two children. Indir Thakrun, an old widowed relative who is part of the Ray household in the book, appears to be a prototype of Menaka Devi, an old aunt of the author's father.

The most important characters of the book are, of course, the two children, Durga and her brother Apu. The author is certainly at his best while revealing his understanding of the child's mind.

The little Durga, for example, whimsical and free as a bird, is always ready to snatch from life whatever it can offer her without bothering in the least for social conventions. Yet, though by nature greedy and self-centred, she becomes tender and generous in her relationship with her younger brother. Apu, however, is the hero and the central character of the book and it is his life which the author unfolds, a life resembling very much that of an average but more sensitive child of his class.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'Panchali,' in medieval Bengali poetry, meant a long narrative poem recited generally with a puppet show which illustrated the story. The English translators (T.W. Clark and Tarapada Mukherji) of the book have therefore sub-titled their translation as The Song of the Road (1968), whereas the French translator (France Bhattacharya) keeping Pather Panchali within brackets, titles her translation as La complainte de sentier (Gallimard, Paris, 1969).

The life that is unfolded in the book concerns events that overtake the members of the Ray family and the latter's relationship with the others in the village of Nischindipur. In addition to the animate characters—a veritable galaxy of children, women and men—the inanimate world of nature with its trees, fruits, flowers, fields and village paths also plays a prominent role in the depiction of that life and is portrayed as personified presence. That life, in itself simple and monotonous, marked by the change of seasons, religious festivals and domestic trivialities and quarrels, is free of all meanness and, because of the compassion it unfolds, it assumes a universality. From the road here rises a song, the song of life with which the child in the book becomes intoxicated, despite many ups and downs and bends in the road, like the sad cruel death of Indir Thakrun and, later in the book, the much more cruel death of Durga.

In the author's narration of the story there is often an apparent discontinuity from chapter to chapter, with some chapters broken into short, at times abruptly ended units. But in a larger sense this goes well with the episodic character of the book and the symbol of a continuing road for life.

The book which follows Apu's growth since his early childhood has thirty-four chapters in all and ends with his resolve to return with his mother to Nischindipur after a lapse of three years. Earlier, his father had died at Banaras, having spent some time there in search of happiness for his family and doing something worthwhile in life. The family had migrated from Nischindipur, shortly after the death of Durga, to that far away place in North India. The English and French translators, however, did not agree to the length the author gave to the book and, following the version adopted by Satyajit Ray for his film based on the book, ended their translations with Apu, accompanied by his parents on the first-ever journey by train in his life, looking out of the window to murmur his solitary adieus to his departed sister and the village. What follows and what the author goes on to recount in six more chapters of his book in the original Bengali edition appears to be a little out of tune, both structurally and emotionally, with the preceding contents and should have, as some critics seem to think, more appropriately formed part of Aparajita, the sequel to Pather panchali.

The unity achieved in this book is principally one of tone which is again inseparably connected with the well defined milieu of Nischindipur and its people, its sky of many seasons, its fields and paths, where the two children, so happy to find themselves together, were always out to experience the adventure of their life.

PATHIK (Hindi). Ramnaresh Tripathi's Pathik (1920) is the most popular episodic poem (Khanda-kavya) in Hindi Romantic poetry. The poem was written during the period when Gandhi joined the freedom struggle and his Satyagrah and non-cooperation movements were in full swing.

In the tradition of Hindi poetry Pathik shared the Romantic sensibility of Shridhar Pathak. For his theme he went neither to history nor to mythology, but to the resources of his own imagination. The man and nature relationship depicted in the book is also a deviation from the conventional poetic style. It is not just a description of nature for 'alambana' and 'uddipana'. Rather, nature not only haunts man with its beauty and immensity but impels him to action. The hero of the poem gets inspiration when he comes into close contact with the nature of his motherland. He resolves to free the nation from slavery, travels all over the country, sees for himself the suffering of the poor masses, and activates himself to liberate them.

The patriotic sentiment became the content of literary expression in Bharatendu's poetry, and since then the poets realised their prime responsibility to give voice to social problems in their works. In Pathik Ramnaresh Tripathi presents this theme with the elegance of poetry. The narrative is divided into five chapters. The action begins with the hero enchanted by the beauty of nature, unwilling to go back to society full of suffering and despair. Inspired by a hermit, he gives up his escapism, gets involved in humanitarian work and takes the pledge to serve his motherland. He realises that people are the victims of exploitation by their rulers. He organises the poeple and asks them to protest against the alien rule and not to cooperate with the Government. He is arrested and awarded capital punishment; his wife and son also have to lose their lives. But his message has already reached the people and they continue their passive resistance which ultimately wins them freedom.

Pathik was written under the direct impact of the Gandhian thought, and is a running commentary on the imperialistic loot by the Britishers. The tryanny of the rulers is expressed in realistic symbols and images woven in the texture of poetic fabric. The poem has historical importance in a number of ways. It paved the way for the chhayavadi poets to give poetic expression to national awakening and to identify nature with human life. It is also important from the point of view of the use of khariboli as the language of poetry, and Tripathi stands out as a leading poet who created such melodious and elegant poetry in khariboli. It is because of this quality that Acharya Ramchandra Shukla wrote that patriotism got an aesthetic expression in Ramnaresh Tripathi's poetry. On the ideological level, the poet concentrates on common welfare rather than individualism.

Immediately after its publication, Pathik became very popular not only with the academics but also with the national leaders of the freedom movement. Mahatma Gandhi, Madan Mohan Malaviya, Shridhar Pathak, Ayodhayasingh Upadhyaya 'Hariaudh', Maithilisharan Gupta and Purushottam Das Tandon were all admiration for the poem. The book became so popular with the freedom fighters that they carried a copy of it with them to jail. Almost eighty editions of the book have so far been printed.

PATHINENKIZHKKANAKKU (Tamil). The period after the Sangam age (before the age of the Pallava supremacy) is often considered a dark period in Tamil history. This period consists of the later part of the sixth century and especially the beginning of the seventh century. The Pallavas and the Kalabhras invaded the Tamil land, and its language stood neglected. Though no good literary work appeared in this dark period, such writings as Pathinenkizhkkanakku, Silappadikaram, Manimekalai did appear in this age. There are critics who regard Pathinenkizhkkanakku as a work of Sangam literature. In fact, no concrete proof is available to establish the actual year of these writings. As a majority of these poetical works fall within the category of small poems in four lines, they are also called Kizhkanakku works ('mel' and 'kizh' mean big and small respectively. 'Kanakku' means writing or work).

An old poem in four lines refers to all the eighteen Kizhkanakku works. These eighteen works are (1) Thirukkural (2) Naladiyar (3) Nanmanikkadikai (4) Iniyavai narpathu (5) Inna narpathu (6) Kar narpathu (7) Kalavazhi narpathu (8) Thinaimozhi aimbathu (9) Thinaimalai nurtaibathu (10) Ainthinai aimbathu (11) Ainthinai elubathu (12) Thirikadugam (13) Asarekkovai (14) Pazhamozhi (15) Sirubanja mulam (16) Mudhumozhikkanji (17) Elathi (18)Innilai or Kainilai.

All these eighteen works fall within two major divisions, 'akam' and 'puram'. Of these eighteen works, Thirukkural, written by Thiruvalluvar, is the best because of the vastness of its subject matter and universality of its appeal. Thiruvalluvar seemed to have lived sometime during the first three centuries of the Christian era. Thirukkural includes 1330 'kural venbas' (couplets), divided into 133 chapters (athikarams) of ten kural venbas each. These 133 chapters, in turn, have been divided into three parts—'aram' (38 chapters), 'porul' (10 chapters) and 'kamam' (25 chapters). Aram deals with 'dharma' or virtues, 'porul' with 'artha' or government and society, and 'kamam' with love.

Though the work is made up of seemingly unconnected couplets, each complete in itself, the author is able to give an integrated picture of his experience and vision of the moral man and the ethical state. This work is full of suggestions, of similes and metaphors, and of the grandeur of the epigrammatic style. It has been translated into several languages of the world, and about ten writers have written commentaries on it. No other Tamil literary work can claim to have such a big number of commentaries.

Naladiyar, the second work in Pathinenkizhkkanakku, is so called because it is a compilation of four hundred poems (venbas) of four lines each. These four hundred poems have been written by Jain priests and compiled by Pathumanar. It is also called Nalady nanuru. Thirukkural's themes are sometimes re-iterated by the author of Naladiyar, but it gives more importance to the ethical aspect of human life.

Nanmanikkadikai is an ethical work containing 104 poems in 'venba' form. It is called 'Nanmanikkadikai' because it contains poems which tell us four gem-like facts. Written by Vilambu Naganar, each of these poems teaches us that great people are born in any section of society and that people should attain salvation by leading a life of fame in the present life.

Iniyavai narpathu includes forty-one poems (in 'venba' form) together with the Invocation written by Pudanchendaner. As these poems unlike Iniyavai narpathu point out avoidable 'evils', this work gets this name. These poems have been written by Kapilar. Kar narpathu by Maduraikkannankuthanar deals with the theme of separation by portraying the heroine waiting for her lover at the appointed time. These poems describe through realistic similes the rainy season with its flowers, beautifying the pastoral land. As there are references to rainy season in almost all the poems it has been named 'Kar narpathu'. Kalavazhi narpathu was written by Poikaiyar in order to rescue his friend Chernman Kanaikalirumborni when he was defeated by Cholan Chenganan at Kazhumalam. This poetic work praises the victory of Chenganan in the war.

In Thinaimozhi aimbathu, Kannan Chendanar, who is the author of this work, beautifully describes the waterfalls in 'kurinji' region. Thinaimalai nutraimbathu consisting of the thirty poems for each region was written by Kaniyan Medhaviyar. Ainthinai aimbathu consists of ten poems for each of five regions (according to the Tamil aesthetic tradition), and hence the name. These poems were sung by Maran Poraiyan. Maran refers to Pandiyan and Poraiyan to Cheran. These poems have been composed for restating the concept of ideal love. Ainthinai ezhupathu consists of fourteen poems for each region of five and so they are seventy in total. This work elaborately depicts the theme of love. Murathiyar is the author of this work. Thirikadugam was composed by Nalladhanar who is believed to have lived in the later part of fifth century A.D.

Asarakkovai includes a hundred poems (excluding the invocation) in which various 'venbas' mix with one another. A striking feature of this work is its didacticism; therefore most of the scholars feel that it tends to imitate a Sanskrit work. The author of this work is Peruvayin Mulliyar whose period too may be the fifth century A.D. Pazhamozhi consists of four hundred poems including the invocation; each poem ends with a proverb which had been prevalent in those days. Though it is an ethical work, it includes a lot of historical data. This work is considered an important one next to Thirukkural and Naladiyar. Chirupanja mulam, written by Kariyasan, consists of 102 poems. In the thirty-third song the poet describes the qualities of a good poet.

Mudhumazhikkanji is written by Kudalurkilar. This work contains ten parts with ten poems each. These are in 'Kuralthalisai'. In this work, the author takes the position that education is superior to good manners.

Elathi is written by Kanimethavi, and Innilai by Poikaiyar. Innilai teaches 'aram', 'porul', 'inbam' and 'vidu'. This work is of forty-five 'venbas'. In this work there is a reference to Lord Shiva. The style of the poem adds to poetic beauty. Kainilai consists of a total of sixty poems, twelve poems for each region. Pullangadanar is its author who might have lived in the fifth century A.D. In general, almost all the writings of Pathinenkizhkkanakku are didactic. They teach ethics and morals.

P.M.S.

PATHUR (Kashmiri), pron. pāthūr, signifies a comic folk-performance presented on an improvised open-air stage. The genric term has happily come down to us in a 'shruk' of Nunda Rishi (14th-15th c.) revealing that in this genre a single performer assumed a variety of roles on the folk-stage.

Lineage: The earliest reference to the historical moorings of a pathur, however, is found in a pathur itself where Nabud Vatul informs his spectators:

> Harshadev, they say, was the ruler,
> Varshadev was his minister;
> Abahoer was his clown,
> And Dayut, his magun (clown-in-chief).

That carries the performers' professional lineage back to the early 11th century when Sanskrit was the language of court and culture in Kashmir. Obviously, the pathur of those days must have been presented in the people's language emerging out of the Sanskrit-Prakritic source. The term pathur, thus, is Prakritic form of 'Patra' and registers a semantic extension from the character to the performance itself. Conventionally, improvised dialogues in Kashmiri seem to have ensured a continual flow of verbal heritage visually presented through a mirthful amalgam of music, mimicry and ridicule. That reminds us of what Abhinavagupta (10th c.) in his Abhinavabharati has recognized as the function of the 'Bhandanatya'.

Development: From 'Bhandanatya' to 'Banda-pathur' of today we naturally find a continuum of folk-memory. Perpetuated by bands of strolling performers called Bagat or Band (Bhagat/Bhand), the pathur was called Banda-pathur, while the celebration of an occasion in terms of such a performance came to be known as Banda-jeshin.

In the initial stage of its development, it, however, appears to have flourished mainly at fairs and festivals round about shrines and places of pilgrimage, but, by and by, it seems to have become incorporated into various programmes of public entertainment, managed by a community of Bagats or Bands. They were often sponsored by eminent members of rural society, but they occasionally catered to the elitist needs also. Even in the 19th century, the Bagats were in great demand during the marriage season and at the harvest time, as observed by Lawrance in his Valley of Kashmir (1888). No wonder therefore, that over two dozen centres of Banda-pathur still exist in the valley.

Characteristics: Till recently the Banda-pathur continued to be transmitted by word of month (without a written record), and it was only a couple of years back that Mohd. Subhan Bagat, an outstanding Band of the Bagat Theatre (Akingam) painstakingly compiled the traditional scripts of as many as eight pathurs in a volume titled Banda-jeshin. These are: Darza-pathur (Pathur of the Darad women); Raza-pathur (Pathur of the Raja); Bakarval-pathur (Pathur of the goat-herd); Shikargah-pathur (Pathur of the game-sancturary); Buhury-pathur (Pathur of the pedlar); Vatal-pathur (Pathur of the cobbler); Gosany-pathur (Pathur of the recluse); and Angraez-pathur (Pathur of the Englishman).

Some of these like Vatal-pathur, Raza-pathur and Buhury-pathur register a broad spectrum of cultural stratification, while a few others like Gosany-pathur, Bakarval-pathur and Angraez-pathur have incorporated even quite recent phenomena. Some of these, again, mockingly display a queer mixup of Persian and Punjabi as an index to snobbish contempt for the mother-tongue, while Darza-pathur debunks a Kashmiri upstart pretending to be a Persian-speaking outsider.

The main objective of the pathur is to laugh away insensitivity to human misery (caused by an individual or an institution). The role of the maskhara (clown) beside the magun (clown-in-chief) is, therefore, pivotal to the pahtur (performance), and brings to our mind the role of the traditional 'vidushaka' flanked by 'pariparshvikas'. The maskhara, accordingly, takes recourse to joke, repartee, ridicule, sarcasm, satire and even mascarade—any trick of the jester's trade, in fact, that ensures a laughterful response by the spectator.

Every pathur opens and closes with comprehensive prayers (more comprehensive than the 'Bharata-vakyam') for the welfare of one and all, including the Bagat's patrons and benefactors as well as the ones they dreaded except those whom they cleverly labelled as bakhal (miserly) or badkhal (ill-wishers). Buhury-pathur, for instance, verbalizes a series of concerns like the following:

> May the mulk (country)and the khalq (populace) prosper... May Maj Kasheer (mother Kashmir) be blessed...May the soil yield abundance... May we be safe from famine and epidemic.

Yet, the clash of class-interests rings clear even in the clownish non-seriousness of the interlocutors, cutting the bullies to size with blunt caricature. Every pathur, in a way, articulates a sort of muffled confrontation between the oppressor and the oppressed. On the one hand, we find various cogs in the wheel of oppression, like the tehsildar, moqadam, kardar, ardaly (orderly), thanedar, choukidar, pulsavoel, patwary, darad, shahgoish (royal confidant), sagvan (dog-keeper). shehsavar, Angraez, raza (ruler), buhur (pedlar) etc., while, on the other hand, we come across the groost (peasant). bakarval (goat-herd), navid (barber) and other hapless Kashmiris condemned to 'begar' (forced labour gratis). Darza-pathur, for instance, perpetuates the painful memory of the Darad oppressors who were, in their own turn, liquidated by the Mughal usurpers, while Raza-pathur relays the people's mute resentment of exploitation by various regimes, right from the Mughals to the Dogras, particularly during the intervening period of the Afghans and the Sikhs.

The number of folk-artists needed by a pathur ranges from nine (in Bakarval-pathur) to twentyone (in Buhury-pathur), including musicians playing the clarionet (suarnay) and the drums (particularly the 'doel' and the 'nagara'). The tunes played by them have a grammar of their own with a peculiar nomenclature suiting the mood and temper of a pathur. The crux of the pathur, however, lies in the calibre of the resourcerful maskhara who takes creative care to see that despite uncouthness he does not degenerate into a garrulous bore. The merry response he seeks to arouse has, of course, to be in consonance with the socio-cultural context of a group predicament at a particular moment in group memory evocating points of contemporary relevance.

PATI, RATNAKARA (Oriya; b. 1881, d. 1969), eminent teacher and essyist, studied Philosophy at Calcutta University, taught at several colleges in Bihar and Orissa and retired as Professor of Philosophy from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack. His essays, published under the title Prabandha prakasha (1927) deal mainly with philosophical and sociological topics in lucid prose. His other works include Bibarttanabada (Theory of evolution) and Swapnatattwa (Truth about dreams) published by the Sahitya Academy of Orissa. He also wrote a history of Western Philosophy from Bacon to Kant, entitled Modern European Philosophy, and a book in Oriya on Psychology which is still unpublished.

PATIL, CHANDRASHEKHARA (Kannada; b. 1939), a noted poet, playwright and editor, was born at Hattimattur in the Dharwad district of Karnataka. He holds the M.A. degrees of Karnataka and Leeds Universities, and teaches English at Karnataka University, Dharwad. Patil's first collection of poems Banuli appeared in 1960 and he has since published six more collections, Madhyabindu (1964), Hattombattu kavanagalu (1967), Gandhi smarane (1976), O enna deshbandhavare (1977), Ayda kavanagalu (1978) and Andha sathyada hudingi (1990). Patil has passed through both the major phases of modern Kanada poetry, Navodaya and Navya, and is at the moment at the vanguard of the 'bandaya' movement, which represents a revolt against modernist literature and emphasises the value of social protest and commitment for the writer. The journal he edits, Sankramana, is the chief organ of the Bandaya movement. Patil turned to drama in 1968 and his first play Kodegalu (1968) was an early experiment in the Absurd theatre. This has been followed by eight more plays, Appa (1969), Gurtinavaru (1970), Kunta kunta kuruvatti (1970), Tingara buddanna (1971), Kattala ratri (1973), Jagadambeya bidinataka (1974), Gokarnada Goudasani (1974) and Buradibabana lakspaharanapavada (1976), which constitute an original and significant contribution to Kannada theatre. Patil has also edited three collections of poems, Gandhi Gandhi, Sankramana kavya and June 75 March 77, and also written an account of his experiences in jail during the Emergency under the title 26 dina, 25 ratri (1979). As a writer, Patil is distinguished by his love of experimentation, social and ideological commitment, a highly idiosyncratic and not seldom stinging wit and a mastery over a wide range of speech rhythms.

commitment. The collection of his poems Talyatalya saulya (Shadows in the lake, 1978) includes poems written during 1952-1977. But he is very much a poet of the fifties when, under the impact of modernism, romantic poetry found it difficult to win the favour of the serious readers of poetry. Still his amorous love lyrics, with their brevity and formal compactness, have been widely appreciated. They successfully poetize the delicate moods of lovers carrying the overtones of Shelleyan 'sweet sadness'. The portrait of the blond beloved is provocative enough, and the subdued sensuous element has a touch of delicacy. What makes his love poems lively is the way they exploit the emotive potential of the agrarian environment. The refined urban idiom of his poetry skilfully accommodates folk images and rhythms. The manipulation of sound and colour within the bounds of the traditional stanzaic form shows scrupulous craftsmanship.

PATIL, SHANKAR (Marathi; b. 1926) is a short story writer, writing stories against the rural background. He was born in a small village in Kolhapur district (Maharashtra), and did his B.A. and B.T from Shivaji University, Kolhapur. For a few years he taught in schools and in 1957 joined the All India Radio at Pune.

His first collection of short stories, Valiv, was published in 1958, followed by Bhetigathi (1960), Abhal (1961), Dhind (1962), Don (1963), Bavri sheng (1963) and Khulyachi chawdi (1964). In 1959 he got the Asia Foundation Fellowship for research on rural life on which his novel Tarfula (1964) is based. His other two collections of short stories are Pahuni (1967) and Fakkad goshti (1973). In collaboration with scholars like G.V. Akolkar and G.P. Pradhan he edited Sahitya sarita, a series of textbooks for schools in Maharashtra (1968). He was appointed by the Maharashtra Rajya Pustak Nirmiti ani Abhyaskram Sanshodhan Mandal as special officer for Marathi. In 1972 he was appointed as Vidya Sachiv for selection of textooks in six languages other than Marathi. His two collections of humorous short stories, namely Khelkhandoba (1974) and Tajmahalmadhye sarpanch (1977), are typical of his rugged humour untamed by urban sophistication. His first four collections of short stories won him the State Government awards. Nivdak Shankar Patil (1966) is an anthology of his selected short stories which was widely translated in India and abroad.

He wrote scripts for a few 'Vaganatyas', a form of folk theatre. Some of them are Galli te Dilli, Katha akalechya kandyachi and Lawangi mirchi Kolhapurchi. He has written screen plays for some Marathi films of which 'Yuge yuge mi vat pahili', 'Gangawlan', 'Pinjara', 'Ek gav bara bhangadi' and 'Dongarchi maina' have been very popular.

Shankar Patil is known for his sharp analysis of the psychology and behaviour of people in rural areas. His language is natural and unpretentious. Shankar katha is an anthology of his selected short stories recently published. Shankar Patil's depiction of life in the countryside is both candid and humorous.

PATINEN CHITTAR (Tamil). The eighteen Chittars are variously named in Tamil. The origin of the Chittar tradition has not been explored with any certainty. The Chittars can be identified as persons who have attained miraculous powers.

The Chitta tradition in literature begins with Tirumoolar (*c.*7th/8th c.), the author of Tirumandiram. He is credited with having brought the great Shaivite doctrine into Tamilnadu, or alternately he is claimed to have introduced the principles of Shaivism which spread to Kashmir. Tirumandiram, comprising three thousand verses, is an important work on the Shaivite doctrine of the South. Tirumoolar has also many abstruse verses which, we are told, can be interpreted in terms of astrology, medical science and even the science of splitting the atom. In the twentieth century, S.D.S.Yogi, a modern poet, has interpreted his chapters on the atom, claiming to have decoded a cipher contained in the text for splitting the atom and releasing a tremendous physical force.

The only other poet of the Chitta tradition who also belongs to the Shaivite cannon was a woman, named Karaikkal Ammayar. Her date is uncertain except for the fact that she came after Tirumoolar. Her output is slight but significant. She sings of the Divine Dancer (Shiva) as inhabiting Tiruvalangudu and admonishes Him to dance cautiously, for when He moves his feet the underworlds are shaken and when He moves His arms the upper dimensions are in confusion; the stage is too small for Him even if it be the universe. In another song she sings of the Dancer in ecstasy and of His consort watching Him in wonder and fear.

A later tradition, again, identified with the eighteen Chittars, came up perhaps after the emergence of temples in the Tamil land, during the reign of the Pallavas, Cholas and Pandyas. These eighteen are never identified by name, though each is credited with having built a temple in the South. A later view identifies the names of all the eighteen Chittars. Apart from one Tirumoolar, they include Bhogar, Shiva Vakkiyar, Pampatti, Kodambai, Idakkati, Yenaadi, Gorakkar amongst others. A few seem to have belonged to the tradition of the Natha Siddhantis of northern India. Many of them have left no literary works behind. Bhogar left an account of his visit to a country which might have been China. This account, considered almost a scientific thesis by some, describes in verse several scientific principles like those of the steam engine and the aeroplane. Bhogar is also considered an innovator of the Tamil system of medicine, known as the Siddha system.

The popular poems of these Chittars are the ones that hve come down to us from such poets as Shiva Vakkiyar, Pampatti and Kodambai. Of these Shiva Vakkiyar is more earthy; he uses a racy folk idiom which speaks directly to the unlettered. Many of his phrases and images are still popular with the common folk.

This latest tradition of the eighteen Chittars dates back to the sixteenth century. In common parlance when the Tamil says Patinen Chittar, he does not know which tradition he is speaking about; but it is usually the third and the last. The other two are restricted, the first to the metaphysical Shaivite canon in its early stages and the second to the medical system of a native tradition. The third was anti-caste socially, more aware of the evils of institutionalised religion and may sometimes even sound atheistic within a theistic framework.

PATIRRUPPATTU (Tamil), one of the works of Ettuttokai of the Sangam age, is a collection of a hundred poems consisting of ten equal sections, each composed by a poet in praise of a Chera King. The book is on the 'puram' theme. It consists of ten tens and hence the name Patirruppattu. Each ten glorifies the valour and benevolence of a Chera King. Of these ten tens, we have only the middle eight intact. It is possible that the first ten are in honour of Utiyan Cheral and the last in honour of Ilancheral's successor. The second is written by Kumattur Kannanar in praise of Imayavaranpan Netuncheralatan, the successor of Utiyan Cheral. The third poem is on Palyanaichelkelu Kuttuvan by Palaikkautamanar, the fourth on Kalankaykkanni Narmutichcheral by Kappiyarrukkappiyanar, the fifth on Katalpirakkottiya Chenkuttuvan by Paranar, the sixth on Atukotpattucheralatan by Kakkaipatiniyar, the seventh on Chelvakkatunko Valiyatan by Kapilar, the eighth on Peruncheral Irumporai by Arisil Kilar and the ninth on Kutakkoilancheral Irumporai by Perunkunrurkkilar. Such exclusive praise of the Chera kings in a distinct group of verses which has not been extended to the other kings is a unique feature of this work. That the Chera kings had rewarded these poets magnificently is evident from the colophon of each section. Another unique feature of these poems is that a happy expression has been chosen from each verse and given as its title.

The work throws light on the history of the ancient Tamil Nadu to an extent. The poems reveal that the Chera country was rich with fertile lands and abundant water facilities and the people lived in peace, leading a virtuous life. The proverb 'As is the king, so are the subjects' stands true in the work. The poets were rewarded by kings and enjoyed an esteemed status in the country. They had the license even to criticise the kings, who followed their advice.

In addition to being a historical account of the reign of the Chera Kings, Patirruppattu is also regarded as an excellent literary work, owing to its terseness of expression, realistic pictures, rich imagery and striking similes.

PATISAMBHIDA-MAGGA (Pali) is the thirteenth book of Khuddaka-nikaya of Suttapitaka (Buddhist canon). The text intends to show the path (magga) to the realisation of truth taught by the Buddha. This systematic exposition of certain important topics of Buddhism consists of three 'vaggas' : Mahavagga, Yuganandha-vagga, and Panna-vagga. Each has ten topics (kathas), eg., Nanakatha, Yuganandhakatha, Maha-panna-katha. The list of contents (matika) at the beginning of the book is restricted to the first vagga only as it mentions 73 'nanas' which do not include any of those in the other two vaggas. However, only three kathas out of 73 are discussed therein. The two others do not have 'matika'.

Mahavagga treats such topics as the five 'indriyas' (powers) : 'saddha' (faith), 'viriya' (energy), 'sati' (recollection), 'samadhi' (concentration), and 'panna' (reason); the three 'vimokkhas' : 'sunnato' (emptiness), 'animitto' (signless) and 'appanihito' (desireless); 'anaana' (regulation of breath); 'kusala' and 'akusala-kamma' (good and bad actions); 'kamma-vipaka' (fruition of actions); the various conditions of 'arahantship'; sotappati, sakadagami, anagami, arahatta,and so on.

Yuganandha-vagga considers among other topics 'saccha' (the four Aryan truths) : 'dukkha', 'dukkha-samudaya', 'dukkha-nirodha' and 'dukkha-nirodha-gamini-patipada'; the 'bojjhangas' (constituents of supreme knowledge); the noble eight-fold path : 'sammaditthi' (right view), 'samma-sankappo' (right resolve), 'samma vacha' (right speech),'samma kammato' (right action), 'samma-ajiva' (right living), 'samma vayamo' (right exertion), 'sammasati' (right recollection), and 'sammasamadhi' (right concentration).

Panna-vagga addresses itself to the treatment of the eight 'chariyas' (conduct), such as 'iriyapatha' (the four postures), 'ayatanas' (spheres of senses),'sati' (application of mindfulness),'samadhi' (the four stages of jnana), 'nana' (the four Aryan truths), 'magga' (the four Aryan paths), 'patichariya' (the four fruits of the life of mendicants), and 'lokattha' (promotion of the good of the world) with 'patihariya' or 'iddhi' (miracle), 'adesana' (commands), and 'anusasana' (instructions), and refers to the marvellous way in which the Buddha enlightened the people.

Though the contents are philosophical to form a part of the Abhidhamma, they are included in the Sutta-pitaka. The contents are presented as set forth by the Buddha on various occasions and the traditional phrase at the beginning, 'evam me sutam', occurs frequently. The treatment of topics is scholastic and there are long passages taken wholly from the Vinayapitaka, and the other Nikayas of the Sutta-pitaka. The names of certain Buddhist arhants current in the iddhi-katha without other information was, perhaps, taken for granted.

Saddhammappakasini, a commentary, ascribes the authorship to Sariputta.

PATRA (Sanskrit). According to Sanskrit lexicons the word 'patra' means (i) a receptacle of any kind, (ii) a worthy person or a person fit to receive gifts, (iii) a king's minister, (iv) an actor or a dramatis persona. We are concerned with the last which the Indian theoreticians have categorised into several types giving exhaustive accounts of such dramatis personae. We may arrange them in the following manner:

(a) 'Nayaka' or the protagonist: The protagonist owes the appellation, Nayaka, to his action which leads the dramatic events to their culminating point. He is portrayed in such a manner that he seems to the spectators to be a towering character. All protagonists are said to be 'noble or self-controlled' (dhira) and are subdivided into the 'light-hearted' or 'gay' (lalita), 'calm' (prashanta), 'exalted' (udatta), and 'haughty' or 'vehement' (uddhata).

A further fourfold division of the protagonists is made relating them to their attitude to women, viz, 'courteous' (dakshina), 'deceitful' (shatha), 'shameless' (dhrista), and 'loyal' (anukula). Since these four types are applicable to each class of protagonists, sixteen possible kinds can be further computed. Also, the sixteen kinds may have three sub-varieties each, viz. 'high', 'middle', and 'low' classes; thus, in all, we are to negotiate with forty-eight different types of protagonists. Some examples may now be given from the realm of Sanskrit drama. A noble and dignified protagonist with a romantic streak is a 'dhiralalita' character. The king of Vatsa in the plays of Bhasa and Harsha is the finest example of such a type. A noble but calm hero (dhiraprashanta) is a brahmin or a merchant whom we generally meet in the sub-genre called 'prakarana', as for example, Madhava in Bhavabhuti's Malatimadhava, or Charudatta in Shudraka's Mricchakatika.

A noble and exalted protagonist (dhirodatta) is the gem of perfection; his is a character of great strength, nobility, firmness and integrity. Generally royal personages, commanders, ministers and high officials belong to this type. Dushyanta in Abhijnana Shakuntala conforms to its requirements.

A noble but haughty hero (dhiroddhata) is difficult to conceive since he is a victim of pride and jealousy, an adept in magic arts, self-assertive, fickle and irascible. Parashurama in Mahaviracharita belongs to this type, but he is only secondary in importance.

The antagonist (pratinayaka) has been conceived as a contrast to the hero. He is said to be of the 'dhiroddhata' type, i.e. self-controlled and vehement but, at the same time, he is also stubborn, greedy, criminal and vicious such as Ravana and Duryodhana.

(b) Nayika or the heroine: As the term 'nayika' grammatically happens to be the feminine form of 'nayaka' it also signifies that her role is no less important in a play. Rhetoricians have conceived of various kinds of heroines according to their individual features, position, and relation to the protagonists. They may be 'divine ladies' (divya), 'queens' (nripapatni), or 'women from noble families' (kulastri), or 'courtesans' (ganika). But the selection of the type of the heroine is made primarily in connection with her relation to the protagonist; she may be his wife (sva, sviya), or belong to another person including the hero's wife (anya, parakiya), or be a hetaera (sadharani).

A very remarkable characteristic of the Sanskrit plays is that the aspect of the woman as wife has been emphasised time and again. In almost every drama she has been depicted as the true companion of man either as wife or as beloved. Conjugal love on the physical plane and its representation on the stage have always fascinated the rhetoricans, beginning with Bharata, and many of them have sought to analyse them in detail. Bharata says in his Natyashastra: 'Sarvah prayena loko'yam sukhamicchati sarvada/sukhasya cha striyo mulam nanashiladharashcha tah', i.e. 'Happiness is the ultimate aim of everything done by human beings in this world, and this happiness can be complete only when there is companionship between man and woman; hence women are the ultimate source of happiness'. Consequently, almost all Sanskrit plays deal with love, culminating finally in the happy union of the couple. Mudrarakshasa, Venisamhara, Mahaviracharita and Chandakaushika may, however, be regarded as exceptions.

Bharata also says that 'all women belong to three classes; viz., the best, the worst, and the mediocre' (Natyashastra). The later rhetoricians classified women in two different ways, the first depending on the nature and temperament of the character. If she is young, innocent and easily convinced, i.e. inexperienced, she is 'mugdha'. One who is clever enough to understand the deceitful intrigues of her husband or lover and bold enough to deal with him as he deserves is 'pragalbha'. One who has passed the stage of 'mugdha' but has not yet caught up with the stage of 'pragalbha' is 'madhya' (i.e. partly experienced). Another categorization is based on the attitude of the protagonist towards the heroine and, accordingly, there are eight kinds of heroines, viz.,

vasakasajjita, virahotkanthita, svadhinabhartrika, kalahantarita, khandita, vipralabdha, proshitabhartrika, and abhisarika.

It is no less significant that Bharata recognised the importance of the heroines he wrote about in detail. About others he gave only general hints. However, interestingly enough, there is no mention about women as daughters, sisters, or mothers. When the creative genius was sliding down in Sanskrit dramas, several human dimensions were lost sight of and a tendency to subscribe increasingly and mechanically to rules and dictates formulated by the authors of dramaturgy originated. Hence we hardly come across living men and women; instead, we meet only stereotypes of various kinds. Such dramatis pesonae (patras) may be arranged into three classes, high, middle and low. Of them, the following types deserve mention: (a) Pithamarda: According to theoreticians like Dhananjaya and Vishvanatha, a Pithamarda is an adviser on pleasure to the protagonist. He possesses the qualities of the protagonist though in a lesser degree; he is intelligent, and attends to the interests of the protagonist with unquestionable devotion. It is said that he should be the hero of the episodes (pataka, prasangika, itivrtta). Thus Makaranda in Malatimadhava and Sugriva in the dramas based on the Rama-legend belong to this category. The term, however, has not been mentioned in those plays, while in Malavikagnimitra the nun Kaushika is stated to be a 'Pithamardika' as she acts as an intimate companion. In the later dramas, such a role ceased to be a constant one.

(b) Vidushaka: According to Natyashastra, Dasharupaka, Sahityadarpana, and Rasarnavasudhakara, the 'Vidushaka' (i.e. the abuser or the comic person) is the confidant of the king. He is a brahmin, yet he speaks the popular speech; he is ludicrous alike in dress and behaviour. He is said to be a humpbacked dwarf with projecting teeth and distorted face; he is bald-headed and red-eyed. He makes himself ridiculous by covering his person with tatters and skin and by anointing himslef with ashes, etc. He indulges in incoherent and slippery talk; he often makes an exhibition of knowledge which he actually does not possess. He has a tendency to quarrel and is greedy of food and gifts of every kind. All other characters try to have fun at his expense, though he stimulates laughter at almost every step. He is always a sure companion of the protagonist. He makes some unlucky and incompetent attempts to help him, and many times makes the situation more complicated.

Drama might have borrowed him from the popular plays of the wandering dancers and mimes. If one interprets the name literally, he is the one who abuses, and in this sense he might be traced back to the figure of an abusing brahmin in the Mahavrata ritual where a celibate and a prostitute abused each other. We come across a Vidushaka and a maidservant hurling abuse at each other in Karpuramanjari of Rajashekhara. It is quite significant that the figure of Vidushaka appears in those dramas which do not borrow their material from the principal plot of the great epics. He is, however, missing from plays where the inventive power of the dramatist is evident, e.g., Malatimadhava of Bhavabhuti. His place has been usurped by the figure of a 'narmasuhrid' arising out of the popular tradition envisaged in Kathasaritsagara.

(c) Vita: He is a much less common but an interesting figure who has been compared to the parasite of the Greek drama. The theoreticians call him a cunning epicure, and maintain that he should be a poet skilled in arts, especially music, and acquainted with the ways of hetaerae. He is an expert not only in conversation, but also in worldly ways, and is endowed with literary and artistic culture. Vatsyayana suggests in his Kamasutra that the Vita is a married man and a squanderer of talents. He is an essential figure in a Bhana or monologue; however, the sutradhara appears as a Vita here who narrates his own shady adventures. This figure may have been borrowed from the popular dramatic tradition, but in the regular forms of Sanskrit drama, he does not enjoy importance. Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti ignore him; Harsha's Nagananda depicts him only in an episodic situation. Among the older dramas, the Vita plays an important role only in Mricchakatika.

(d) Shakara: The 'Shakara' is an old popular figure who is the brother of a royal concubine. The rhetoricians observe that he belongs to a low caste and is of uncertain temper, being easily angered or pleased. He puts on gorgeous dresses and ornaments and boasts of his high connections, though he proves himself ignorant, corrupt and incompetent. His name indicates that he would substitute the palatal 'sh' for the dental 's' in his speech and, according to Bharata, he speaks the Magadhi dialect. He appears in Bhasa's Charudatta, but is displayed prominently in Shudraka's Mricchakatika. He appears also in an episode of Abhijnana Shakuntala but fades out quickly.

(e) Duta: The royal protagonist requires the aid of a 'duta' or messenger in his amorous intrigues as well as serious matters. A Duta should have loyalty, courage, energy, good memory, and adroitness. Sometimes he has limited authority and can act according to his best judgement. The heroine, too, has her messenger who may be a friend, a slave, a foster-sister, a neighbour, a work-woman, or an artist. It is strange that sometimes a nun of the Buddhist order was used as a messenger for the heroine. Perhaps this sheds light on the attitude of society towards a waning Buddhism.

(f) Cheta: the 'Cheta' or slave is intimately associated with the royal household whose features have been discussed by Bharata. He stays within the circle of the protagonist's allies.

(g) Besides such characters, in the remoter or outer circle of the protagonist we come across the following 'patras': the commander (senapati), the royal prince (kumara), minister (mantrin, amatya), judge (pradviveka), officer (prayogadhikarta, court-priest (purohita), door-keeper (pratihari), etc.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(h) Among the women-folk, the heroine has her friend, foster-sister, maid-servant, and others. Bharata dscribes them as members of her inner circle (abhyantara gana). This circle also includes the following: the chief queen (mahadevi), second queen (devi), old lady (vriddha), female body-guard (samchariki), Yavani (Greek maiden), etc.

There are also the following characters connected with the royal harem; the king's favourite (svamini), royal concubine (sthayini and bhogini), chief attendant (ayukta), king's personal attendant (anucharika), duenna (mahattara), etc.

The hetaera (courtesan) deserves special attention since she is painted in fascinating colours; she is kind-hearted, adroit, active, seductive and thoroughly skilled. She stakes her claim for genuine admiration as well.

(i) Another class of people are grouped as neuter (napumsaka). They are, according to Bharata, the following: the learned brahmin (snataka), the chamberlain (kanchukin), eunuch (varsadhara, nirmunda, upasthayika), etc.

The peculiar features as well as the individual etiquette of the above types have been discussed by rhetoricians.

According to Natyashastra, the dramatic genre reflects the world, as it were, in a mirror. In fact, it is a microcosm representing good and evil, happiness and sorrow. The stage unfolds before us a unique gallery of diverse characters of varying hues and dimensions. Thus, a detailed study of the patras, i.e. dramatis personae, of the Sanskrit plays sheds illuminating light on the multi-dimensional life of India in the past.

PATRAS BOKHARI (Urdu; b.1897, d.1958). Pir Syed Ahmad Shah, pen name Patras Bokhari, was the second among the three sons of S. Asadullah Shah Bokhari. His ancestors migrated from Bokhara and settled in Punjab during the Mughal rule, Patras was born in Peshawar, and having acquired the basic traditional education at home, he got admitted to the local English school. The Headmaster used to call him 'Pir', which by usage became 'Peter', later adopted as Petrus/Patras by the author himself.

Patras did his graduation from the Government College, Lahore, in 1917, and after sometime proceeded to England for higher studies. From Cambridge University, he got his Tripos, returned home and joined the Central Training College, Lahore. Later, he served at the local Government College and soon gained popularity as a teacher of English.

Bokhari joined as Station Director, All India Radio, in 1934. In 1947, he joined Government College, Lahore, as its Principal. Later, he served the department of Foreign Affairs of Pakistan, and left for the U.S.A. He served the U.N. also as a Deputy Secretary in its Information Section.

Patras Bokhari, besides being a devoted teacher and an able administrator, was a successful writer. His wide knowledge, sharp intelligence, and ability to express himself effectively earned him an important place in Urdu literature as a humorist and as a writer of beautiful 'inshaiye' (personal essays).

Inshaiya is a new prose genre in Urdu, and in comparison to other literary forms in prose, it has its own structure and appeal. It originated during the concluding years of the nineteenth century and developed into a separate form in the early part of this century.

Patras Bokhari has only one book to his credit entitled Mazamin-e-Patras. Most of its essays meet the standard demanded by this prose genre. He is ranked second among the able inshaiya writers of Urdu, being next only to Rashid Ahmad Siddiqui.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Assamese). Assam was brought under the British rule in 1826. It was indeed a turning point in the history of literature and culture of Assam. An awareness of the lost glory and an intense longing for freedom came to occupy the mind of the people. Like people in other parts of India, the Assamese people felt humiliated as they had to submit to their alien British rulers. This feeling found expression in literature. Some poets wrote poems which were surcharged with deep emotion. Of these Kamalakanta Bhattacharya was the most outstanding. In his poems he was at once a patriot, a philosopher and a social reformer. His poems express a new ideal, that of nationalism. His notable collections are Chintanol (Burning thoughts, 1980) and Chinta taranga (Waves of thoughts, 1933). Patriotism was a burning passion with Kamalakanta, and the poems were deeply rooted in the ancient traditions of our culture and history. The pitiable contrast 'between the glorious past and the benighted present' is a recurring theme in his poems. In Chintanol there are poems like 'Udagani', 'Purnimar ratiloi chai', 'Jatiya gaurav' etc., wherein we find 'illuminating juxtaposition of two pictures' one of the golden and the other of crippling and stultifying bondage. His ebullient emotion finds expression in poems like 'Rangpu' and 'Sibsagar darshan'. In the poem 'Pahoroni' the poet, after recollecting Assam's past glory, describes the way of reviving the ancient glory of Assam. The love of patriotic ideals, local in Chintanol, assumes a larger universal note in Chinta taranga. In Himalayar prati sambodhan, the poet describes the glorious past of India and contrasts it with the woes and miseries of the present. The poem ends with an optimistic note.

The other patriotic and nationalist poets worth mentioning are Lakshminath Bezbarua and Ambikagiri Roychowdhuri. It may be mentioned here that the Non-cooperation Movement launched under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi in the early twenties of the present century had set in motion a powerful partriotic current. In addition the Bengali songs of Dwijendralal Roy and Bankimchandra Chatterjee caught the imagination of some of the Assamese writers. Bezbarua wrote a number of lyrics and patriotic songs. His Kadamakali was published in 1913, but some poems were not included in it. In his patriotic poems, as in 'Amar janmabhumi', 'O mor aponar desh', 'Asam sangit', 'Vin aru baragi' and 'Brahmaputra', Bezbarua set forth the glories and greatness of the Assamese history and culture with glowing love and admiration. This idealization of the past stimulated his nationalistic sentiments. 'Asam sangit' may be taken as a tapestry in which he has woven the glories of Assam in order to inspire and exalt the people of Assam who were groaning under the bondage of the British rule. 'O mor aponar desh' has been rightly regarded as the national anthem of Assam. His 'Vin aru baragi' is a poem of stirring patriotic appeal.

Roychowdhuri wrote both mystic and patriotic poems. A life-long fighter for national liberation, he was incarcerated twice for taking part in the freedom movement. He often gave himself out as a rebel and revolutionary. Almost all the poems of the Songs of the Cell were written behind the prison bars. His other collections of poems are Anubhuti (1914), Sthapan kar sthapan kar (1958) and Bedanar ulka (1964). He sought not only to liberate the country from its foreign yoke but also to put an end to all the evils that had eaten into the vitals of society. In his brave lyric 'Jivan kinhak kay' we get a glimpse of his life-philosophy. His conception of freedom is well-expressed in the poem 'I am the prince of freedom'. He wrote some patriotic and nationalistic songs as well.

Shailadhar Rajkhowa, author of Nijara (1935), wrote a few poems with patriotic fervour. He displayed his consummate skill in weaving romantic stories around places of historical interests. His 'Barpeta', 'Bisandoi ali' and 'Pashan pratima' are patriotic poems. Dimbeswer Neog (1900-1966), the author of Indradhenu (1930), also wrote a few patriotic poems. His patriotic impulse is best expressed in the poem 'Buranji-lekhak' which is surcharged with deep emotion. His 'Sapamukta' is a poem in which love for the beloved coalesces with love for the motherland, and the poet seeks to rouse the slumbering land to patriotic pride. A revolutionary poet much in the line of Kazi Nazrul Islam of Bengal, Prasannalal Chowdhuri, author of Agnimitra (1952), is an iconoclast and out to 'erect the edifice of a brave new-world' upon the ashes of the old, and determined 'to purge all the accumulated dross and filth of the centuries'. His human sympathy is more pronounced in Nangalar git.

> Let the plough triumph,
> Let the destitute be free
> Let millions of heads be held high.

Jyotiprasad Agarwalla, who was closely associated with the freedom movement, wrote some nationalistic poems. His nationalistic fervour finds its best expression in the poem 'Deka-gabharur ukti'. His 'Poharar jaygan', 'Biswa bijayi na jowan', 'Bharat janani', 'Luitar parare ami deka lora' are nationalistic in spirit. Binandachandra Barua wrote some patriotic and nationalistic poems. The poems in Sangkhadhwani (1925) and Pratidhwani (1938) are saturated with deep emotion. If the poet 'rakes up the past', it is only 'to find sparks of courage and inspiration'. His message to the rising generation is to smash the fetters of the foreign rule and to build up a prosperous Assam. His 'Rangamua bir', 'Agiathutir bir', etc. are patriotic poems based on episodes from the history of Assam. One cannot think for a moment that 'Najana birar mur' is an adaptation of an English poem. Hiteswar Bazbarua wrote a few long narrative poems, based on history, such as Kamatapur-dhamsa aru birahini bilap (1912), Tirutar atmadan (1913), and Juddhakhetrat Ahom ramani (1918) which kindled the fire of nationalism. Ganeshchandra Gogoi's 'Puja ayojan' is a patriotic poem. T.R. Phukan and N.C. Bordoloi, who championed the non-cooperation movement in Assam, composed some patriotic songs. Padmadhar Chaliha's collections of songs, such as Phulani (1915), Swaraj sangit (1921) and Giti-lahari (1923), include some patriotic songs.

Some Assamese historical plays ignited the fire of nationalism, and contributed in no small measure to the re-awakening of the people to their social and political problems. Padmanath Gohain Barua's Jaymati (1900) was the first historical drama in the Assamese language. His other historical plays are Gadadhar (1908), Sadhani (1911) and Lachit Barphukan (1916). Lakshminath Bezbarua's historical dramas are Chakradhwaj Simha. Jaymati Kunwari and Belimar. All appeared in 1915.

Among the others who wrote historical plays were Radhakanta Handique, Kamalananda Bhattacharya, Dandinath Kalita, Shailadhar Rajkhowa, Daibachandra Talukdar, Atulchandra Hazarika, Jyotiprasad Agarwalla and Nakulchandra Bhuyan. Jyotiprasad's drama Labhita (1948), written on the background of the Second World War, depicts the patriotism of an Assamese girl Labhita who joined the Indian National Army during the liberation movement and died on the fields of war. In Tikendrajit (1959) Atulchandra Hazarika narrates the insurgency of the people of Manipur against the British in 1891 under the leadership of Tikendrajit. Suren Saikia's Kusal Konwar (1949) is based on the 1942 movement and delineates how Kusal Konwar became a martyr being executed on the false charge of derailing a train. In Prabin Phukan's Maniram Dewan (1948) we find how Maniram Dewan, tried for the restoration of the Ahom monarchy, was executed in 1857. Another play, Piyali Phukan (1948), published by Nowgong Shilpi Samaj, is based on the martyr Piyali Phukan who made an attempt to drive out the British from Assam in 1830.

Mahatma Gandhi's Non-cooperation Movement gave a fillip to the growth of Indian nationalism and made a deep impact on some Assamese novels and short stories. This is discerned in the novels of such writers as Dandinath Kalita, Daibachandra Talukdar, Birendra Kumar Bhattacharya and Jogesh Das and in some short stories of Laksmidhar Sharma and Troilokyanath Goswami.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Bengali). Nationalism is a product of western ideas introduced into this country under the impact of the British invasion. And it is this sense of nationalism that rekindled the dormant feeling of patriotism which sometimes projected itself as a sense of pride in our national heritage and sometimes in the regional variation of our common culture.

So far as Bengali literature is concerned, ideas connected with patriotism began to be perceived in the writings of poets, playwrights and other writers who appeared in the wake of the British presence in Bengal. They were preoccupied with the dividing line between the gradual decline of the medieval concepts such as feudalism and village society and the emergence of the new values directly related to the metropolitan culture. Ironically the consciousness of the foreign rule represented by the British power in India gave a fillip to our feeling of patriotism. There grew a class of writers who embraced such ideas as patriotism, humanism, democracy, etc., all bound up with the rise of the middle class in the country.

The first in this line was Iswarchandra Gupta (1812-1859) who may be regarded as standing between the old and the new but, at the same time, not immune from or averse to the absorption of patriotic sentiments. For example, he initiated his countrymen into the ideas of nationalism and into the worship of the land as the Mother, where one is born and learns one's first language. He rebelled against the slavish imitation of foreign ways and, in one of his poems, severely castigated those who showed a predilection for what he called, a "foreign dog" in preference to their own gods. As editor of Sambad prabhakar, a weekly and later a daily, he, notwithstanding his innate conservatism, was generous enough to welcome some of the progressive movements of the age.

Rangalal Banerjee (1827-1887), who appeared in the wake of Ishwar Gupta, was a poet quite familiar with the modes of English poetry, and he sought to clothe his poetic creations with the more notable features of Ishwar Gupta. Patriotism was a predominant note of his poetry and particularly Padmini upakhyan (1958), his first work, bears eloquent testimony to this.

The most outstanding poet of this period is, however, Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873) whose magnum opus Meghnadbadh kabya (1861) is nothing but a lengthy dirge consecrating the deity of patriotism—a piteous lament over the loss of motherland to an aggressor.

The path shown by Rangalal and Madhusudan was later followed by Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903) and Nabinchandra Sen (1847-1909), principally known for their patriotism. Hemchandra in his Britra samhar kavya (1875-77) and Nabinchandra in his Palasir juddha (1875) sang in praise of freedom and bewailed its loss.

But the greatest patriotic poet was undoubtedly Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) who wrote countless national songs during the movement against the partition of Bengal (1905) and many essays including 'Swadheshi samaj'. His novel Gora dealt with the theme with a seriousness of purpose and without narrowness of outlook. His Nationalism (1916), containing a bunch of speeches delivered in Japan, is a trenchant indictment of chauvinism and jingoism generally pactised in the name of nationalism.

Other poets noted for their patriotic fervour in their poetry and drama are Govindachandra Das, Dinabandhu Mitra, Jyotirindranath Tagore, Upendrachandra Das, Haralal Roy, Girishchandra Ghosh, Dwijendralal Ray, Satyendranath Dutta, Mukunda Das, Sachindranath Sengupta and Manmatha Roy.

For prose literature Bankimchandra was the greatest apostle of patriotism. His novel Anandamath (1882), which contained the immortal song 'Bande mataram' (I bow to thee, Mother), at one time fired the imagination of thousands of youths in the country many of whom cared for nothing and laid down their lives with this song upon their lips. The successive Swadeshi movements in the country and the periodic revolutionary upsurge were directly traceable to the inspiration derived from this novel. Bankim's essays, of which 'Kamalakanter Daptar' (1875) was the most famous, also breathed a patriotic fervour.

Another prose writer who enriched patriotic literature immensely was Saratchandra Chatterjee (1876-1938) whose novel Pather dabi (1926) is a landmark in so far as it succeeded in rousing nationalist fervour and bitterness against the British rule in this country. So pervasive was the influence of this book on the minds of the youths that at one time it was banned by the Government. Its central character, Sabyasachi, served as model for them. The ban was, however, later lifted.

Saratchandra's Swadesh o sahitya (1932), a collection of essays, is instinct with patriotic ardour from the beginning to the end.

Among other fiction writers noted for patriotic zeal were Upendranath Ganguly, Tarashankar Banerjee, Banaphul, Manoj Basu, Pramathanath Bishi, Gajendrakumar Mitra, Subodh Ghosh and Satinath Bhaduri.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Dogri). Dogri literature does not have anything like a nationalist movement to show, yet it is not absolutely devoid of literature reflecting the nationalist sentiment. Poems of Baba Kanshi Ram (1882-1943) and Hardatt (1890-1956) reveal something of this sentiment. Baba Kanshi Ram, known as Pahari Gandhi, made his poetry the vehicle of propagating nationalism. But on the whole, the Dogri literary movement, starting around 1944, was more concerned with eulogising the glories of Duggar and Dogra heroes and inculcating love for Dogri and pride in Dogra traditions and values.

Thus, the first collection of poems of twelve Dogri poets, entitled Jago Duggar (late 40s), contained mostly poems of this patriotic sentiment, but it also contained a few poems reflecting the wider nationalist sentiment written by Hardatt Shastri, Denubhai Pant, Kishan Samailpuri, Parmanand 'Almast', Vedpal and Ramnath Shastri. Then in the 1950s, the Dogri Sanstha brought out a collection of poems written by Dogri poets on the occasion of the first anniversary of the 1857 War of Independence. It was entitled 1857, and almost every Dogri poet contributed a poem to it. The poems included in this volume, and many more not included, were composed and read at the Dogri Kavi Sammelan organised in connection with the anniversary celebrations. In 1965 the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages published an anthology of patriotic poems. Piyush Guleri too brought out a collection of his patriotic poems and songs in Mera desh mhachal. Mohanlal Sapolia also wrote a number of poems, many of which express the larger nationalist sentiment; some of them have been included in his collections of poems called Sajare phull and Rashtri bhakhana. It is not only Dogri verse that shows this nationalist sentiment here and there, but Dogri short stories and one-act plays also show it. Examples may be found in Narender Khajuria's stories 'Natak da hero' and 'Ma tu lori ga' included in Nila ambar kale badal, D.C. Prashant's one-act play Vir Zorawar, Kavi Ratna's one act play Morche uppar written in 60's, Narsingh Dev Jamwal's works in different genres and a few poems of Padma Sachdev and Ramlal Sharma.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (English). Patriotism in Indo-Anglian writing is expressed in many forms, as love of the country, search for the Indian identity and a driving urge for national resurgence. In fiction we see the reflection of the patriotic and nationalist sentiment on a very large scale. In quite a few novels in pre-independent India we see a search for an Indian identity and its assertion in the face of the colonial rulers. Lal Behari Day's Govinda Samanta (1874) and Soshee Chunder Dutt's The Young Zamindar (1883) strive for it. After independence, however, such novels were written not for upholding the national identity to confront the colonial rulers but to project the glory of the country before the world. The identity of the Indian nation was now asserted at higher levels which included the country's cultural and philosophical tradition. Raja Rao's The Serpent and the Rope (1960), for example, where an expatriate Indian in Europe is in search of his spiritual Indian identity, may be taken as an attempt in this direction.

In Indian political novels, too, is expressed the national spirit. The sporadic armed rebellions which erupted with the machinations of the uprooted native rulers in various parts of the country against the British rulers in the first half of the nineteenth century find adequate reflection in fiction. The first such novel is Kylash Chunder Dutt's A Journal of Forty-eight Hours (1835). It depicits a violent uprising of the 'Rajas, Nobabs and Babus' of Calcutta against the British rulers. The revolt is, of course, suppressed and the leaders executed, but it is significant that one of the leaders appeals to his countrymen before his execution to preserve the cause 'so gloriously commenced'. The second Indian English novel, The Republic of Orissa (1845) by Soshee Chunder Dutt, also presents a similar rebellion. This time, it is by the tribal chiefs of Orissa, Bihar and Bengal. His Young Zamindar, too, besides affirming the national identity already mentioned, shows similar political uprisings. In his next novel, Shunkur (1885), Dutt mingles history and fiction. It depicts the Sepoy Mutiny and Nana Sahib as an organising force behind it. As the mutiny breaks out, Nana Sahib succeeds after violent battles and atrocious killings on both sides in freeing Kanpur and proclaiming himself the 'Peishwa of India'.

In the second phase of the freedom struggle, different political organisations were formed towards the later decades of the ninteenth century by the Western educated middle-class leaders. They accepted the British rule as 'divine dispensation' but wanted self-government within the Empire, as the history of the first phase of the Indian National Congress shows. A friendly relationship between the ruler and the ruled was their cherished ideal. There are two novels reflecting this phase, The Price of Destiny (1909) by Sarath Kumar Ghosh and Hindupore (1909) by S.M. Mitra. In Mitra's Hindupore the arrogance and disrespect of the British officials towards the Indians have been shown as the cause of the Indian unrest. In the third phase of the freedom struggle, first under the leadership of Tilak, and next under Gandhi and Nehru, the Congress demanded complete freedom. K.S. Venkataramani's Murugan, the Tiller (1927) shows the Gandhian ideal of rural reconstruction as a step towards attaining freedom, while his Kandan, the Patriot (1932) exhibits the non-violent political struggle for freedom under the influence of Gandhi. Mulk Raj Anand's first novel, Untouchable (1935), depicts the national movement inspired by Gandhi's call to eradicate untouchability from Hindu society. Raja Rao's Kanthapura (1938) is another novel reflecting the Gandhian influence on our freedom moverment. It narrates a village woman's experience in her involvement in the freedom struggle. It is an uncommon story of rare emotional and spiritual involvement of an individual village woman.

In Raja Rao's short story, 'The Cow of the Barricades', an innocent white cow, killed in police firing, acquires a symbolic meaning. R.K. Narayan's short story 'Gandhi's Appeal' shows the irresistible attraction of Gandhi for the women of India. Bhabani Bhattacharyya's So Many Hungers (1947) on the other hand, shows the misrule and exploitation of the British that pushed India to extreme poverty and an unprecedented famine.

In post-independence India, nationalism or patriotism very often finds reflection not through an expression of undiluted love for the country in direct terms but through a criticism of the nation for its ugly aspects with the hope of making a better, stronger nation. G.V. Desani's All About H. Hatterr (1948) satirically presents some aspects of the Indian society which are not quite happy. Nayantara Sahgal's political novels, This Time of Morning (1965), Storm in Chandigarh (1969) and The Day in Shadow (1971) expose the game of dirty politics in free India.

When we move to poetry, our first encounter is with Henry Derozio (1809-1831). Though a Eurasian by blood, he was an Indian patriot writing some very brilliant patriotic poems in English. We can refer to the opening sonnet of his long narrative poem The Fakeer of Jungheera (1828), the sonnet 'The Harp of India', and the lyrics 'To India, My Native Land' and 'To the Pupils of the Hindu College'. Kashiprasad Ghose (1809-1873) also wrote patriotic poems, and his 'The Farewell Song' is an instance. Then we had Soshee Chunder Dutt, Hur Chunder Dutt and Michael Madhusudan Dutt who wrote patriotic poems speaking of freedom. The famous national leader, Sarojini Naidu (1879-1949) too had in her excellent lyrics, the flame of nationalism. We may point to her poem, 'Awake', where, besides the urge for freedom, there is a call for the integration of diverse communities. Joseph Furtado (1872-1947), an Indian poet of the Portuguese Goan origin, gives expression to his love of the country in his poem, 'My Native Land'. Against such poems which express love for the country in direct terms, we have some poems where the dark side of our national life finds expression. We may refer, for instance, to Annaji's 'What care I for Lajpat Rai', which attacks our unabashed selfishness, or to V.N. Bhushan's 'Ninth August 1942', which exhorts us to shake off our apathy and 'follow the nation's stirring call'.

After the country had won freedom many sensitive writers were disillusioned with the state of affairs. Many poets, therefore, instead of writing patriotic poems in direct terms as of old, expressed their concern for the maladies of the nation. In his poem, 'The Song of India', V.K. Gokak asks Mother India what song he should sing for her. Should he sing of her natural beauty, ancient glory, industrial advancement, and all that? But she asks him to 'Sing of the beggar and the leper/That swarm my streets/ Sing of the filth and dirt/ That foul my sylvan retreats'. There is another brand of post-independence national spirit, touched with anger at the fanaticism of the so-called nationalists who insist on everything swadeshi but endanger individual freedom in a free country. One may point to Kamala Das's poem, 'Introduction', in this context.

Compared to fiction and poetry, drama shows less nationalistic concern. Even then, this spirit is not altogether absent. There is, for example, Bharati Sarabhai's play, The Well of the People (1943), which shows the influence of the Gandhian thought on social reconstruction.

We may now turn to non-fictional English prose-writings. We have a vast body of writings and speeches by political leaders which is more politics and less literature and may be left out. But we have political leaders who are also writers in their own rights, and they deserve consideration. The first name in this category is that of Dadabhai Naoroji (1825-1917). His book, Poverty and Un-British Rule in India (1901), made a great impact on the Indian mind and moulded the public opinion against the economic exploitation of the British in India. We had Surendranath Banerjee (1856-1925) whose autobiography, A Nation in Making (1925), gives a stirring account of the Indian people coming together as a nation to fight the colonial rule. Mention may also be made of Bipinchandra Pal's books, Nationality and Empire (1916), Indian Nationalism: Principles and Personalities (1919), and Memoirs of My Life and Times (2 Vols., 1932, 1952), Lajpat Rai's Young India (1917) and the Political Future of India (1918), V.S. Srinivasa Sastri's Thumb-nail Sketches (1946) of eminent public figures like Gandhi, Tilak and Naoroji. Gandhi's impact was indeed the most dominant. His political heir, Jawaharlal Nehru, was not only a national leader of the top rank but also an Indian-English writer of the highest order. His Autobiography (1936) and Discovery of India (1946) shaped the nationalistic perspective of the country.

Besides political leaders, we had other prose-writers also who reflect in their work the national spirit. Raja Rammohan Roy (1772-1833), R.G. Bhandarkar (1837-1925), Mahadev Govind Ranade (1842-1901), Kashinath Trimbuck Telan (1850-1893), and Romesh Chunder Dutt (1848-1909) were the early pioneers imbued with the love of the country and its rich heritage. Then we had Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) who inspired the Indian mind with his writings. In his book Nationalism (1917), he condemned Western imperialism which caused appalling damage to the colonial countries like India. Another great Indian was Vivekananda (1863-1902), the unique exponent of Indian culture and thought. And finally there was Aurobindo (1872-1950), a great spiritual leader who in his early life was also a nationalist activist. His New Lamps for Old (1893-94) is a volume of the nationalistic essays of this period. His important books on cultural nationalism are The Renaissance in India (1920) and Foundations of Indian Culture (1953). His two great works in prose and verse, The Life Divine (1939-40) and Savitri (1954) respectively, are expositions of his outlook on life as an Indian spiritualist.

In striking contrast to such spiritual masters is Nirad C. Chaudhuri (b. 1897), a prose-writer of a very high order and a nationalist of a different kind altogether. His books, Autobiography of an Unknown Indian (1951), The Continent of Circe (1966), and To Live or Not to Live (1972) show him as a ruthless critic not only of the contemporary Indian scene and society but also of many of our traditional values. The national sentiment thus finds many channels for its expression in Indo-Anglian literature. And since English is not the language of a particular area in the country, patriotic literature in English represents the nationalistic spirit without being confined to a particular cultural or racial group.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Gujarati). Narmad (1833-1886) in his writings declared the mutiny of 1857 as a freedom struggle, and in his essay Swadeshabhiman (Patriotism) explained in detail the concept of nationalism, and urged the people to fight for freedom. In the twentieth century, some poets have written poems eulogising the greatness of India. Kant (1867-1923) has written Bharatmatane sambodhan (Address to Mother India) and Balwantrai Thakore (1869-1946) wrote Majinun stotra (Hymn to mother) in which he depicted the greatness of India. Nanalal (1877-1946) in his poem 'Sakunni ghadio' asked his countrymen to fight against the British rule. In 1915, after Gandhiji's arrival in India, his impact was seen in all walks of life. In all the genres of Gujarati literature there was a spurt of nationalism. Almost all poets between 1921 and 1945 wrote poems eulogising Gandhiji and the freedom struggle. Umashankar Joshi, Sundaram, Sneh Rashmi, Karasandas Manek, Ramnarayan Pathak, Jhaverchand Meghani, Lalit Balmukund Dave and others wrote poems on Gandhiji and the freedom movement. Though Gandhiji was wedded to non-violence, Meghani eulogised the sacrifice of martyrs like Bhagat Singh and others. Ramanlal Desai wrote two novels, Divyachakshu and Bharelo agni, the former based on the Satyagraha of 1930 and the latter on the 1857 War of Independence. Young writers like Jayanti Dalal and Chunilal Madia wrote Padarna tirath on the background of the 1932 movement and Pavak jwala on the Quit India Movement of 1942 respectively. Sopan has written a novel on the 1942 Quit India Movement, called Jayant. Subhash Bose's revolutionary movement during 1943-1945 was also found to be an appropriate subject for creative literature. Karsandas Manek has written Sapnu gulabi (Rosy dream), depicting Netaji's efforts to liberate India, and Niranjan Varma and Jaymal Parmar have written a novel Kadam kadam badhayeja (March forward), based on Subhash's revolutionary movement.

After Independence, the rosy dreams of independent India having been shattered by the holocaust of partition, and the mal-functioning of the government, many writers indulged in sarcasm towards the rulers in their writings. Umashankar Joshi wrote a number of such poems. Only in the Indo-Pakistan wars of 1965 and 1971 and the Indo-China war of 1961 do we find nationalist sentiments expressed through poems, short stories and novels. Chandrakant Bakshi wrote several stories on this theme,and Shivkumar Joshi's novels have in the background all the three wars.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Hindi). The sentiment of patriotism has always been a major impulse in Hindi literature, though it has undergone changes in conceptual meaning under the stress of times. In the early periods and during the medieval times from the ninth century to the middle of the nineteenth century, any one fighting for his state or against an invader from outside was reckoned as a patriot. His display of bravery and chivalry was regarded as a display of his patriotism. Prithviraj raso by Chandra Bardai shows best the patriotic feeling while depicting the fight between Prithviraj Chauhan and Muhammad Ghori. Here it is pertinent to note that in those days the concept of nation was confined to one's own state. Hence, in the works of this period such as Paramal raso, Hammir raso, Jaichandra jas-chandrika, the hero kings and their nobles treated even their neighbouring rulers, if hostile, as alien invaders. In the medieval time, 'bhakti' was the dominant sentiment in Hindi literature, but the saint-poets did try to bind the people of different creeds together. Later in the 'Riti kal', literature tended to be more secular and broad-based, but such works as Chhatra prakash by Gorelal, Hamir raso by Jodharaj, Sujan charitra by Sudan, Shivaraj bhushan and Chatrasal dashak by Bhushan, though full of the heroic sentiment, are patriotic only in a limited sense. Basically, their heroes championed the cause of their cult.

It is in the modern age that patriotism becomes a dominant feature of literature. The struggle against British imperialism and colonialism stirred the nation. The new nationalism was a direct offshoot of such patriotism. The magazines of the period, such as Kavivachan sudha, Harischandra chandrika, Anand kadambini, Hindi-pradeep, and the literature produced during the age reflect the patriotic fervour of the nation. Bharatendu Harishchandra, Balkrishna Bhatt, Pratapnarain Mishra, Radhakrishna Das, Premghan, Jagmohan Singh, Kishori das Goswami and a host of other writers wrote on patriotic themes. Bharatendu's plays, Andher nagari chaupat raja, Bharat janani, Bharat durdasha, Vaidiki hinsa hinsa na bhavati, and his miscellaneous writings, poems and essays, are all full of patriotic zeal. He could write in a limerick: 'churan sahib log jo khate, sara Hind hazam kar jate' (The Englishmen eat this churan, therefore, they digest the whole of India). The heroes of the 1857 Mutiny, such as Maharani Laxmi Bai, Nana Sahib, and Azimulla Khan, became the symbols of Indian patriotism.

From the 'Dwivedi Yug' onwards the patriotic wave reached new heights as the struggle for freedom gained greater momentum under the leadership of such stalwarts as Dadabhai Naoroji, Lokamanya Tilak and Lala Lajpat Rai. The writers sang of India's glorious past, launched a crusade against alien rule, and stressed the need to unite the Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and Christians into one nationhood. Maithilisharan's Bharat bharati, Shyamnarayan Pandey's Haldighati and Jauhar, Subhadrakumari Chauhan's Jhansi ki rani, Makhanlal Chaturvedi's play Krishnarjun yuddha, Vrindavanlal Verma's stories such as 'Tatar and Vir Rajput', 'Sardar Purna Singh's essays like 'Sachhi virta', Ramchandra Shukla's essay 'Kshatra dharma ka saundarya', and Radhamohan Gokul's biography of Nepoleon Bonapart, are all charged with the intensity of patriotism. Besides, there were poets like Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Ramnaresh Tripathi, Sohanlal Dwivedi, Balkrishna Sharma 'Navin' and Siyaramsharan Gupta who wrote under the spell of the new awakening. Then we had such powerful poets as Prasad, Nirala, Pant, Mahadevi Verma and Dinkar whose poems reflected in different ways the patriotic upsurge. Prasad's plays too, such as Skandagupta, Chandragupta and Dhruvaswamini, had the undertone of the national sentiment. The literature of chhayavad is, indeed, a creative rendering of the throbs of the Satyagrah movement of the time. Nirala's 'Jago phir ek bar' (Awake once more) communicates this throb vividly. The patriotism of Dinkar expresses itself in poetry born out of the churning of history and mythology. In fiction, Premchand's Gaban and Karmabhumi, Prasad's Kankal and Titli, Vrindavanlal Verma's Maharani Laxmibai and Virata ki Padmini are landmarks in the history of patriotic literature.

Since 1936 the progressive movement in Hindi further strengthened the patriotic spirit through the writings of Kedarnath Agrawal, Trilochan, Nagarjun, Bhagawaticharan Verma and Shivamangal Singh 'Suman'. Literature that looks foreward, be it Rangeya Raghav's Tufanon ke beech, Amrit Rai's Kalam ka sipahi : Premchand, Yashpal's Dada Comrade or Dinkar's Kurukshetra, is of a piece in its stress on sacrifice and dedication to the cause of the people.

After Independence, the impulse for patriotism was transformed into an urge for re-building the nation. The assassination of Mahatma Gandhi in the wake of the country's partition brought out some very poignant literature, such as Yashpal's Jhutha sach, Mohan Rakesh's Malbe ka malik, and Dinkar's elegies. During the Chinese aggression and the fight with Pakistan, the injured self-respect of the country found its expression in Dinkar's Parashuram ki pratiksha. Sachchidanand Vatsyayan 'Agyeya', Girijakumar Mathur, Bhavaniprasad Mishra, Sarveshwar Dayal Saxena, Raghuvir Sahay, Dhumil, all expressed the national aspirations. There was, however, another aspect of national life which engaged the minds of many sensitive writers. The corruption in the country and the deterioration of values found their expression in several writers, such as Shrilal Shukla's novel Ragdarbari, Mohan Rakesh's play Andhere band kamare, Sarveshwar's play Bakari and Dhumil's poems Sansad se sadak tak.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Kannada). The love of Karnataka and the Kannada language finds expression in the very first extant work, Kavirajamarga, and Pampa, the first poet whose works are extant, has expressed his love of his land in memorable words. But patriotism as we understand it—the loyalty to a nation—is seen in Kannada literature in the Navodaya period only. Lavanis (ballads) were composed and sung, glorifying the brave men and women who fought against the British, like Kitturu Rani Chennamma (1780-1830), Tippu Sultan (1750-1799) and Sangolli Raya Nayka. These works cannot be dated; but they were composed soon after the martyrdom of the hero or heroine, and were immensely popular. They contain denunciation of the British. But the awareness of a shared and a common future, a recognition of India as a nation—these manifested themselves much later. It is also not possible to date the ballads which were inspired by the struggle for Independence. In some of the songs of the saint-singer, Sishunala Shariff (1918-1989) the tyranny of the British is denounced. Kambi Basavayya (1875-1920) composed ballads singing the praises of Tilak and Lala Rajpat Rai, and used the expression, 'Vande mataram'. Professional troupes staged plays depicting the martyrdom of Naragunda Nana Saheb, Kitturu Rani Chennamma and other brave fighters. Bandha vimochana was a play inspired by the life of Balagangadhara Tilak. But these expressions, again, cannot be dated.

Translations of Bengali and Marathi novels brought nationalism into Kannada literature fairly early. Bankim chandra's Anandamath was translated into Kannada in 1897. Harinarayan Apte's Ishvari sustra, built around the heroic figure of Shivaji, was translated in 1913. The translator, Galaganatha, wrote his own independent novel, Madhavakaruna vilasa in 1923. This takes the reader back to the glorious days of the Vijayanagara Empire.

The sentiment of patriotism manifested itself in literature, in the thirties and the forties, in several ways. There were direct expressions of the love of the motherland; there were compositions bewailing her poverty and slavery; there were compositions carrying the reader back to golden chapters in the history of the land, reminding him of the dark days on which the country had later fallen, and also of the values which the country had cherished. Sali Ramachandra Rao, Dattatreya Ramachandra Bendre, K.V. Puttappa, M. Govinda Pai and a host of other poets composed poems imbued with patriotic fervour. The very title of one collection of Puttappa's poems is 'Panchajanya,' which signifies the tone of militant nationalism such as the times required. Bendre was interned for writing a poem, 'Narabali'(The human sacrifice). In one of his poems, Mother India bewails that she bore thirty-three crore children, but all of them proved useless. Indeed, it was in poetry that nationalism found its earliest expression, and, until 1946, it was the poet who turned again and again to this theme. In one of his poems, Puttappa declares, 'Drive away, far away hundreds of gods/Bharatmata is our only goddess today'. V.Seetharmaiah, Kadangodlu Shankara Bhatt, V.K. Gokak, Kayyaro Kiyyanno Rai—all wrote stirring poems lamenting the slavery of the country. Balchandra Ghanekar wrote plays about the trial of Tilak and the Salt Satyagraha led by Gandhiji. Parashurama is the hero of G.P. Rajaratnam's play, Gandugodali (1933), and Kartaviryarjuna, the villian. The veil is thin, and it is clear that Kartaviryarjuna is the foreign tyrant and Parashurama, the youth of the land.

But soon nationalism ceased to be mere lament for the country's plight and the desire to free her. It acquired other dimensions. The country is not just a geographical area : it is the people, and loving the country implies loving the people who live there, and this, in turn, means ensuring justice and civilized life for all, ensuring that the diginity of man as man is not denied. So patriotism expresses itself as reformist fervour; writers create a new 'hero'—the man dedicated to the service of the people, the man wedded to poverty and the service of the downtrodden and the helpless. Puttappa's play, 'Jalagara' affirms that the worship of Daridranarayana is true worship. Gokak's play, Jananayaka (1936), poses the question, 'Who is the true leader of the masses?'. The final answer is, 'He who is free from religious narrow-mindedness, free from selfishness, an idealist, a man of integrity who wishes to serve'.

Patriotism also expressed itself as the search for the Soul of India. The study of the history of England and the consistent glorification of the values (of course, at home) of the rulers turned the Indians to a study of their own past. The influence of Bankimchandra and Harinarayana Apte is also significant here. So in the Navodaya period the historical novel and the historical play make their appearance. In Old Mysore at any rate, Vasudeviah's prose works, Aryakirti (1895) and Chhatrapati Shivaji (1898) were read by thousands of boys and girls at school, and made a deep impression. Galaganatha's Madhavakaruna vilasa has already been mentioned. Davudu Narasimha Sastry's Mayura (1928), not quite faithful to history, but presumably narrating the story of the founder of the first Kannadiga royal dynasty, appeared. Professional troupes presented historical plays—whatever their fidelity to history.

Nationalism flowered abundantly in the field of biography. Several biographies of Gandhiji appeared, Biographies of Balagangadhara Tilak, Gopalkrishna Gokhale, Raja Rammohan Roy, Vivekananda, Ramakrishna Paramahamsa, and, later, Jawaharlal Nehru, Subhashchandra Bose, Vallabhbhai Patel, Kastur Ba, Sarojini Naidu and Rabindranath Tagore were also written. These were, one and all, adulatory, and there was little attempt at defining individuality, but they set ideals of heroism and service. The writings of Siddavanahalli Krishna Sharma stand out because of his art and skill of verbal description. He could etch a character and create an atmosphere in a few words.

Even before 1947 some writers were realistic in their treatment of themes connected with the struggle for freedom. In 1942 Shivaram Karanth's Marali mannige depicted, in the experiences of Rama, the trials of the young men who were thrilled by the call to fight for the country and later, engaged in constructive work as Gandhiji desired. In 1946-47 several novels appeared, all dealing with the struggle for Independence. V.M. Inamdar's Moora batte, Basavaraja Kattimani's Swatantradedge, T.R.Subba Rao's, Rakta tarpana, Gorur Ramaswamy Iyengar's Meravenige, and S. Anantanarayana's Muruku mantapa and Payanada hadiyalli were among these. Each had its distinctive approach. For example, while Kattimani's novel looked at the struggle mainly from the point of view of an ignorant village boy, Anantanarayana's novels dealt with the point of view of a college youth drawn to the struggle. Ramaswamy Iyengar's novel presented, sometimes without artistic transmutation, the experiences of a man who had been in the thick of the struggle. V.M. Inamdar's Vijaya yatre (1948) is remarkable in some ways. The action begins on 15 August 1947, and is limited to twenty-four hours. At the centre is Vijaya, who had fought for freedom but is now seriously bedridden in the hospital. It sounds a deep note of pessimism, detecting in the ways of the government an indifference to the values Mahatma Gandhi. The disenchantment voiced barely a year after the dawn of freedom is surprising. Shivarama Karanth's Audaryada urulalli appeared in 1947; it also depicts the trials of those who took to constructive work seriously, and at the same time, recognizes the danger to the country from self-styled patriots and politicians.

In the last thirty-five years patriotism has manifested itself in literature as a commitment to the people's welfare and to democracy. Both sentimentality and euphoria have disappeared; even if they do appear they are suspect and ridiculed. Disenchantment with free India and a realization that only vigilance can check hypocrisy and autocracy characterize literature generally. The Navya school reacted violently to the hypocrisy and the power-hunger let loose in free India. Outside Navya, writers like 'Sriranga' (in the novel, Vishachakravyuha and the play, Shokachakra) and S.L.Bhyrappa (in the novel, Matadana) have analysed the causes of degeneration in the country's values. In several recent novels Shivarama Karanth has analysed the evils haunting free India. The tone is one of disenchantment, not seldom coloured by bitterness and anger.

Patriotic sentiment manifests itself in a striking way in V.K.Gokak's epic, Bharatasindhu rashmi (1986). The poem takes its material from the Rig Veda, and shows an India facing a grim crisis because of the conflict between the Aryans and the Dasyus; Prince Vishvaratha develops, through 'tapas', a personality which can cope with the crisis. Its message is one of harmony and unity.

Bandaya and Dalita writers have found much to criticize and to repudiate in India's history. Behind their criticism is the vision of a land where equality and justice are realized ideals.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Kashmiri). The sparks of patriotism are widely scattered in Kashmiri literature, especially in folk-poetry, long before its emergence as a trend during the thirties of the current century under the influence of the struggle for freedom. Other factors which influenced this trend were the patriotic writings in Hindi, Urdu and English. Famous poets like Allama Iqbal, Byron, Josh Malihabadi, Mayakovski and others opened new vistas before the new generation of Kashmiri poets who followed Ghulam Ahmad 'Mahjoor' and Abdul Ahad 'Azad'.

Mahjoor and Azad were the harbingers of the new age in Kashmiri literature, and it was through their efforts that nationalism as an undercurrent in poetry made its way in Kashmiri. Mahjoor's (1885-1952) famous song 'Valoo has bagvana nau baharuk shan paedakar' (Come ye gardener, come with the glory and grandeur of spring) ushers in this trend. This song later became the war song of the freedom struggle. Its freshness of thought, revolutionary fervour and longing for a better future attracted the attention of all patriotic forces in Kashmir.

Mahjoor was basically a poet of love and romance, but the nationalistic urge too was quite marked in him. His famous poem 'Gulshan wattan' (My motherland—the garden of flowers) which he composed a little earlier is, as a matter of fact, the first and the most powerful expression of his patriotic sentiment. He wrote many more poems in this strain with the intensity of freedom struggle, which include 'Nalay Kashir', 'Azad', 'Nau Kashir', 'Sher-i-Azam Kashmir', 'Kashiri sund tarana', etc. But Mahjoor is largely a singer of love songs. As compared to him, Azad was a poet with a philosophy of life, and had a deep understanding of the problems facing the motherland. He stood for the great past and the bright future of his homeland and preached the doctrine of mutual understanding and national integration.

Azad composed a good number of poems replete with patriotic fervour. This note characterizes his ghazals, too. 'Wattan dar' is the most important of his poems on the theme of nationalism. Dilsoz was greatly influenced by the nationalistic poetry of Iqbal, and some of his poems glow with revolutionary ideas.

Master Zinda Kaul (1884-1965) was basically a mystic poet, but he too could not resist his inborn nationalistic feelings. Some of his poems have a deep-rooted impact of nationalism. Take for example 'Son desh' (Our motherland):

> This land is the abode of Lal Ded and Rupa Ded.
> Nund Rishi and Rishi Mole both hailed from this place.
> Kakji and Paramanand too flourished here.
> Here Sahib praised Gani Kashmiri!
> Here he was made to understand the meaning of Kralpong.
> Come ye maidens and sing a sweet song.

Abdul Sattar Aasi (d. 1950) also made some contribution to this trend. Three poems of Aasi, 'Flag song',

'Poverty' and 'Mazdur' are worth mentioning.

It is the towering personality of Dinanath 'Nadim' (1916-1988) who revolutionised the world of poetry in Kashmiri and added new and powerful dimensions to it. In expressing his patriotic feelings and revolutionary ideology, he changed the format of Kashmiri poetry in content and form and made use of fresh language which was forbidden till then. Nadim wrote his earlier poems in 1946-47, which were later published in Gaie ja Kashmir in 1948. This anthology is the first collection of national songs published in Kashmiri. There are as many as six poems of Nadim included in this anthology. All these six poems are full of vigour, patriotic zeal and revolutionary glow. His style and diction too have a new force:

Red and warm, red and warm
My blood is red and warm
My youth the force of a storm.
For Kashmir, my land, as a martyr I would die;
And whirpools do not fill the wind with trepidation
Lulled in the Dal Lake, waves should not hide and linger.

Nadim wrote so much in this strain that it is impossible to make a mention of all his songs. His famous opera Bombir Yambirzal is, as a matter of fact, a protest against imperialist forces, which then had an eye on Kashmir.

Those who continued to write in this trend after Nadim include Amin Kamil (b. 1921), Arjandev 'Majbur' (b. 1923), A. Rehman 'Rahi' (b. 1925), Muzaffar Azim (b. 1934), Motilal 'Saqi' (b. 1936), Ghulam Nabi 'Khayal' (b. 1936), Makhanlal 'Bekas' (b. 1939), Rasul Pompur (b. 1939) and Chamanlal 'Chaman' (b. 1939). Three anthologies of national songs have come out since the publication of Gaie ja Kashmir. These anthologies include the songs written by poets during the Chinese and Pakistani invasions in 1962 and 1965 respectively. The anthologies are Wattan chuy nad layan (Motherland calls you, 1962), Yi chu son wattan (This - our motherland, 1966) and Surug miyoni wattan (My motherland - the paradise, 1972). All the three above-mentioned anthologies have been published by the State Academy of Art, Culture and Languages.

In the field of prose, there are only two short stories, 'Javabi kard' and 'Shena piets pita' by Dinanath 'Nadim', which deserve mention.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Konkani). Though he was a Goan member of the Portuguese Parliament in Lisbon, the versatile Francisco Luis Gomes was the first to give written expression to Indian nationalism as early as in 1861, in his famous letter to the French poet-statesman Alphonse Lamartine, written in French. Precious little or nothing seems to have been written in Konkani in identification with the national cause before 1940. For one thing, the potentiality of the people's language as the appropriate medium of arousal of the national consciousness was realised quite late in the day; for another, Goa epitomised India for the majority of the Goan people, hence Goan writers while referring to Goa by name imply always the greater country.

Stirrings of nationalism are noticed in several Konkani novelists and journalists among Goan emigrants in Bombay since the turn of the present century, notably in the writings of novelist Joao Luis Carvalho who flourished around 1909-1939. But the real radical wave of nationalism that appeared in print for the first time in Konkani was in Gomantak (1940), the nationalist weekly of Juliao Menezes, published from Bombay. It shook the Goan out of his complacency and attempted to pull him into the mainstream of the Indian national movement. Menezes' close friend, the fiery socialist Ram Manohar Lohia's entry into Goa on 18 June 1946, as a guest of Menezes, sent shock waves throughout Goa and marked a turning point in the freedom movement in Goa, drawing Goan youth en masse into it.

Among the first to respond to this call of nationalism among writers in Konkani was Bakibab Borkar who then did his first compositions in Konkani poetry on patriotic themes. Borkar started a fortnightly Amchem Goem (1946-47) in Roman script to propagate the cause. Later, he published Projecho avaz (1950), a weekly in Roman and Devanagari scripts. The moving spirit behind these publications was the illustrious savant the Rev. H.O. Mascarenhas, with Lakshmanrao Sardessai contributing to literature in the form of short stories. It needs to be mentioned that Kakasaheb Kalelkar played a leading role in publicising Konkani literature of a nationalistic character and influenced a whole host of writers who came under his mantle to write in Konkani for the national cause.

Enio Pimenta founded and edited the nationalist Konkani weekly, Goemkar (in Roman script), from 1949 to 1952 in Bombay. Ravindra Kelekar, one of those who had been drawn into the nationalist movement in 1946, moved over to Gandhiji's Ashram at Wardha and from there started a fortnightly Mirg (1953, in Devanagari) which he ran for nearly four years, in which appeared the poetry of Waman Sardessai (Abhijit) and the prose of Godubai Kelekar. Tristao Braganza Cunha, the aristocratic scion of a nationalist leader, launched in Bombay his weekly Azad Goem (1955) in which another adept of the 1946 movement, Evagrio Jorge, was the principal writer. Ravindra Kelekar started later in 1957 his Gomant Bharati in Roman script. These had a significant impact on the Goan reading public.

Ravindra Kelekar (b.1925) brought much of Gandhian literature into Konkani. His Mahatma (1954) contains views of the world's leading personalities on Mahatma Gandhi's life and work. Gandhijinlo marg (1956) is a collection of essays by Kakasaheb Kalelkar, Kishorlal Mashruwala and Vinoba Bhave, translated by him. Satyagraha (1955) contains Gandhiji's discourses on 'Satyagraha'. Mangal prabhat (1956) contains Gandhiji's observations on various issues. The major work in this genre is Ashe ashil'le Gandhiji (1960).

Gomant Bharati Prakashan published also Bharatacho dishttavo (Vision of India), as perceived by Gandhiji, by the well-known poet B.B. Borkar. The noted prose-writer R.N. Naik translated R.K. Prabhu's The Mind of Mahatma Gandhi into Konkani as Manastirtha (1958). Niti-dharma (1956) is a Konkani version of Mahatma's The Ethical Religion, and Sarvodaya (1956) a translation of Gandhiji's Unto This Last (Ruskin), Satyachi sadhana (1957) is translated from Gandhiji's book Truth is God.

T.B.Cunha's Denationalisation of Goans was rendered into Konkani by Evagrio Jorge and published in 1961. Jorge himself has written and published Amchem Goem amkam zai (1955), Purtugezanchem raj mhunje Goenkaranchem nisontton (1946) on Goa's need for freedom. The movement also generated literary tracts of patriotic character. In this category were F. M. George's Catolo Igorz ani suttkechi chollvoll (1957) on Catholic Church's position vis-a-vis the freedom movement. Goemche uttav ani bondd'dam (1956) is another publication of historical and patriotic interest. Booklets like Lokmanya Tilak (1956), Nehru ani Goem (1957) and Salazar ani Goem (1956) dwelt on the role of Nehru and Salazar with regard to Goa. The eminent folklorist Lucio Rodrigues also contributed in Konkani to Gomant bharati weekly on nationalistic issues. Besides these, there were several magazines circulated clandestinely in Goa, many in manuscripts. In Aguada Fort Jail, Zot manuscript periodical was brought out by Nagesh Karmali from 1954 onwards. There was a considerable production of poetry in Konkani, especially at the time of the Chinese aggression in 1962, on patriotic themes. The outstanding poetry of this nature was seen in R.V. Pandit's works as well as those of Manoharrai Sardessai, especially in the latter's Zaiat zage (1964).

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Maithili). The term 'patriotism' has both a large and a narrow connotation in Mithila. In its larger sense, it embraces India as a whole, but in its restricted sense it is confined to Mithila only. In Maithili literature, nationalism ordinarily means the love of the land of Mithila. From about 1906 to 1935 the first instinct of Maithili writers was to write about the plight of Mithila and Maithils. Nevertheless, the country as a whole was as dear to them as Mithila itself. Mithila gitanjali (1927), an anthology of patriotic songs edited by Yadunath Jha 'Yaduvar', reflects both national and regional patriotism. So is the case with another anthology. Mithila sandesh, edited by Shyamanand Jha. Ramanand Jha Raman in his Navin Maithili kavita has refuted the allegations that Maithili writers were indifferent to the freedom movement of the country. Numerous poems of Yatri, Arasi Prasad Singh, Ishanath Jha, Bhuvaneshvar Singh 'Bhuvan,' Bhola Lal Das, Jivanath Jha and others have given expression to national sentiments. Even their regionalism is only a partial reflection of their larger fervour.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Malayalam). The earliest work in Malayalam to show signs of a glowing sense of patriotism is Puntanam Nambudiri's well-known poem Jnanappana (15th c.), which besides containing the message of the Upanishads, has lines written in honour of the motherland. According to Puntanam, Bharata is the place where our 'karmas' (actions) are fulfilled and salvation is achieved. But patriotism as an expression of nationalistic fervour is first found in the literature of the present century. In the beginning of this century, the spirit of patriotism expressed itself in the struggle for Independence. The first and perhaps the foremost of the poets expressing this sentiment was Vallattol Narayana Menon. Having whole-heartedly accepted Mahatma Gandhi as his guiding star in 1920, as proclaimed in the poem 'Ente gurunathan' (translated into English under the title 'My Master' by Kainikkara Kumara Pillai), the poet became an eloquent champion of the nationalist movement. Interestingly, the poem contains some Upanishadic imagery also: for the warrior who conquers the world with love, the mystic OM is the bow, the soul the arrow. Equally remarkable are the following lines.

> Only the land that gave birth to the Gita,
> Could bring forth a 'Karma Yogi' of this calibre;
> Only in the Himalayan and Vindhyan ranges,
> Could be found a lion so disciplined, in peace;

'Matrivandanam' is another well-known poem written by Vallattol, but the object of adoration here is not Bharata but Kerala. In another poem he addresses the youth of the country and warns against unreasonable Westernisation. He says,

> Let us go to the place where there is eternal dawn,
> Only darkness is inclined to the declining west.

Vallattol was one of the trio in the history of Malayalam poetry, the other two being Kumaran Asan and Ulloor S.Parameswara Iyer. Of these two the former was more concerned with the eradication of casteism, which he hoped would inevitably result in an all-out effort for the emancipation of the mother-land; the latter tried more to disseminate the cultural heritage of this ancient land. Nevertheless, the poem 'Oru udbodhanam' (An exhortation), in which Asan calls on the people to march forward undauntedly to win freedom bears unmistakable evidence of his interest in the national cause. There are about half a dozen short poems and a few essays to the credit of Ulloor, who highlights in them the glory of this country, besides the famous poem Chitrashala (A gallery of pictures, 13th ed. 1986), which throws light on some of the characters and episodes depicted in our epics and puranas. He also paid a rich tribute to Gandhiji in some of his short poems and essays. This is amply borne out by the poems in the collection, Taptahridayam (1948), and the first essay in Arshabhumiyude atmachaitanyam (1969). Standing out from the rest of the by-gone poets are G.Sankara Kurup, Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, P. Kunhiraman Nair, Vennikulam Gopala Kurup, Idasseri Govindan Nair, Vailoppillil Sreedhara Menon, Vayalar Rama Varma, V.K. Govindan Nair, Punalur Balan and N.N. Kakkad. Sankara Kurup's poems on Gandhiji, Netaji Bose and Jawaharlal Nehru are collected in the volume entitled Italukal. The other poets represent varying degrees and shades of patriotism.

Among the living poets, mention must first be made of Bodheswaran, whose 'Kerala ganam' is an unforgettable poem on Kerala; then, of M.P. Appan, who has contributed at least a dozen poems including 'Jhansi Rani' and 'Nammude kodi' (Our flag); and finally of Suranad Kunjan Pillai, some of whose essays and two of whose poems ('Kerala gitam' and 'Bharata gatha') are memorable in this regard. Perhaps all these are eclipsed by N.V. Krishna Warrior in one respect—in the expression of post-independence disillusion. His 'Mohandas Gandhiyum Nadhuram Godseyum' (Gandhi and Godse) is perhaps the most telling of the poems of this type. O.N.V. Kurup, P. Bhaskaran, Olappamanna Subrahmanian Nambudiripad, Akkittam Achyuthan Nambudiri, Pala Narayanan Nair, G. Kumara Pillai, Ayyappa Paniker, Sugatha Kumari, Chemmanam Chacko, Vishnunarayanan Nambudiri and Palur have also reacted to the call of the country in varying moods and ways.

When we turn from poetry to prose the first name to occur to us is that of Velu Tampi Dalava (1765-1809). Though not regarded as a literary figure, he has left behind an exquisite piece of writing in what has come to be known as the Kundara Proclamation (1809). Here he calls upon his fellow citizens of the erstwhile state of Travancore to fight against the British who brought most parts of the country under their direct control.

It is a far cry from Velu Thampi to Swedeshabhimani Ramakrishna Pillai, the first major Malayalam prose writer who was inspired by the spirit of patriotism. In his paper Swadeshabhimani he consistently attacked the misdeeds of the Dewan, then in power in the state. Malayalam prose itself attained in his hands unprecedented vigour capable of pungent sarcasm, vitriolic attack and socio-political overtones. Then, more recently, we have had novelists like P. Kesava Dev and Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, and playwrights like Thoppil Bhasi and Ponkunnam Varkey, who have all expressed the spirit of patriotism in their writings in their own unique ways.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Marathi). With the fall of Peshava Raj the British rule was firmly consolidated in the 19th century Maharashtra. The British rulers and their culture and style of functioning were new and modern in spirit and content. When the native culture encountered it, the process of acculturation took place and resulted in creating a new renaissance. The concept of 'nationalism' got a new dimension now, encompassing respect for the nation as a whole, its glorious ancient tradition, history and philosophy. It inspired many modern writers who were now conscious of the new concept of nation and had started giving expression to patriotic feelings in different forms of literature such as essay, novel, drama and poetry.

In the pre-British period, an art-form, called 'povada', was very popular and was used as a powerful device for inspiring people to fight against the enemy. This art-form was indigenous and could have been used against the British also, but since it came from the masses as folkart, the elite class, under the influence of Western ideas, did not feel drawn to it. An exception was Mahatma Phule, who was radical and humanitarian in his outlook. Phule's idea of social reform was mass-based and mass-oriented, and therefore he viewed literature from the common man's point of view. He wrote Chhatrapati Shivaji maharahancha powada in the traditional folkform, but its content was patriotic and progressive. It was not in tune with elitist patriotism but it influenced the writings of those who tried to follow his philosophy in organized activities. Artists like Shahir Amarshekh and Shair Annabhau Sathe were drawn to it.

The name of Vishnushastri Chipalonkar must be mentioned as one of the dominant patriots during the British colonial rule. He projected the idea of nationalism forcefully among the newly educated elites of Maharashtra. He used the essay form as his medium and started a journal called Nibandhamala, which he edited for more than fifteen years. He wrote essays on India's past history and present degradation. He believed in the cyclic concept of history and maintained that India would once again regain her past glory, and urged his countrymen to rise against the British power. He, however, showed love-hate relationship with the British: love for their rational, scientific and materialistic outlook, and hatred for ruling India and treating Indian culture as inferior. Chipalonkar's style of writing was forceful and rhetorical, dramatic and humorous. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, who transcended regional barriers, became a national leader. He wrote Kesari's editorials in a patriotic spirit and aroused his countrymen to participate in the freedom movement. Shivaram Mahadeo Paranjape, another important name in essay writing, imbibed the spirit of Chipalonkar's thinking and writing and added a new dimension of allegory and poetic quality to his essays. Savarkar echoed this spirit of patriotism in his prose-writing. His book on the 1857 'mutiny' was an attempt to prove that the mutiny was not just a revolt by native soldiers, but a patriotic struggle for freedom against the tyrannical British rule. After independence, thinkers like P.G. Sahastrabuddhe advocated the idea of nationalism through his books and essays, and the creative writer P.B. Bhave showed the same spirit in his essays like 'Sahadeva agni aan'.

In the field of poetry poets like Vinayak, Govind and Savarkar created a new wave of patriotic poetry in Marathi. It was romantic in spirit and dramatic in expression. Vinayak turned to history and glorified it. His statement 'Purva divya jyanche tyana ramya bhavi kal' is full of poetic fervour. Tekade's 'Ha Hind desh maza' was also a very popular patriotic song. Savarkar was an active rebel engaged in revolutionary activities against the British rule. His poems like 'Ne mazasi ne parat matrubhumila sagara pran talmalala' or 'Swatantrata stotra' are examples of intense poetic expressions of patriotic spirit in Marathi poetry. When the freedom movement reached its peak, a new star on the horizon of Marathi poetry appeared; he was Kusumagraj. His collection of poems, Vishakha, gave inspiration to many freedom fighters. His patriotic poems like 'Garja jayjaykar kranticha' and 'Vegat doudale veer Marathe vir saat' were on the tip of the tongues of those who fought for the freedom of the nation. Kusumagraj seems to have continued to write in this spirit even after independence. His poem 'Baraphache tat petun uthale' written during China's aggression shows his continuous commitment to the need of the time. In additon to these poets who formed the core of patriotic poets in Marathi, other well-known poets were Tilak ('Srishti tala pahuni dhanya mate'), Tambe ('Rudras awahan'), Yashwant ('Wadhude karagrahachya bhinti kiti'), Madhav Julian ('Bhrant tumha ka pade?'), Borakar ('Tethe kar maze julati'), G.D. Madgulkar ('Jinku kinva maru' and 'Vandya vande mataram') and Vasant Bapat ('Deshachi hak').

The Marathi novel in the formative period was under the influence of Scott and Reynolds, and Marathi novelists, while imitating them, searched for a heroic period in the past which they could project with pride and also relate to their own time. It was this search that drew them to Shivaji's time, full of thrilling and exciting events. Shivaji's attempt to establish Maratha power was not only a matter of power politics, but also an attempt to make the native people brave, self-conscious and proud of their land, culture and religion. H.N. Apte, who was otherwise inclined to write social novels like Pan lakshat kon gheto, was also tempted to write historical novels like Ushakal, Vajraghat and Gad ala pan sinh gela. Nath Madhav wrote Swarajyachi ghatana, Swarajyachi duphali, Swarajyache parivatan, Swarajyacha karabhar, etc., and made this genre very popular among the readers. Patriotism, which was now part of national ethos, was amply reflected in those historical romances. Though the historical authenticity of those novels is debatable, they were successful in making people conscious and proud of their history. In the post-independence era historical writing has continued to fascinate such writers as B.M. Purandare (Raja Shivaji), G.N. Dandekar (with novels on Maratha rule), Ranjit Desai (Shriman Yogi), Shivaji Savant (Chhava), etc. Creative writing on historical subjects in pre-independence period served as an inspiring source of partiotism, but the response to historical writing today shows that it has functioned as revivalism in disguise.

Of the three playwrights--Kirloskar, Deval and Khadilkar--who popularised Marathi theatre by writing plays on myths, history and social problems, Khadilkar stood apart by his active role in politics. He was a very close associate and ardent follower of Tilak. His way of thinking and perception was influenced and shaped by the ideology of nationalism propagated by Chiplonkar and popularised by Tilak. In the process of encounter with the British culture the native upper class elite gave serious thought as to why the Western nations had marched ahead of the Eastern countries in material progress.They concluded that the backbone of the Western culture was reason which treated knowledge as power. As against this, the Oriental view of knowledge considered it a device for spiritual understanding, leading towards the individual's salvation. As a result, association of culture with power became a part of many an Indian's thinking. While revolting against the British rule, they advocated the Western concept of knowledge as power. Khadilkar's plays, Kichak wadha, Vidyaharan and Bhaubandaki, represent this peculiar position of a nationalisic writer. Kichak wadha was analogous to British rule in which Kichaka was projected as a symbol of the tyrannical British power, and hence his assassination. This message of the play was so powerful and directly communicative that the British government banned its performance. In Vidyaharan the myth of Shukracharya and Kacha was interpreted in a new political context. Kacha's attempt to draw knowledge (Sanjivani vidya) from the opposite power at any cost could be considered the playwright's acceptance of knowledge as power. In Bhaubandaki he highlights the importance of working together, i.e. of collective responsibility, keeping aside personal prejudices and differences for the sake of nation. In order to project this message he takes into consideration the period of Peshava rule when rivalry in the royal family resulted into the assassination of Narayanrao Peshava. Savarkar, in addition to writing poetry and prose in patriotic spirit, also wrote a play called Sansyasth khag condemning philosophisation of peace and power structure. Vir Vamanrao Joshi through his play Ranadundhubi and Vasudeoshastri Khare through his Shivasambhav expressed the same patriotic spirit. In the post-independance period, P.B. Bhave too wrote a play called Rani Padmini and upheld martyrdom for one's honour as a great value. In Vij mhanali dharatila Shirwadkar portrayed the Queen of Jhansi as a great patriot and a great mother, fighting for the nation and showing rare bravery. During the Chinese aggression Bal Kolhatkar wrote a play called Simevarun parat ja in a symbolic manner in which he described the confrontation of Pauras with Sikandar, thereby bringing out the dauntless spirit of India.

In pre-independence India, patriotism ordinarily meant rebellion against the foreign power, with an aspiration for freedom. With the removal of foreign rule, the context has changed. In course of time writers and thinkers have realised that mere political freedom is not enough to face the multi-dimensional reality of life. As a consequence, traditional patriotism in literature has lost its vigour and many serious writers have turned to other aspects of life for the exploration of their vision.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Nepali). Indian nationalism grew with a kind of negative reaction to the British rule in India. There was a re-awakening in the nineteenth century, a renewed awareness of the glorious past of this country. This awareness generated the conviction that the common weal of this country lay in its freedom from foreign domination. This conviction surfaced particularly in the early part of the present century and resulted in the freedom movement.

In fact the national uprising in India had a great impact in the hill areas when the veteran Nepali freedom fighter, Dal Bahadur Giri, took active part in the public meeting organised by C.R. Das and Sister Nivedita at Darjeeling in the year 1906 and the immortal song 'Vande mataram' vibrated in the hill areas. Bhanubhakta Acharya, the great poet and the father of modern Nepali literature, wrote in his Bhaktamala: 'Baro durlav janos bharat bhumiko janma janlay' (Let the people know that the birth in the land of Bharata is not easily obtained), These words of Bhanubhakta had their significance because never before in Nepali literature had occurred the word Bharata nor had such devotion been shown to this land. Though torn apart by the oppressive British rule for two centuries, the hopes and aspirations of the Indian Nepalese are part of Indian nationalism and Indian awakening.

A very important factor in the birth and growth of nationalism in any country is its literature. The press plays a vital role. The birth of Gorkhe khabar kagat in 1902 at Darjeeling edited by Padri Gangaprasad Pradhan, of Chandrika in 1918-19 edited by Parasmani Pradhan, of Adarsha edited by Seshmani Pradhan in 1932 from Kalimpong, and of Gorkhasansar and Tarun gorkha published and edited by Thakur Chandan Singh from Dehradun in 1931 and 1932, played a significant role. The first issue of a literary magazine Bharati, edited and published by Parasmani Pradhan from Darjeeling in 1949, was dedicated to the motherland India and the Indians:

Nepali bharati hami, bharati ko pichha paau
Bharati ko garau puja bharati bhakta bhai marau

(We are Nepalese belonging to India; let us worship our motherland and die as loyal Indians.)

Mayadevi Chettri, herself a freedom fighter, wrote a book Swatantra sangram in 1947. She recounts the great roles played by Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Subhashchandra Bose, and Dal Bahadur Giri in the freedom movement. In one of her poems 'Swagatam' she writes:

Desko premmai lipta bhai jailmai
Pranko prem lai tyaggari cellmai

(With love of the country in the jails, sacrificing love of life in the cells, we march.)

The post-independence years of 1949-52 were marked by the growth of two Nepali journals in Darjeeling—Sathi edited by T. Mahaen and Himal kishore edited by Deokumar Sinha (Thapa). Both the journals profusely mentioned the freedom struggle and the role of the freedom fighters.

The Chinese aggression of 1962 and the Indo-Pak War of 1965 left a deep imprint on the Nepali literature. The Nepali writers and poets rose to the occasion as others did in the country. R.P. Lama under the aegis of the West Bengal Government edited and brought out two volumes of Desbhakti githru in 1965 and 1974.

In his collection of poems, Himalaya, published in 1966, Harkazang Singh Chettri wrote:

Janani Bharatko nastak
Uchha uchha sada garau
Mansa vachha karmana
Bharat hit dhyan lagau

(Let us hold high the head of our motherland India; let us dedicate to the cause of India our mind, our devotion and our deeds.)

The veteran Nepali poet from Tezpur (Assam), Puspalal Upadhyaya, wrote a book of poems entitled

Usha manjari in 1987. In one of his poems, 'Desh mahima', the poet writes:

Hamro desh vishal bharat yanha eutai bagaicha bhari
Dheraj jati ra dharmapran janata baschan gujara gari

(Our country, great India, is full of gardens. Many people of different religions live here like one soul).

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Oriya). The sentiment of patriotism as love of one's own country and culture may be seen even in old Oriya literature in such works as the Mahabharata (15th c.) of Adikavi Sarala Dasa and the Ramayana (16th c.) of Balarama Dasa. The two are not actual translations of the Sanskrit originals, and they reveal the life and tradition of the fifteenth and sixteenth-century Orissa. Both poets have endeavoured to magnify the holy and puranic sanctity of this land.

The Oriya people lost their separate and independent entity after the British occupation of Orissa in 1803 when Orissa became part of the provinces of Bengal, Bihar, Central Province and Madras. After a hundred years of British rule the Oriyas in 1903 organised the Utkal Sammilini and started agitation for the political, economic and cultural unity of the state. Naturally Oriya literature felt its impact. The novelist Fakiramohan, the satirist Gopalchandra Prajaraji, the poets Radhanath, Nandkishore Bala and Gangadhar Meher, the playwright Ramashankar Ray, the journalist Gourishankar Ray, the essayist and editor Biswanath Kar reflected in their writing the glorious tradition and the hopes and aspirations of Orissa. This period is known as the period of nationalism in Oriya literature. The desire for national freedom finds expression in the poems, plays and essays written in this period. The writers, poets and literary stalwarts like Pandit Gopabandhu, Pandit Nilkantha, Pandit Godavarish, Govinda Tripathy, Godavarish Mahapatra, Jagabandhu Singha truly represented the national feelings and national resurgence of the people in various ways. The period is also considered extremist in the history of Oriya literature. Local tradition, natural scenes, glorious architecture and sculpture became no doubt the living elements in literature.

Fakirmohan represented the common man in his works. The Sabuja Group and the Progressive group of writers also echoed the same sentiment. They loved the common man and glorified his aspirations in their works. For the first time the depiction of character, absent in Oriya literature for hundreds of years, assumed importance. Under the impact of Mahatma Gandhi and the struggle for freedom, the novels, dramas and short stories of the period expressed a strong reaction not only against an alien rule, but also against the suppression of national sentiments and economic and cultural exploitation.

P.P.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Punjabi). From its origin in the medieval times to its growth in the first half of the twentieth century, the patriotic literature in Punjabi can be identified in both its generic and specific phases. It remained in its generic phase till the downfall of the Sikh kingdom, but entered its specific phase under the impact of the national struggle for freedom started against the British in the first half of the twentieth century. The nationalist literature of the generic phase is available in two forms: first, anonymously composed; second, written by writers of known identities. In both these forms, it deals with resistance put up by heroic figures to alien invasions launched from the Persian terrain under Islamic fervour. Composed as heroic tales of the rugged sort, its anonymous form is now preserved in Punjab dian varan (Lays of Punjab, 1946) compiled by Ganda Singh. Centred round encounters in the battlefield, these rugged tales invariably invoke the motifs of resistance, intransigence and strength. With minor variations, they are almost identical in their narration. Meant to be sung at a high pitch to the accompaniment of a popular musical instrument, 'sarangi', they relate to the phonetic rather than the semantic side of the language.

Najabat, Ali Haider, Qadar Yar, Shah Muhammad and Matak were writers with known identities who contributed to the nationalist literature of the generic phase. In this respect, mention may be made of Najabat's Var Nadir Shah (Lay of Nadir Shah), Qadar Yar's Hari Singh Nalva, Shah Muhammad's Angrezan te Singhan di Iarai (War of the Sikhs and the British) and Matak's Jang Singhan te Farangian da (War between the Sikhs and the aliens). Exact dates of the writing of these vars are, of course, conjectural, but as their names imply, they concern the times when the Sikhs fought for sovereignty, maintained it and ultimately lost it to the British. Almost all these writings are of Muslims who professed ardent faith in Islam. However, having renounced the Islamic stance of conquest, they had acclimatised themselves to the Punjabi ethos that favoured intransigence and resistance. No wonder then, Najabat's main concern is with the suffering people of the Punjab, though he is objective enough to impart heroic proportions to Nadir Shah. Likewise, in Qadar Yar's lay, Hari Singh Nalva is depicted as the epitome of all those qualities which made imperative the expansion and consolidation of the Sikh kingdom. Of them all, Shah Muhammad has received the highest veneration for the profound empathy he professed for the Sikhs in their war against the British. At the same time, he is fair enough to draw attention to weaknesses which caused the downfall of the first and probably the last state of the independent Punjab.

With focus upon the historical destiny of the Punjab, these writings articulate a nationalist feeling of the generic sort. With the exception of Matak's, these writings are of a high literary merit which is, in no way, impeded by their political relevance. Deeply involved as they are with permanent motifs of intransigence, resistance, valour and strength, they keep themselves aloof from the motifs of caste deprivation, economic exploitation, social inequality, political partisanship, etc. Under the ambience of the national war of freedom against the British, however, these transitory motifs come to the foreground, thereby initiating the specific phase of patriotic literature in Punjabi. Its political relevance apart, this nationalist literature in Punjabi reflects literary merit to the extent to which the permanent motifs remain lurking in the background of these otherwise specifically relevant writings.

In the second phase of patriotic literature, the impulse for writing is forwarded by three movements—the Ghadar Movement, the Gurdwara Reform Movement and the Congress Movement respectively. Founded abroad in America on the eve of the First World War, the Ghadar Movement took mostly the Punjabi peasants in its fold. Born and brought up on the terrain of Sikh ethos that imparted overwhelming significance to martyrdom, the most talented of them, such as Harnam Singh Tundilat, Kartar Singh, Munsha Singh Dukhi and Bhagwan Singh Pritam wrote verses of exhortation. Written in the traditional forms of the folklore, these verses exhorted the readers to raise the banner of revolt against the British. Confined to this linear theme of exhortation, these poems evoked response only from those who had already chosen to be partisans. Lack of literary competence further circumscribed the evocation of this response. Naturally the publication of these verses remained confined to the different issues of the Ghadar. They were never published in book form except those of Munsha Singh Dukhi, who was persistent enough to publish his verses in his collection, Subhag Baisakhi (Auspicious Baisakhi, 1922).

Vidhata Singh Tir, Hira Singh Dard, Avtar Singh Azad and Sohan Singh Sital started their literary activities under the impact of the Gurdwara Reform Movement aimed at the emancipation of the Sikh religious institutions from the priests (Mahants) who had turned them into centres of depravity and corruption. The priests sought the protection of the British government which it readily provided, because it feared that a great national upsurge was latent in the Gurdwara Reform Movement. The non-violent heroic struggle under the leadership of the Akali Party inspired Vidhata Singh Tir in his writing Tir tarang (Tir's upsurge, 1920) and Aniale tir (Pointed arrows, 1929). Hira Singh Dard in Dard sunehe (Messages of pain, 1922) tried to convey the same effect in less lyrical way. In Qaidi vir (The imprisoned hero, 1924) and Shahidi parwane (Devotees of martyrdom, 1929), Avtar Singh Azad touched upon an analogous theme, i.e. the retransfiguration of martyrdom for a religious cause into sacrifice for a national cause.

Liberation struggle led by the Indian National Congress influenced the poets like Dhani Ram Chatrik, Gurmukh Singh Musafir, Darshan Singh Awara and Piara Singh Sahrai, to write patriotic literature in their own way. The most significant achievement of them all is that of Dhani Ram Chatrik, who in Chandanvari (Orchard of sandal wood, 1931), Kesarkiari (Beds of flowers, 1940) and Navan jahan (The new world, 1945), sought to recreate the image of ancient India as an essential paradigm for modern times.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Rajasthani). The patriotic sentiment in the early Rajasthani literature is, in fact, the spirit of sacrifice for the cause of religious faith or for the sake of one's land of birth. The bards upheld these values and inspired all classes of society, especially the Rajputs, to defend their religion and their land. It was in this tradition that the poets sang of the brave deeds of the heroes who opposed the British authority, just as the 'charans' in the past had idolised the heroes who had fought against the Mughals. Asiyo Bankidas of Jodhpur extolled the efforts of the Bharatpur ruler who did not surrender to Lord Lake, the British General, who attacked him ('Gora hata ja', Parampara Quarterly, vol. 1, No.2, Jodhpur, 1956). Other important poets who eulogised the heroes defying the British were, to mention a few, Suryamall Misrana, Girvardan kaviya, Lalsa Nathuram, Lalsa Nawalji, Adha Jawanji, Budhsingh and Durgadatta.

Some other poets in this category are Mehadu Dalaji who wrote about the Rawal of Dungarapur, Sandu Raghodas who praised Rawat Kesari Singh of Salumbar, and Adha Jaduram and Asiya Budhji who sang of the bravery of Champawat Abhaisingh (for details see 'Gora hata ja', referred to above). Sankaradan Samor and Kesari Singh Barahath are two of the most outstanding bards who contributed richly towards patriotic literature, partly in the old tradition and partly in the modern sense. Shankaradan composed songs in honour of Tantya Tope, Kesari Singh addressed thirteen couplets to Maharana Fateh Singh of Udaipur, warning him that his honour would be in jeopardy if he attended the British 'Durbar' in 1903 at Delhi. The Maharana was moved and he was absent at the Durbar which offended the British. Mention may also be made of certain folk songs popularly sung by the people of Marwar during the Holi festival.

The songs relate to the incidents that took place at Bharatpur and Aua ('Gora hat ja'). Another folk song disapproving the action of the Jaipur ruler in surrendering the Sambhar salt lake to the British was popular in the Jaipur region.

The renaissance that ensued with the impact of Western culture introduced new elements in the traditional concept of patriotism. With the progress of the Congress ideology in Rajasthan, there was a marked change in the outlook of the people. Even the traditional bards fell in line with others and eulogised national leaders in the larger perspective of the country as a whole. Udairaj Ujjwal and Nathu Singh Mahiyariya were two such bards. Ujjwal's Bhaniya ra duha is a fine anthology of bardic eulogies in praise of leaders like Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Subhash Chandra Bose, Vithalbhai Patel and others. Nathu Singh's Gandhi shataka contains inspiring laudatory verses on Gandhi. The revolutionaries of Bengal—Rasabihari Bose and Sachindra Sanyal—also inspired the poets of Rajasthan, such as Barahath Kesari Singh, Gopal Singh of Kharawa, Vijai Singh 'Pathik', Damodardas Rathi and Arjunlal Sethi. A fiery song composed by Sethi in the folk style speaks eloquently of his feelings against the white man (Maruvani monthly, Vol. I, Nos. 10-11, Jaipur, 1953). The agrarian movements started at Bijoliya and Begun in Mewar and Bundi in Hadauti region had the support of several poets who were also political workers. They composed anti-government songs in the folk style and sang them in public gatherings and rallies. Some prominent names of such poets are Vijai Singh 'Pathik', Manikyalal Varma, Bhanwarlal Swarnakar, Ghanshyam Sharma, Nainuram Sharma and Bhairavlal 'Kala Badal'. With the establishment of 'praja mandals' in the princely states scores of folk-poets appeared on the scene. Some of them were of very high calibre. They were Hiralal Shastri of Jaipur who gave us Gita pachchis (1954), J.N. Vyas whose writings appeared in Agnivan, the fortnightly paper edited by him, and G.L. Vyas whose posthumous collection of poems was published under the title Jan-kavi ustad (1972). There was a sufficiently large number of such poets and writers in almost every princely state. On a more exhaustive survey, the number is likely to swell up further. Mention may also be made of the tribal songs of Bhils who were quite progressive and wrote patriotic songs in honour of their tribesmen who challenged the foreign domination and also about Mahatma Gandhi and local political leaders. (Rajasthani Bhilon ke loka gita, Udaipur, 1954).

The war with Pakistan during the Prime Ministership of Lal Bahadur Shastri, again, boosted up the national fervour. Strangely, the challenge was taken up by the poets of the older order who composed in the traditional bardic and folk styles. Paramavir (1963), Shaitan sujas (1964), Piru prakash (1965) and Maran tyunhar (1966) are some of the prominent works describing the brave deeds of heroes. Nathu Singh's Kashmir shataka also relates to this war. Other such works are K.S.Rajwat's A jamin apani (1965), G.L. Dangi's Ladai shurama Ajaji (1966), Mukun Singh's Govind Singh ri vela (1966), Piru Singh ri vele (1966) and Govind Singh ri nisani (1967), Gandhi gatha edited by S.S. Dhamora (1969), R.D. Shrimali's Bawano himalo (1971), Maharsi Kanha's Pak China nain chetawani (1971), D.K. Rajpurohit's Yahya mana le kaino (1971), P.L.Sharma's Amar Bangalo, Lala Kavi's Nav Prabhata (1971) and Swadhin Bharat ke gita (1972), and Bhanwar Pandey's Sola ri sahi (1975). Besides these works, stray poems and short stories were also published in magazines. However, no outstanding work—novel, drama or poetic composition—was attempted with the modern concept of nationalism in mind.

Raw.S.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Sindhi) in Sindhi goes back to the medieval times. In spite of the influence of Persian and Arabic literature on the Sindhi writers of medieval period, the characteristics of Sindhi sufi poetry show patriotism in its very core. The form of the verse is purely Indian. In place of Persian prosody, which was in vogue at that time, the sufi poets adopted doha and soratha forms which were thoroughly Indian. The feeling imbibed in these poems and their expression clearly indicate the absorption of the Indian tradition. The diction and imagery are pure Sindhi. The entire poetry of Shah Abdul Latif is cast in the traditional ragas and raginis of Indian poetry, especially 'Sur Kalyan' and 'Sur Ramakali'. He depicts the heroes and heroines of India. The content of his poetry is thoroughly Indian; it may be medieval, but surely not Central Asian or West Asian. It seems Shah was a great patriot. That his poetry made a startling appeal to the reader, fed on the ancient scriptures of India, ought not to be disregarded.

It is really interesting to observe how the average individual identifies himself with the great minds and eminent leaders of his civilisation. The medieval Sindhi reader must have felt the same way when he talked about his favorite poet-saints, believing that he could partake of their supernatural virtues and strength. At a time when the Sindhis were studying Persian and Arabic to please their masters, and praising Persian poets, the patriotic attitude of sufi poets in adopting Indian forms in their poetry and depicting Sindhi episodes in chaste Sindhi language is praiseworthy.

In his book Paigham-e-Latif (Message of Latif), G.M. Syed compares the patriotic Sindhi poet, Shah Abdul Latif, with Iqbal, the Islamic poet. When Shah, in his poem, prays to God to shower prosperity upon Sindh, he visualises Sindh as an integral part of India.

New events took place in the lives of Sindhis about the year 1907. Lord Curzon's Partition of Bengal roused the whole country to political consciousness. Sindhis were no exception. Now, this political consciousness was further enhanced by the Morley Minto Reforms. The national sentiment ran high in the minds of Indians; they turned to politics and social reforms. The taste of the readers changed and they demanded purely Indian literature. For once, the Sindhi writers refused to turn to outmoded medieval romances for inspiration and guidance.

Patriotism appeared in Sindhi literature again through translations. Bankimchandra's book Anandamath (1884) provided the rallying song of 'Vande mataram'. This was translated into Sindhi by Gordhan Sharma. The translation was, however, poor and did not do justice to Bankim's genius. Gordhan Sharma also translated Lokmanya Tilak's book on 'Swadeshi'. Along with other books on patriotism by the Indian writers, Nazrul Islam's outspoken poems in the cause of freedom were translated into Sindhi by D.K. Mansharamani under the title Baghi (Rebel). These translations only increased the hunger of the readers for such books.

In the above books one finds a merciless hatred for all things British and a love for all things Indian. That the spirit of patriotism is strong in defeated nations cannot be denied. Undoubtedly, millions of Indians, who were ruthlessly persecuted by the British during the Freedom Movement, had nothing but hatred for the British responsible for repression. All those persecuted found themselves portrayed as characters in the Sindhi literature of the period.

Kishinchand 'Bevas' was a nationalist poet. He was the first poet who wrote a patriotic song. A few of his poems reflect nationalism, pure and simple. In one of them he says, "Reason or intellect, freedom, dignity, prosperity, prestige crave admittance only where there is love for one's land."

Hundraj 'Dukhayal' is a prolific writer of national songs. His poems are collected in many volumes, the main among them being Sangit phul (1946) and Sangitanjali (1963). The latter is divided into seven parts and one of them (Part II) includes the songs of freedom. Many poems under the songs of freedom are occasional and topical, but they easily lend themselves to singing. The poems under 'Umar-Marui' in the collection are really a rare blend of patriotic feeling and poetic sentiment.

One finds sporadic portrayal of patriotism in the poetry of Lekhraj 'Aziz', Hari 'Dilgir' and Nirmal Jivatani who are essentially romantic poets. There is yet another rebel poet in Sindhi language, Hyderbux Jatoi, whose poems in Tuhfa-e-Sindh (1930) emit fire of patriotism.

Many writings of progressives during the period 1940-1958 reflect nationalism but these are unimpressive, and lack fire and blood-thirstiness demanded by such writings. They use set Marxist terminology and their diction looks imported.

The contemporary Sindhi writers have not taken much note of patriotism in literature. In a sense the modern man's only religion is nationalism. His god is the nation he belongs to. Patriotism often uses the language of love of the country, but it also feeds upon the emotions of fear and hatred. Intelligent love demands insight based upon reflection while hatred involves the absence of reflection. Patriotism employs a host of symbols which appeal to emotions and to the primitive instincts of man, creating at the same time illusions of grandeur and moral achievement. Further, extreme nationalism usually characterises a second rate mind which appeals to the popular taste and basks in the glory of public acclamation. Contemporary Sindhi writing is, therefore, bereft of elements of patriotism in the narrow sense of the term, maybe, because Sindhis have no state of their own.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Tamil). Subramanya Bharati is the first and foremost among the nationalist poets in Tamil. He translated the song 'Vande mataram' into Tamil, and wrote many poems praising the cultural heritage of India, describing the pitiable condition of contemporary India, and exhorting the people to stand united in the struggle for freedom. In poems like 'Bharata nadu' and 'Naddu vanakkam' he stresses the past glory of India. 'Bharata desham' visualizes a free and prosperous India. 'Veri konta tay' and 'Bharatamata tiruppaliyeluchchi' are heroic songs about the achievement of freedom. 'Tayin manikkoti parir' is about the national flag. 'Bharata janankalin tarkala nilaimai' (The present condition of the Indian people) laments the pitiable condition of contemporary Indian people—lazy, disunited, cowardly, poor and superstitous. In 'Pokinra Bharatamum varukinra Bharatamum' he rejects outright such undesirable tendencies, and welcomes a New India, full of enthusiasm, confidence, unity, perseverance and prosperity. Poems like 'Sutantiradaham' and 'Sutantirapperumai' sing of the thirst for freedom and praise the glory of freedom. In 'Vitutali' he says that in free India there is no room for prejudices based on caste and wealth. He has also written poems praising individual partriots—Shivaji, Guru Govind Singh, Mahatma Gandhi, Dadabhai Naoroji, Tilak, Gokhale, Lala Lajpatrai and V.O. Chidambaram Pillai.

When we talk of patriotism in literature, we must distinguish three different kinds of patriotic literature: (1) the literature that stresses national values and describes our national heritage, (2) the literature that deals directly with the freedom struggle and the leaders involved in it, and (3) the literature that describes the pitiable condition of our people and tells us how we can improve out lot and become a strong and happy nation. All these tendencies are discernible in Bharati's poems. Namakkal Kavignar Ramalinkam Pillai was deeply influenced by Mahatma Gandhi and wrote many poems about Gandhian values. His song 'Kattiyinri rattaminri yuttamonru varukutu' (A war without swords and blood is coming) brought him into limelight. That song was about the Salt Satyagraha. He wrote poems on Khaddar, Satyagraha, removal of untouchability, prohibition, etc.

puranam and Gandhi puranam. Kavimani Desikavinayakam Pillai belonged to the princely state of Travancore, and therefore was not directly involved in the freedom struggle; but he was also attracted by the Gandhian movement. He wrote on Gandhiji and his ideals. Through his poems he exhorted the people to give up the caste system and eradicate untouchability. He stressed the need to wear only Khaddar so that our economy could become self-sufficient.

C. Rajagopalachari (Rajaji) retold the Mahabharata and the Ramayana in simple Tamil prose so that the two epics could become part and parcel of the life of the common man. He also explained the philosophical principles of the Upanishads and the Bhagvadgita in various articles.

R. Krishnamurti or Kalki, the founder-editor of Kalki weekly, was also influenced by Gandhian thought. His novel Alai osai deals with the freedom struggle and the partition of India.

Tiru. V. Kaliyanasundara Mudaliyar was drawn towards the national movement. He edited Deshabhaktan. Later he became the editor of Navashakti, a Tamil weekly. He was one of the founders of the Trade Union movement in Madras. He wrote a number of books on Gandhian topics and patriotism. Among them, Manitavalkkaiyam gantiyatikalum (Human life and Mahatma Gandhi), Intiyavum vitutalaiyum (India and freedom) and Urimai vetkai allatu nattuppatal (Thirst for freedom, or song of the Nation) are significant.

Patachchoru, a play by B.S. Ramaiya tells the story of a Gandhian and his daughter. Sivasankara Mudaliyar takes his daughter Kumudam to meet Mahatma Gandhi. When Gandhiji asks her to donate her gold ornaments, she readily gives them away to him. She promises never to wear ornaments. Her promise to Gandhiji becomes a curse for her, so far as her marriage is concerned. No family is willing to accept her as a daughter-in-law, because a woman without gold ornaments is considered inauspicious. Her parents advise her to wear ornaments for the sake of marriage, but she is determined to honour her pledge to Gandhiji. Finally, a Gandhian youth marries her, but his idealism is only skin-deep. He makes a lot of money during the Second World War. When the country becomes independent, he wants to buy ornaments for Kumudam in order to hide his black money, but she firmly rejects the idea. He gets angry and sends her back to her parents' home. The play ends with the repentant husband deciding to rejoin his wife. He tells her that he would surrender his black money to the Government.

Akilan portrays the post-Independence India in his novels Enke pokirom (Where are we going?), and Putuvellam (New tide) which describes how plain living and high thinking are swept aside by the new tide of opportunism.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Telugu). The spirit of patriotism did not find a direct expression in Telugu literature till 1905. It was the partition of Bengal which roused popular feeling in Andhra.

Chilakamarti Lakshminarasimham, inspired by Bipinchandra Pal's speech in Rajahmundry, composed a short poem in Telugu and recited it at a public meeting. This poem might be considered the first poetic expression of patriotic sentiments in Telugu literature. The imprisonment of Lala Lajpat Rai in 1907 and the consequent strikes and processions taking the form of the Vande Mataram Movement found expression in his other inspiring poems.

The deaths of Gopalakrishna Gokhale and Bal Gangadhar Tilak, and the massacre at Jallianwala Bagh in 1920 moved such poets as Rayaprolu, Garirmella, Balijepalli, Jagannatha Das, Kondapalli and Nellore Venkataramanaidu to write patriotic poems. The meeting of the All India Congress Committee in 1921 at Vijayawada provided themes for poems and songs. Kondapalli wrote poems condemning the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1921. Duggirala Gopalakrishnaiah inspired the people with his speeches and extempore poetic compositions which became very popular. Poems were also written on such diverse topics as the picketing of toddy shops, no-tax campaign and protest campaign against the Simon Commission in Madras led by Tanguturi Prakasam in 1928. The Salt Satyagraha in 1930 was the subject-matter of Salt poems.

Garimella Satyanarayana occupied an eminent place as a poet of nationalism. His song 'Makodi tella doratanamu' (We don't want this White Government) was the most inspiring and popular song in Telugu which carried a year's imprisonment on it. Garimella wrote songs on almost all important events of the National Movement.

Next to Garimella, Basavaraju Appa Rao wrote patriotic songs in which he deified Gandhi as an 'avatar'. Other poets like Tummala Sitaramamurty Cherukuvada Venkata Narasimham, Damoji, Veluri Sivarama Sastri, Viswanatha Satyanarayana, Damaraju, Katuri Venkateswara Rao, Kondpalli, Mangipudi Venkateswara Sarma, Vedula Satyanarayana, Jandhyala Papayya Sastri, Adavi Bapiraju, Kandukuri Ramabhadra Rao too extolled Gandhi as a god in their poems.

Tummala Sitaramamurti and Veluri Sivarama Sastri were the first biographers of Gandhi. Unnava Lakshminarayana, a prominent Congress leader, wrote Malapalli (1922-23), the first novel in rich and chaste colloquial idiom on the National Movement combining moral idealism with several aspects of Gandhi's constructive programme like the removal of untouchability and village reconstruction.

Mother India was exalted in most of the Telugu songs and poems. Gurazada Appa Rao's patriotism was imbued with lofty idealism which stemmed from a broad-based humanism in its appeal to the people to cultivate moral and ethical qualities. Garimella appealed to the people to awake and arise and fight for freedom. Mangipudi expressed sorrow over India's misery and slavery. Rayaprolu glorified India's spiritual eminence and appealed to the people to take pride in it. Gurazada Raghava Sarma and Vedula Satyanarayana Sastri deified Mother India. To Devulapalli Krishna Sastri India was holiness and beauty in perfection. Malladi Ramachandra Sastri revered Mother India as the treasure-house of spiritual and moral wisdom.

To Damoji the national flag was a symbol of national unity and honour. Basavaraju appealed in the name of the flag to fight and even die for freedom. To Sunkara Satyanarayana the flag was a symbol of heroic struggle for freedom and peace. A common feature of the songs on the national flag was the symbolic interpretation of the three colours.

The Jallianwala Bagh massacre was depicted in moving terms by Puvvada Seshagiri Rao, Kondapalli Jagannadha Das, Balijepalli and Gurazada Raghava Sarma. The Non-Cooperation Movement inspired Mangipudi, Damaraju, Garimella and Basavaraju. Tripuraneni Ramaswami appealed to the heroic instincts of the Telugu people in particular in a popular song. Duvvuri Rami Reddi combined patriotic fervour with poetic beauty in his poems. The boycott of colleges, councils, courts and foreign cloth was the theme of poems by Katuri Venkateswara Rao, Nellore Venkatarama Naidu, Cherukuvada Venkata Narasimham, Kondapalli Jagannatha Das and Basavaraju.

Garimella, Mangipudi and Gurazada Raghava Sarma propagated prohibition of alcohol, while Nellore Venkata Rama Naidu and Basavaraju encouraged the people to eradicate untouchability. Satyagraha also inspired writers like Mangipudi, Balijepalli and Tummala. Sufferings in jails was the theme of Mangipudi, Dasarathi, Raghava Sarma, Garikipati Mallavadhai and Jogaiah Sarma.

Venamamalai Varadacharyulu, Sambasiva Rao Babji, Katuri Venkateswara Rao and Puripanda Appalaswami wrote poems and songs on the Quit India Movement of 1942. The dawn of Independence was the theme of the poems of jubilation by Jandhyala Papayya Sastri, Katuri Venkateswara Rao, Puripanda Appala Swami, Duvvuri Rami Reddi, Turaga Venkataramayya, Dhavala Srinivasa Rao and Rayaprolu.

PATRIOTIC LITERATURE (Urdu). Patriotism, as a state of mind indicative of the love of the individual for his country, is an age-old phenomenon, but its manifestation in literature became more apparent in the eighteenth century with the gradual strengthening of the British colonial hold over India. The Urdu language, which has originated as a lingual by-product of the cultural synthesis of the Hindus and Muslims in the medieval times, patronized by both courts and courtiers, sufis and saints, and common people, had, by the eighteenth century, been perfected as a medium of poetry by scores of masters. The eighteenth century Urdu poetry, which reflects the contemplative, transcendental mood of the Indian mind, refuses the oppressive influence of the religious dogma, and emphasising the unity of man and humanism, is permeated with sentiments of attachment to the Indian soil, and its syncretic cultural tradition. But as the spectre of the British colonialsim grows from Bengal to Oudh and Delhi, and to vast areas in South India, the sentiments of patriotism give place to feelings of nationalism in Urdu poetry. The earliest expressions are found in the stray couplets of the ghazal poetry, which over the ages has been by far the most common genre of Urdu. Usually these are veiled in the romantic metaphors of established usage, but because of the system of conventions operative in the ghazal, and because of the denotations and connotations of certain words, these couplets lend themselves to deeper political interpretations conveying a whole range of meanings reflective of the distress and agony of the Indian people during those times.

The battle of Plassey in 1757 was a turning point in the history of India, and according to chroniclers, struck by the tragic death of the heroic Nawab Sirajud Daula at the hands of the British, one of the contemporary poets, Raja Ram Narain Mauzun, is said to have composed the following verse:

Ghizalan tun to waqif ho kaho Majnoon ke marne ki, Diwana mar gaya aakhir ko virane pe kya guzri.

(O gazelle, you are a witness to the death of Majnoon. The mad patriot is no more; what will now be the fate of the desert, i.e. the country ruined by the alien rule?)

Time and again sentiments like these vouched in the romantic imagery of the ghazal were expressed, either obliquely or directly, by the eighteenth century Urdu poets and we come across classical masters like Mir Taqi Mir and Hatim, grieving at the rot that had set in the Mughal administration, and the tragic downfall of the great empire as well as the heart-rending sites of the ravaged cities of India. Mus-hafi and Jurat were direct witnesses to the thumping advances of the British colonialism into Oudh and Delhi:

Dilli men aaj bhik bhi milti nahin unhen,
Tha kal talak dimagh jinhen takht-o-taj ka. (Mir)

(Today in Delhi even alms are not available to those who till yesterday decorated the royal throne.)

Kauri kauri bikte hain gul kishwar-e-dili ke bich, Husn ke malik jo the woh aise arzan ho gae. (Mus-hafi)

(The roses—royal—princesses—are sold for a pittance in Delhi. Alas, those who personified beuty have become so cheap today.)

Hindustan ki daulat-o-hashmat jo kuch keh thi,
Kafir farangiyon ne batadbir khench li. (Mus-hafi)

(Whatever wealth and riches India had, the Kafir Farangis (British) have by their tactics usurped.)

Kahiye na inhen amir ab aur na wazir,
Angrezon ke haath qafas men hain asir,
Jo kuchh woh parhayen so yeh monh se bolen,
Bengale ki maina hain yeh purab ke amir. (Jurat)

(Now they do not deserve to be called nobles and nabobs. They are stooges in the hands of the British. They say only whatever they are tutored. They are like the puppets of Bengal in the hands of the British.)

The annexation of the state of Oudh by the British in the middle of the nineteenth century was a personal tragedy for many poets of Urdu. Commenting on this, Abdul Halim Sharar, a noted cultural historian of Lucknow, writes that the news of the deposition of Nawab Wajid Ali Shah was so shocking that many lost their minds, and many their patronage, and had nowhere to go. Fat hud-Daula Barq, who was one of the companions of the king from his boyhood, accompanied the king in his exile, and stayed in Matiya Burj in Calcutta's Fort William with him to his last day. Mir Anees, the doyen of Urdu 'marsiya' (elegy), expressed his grief in the following quatrain:

Kyonkar na dil-e-ghamzadah faryad kare,
Jab mulk ko yon ghanim barbad kare,
Mango yeh duaa keh phir Khudawand-e-Karim,
Ujri hui saltanat ko aabaad kare.

(Why shouldn't my heart grieve when my country is plundered so badly by the enemy? Pray that God may have mercy and the Sultanate be set up again.)

These events were followed by the great Rebellion of 1857, which by many is termed as the first War of Indian Independence. The Urdu poets fanned the fires of revolt, and many died fighting the British. Imam Bakhsh Sahbai, close friend of Ghalib and a renowned scholar and poet, was brutally slaughtered along with the members of his family; Mufti Sadrud Din Azurda, another contemporary of Ghalib, who at the time was the Mufti of Delhi, was charged with siding with the revolting armies and for signing the Declaration of Holy War (Fatwa-e-Jihadiyah) against the British. He was dismissed from service, and his property was confiscated. He spent the remaining years of life in ignominy. Ghalib, the greatest of Urdu poets, stayed in Delhi throughout this period and recorded the events of war in his Persian diary, Dastambu. His thoughts and feelings about his experiences during the rebellion, however, can also be found in his private letters to friends and disciples, which were written with comparatively greater freedom and boldness.

The tragedy of 1857 was so close and deep to the bone of the Delhi poets that many of them composed elegies and Shahr Ashobs on the fall of the capital, and about the deportation of Bahadur Shah Zafar to Rangoon. Twentyseven of such poems were compiled in a book, Fughan-e-Delhi (The lamentations of Delhi) by a disciple of Ghalib, Tafazzul Husain Khan Kaukab. One of the important poems of the period is a chronogrammatic poem commemorating the beginning of the uprising composed by Mohammad Husain Azad, which appeared in the Delhi Urdu Akhbar. This newspaper was owned by Azad's father, Maulvi Mohammad Baqar, who later was killed by the English and his press confiscated. The young Azad had to flee for his life. This poem appeared in the 24 May 1857 issue of the Delhi Urdu Akhbar, a copy of which is still preserved in the National Archives of India. Bahadur Shah Zafar himself was a poet of merit, and the poetry composed by him during his last years in exile bears a clear stamp of his misery and deprivation.

The poets of 1857 were followed by Hali. Though the harbinger of modern age in Urdu poetry, he was moderate by temperament and under the impact of the reformist movement of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan. He settled for moral regeneration and social reform. But the distinction of being the first modern nationalist poet of Urdu clearly belongs to Shibli. He was one of the band of devoted Ulamas, religious scholars of Deoband, who not only championed the cause of freedom, but also urged upon their fellow-Muslims to join the mainstream of national struggle. Shibli by his poems and articles, denounced the separatist politics of some of the Muslim leaders, and pleaded for the Independence of the country as soon as possible. Romantic by nature, whenever he wrote on political themes, his poetry was full of fire and verve, and deeply anti-colonial in tone and temper. Simultaneously, the close of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century saw the rise of two major patriotic poets of Urdu, Durga Sahay Saroor Jahanabadi and Mohammad Iqbal. Iqbal's early poetry is permeated with his love for India, and to him goes the credit of composing some of the finest patriotic songs in Urdu, like 'Himala', 'Aftab' (translation of Gayatri Mantra of the Vedas), 'Naya Shivala', 'Swami Ram Tirath', 'Ram' 'Nanak', and the most famous of all 'Taranah-e-Hindi' which is sung till today in India, and is one of the most popular national songs among Indian children:

Sare jahan se achha Hindostan hamara
Ham bulbulen hain iski yeh gulsitan hamara...

(India, our country, is the best in the world. This is our garden, we its nightingales...)

Later on, Iqbal concentrated more on his message of Pan-Islamism.

Around the First World War, the nationalist verse of Urdu was further enriched by stalwarts like Chakbast and Hasrat. Chakbast, being a moderate, was inspired by leaders like Bipin Chandra Pal, Gokhale and Mrs.Annie Besant. His poems,'Khak-e-Hind','Awaza-e-qaum' and 'Hamara watan dil se pyara watan' portray the liberal-moderate aspect of our freedom movement, whereas Hasrat was an extremist, and he never settled for anything less than full freedom. His political mentor was Bal Gangadhar Tilak and, like him, Hasrat always emphasized full freedom, swaraj, as goal of the Indians. He was a down-to-earth man, lived a simple life, wore khadi, suffered imprisonment several times and also always daring and undaunted in expressing his patriotic convictions. Essentially a lyrical poet, Hasrat expressed his political views through the tender medium of the ghazal whenever he chose to. His poetry thus reflects the extremist element in our freedom movement couched in the sweetest words of the ghazal mode:

Rasm-e-jafa kaamyaab dekhiye kab tak rahe
Hubb-e-watan mast-e-khwab dekhiye kab tak rahe
Daulat-e Hindostan qabbzah-e-aghyar men
Be-adad-o-be-hisab dekhiye kab tak rahe (Hasrat Mohani)

(Let us see for how long the tyranny will rule. Let us see for how long the patriots do not rise from slumber. India's riches are in the hands of plunderers. Let us see for how long this goes on unchecked.)

And now a few lines from Chakbast:

Yeh josh-e-pak zamanah daba nahin sakta
Ragon men khun ki hararat mita nahin sakta
Yeh aag woh hai jo pani bujha nahin sakta
Dilon men aake yeh arman ja nahin sakta
Talab fuzul hai kante ki phool ke badle
Na len bahisht bhi ham 'home rule' ke badle

(This excitement no one can put down. It's like the life-blood running in our veins. It's the fire no water can put out. It's the resolve we will never give up. Who will barter a flower for a thorn? We will never accept even paradise in exchange for Home Rule.)

Thus simultaneous with the Indian freedom movement assuming mass proportions, and Mahatma Gandhi's emergence as its great leader, and the Khilafat Movement touching chords in every heart, Urdu poetry entered a phase where nationalism acquired the distinction of becoming one of its recurring features. During this period there were scores of poets, whose poetry reverberated with sentiments of nationalism and strong opposition to the foreign rule. Maulana Mohammad Ali Jauhar's following couplet turned out to be a trend-setter:

Daur-e-hayat aaega qatil qaza ke baad
Hai ibtida hamari teri intiha ke baad
Qatl-e-Husain asl men marg-e-Yazid hai
Islam zindah hota hai har Karbala ke baad

(A period of joy certainly will come after the martyrdom. There is a new beginning after every end. The assassination of Husain in fact is the death of the tyrant Yazid, because Islam gets a new life after each Karbala.)

This period saw the rise of many poets. To name a few, Wahidud Din Saleem, Shauq Kidwai, Brijmohan Dattatreya Kaif, Zafar Ali Khan, Anand Narain Mulla, Iqbal Suhail, Tilok Chand Mahroom, Saghar Nizami, Gopi Nath Aman, Ravish Siddiqui, Ali Jawad Zaidi, Jagan Nath Azad, Makhdoom, Faiz, Majaz, Sardar Jafri, Kaifi Azmi, Majrooh and others, whose main poetic inspiration came from the national struggle and the freedom movement. However during this period, the voice of Josh Malihabadi was the loudest. Given to romanticism, Josh's concept of revolution hardly stands political reasoning, but endowed with the gift of a highly expressive and powerful diction, his voice was perhaps best suited for the agitational poetry echoing the tension and turmoil of the national struggle. Some of his poems like 'East India Company ke farzandon ke nam', 'Zawul-e-jahanbani' and 'Shikast-e-zindan ka khwab' are memorable in the sense that while being moving pieces of poetry, they mirror the restlessness and the militant mood of the Indian freedom struggle, and also preserve its heat at the boiling point. Josh's poetry has a thundering quality and is known for its masculinity and boldness. In 'Shikast-e-zindan ke khwab,' Josh compares India to a prison, and the shattering of its gates and walls to the removal of the vestiges of British domination:

Kya Hind ka zindan kamp raha hai goonj rahi hai takbiren
Uktae hain shaid kuchh qaidi aur tor rahe hain zanjiren...

(The prison is under attack and the shouts of victory rend the sky. The prisoners at last have risen in revolt and are shattering the chains. . .)

The Urdu language and literature have, thus, been deeply involved with the patriotic and nationalistic movements of India. The distinction earned by the Urdu language as being the language of revolt and revolution is not merely because of the freedom movement's slogans like Inqilab zindabad (Long live revolution) or because of popular songs like:

Sarfaroshi ki tamanna ab hamare dil men hai
Dekhna hai zor kitna bazoo-e-qatil men hai. . .

(Keen is our desire to lay down our lives for the country. Now is the time to challenge the murderer's strength but also because of the deeply realized creative expressions of its innumerable poets who, while echoing the patriotic zeitgeist, also participated in creating an emotional climate in which millions rose against colonialism and led their country to the dawn of freedom.

PATNAIK, AKHIL MOHAN (Oriya; b. 1927, d. 1982), primarily a short story writer, was born in Khurda (Orissa). His father, Bankanidhi Patnaik, Headmaster of the Khurda High School, had a literary taste and wrote short stories. Akhil Mohan completed his studies at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack. After passing B.A. and LL.B. examinations he started his career as an advocate at Bhubaneshwar.

Akhil Mohan's first story 'Sapan' was published in 1948. Thereafter he wrote about fifty stories which were published in different magazines in Orissa. His collections, Jhadar eagle o dharanir krushnasar and O Andhagali, were published in 1961 and 1979. His unpublished stories came out in a volume, Nadir nam ganatantra (1989) after his death. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981 for O Andhagali. His last story 'Kaniapa' was widely appreciated for its human values. Akhil Mohan had a varied life, and he portrayed his experiences successfully in his stories. Be it rustic life in a backward village or aristocratic life in a modern city, he has been able to portray with both ease and great insight. The characters of his stories are unique, lively and communicative. The ordinary impressive objects of everyday life have become important in his writings. His language is polished, elegant and suggestive.

Apart from stories, he wrote biographies, translations, criticism, and belles-lettres. His narrative about Khairi, the tiger-queen of Simlipal (Orissa), was also highly appreciated. Akhil Mohan was associated with several literary bodies. He was President of Godavarish Sahitya Sansad and Lekhak Sammukhya of Orissa. He was also editor of Samavesh, the renowned Oriya literary magazine.

Besides his literary achievements, he was also an amateur artist in Oriya films such as Sesha shravan and Para jhia ghar bhangena. He was also interested in the theatre and played a vital role in the revival of the Janata Theatre Movement.

A.P.

PATTANAYAK, ANANTA (Oriya; b. 1914) was educated at Puri Zila School, Cuttack Collegiate School and Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and did his B.A. from Patna University in 1935. He participated in the freedom struggle and the Praja movement in some feudatory states of Orissa for which he was imprisoned several times. He joined the Congress Socialist Party in 1934 and led its students' wing. He was a freelance journalist, associated with the editing of Samaj, The Orissa Times and The Observer at different times. Since 1968 he has been the Secretary of the Orissa Children's Literature Committee, a Government of Orissa undertaking, and now edits Shishulekha, an illustrated popular monthly for children published on behalf of the Committee. He was once associated with the Peace Committee and the All India Writers' Conference as their active member. He wrote lyrics and dialogues for Oriya films and worked as Associate Director for some of them. His connection with the film-world brought for him the membership of the Film Board of India.

His literary career began in his student days, and his poems, stories and other wirtings were regularly published in Shankar, Asha and other periodicals. He joined the Nabayuga Sahitya Samsad as its secretary in 1935 and was influenced by the progressive ideas which were increasingly finding expression in literature. Raktashikha (The flame of blood, 1936), a collection of his patriotic poems with some similar poems by Sachi Rautray, was banned. His Tarpan kare aji (Offering oblations today, 1948) is a fine poetical obituary on Mahatma Gandhi. The other important collections of his poems include Shantishikha (The flame of peace, 1953), Kinchit (Something, 1960), Aloda loda (Necessity of the unnecessary, 1964), Chhaira Chhita (The touch of the shadow, 1971) and Abantara (The irrelevant, 1979). His artistic execution in poetry is simple and effective. He has made successful use of hyperbolic images and free verse in almost all his poems. A craftsman of current words, he has used the ingenuous language of the common people, making it familiar to his readers of modern Oriya poetry. In his only story-collection, Chadda utar (Question-answer, 1965), he attempted the use of uncommon themes, but could not achieve much and in later years concentrated on writing for children and earned fame. His prose and verse writings for children include Kunumunu (The little kiddies), Lal tuk tuk surujatie (The very red sun), Gapudi main lo dhapudi main (Oh, the story-teller my maternal uncle's wife), Agadam bagadam (Jumble), etc. He is also successfull as a translator and has rendered into Oriya, Gorky's Mother (Ma, 1968), My Apprenticeship (Sikshanavis, 1978) and Sholokhov's The Fate of a Man (Bhagyaru khie, 1966). For children, too, he has translated into Oriya some writings of the Soviet Union. They include Kasara ghoda (Brown horse) and Chhabitiki galpatie (A story to a picture).

PATTANAYAK, BAIKUNTHANATH (Oriya; b. 1901, d. 1979), eminent Oriya poet and one of the pioneers of the Sabuja movement, did his M.A. in Oriya and B. Ed, and worked as a college teacher and later as Inspector of Schools. He began writing poems when he was a student of Ravenshaw College, which were published in Utkal sahitya and Sahakar, two leading literary magazines of the time. In collaboration with his friends of the Sabuja Group, he published a collection of poems called Sabuja kabita. He is best known for his two books Kabya sanchayana (1943) and Uttarayana. The first speaks of the poet's youthful love, his love of beauty and his mystic ideas on life and death. Uttatayana, which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1965, is a happy blend of noble ideas and hard realities of life. His earlier poems have a fluency of expression, a spontaneity of thought and felicity of diction, but his later poems are obscure and there is a perceptible thematic change. Mrittika darshan (The philosophy of dust), an elegy on the death of his child, is unique in the realm of Oriya literature. Besides, he wrote a drama Muktipathe (On the way to freedom) and a one-act play Upekshita (The rejected woman).

PATTANAYAK, BASANTAKUMARI (Oriya; b. 1923) did her M.A. in Economics from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack. In 1951 were published the first collection of her short stories and her novel, Amada Bata, which made her famous. Chitanala, a collection of her poems, came out in 1956, followed by Patala dheu in 1958 and Jivanchinha in 1959, both collections of short stories; Juarabhatta a one-act play, in 1961; Chorabali, the second part of Amada Bata, in 1973; and Alibha chita, a collection of sixty-four love letters between 1974 and 1975. She has also contributed more than sixty essays to different journals such as Jhankara and Sahakara. She has not only shown her power of characterisation, particularly of women, in her fictional work, but also her deep insight into the social reality. She is now devoted solely to social and cultural activities.

PATTANAYAK, BHANJAKISHORE (Oriya; b. 1922), born at Chhanapur or Chhanipur, a village near Salepur in the district of Cuttack, became popular as a dramatist during the first two decades of the post-Independence era. He received his primary education at home and in the village and secondary education at Banipada. Later, he passed B.A. with distinction and joined as Production Officer in the office of the Director of Public Instruction, Orissa.

In his school days he was deeply influenced by the Chhau dance of Mayurbhanja, the Oriya folk dramas and the plays of eminent Bengali writers like D.L. Roy, and wrote Jhada rati (The night of storm, 1939) and Premapushpa (The flower of love, 1940), the latter inspired by the love story of Edward VIII and his abdication of the throne. His third play, Mimansa (1944), was staged by the students of Cuttack Engineering School. In the same year he wrote three more plays named Davi, Adrishya chakra and Devi and the last named became very popular on the stage. He wrote numerous plays for the professional stage including Benami (1946), Jahar (1947), Sikari (1948), Garib (1949), Tofan (1949), Aloka (1950), Manika Yodi (1950), Sadhavi (1951), Vairagira samsara (1952), Agnipariksha (1953), Atithi (1955), Jayamalya (1956), Pahiliraja (1956), Kulabadhu (1956), Jivana jua (1957), Santa ghara (1958), Rajanartaki (1961), Prataparudra (1962), Asoka-stambha (1963), Gotie ma kutie santana (1965), Gulnar (1970), Akasa yeunthi mati chhuen (1970), Jagarana, Sukhi samsara and Devabhumi. Besides, he wrote a number of radio plays and one-act plays. His historical or semi-histroical plays like Prataprudra, Gulnar, Rajanartaki and Devabhumi are not very striking. Influenced to some extent by Ibsen he was primarily a writer of social plays depicting social and economic problems, the struggle between the workers and the capitalists, the tenants and the landlords, the cruel money-lenders and the poor debtors, the rich and the poor. They serve as a background for his romantic love themes. The plays are moralistic in spirit as they illustrate the victory of good over evil or a change of heart for the wicked. They are rendered all the more pleasing to the audience as they uphold the power of love consummated in the romantic union of lovers. Gandhian reformism is seen in some of his plays like Pahiliraja and Agni pariksha. In Garib he apparently emphasises the need for a revolution and in Asokastambha he advocates the ideal fusion of inner strength and the spirit of non-violence, the blending of a sense of discipline with the spirit of love. In dramas like Vairagira samsara and Atithi, he brings out the virtues of the Indian family life. Jayamalya, his most successful drama, deals with the tragic lot of an idealistic creative artist and Parishodha, written in collaboration with Saradaprasad Nayak, is his only other drama with a tragic end. Jahar is an anti-imperialistic play denouncing the ugly outburst of communalism seen in the wake of Independence. Most of his plays are characterized by sensationalism, melodrama and cheap comic elements. His dramas of mystery and crime, like Santa ghara and Sadhavi, are gripping but suffer from an excessive desire to be theatrical and a preference for the sensational. Bhanjakishore was, however, successful as a commercial dramatist, though his works fall short of the best in dramatic art.

PATTANAYAK, BHIKARICHARAN (Oriya; b.1877, d.1962) wrote by and large in the dramatic tradition of Ramshankar Ray whose junior he was as a lawyer. The spirit of reform and patriotism found in Ray marked his writings as well. In structure, dialogue, use of blank verse and arrangement of scenes he clearly followed his mentor.

His first play, Ingrej katrika kataka vijaya (Conquest of Cuttack by the English), written soon after his passing the Matriculation examination and staged by the students of Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, was published in 1901. Depending largely upon Toynbee's History of Orissa (1874) and Jagamohan Lala's Orisa vijaya (Conquest of Orissa) and influenced to some extent by Lachhma, a novel by Fakirmohan Senapati, Bhikaricharan depicts in this drama the tragic defeat of Balaji, the Maratha ruler of Orissa, at the hands of the invading British army. The skeleton of history has been given flesh and blood through imaginative portrayal of characters and scenes that stir pathos and rouse patriotic sentiments. Bhikaricharan was a pioneer in introducing 'khanda-amitra-kshara chhanda' (blank verse in broken sentences), but his blank verse is often poor and inflexible. The play is burdened with too many songs in the traditional manners. The playwright introduced a 'nandi' or benedictory verse and a 'nati' singing a prayer to Saraswati. But the play has a tragic end in the manner of the western tradition.

Nandi kesvari published in 1915 is semi-historical and is largely based on and deeply influenced by the language and style of the poetical work of the same name written by Radhanath Ray. The drama centres round a tale of the love of a princess which ends in tragedy. Written in blank verse, it is rather amateurish as it is marred by long speeches and asides and also by a profusion of songs.

He wrote another historical drama entitled Raja Purushottama Dev (1925) dealing with the accession of Gajapati Purushottama Dev to the throne of Orissa. It contains some satirical portraits. Ratnabali (1915), first staged in the Kanika palace, is a comparatively more successful drama. Moralistic in purpose, it shows the influence of Shakespeare in presenting the heroine in the disguise of a man. The dialogue is mostly in blank verse. In the social drama Samsara chitra (1915) Bhikaricharan attacks the dowry system, its unhappy consequences and the evils of usury and, in a later farce Yautuka (1924), he ridicules the dowry system again. In Sushila (1917), another social drama, he represents the ideal womanhood in the person of Sushila with her patience, tolerance and spirit of forgiveness and attacks the evils of western influence and libertinism in men and women. Nirupama (1952) is primarily a play with a purpose as the dramatist tries here to remove the popular misconception about leprosy. This drama too is burdened with too many songs.

Karmakshetra, published in 1960, was Bhikaricharan's last drama which upholds the dignity of labour and pleads for the cause of the emancipation of women. The dramatist's lifelong interest in cottage crafts and his ideal of self-dependence are revealed in his depiction of the unemployed graduate Chakradhara who financially sustains his family with the sale of his hand-made articles.

Apart from Yautuka he wrote a farce named Adbhuta adarsha (1909) which was published in the journal Mukura.

Bhikaricharan's plays are not always aesthetically satisfying and they are hardly stageworthy. They reflect a spirit of patriotism and reformism and read like tracts or propaganda.

PATTANAYAK, BIBHUTI (Oriya; b. 1939), a prolific writer of novels and short stories, teaches Oriya literature and language in a college. The locale of his novels varies from the rural landscape to the royal palace or to the centres of modern civilization, their popularity depending mainly upon the romantic appeal. The prominent theme of his novels is often a deep emotional man-woman relationship, and varied experiences of love contribute to the intense fervour in his novels. In every novel a tangled knot of human relationships is presented, exposing the various facets of human character, and he, adept in feminine characterization, explores the mind of woman to show her in various shades of light. Women characters like Nirupama represent the traditional Indian womanhood, whereas at the other extreme one finds Pratima Chaudhuri and Sushama representing a type of modern woman born of the new civilization in all its perversion of values. This obsession with the false values of a philistine civilization develops morbidity syndromes, and it is reflected in individual life. The theme is movingly treated in Keshabati kanya, Ei ma ei mati, Ei mana brindabana and in many other novels. The novelist lambasts these values in Naikara mama shrabani where Chaudhuri frenziedly runs after money and the traditional family life disintegrates.

In characterization, Bibhuti Pattanayak focuses on the extremes in which human nature can live. Chapalachanda based on the background of Praja Andolan (People's Movement) in the princely states of Orissa exposes Bairigana, the ruler of Andharigada, a sadist and sex maniac and his Dewan, Bishweshwara Pattanayak who is perverted and avaricious. At the other extreme there is Shuryamaji, the harbinger of a new consciousness, the chivalric ideal. Then there is Muktamala, the queen, a moving study in feminine jealousy and sacrifice.

Besides the romantic, the novelist deals with various other themes as well. They include the feudal tyranny in Chapalachanda and the molestation of innocent village life by forces of new civilization in Ei ma ei mati. The appeal of his novels and short stories, however, rests mostly on his sensationalism.

He worked at the American School of Linguistics (Pune) for sometime and is now Director of the Central Institute of Indian Laguages, Manasagangotri, Mysore. His essays on linguistics have been published in many journals. He edited Kavilipi and Rabindra-smaranika and wrote some literary essays collected in Sahitya biksha.

K.T.

PATTANAYAK, GOPALAKRISHNA (Oriya; b. 1784, d. 1862), the most popular and famous Oriya Vaishnava lyricist, was born at Paralakhimundi. His father Banabasi was a Vaishnavite devotee of the Chaitanya order and served under the Gajapati Maharaja Paralakhimundi. Gopalakrishna was initiated into the traditional faith, and when his father died he took up a job under the Maharaja as 'Panjia karana' (record writer). Besides his everyday work, he devoted himself to the study of 'alamkara' (rhetoric), 'vyakarana' (grammar), 'kavya' (Sanskrit and Oriya poetry), Srimadbhagavata and the famous Vaishnavite works of the six Vrindabana Goswamis, and to the worship of his family deity, Rasikaraja. He had the opportunity to attend the learned discourses on religion and scriptures at the 'Pandita Sabha' (meeting of scholars) in the court of the Maharaja.

Gopalakrishna initially composed chaupadis on earthly love following in the footsteps of his predecessors. Later he took up the theme of the divine love sport of Radhakrishna and composed a large number of chaupadis setting them to various types of melodious tunes of the Karnatic style. Like Gahasattasai of Hala Satabahana (compiler of the famous Prakrit love poetry) and Amaru shataka of Amaru (Sanskrit poet), his chaupadis are songs based on various single emotions and aspects of the erotic sports of Radha-Krishna in Braja and Vrindabana. Though we do not find a proper development of the story and construction of plot in his Padavali (anthology of songs), the beauty and the dramatic touch of Kishorachandrananda champu and other Vaishnavite Krishna kavyas are not lacking in them. A good number of his songs have attained a classic dignity and are marked by their musical and sincere portrayal of human feelings. In spite of the Vaishnavite conception of the divinity of Radha-Krishna, the depiction of love, hope, despair and agony is true to human life. This humanization of the love of divine characters with the help of local colour peculiar to the social life of Orissa has enhanced the realistic beauty of his composition. His portrayal of Radha as the beloved of Krishna is supreme in Oriya literature not only for its human appeal but also for the sublimity of the emotion of love. Besides the erotic portrayal of Radha-krishna, the depiction of the childhood pranks of Krishna and the maternal affection of Yashoda are no less charming. Gopalakrishna has given a spontaneous and realistic shape to his emotions in a language direct and simple, and in a style lucid and charming, though on occasions there is a coarseness in his choice of diction and use of assonance. He composed a large number of songs (bhajana, kirtana, stuti, etc.) which are cultic in character and spirit. In almost all his songs we come across a devoted soul, surrendering himself to the Lord in 'dasya bhava' or 'manjari bhava' (spirit of servitude).

PATTANAYAK, HALADHARA (Oriya), a prominent medieval Oriya poet, was the son of Ananta Pattanayak, and probably the brother of Gajapati Mukundadeva of the Khurda royal family who ruled during 1657-1668. In the 'Uttarkanda' of his valuable composition Adhyatma Ramayana he gives yugabda 4783, equivalent to 1657-1688 A.D., as the year when the composition was completed. He got his inspiration to compose the Adhyatma Ramayana in Oriya from Sri Maheśvara Acharya, an erudite Sanskrit scholar from Rayapurashasana. Haladhara himself was not adept in Sanskrit so that he had to compose his work keeping in mind whatever he heard from Mahesvara Acharya's interpretation of the original Ramayana. He was the first translator of the Adhyatma Ramayana in Oriya, followed by Gopala Telenga, Damodara Dasa, Gopinatha Dasa, Suryamani Chyaupattanaik and others.

PATTANAYAK, KALICHARAN (Oriya; b. 1898, d. 1978) ranks high among the modern dramatists of Orissa. A noted musician and a master of stage craft, Pattanayak dominated the Oriya stage for decades and made substantial contribution to it, both by writing plays in Oriya and by successully staging them.

Kalicharan Pattanayak drew profusely on the patriotic themes of ancient Orissa's military valour and maritime activities as well as on the cult of Lord Jagannath. The influence of the theatrical performances of the rural folk popularly known as 'jatra' is easily seen in his plays. At a young age he staged Savitri, the success of which encouraged him to stage another dramatic work, Parsuramvijaya.

Ahuti, Pratishodh and Girl's school are three of his early works. These plays were staged and the female roles were played by girls he had picked up. All these efforts of his early dramatic career came to fruition when he founded the Orissa Theatre in 1939 in Cuttack.

His Girl's school was staged by the Orissa Theatre in 1942 successfully and stirred the theatre loving people of Orissa. One of his most important plays is Bhat with the theme of drought and famine in the life of the villages in Orissa. His other famous plays are Chakri (mythological), Atibadi Jagamath Das (biographical), Abhijan (historical), Jayadeva (biographical), Abhijan (historical), Jayadeva (biographical), Chumban, Raktamati (social), Das-bhuja (puranic), Phata-bhuin (social) and Rakta mandar (historical). His social plays were concerned with both urban and rural middle class life of Orissa.

He was instrumental in the expansion of the Oriya stage. As a trainer and writer of drama, poetry and one-act plays, Kalicharan Pattanayak surpassed his contemporaries in output and dramatic appeal. His plays are remarkable for their enchanting lyrics.

PATTANAYAK, KRISHNACHARAN (Oriya; b. 19th century) was born in a Karan family in the state of Dharkot in the Ganjam district. He served as an officer under Krishna Singh, the king of Dharkot, and received patronage from him for his literary pursuits. He translated the Sanskrit Ramayana into Oriya in 1815 after retirement. He also rendered some of the puranas, namely the Vamana purana and the Kalki purana into Oriya, besides the Bhagavata. His translations were not literal, his main purpose was to communicate the ideas. His language, on the whole, is simple, lucid and musical.

PATTANAYAK, KRISHNAMOHAN (Oriya: b. 1877, d. 1940) was born in a zamindar family in the village of Chanahata in Puri district. He had his early schooling in his village and at the Puri Zila School, and later went to Calcutta for higher studies. He joined the National School, Calcutta, in 1908 and passed the I.A. examination in 1911. While he was in Calcutta he joined the terrorist movement and came in contact with Aurobindo Ghose, Khudiram Basu and Barin Ghose, the eminent revolutionaries.

He returned to his birth place and devoted himself for some time to socio-political activities. He worked for the Utkal Sammilani, the organisation which was agitating for the formation of a separate state for Orissa, under the leadership of Madhusudan Das, and also served for a short period as a teacher.

Besides periodical engagements, most of his time was spent in composing songs and singing them and in staging dramas which were his hobbies nurtured from school days. He was also a good actor and stage director and used to get invitations from friends, relatives, admirers and lovers of music to sing songs composed by himself.

His songs are numerous, but he never tried to get them published. He did not even care to collect or compile them and only a few of his essays, songs and poems appeared in literary journals during his lifetime. It was twenty-six years after his death that many of his popular songs were collected and published.

In his songs his innermost feelings found natural and spontaneous expression. He also wrote sonnets, ballads and satires. His poems are lyrical in tone, expressing sentiments of love and patriotism, or they are intensely devotional, or they describe nature or deal with contemporary social problems. The traditional Oriya songs before he started writing lacked variety as they were mostly devotional, centring round the love of Radha and Krishna. By bringing diverse subjects into his poetry he imparted a new tone and meaning to Oriya poetry.

PATTANAYAK, PADMACHARAN (Oriya; b. 1885, d. 1948) was born in the village of Panchagan, near Bhubaneswar. He passed his B.A. examination from Ravenshaw College. Cuttack, and later studied law at Calcutta. Subsequently, he began his practice in Puri where he got associated with various socio-cultural activities and became the Vice-Chairman of Puri Municipality and a member of the Puri District Board. In spite of all these diversions, his main occupation was writing and he contributed regularly to leading Oriya journals.

In 1948 he lost his son and became indifferent to worldly affairs, his health broke down and he lived an unhappy solitary life until his death the same year.

Padmacharan was one of Orissa's foremost lyric poets in the early years of the present century. His poems are mostly romantic and patriotic in nature, and their language is chaste and lucid. He was equally good at writing prose.

Most of his works in prose and poetry, however, have not yet been compiled and published in book form. His published works include: Padma pakhuda, Golapa guchha, Sunara desha, Surayamukhi, Asha manjari, Fakiramohan, Martin Luther, Mahatma Gandhi, Napoleon, Prabandha parijata and Paribarika prabandha.

PATTANAYAK, RABI (Oriya; b.1936) is a contemporary short-story writer with an outward looking attitude to life. His notable collections of short stories include: Andhagalira andhakara, Asamajikara daeri, Ragatodi, Srestha galpa, Hiranya garbha and Amarilata. Almost all his stories deal with contemporary life on varied themes and provide a cross section of society. These stories may be put in three groups, dealing with the problems of the individual, social and religious problems, and the problem of alienation.

In the first group Rabi's subjects are love and sorrows of life. Love is depicted mostly as physical love ('Ragato–di'). At times he probes religious faith and metaphysics also while exploring the theme of love. In the second group of stories he writes about people who live in towns and whose attitude is largely conditioned by sophisticated living. The characters seek interaction with one another but the social situation inhibits self-fulfilment. His central theme in this group of stories is a pitiless exposure of the ills of modern industrial civilization. The stories coming under the third group deal with the modern individual who may have many associations but is always on the move and ever lonely. Sometimes the writer introduces a conflict between the individual and society. The character is afraid of the forces of existence that threaten him, and finds his life absurd and meaningless. Rabi Pattanayak analyses the psyche of his characters, and depicts human condition through various images. In the psycho-analysis of characters he often uses Freudian and existential references.

Many of Pattanayak's short stories are concerned with monotony in daily life. Sometimes the description is like a cinematic depiction of everyday life. In language the writer offers a wide variety, ranging from colloquial speech to modern and scientific vocabulary. His stories, on the whole, appeal more to the emotions, except the 'mini-stories' which make their appeal to the intellect. In his latest collections he has concentrated on the theme of time and eternity.

PATTANAYAK, RAJKISHORE (Oriya; b. 1917), born in Calcutta, was educated at Cuttack and passed the matriculation examination from Ravenshaw Collegiate School in 1934, and his B.Sc. examination from Ravenshaw College in 1938. After passing the Bachelor of Law examination from Cuttack and LL.M. from Banaras he started legal practice in Cuttack in 1944. While practising law he also served as a lecturer at the Law College, Cuttack, for about five years. As a journalist he edited many peirodicals both in Oriya and in English of which one English fortnightly magazine, Scrutiny, deserves mention.

He was also a reputed sportsman but soon gave up sports and devoted himself to writing fiction. His first novel Panjari pakhi (The bird inside the cage) was serialised in 1937 in Nababharat. Simultaneously a few of his short stories also appeared in the Ukal sahitya and the Sahakara and were soon published. Rajkishore came to be known far and wide as a successful writer of fiction. Since then he has produced some seventeen novels, two collections of essays and ten collections of short stories.

His works include: Sindura gara (1943), Ashranti (1944), Smritiramanasi (1944), Panjuri pakhi (1945), Premara niyati (1946), Sapan Khudi (1954), Sanjabati (1956), Premikara diary (1955), Chala bata (1957), Bhasa megha (1958), Kajal gara (1959) Astami chander (1966), Kalaparda (1967), Sakala kuhudi (1970), Pritira banija (1973) and Pritira kajal (1973). Tutha pathar (1945), Hrudayara bandhan (1945), Pathuki (1948) Nisana khauta (1954), Salagrama (1955), Kalpnarafula (1958), Patharadhima (1963), Hata sauda (1971), Hata bahuda (1974) are collections of his short stories. His critical writings are Lekha o pathak (1971) and Oriya sahityara agapachha (1973).

Though his novels and short stories mainly deal with love, they are always marked by psychological studies of characters. It is through his characters that Rajkishore successfully depicts the different cross-sections of contemporary society. His narration is simple and attractive, and his use of the colloquial speech has won him great popularity.

PATTHANA (Pali) is Pali word for Sanskrit 'Prasthana' and is formed by the words 'Pacchaya' and 'Thana'. It is also part of the word 'Jnana Prasthana' of the Saravastivada School. It forms the last book of the Abhidhamma which is considered to be later than the remaining two canons, the Suttapitaka and the Vinayapitaka. There is a controversy whether the Abhidhammapitaka was recognised in the First or the Second Council. However, the Mahavamsa clearly records that the arahants knew the Pitaka. The problem becomes accentuated, because the Mahasanghikas who fell out from the Theravadins, as stated in the Dipavamsa, rejected the Abhidhamma. Further, it is held by some that the 'Abhidhamma' and the 'Malika' are synonymous, though some of the commentaries hold that the term 'Malika' refers to the 'Patimokka'. The Buddhavamsa records that seven treatises found in Abhidhamma were taught by the Buddhakongamana.

Milindapanha has enumerated the seven treatises in the following order, and his classification has almost remained classical since: Dhammasanghani, Vibhanga, Dhalukatha, Puggalapannati, Kathavatthu, Yamaka, Patthana.

A different order of enumeration is maintained in the Sumangalavilasini (Part I) of Buddhaghosa: Dhammasanghani, Vibhanga, Kathavatthu, Puggalapannati, Dhalukatha, Yamaka, Patthana.

It is contended by Buddhaghosa that the textual order of the Abhidhamma started with Sariputta who, it is further held, determined the numerical order of the 'Patthana' to facilitate its proper study.

The 'Patthana', forming the last book of the Abhidhamma, is a stupendous work, and it professes to

His other famous plays are Chakri (mythological), Atibadi Jagamath Das (biographical), Abhijan (historical), Jayadeva (biographical), Abhijan (historical), Jayadeva (biographical), Chumban, Raktamati (social), Das-bhuja (puranic), Phata-bhuin (social) and Rakta mandar (historical). His social plays were concerned with both urban and rural middle class life of Orissa.

He was instrumental in the expansion of the Oriya stage. As a trainer and writer of drama, poetry and one-act plays, Kalicharan Pattanayak surpassed his contemporaries in output and dramatic appeal. His plays are remarkable for their enchanting lyrics.

PATTANAYAK, KRISHNACHARAN (Oriya; b. 19th century) was born in a Karan family in the state of Dharkot in the Ganjam district. He served as an officer under Krishna Singh, the king of Dharkot, and received patronage from him for his literary pursuits. He translated the Sanskrit Ramayana into Oriya in 1815 after retirement. He also rendered some of the puranas, namely the Vamana purana and the Kalki purana into Oriya, besides the Bhagavata. His translations were not literal, his main purpose was to communicate the ideas. His language, on the whole, is simple, lucid and musical.

PATTANAYAK, KRISHNAMOHAN (Oriya: b. 1877, d. 1940) was born in a zamindar family in the village of Chanahata in Puri district. He had his early schooling in his village and at the Puri Zila School, and later went to Calcutta for higher studies. He joined the National School, Calcutta, in 1908 and passed the I.A. examination in 1911. While he was in Calcutta he joined the terrorist movement and came in contact with Aurobindo Ghose, Khudiram Basu and Barin Ghose, the eminent revolutionaries.

He returned to his birth place and devoted himself for some time to socio-political activities. He worked for the Utkal Sammilani, the organisation which was agitating for the formation of a separate state for Orissa, under the leadership of Madhusudan Das, and also served for a short period as a teacher.

Besides periodical engagements, most of his time was spent in composing songs and singing them and in staging dramas which were his hobbies nurtured from school days. He was also a good actor and stage director and used to get invitations from friends, relatives, admirers and lovers of music to sing songs composed by himself.

His songs are numerous, but he never tried to get them published. He did not even care to collect or compile them and only a few of his essays, songs and poems appeared in literary journals during his lifetime. It was twenty-six years after his death that many of his popular songs were collected and published.

In his songs his innermost feelings found natural and spontaneous expression. He also wrote sonnets, ballads and satires. His poems are lyrical in tone, expressing sentiments of love and patriotism, or they are intensely devotional, or they describe nature or deal with contemporary social problems. The traditional Oriya songs before he started writing lacked variety as they were mostly devotional, centring round the love of Radha and Krishna. By bringing diverse subjects into his poetry he imparted a new tone and meaning to Oriya poetry.

PATTANAYAK, PADMACHARAN (Oriya; b. 1885, d. 1948) was born in the village of Panchagan, near Bhubaneswar. He passed his B.A. examination from Ravenshaw College. Cuttack, and later studied law at Calcutta. Subsequently, he began his practice in Puri where he got associated with various socio-cultural activities and became the Vice-Chairman of Puri Municipality and a member of the Puri District Board. In spite of all these diversions, his main occupation was writing and he contributed regularly to leading Oriya journals.

In 1948 he lost his son and became indifferent to worldly affairs, his health broke down and he lived an unhappy solitary life until his death the same year.

Padmacharan was one of Orissa's foremost lyric poets in the early years of the present century. His poems are mostly romantic and patriotic in nature, and their language is chaste and lucid. He was equally good at writing prose.

Most of his works in prose and poetry, however, have not yet been compiled and published in book form. His published works include: Padma pakhuda, Golapa guchha, Sunara desha, Surayamukhi, Asha manjari, Fakiramohan, Martin Luther, Mahatma Gandhi, Napoleon, Prabandha parijata and Paribarika prabandha.

PATTANAYAK, RABI (Oriya; b.1936) is a contemporary short-story writer with an outward looking attitude to life. His notable collections of short stories include: Andhagalira andhakara, Asamajikara daeri, Ragatodi, Srestha galpa, Hiranya garbha and Amarilata. Almost all his stories deal with contemporary life on varied themes and provide a cross section of society. These stories may be put in three groups, dealing with the problems of the individual, social and religious problems, and the problem of alienation.

In the first group Rabi's subjects are love and sorrows of life. Love is depicted mostly as physical love ('Ragato–di'). At times he probes religious faith and metaphysics also while exploring the theme of love. In the second group of stories he writes about people who live in towns and whose attitude is largely conditioned by sophisticated living. The characters seek interaction with one another but the social situation inhibits self-fulfilment. His central theme in this group of stories is a pitiless exposure of the ills of modern industrial civilization. The stories coming under the third group deal with the modern individual who may have many associations but is always on the move and ever lonely. Sometimes the writer introduces a conflict between the individual and society. The character is afraid of the forces of existence that threaten him, and finds his life absurd and meaningless. Rabi Pattanayak analyses the psyche of his characters, and depicts human condition through various images. In the psycho-analysis of characters he often uses Freudian and existential references.

Many of Pattanayak's short stories are concerned with monotony in daily life. Sometimes the description is like a cinematic depiction of everyday life. In language the writer offers a wide variety, ranging from colloquial speech to modern and scientific vocabulary. His stories, on the whole, appeal more to the emotions, except the 'mini-stories' which make their appeal to the intellect. In his latest collections he has concentrated on the theme of time and eternity.

PATTANAYAK, RAJKISHORE (Oriya; b. 1917), born in Calcutta, was educated at Cuttack and passed the matriculation examination from Ravenshaw Collegiate School in 1934, and his B.Sc. examination from Ravenshaw College in 1938. After passing the Bachelor of Law examination from Cuttack and LL.M. from Banaras he started legal practice in Cuttack in 1944. While practising law he also served as a lecturer at the Law College, Cuttack, for about five years. As a journalist he edited many peirodicals both in Oriya and in English of which one English fortnightly magazine, Scrutiny, deserves mention.

He was also a reputed sportsman but soon gave up sports and devoted himself to writing fiction. His first novel Panjari pakhi (The bird inside the cage) was serialised in 1937 in Nababharat. Simultaneously a few of his short stories also appeared in the Ukal sahitya and the Sahakara and were soon published. Rajkishore came to be known far and wide as a successful writer of fiction. Since then he has produced some seventeen novels, two collections of essays and ten collections of short stories.

His works include: Sindura gara (1943), Ashranti (1944), Smritiramanasi (1944), Panjuri pakhi (1945), Premara niyati (1946), Sapan Khudi (1954), Sanjabati (1956), Premikara diary (1955), Chala bata (1957), Bhasa megha (1958), Kajal gara (1959) Astami chander (1966), Kalaparda (1967), Sakala kuhudi (1970), Pritira banija (1973) and Pritira kajal (1973). Tutha pathar (1945), Hrudayara bandhan (1945), Pathuki (1948) Nisana khauta (1954), Salagrama (1955), Kalpnarafula (1958), Pathar-adhima (1963), Hata sauda (1971), Hata bahuda (1974) are collections of his short stories. His critical writings are Lekha o pathak (1971) and Oriya sahityara agapachha (1973).

Though his novels and short stories mainly deal with love, they are always marked by psychological studies of characters. It is through his characters that Rajkishore successfully depicts the different cross-sections of contemporary society. His narration is simple and attractive, and his use of the colloquial speech has won him great popularity.

PATTHANA (Pali) is Pali word for Sanskrit 'Prasthana' and is formed by the words 'Pacchaya' and 'Thana'. It is also part of the word 'Jnana Prasthana' of the Saravastivada School. It forms the last book of the Abhidhamma which is considered to be later than the remaining two canons, the Suttapitaka and the Vinayapitaka. There is a controversy whether the Abhidhammapitaka was recognised in the First or the Second Council. However, the Mahavamsa clearly records that the arahants knew the Pitaka. The problem becomes accentuated, because the Mahasanghikas who fell out from the Theravadins, as stated in the Dipavamsa, rejected the Abhidhamma. Further, it is held by some that the 'Abhidhamma' and the 'Malika' are synonymous, though some of the commentaries hold that the term 'Malika' refers to the 'Patimokka'. The Buddhavamsa records that seven treatises found in Abhidhamma were taught by the Buddhakongamana.

Milindapanha has enumerated the seven treatises in the following order, and his classification has almost remained classical since: Dhammasanghani, Vibhanga, Dhalukatha, Puggalapannati, Kathavatthu, Yamaka, Patthana.

A different order of enumeration is maintained in the Sumangalavilasini (Part I) of Buddhaghosa: Dhammasanghani, Vibhanga, Kathavatthu, Puggalapannati, Dhalukatha, Yamaka, Patthana.

It is contended by Buddhaghosa that the textual order of the Abhidhamma started with Sariputta who, it is further held, determined the numerical order of the 'Patthana' to facilitate its proper study.

The 'Patthana', forming the last book of the Abhidhamma, is a stupendous work, and it professes to show that the Dhammas are not to be mistaken as different entities. They rather form a cosmos in which the smallest unit exercises its control over the rest and is in turn regulated by the rest. No wonder Patthana is likened to an astronomer who regards the entire cosmos of the stars and planets as contributing to a systematic unity.

'Patthana' has a system of relations (Pacchayas) which are twenty-four in number. They are enumerated in the 'Pacchaya Vibhangavara' as found in the first part of the Tikapatthana.

The whole work is divided into four parts:

1. Anuloma Patthana covers the instances in which the Pacchaya relations exist between the Dhammas positively.

2. Pacchaniya Patthana deals with instances in which the relations do not exist among the Dhammas as they are negative.

3. Anuloma-Pacchaniya Patthana takes into consideration the instances in which some of the Pacchaya relations exist. It also takes up the instances in which the Pacchaya relations do not exist. They are positive-negative relations.

4. Pacchaniya-Anuloma Patthana probes the nature of instances in which some of the Pacchaya relations do not exist, and also takes up along with them the instances in which Pacchaya relations exist. They are negative-positive relations.

The text further presents a method by which questions are asked about taking the conditions individually and, next, by twos, threes and so on, up to the maximum combination of twenty-four, referring to the seven combinations of each in relation to the way of taking the triplet by the four methods, i.e, Anuloma, Pacchaniya, Anuloma-pacchaniya and Pacchaniya-anuloma. If all the possible combinations were to be taken, it would amount to an unlimited number of questions. Hence only such questions (about 49) which are representative and illustrative are provided in the text.

The Patthana portion, in short, occupies a significant place in Pali canonical literature.

PATTHE, BAPURAO (Marathi; b.1866, d.1945) was the pseudonym of Shridhar Krishnaji Kulkarni, a major writer of 'Lavani' (erotic poetry) which is an integral part of 'Tamasha', an important form of Marathi folk theatre. Artists working in tamasha were generally drawn from the weaker sections of society. Patthe Bapurao, a Brahmin by birth, was so involved in the art of tamasha that he defied the prevailing caste hierarchy and dedicated his life to this art-form by forming his own troupe and writing 'lavanis' for it. Pavali and Chandravali, the dancers, were two of his close associates.

Bapurao's lavanis have been collected in three volumes. However, a large number of his compositions are still unpublished. His lavanis are characterised by rhythm and simplicity of diction.

Towards the end of his life Patthe Bapurao suffered from poverty and neglect, and died in a slum in Yerawda.

PATTINAPPALAI (Tamil) is a work written by Rudran Kannanar. It is included in the Pattuppattu (Ten idylls), and is written in praise of the Chola King Karikalan. Pattinappalai is a compound of 'pattinam' (city) and 'palai' (the desert region). The reference here is to the city of Kaverippatinam, the capital of the Chola kingdom. There is also an 'akam' element in the poem which runs as a parallel strain. Thus Pattinappalai refers to the proposed separation of a lady from her lord who wishes to go to the city of Kaverippattinam. A lover soliloquises, saying that the riches of the city would not tempt him to leave his beloved, for life with her is sweet and gracious, whereas parting from her is as dreadful as Karikalan's anger. Though the poet Rudran Kannanar tries to provide the dimension of an 'akam' poem, it is actually a 'puram' poem; out of 301 lines of the poem the akam element is confined to five lines only. The poem is written in 'akaval' metre and at times interwoven with 'vanchi' metre. The King Karikalan is said to have given the poet 160 million gold coins as a present for the poem.

Pattinappalai describes the city of Kaverippattinam in all its maritime glory. The poet delineates in detail the greatness, the richness and the wonderful culture of the city and the state and gives us a picture of the daily life of the people as it was lived in that remote age.

The poem commences with a fine description of the rich Chola country watered by the never-failing river Kaveri. The city situated at the mouth of the river is full of parks, groves and lakes. It is surrounded by a strong wall with a gate on which is set the Chola tiger mark. People of different occupations and castes reside in the various parts of the city. As it is a sea-port town, the fisherman's quarters and their life are described in some detail. There is a graphic description of the city, particularly of the quarters where alm-houses and monasteries are situated.

The other part of the poem deals with the reign of Karikalan and his heroic deeds. It speaks also about his rule creating habitations out of forests, deepening of tanks, enriching kingdom, making shrines and constructing fortifications.

The poem is full of splendid pen-pictures. With wealth of detail and vivid realism the poet describes the kingdom, its capital city with its various sections, its customs, houses and bazars, and its social life. He also reveals his love of Nature by making references to the flora and fauna of the land. The descriptions are made vivid by the apt use of figures, particularly similes and metaphors which elucidate as well as embellish the details. Thus the poem is important for its historical, social, religious and literary values.

PATTINATHTHAR (Tamil;b.9th century A.D.) is also known as Pattinaththup-pillaiyar and Pattinaththu adigal. In Tamil there are three poets of these names. They are Pattinaththar the saint, Pattinaththar the ascetic and Pattinaththar the mystic.

Pattinaththar the saint was a rich house-holder but a great devotee of Shiva. His work is a devotional text celebrating the glory of Mahadeva.

All the hymns, especially the hymn sung in Thituvotriyoor, propound the philosophy of Shaiva Siddhantam. Pattinaththar's work achieved the greatness of being one of the 'Panniru thirumurai' (the twelve holy texts). His works are included with the hymns of others in the eleventh Thirumurai, and they are Koil nanmani malai, Thirukkalumala mummanikkovai, Thiruvidai marudhoor mummanikkovai, Thiru egambar thiruvandhadhi and Thiruvotriyoor oru pa oru pagdu. All these works are of the 'antadi' type, where the last word of the previous song becomes the first word of the following one.

Among his works, Koil nanmani malai consists of forty songs sung in four different types of lyrics. Hence it is known as 'nanmani malai' (garland of four rubies). 'Koil' refers to the golden temple of Nataraja in Chidambaram. Since this 'nanmani malai' was sung in Chidambaram it got the name Koil nanmani malai. Thirukkalumala mummanikkovai contains thirty songs of three different lyrics. This was composed in the temple of Kalumalam. These poems describe the greatness of Kalumalam and also refer to Gnana Sambandar's vision of God as Ardhanari (half-male and half-female). Thiruvidai marudhhor mummanikkovai also contains thirty songs. There is an elaborate description of the Lord as Ardhanari. The poem refers to the Devaram hymns of Appar, Sambandar and Sundarar, and also to the pure devotion of Manikkavachar. The king Varaguna's spiritual faith and religiosity are described in detail. Thiru egambar thiruvandhadhi contains a hundred songs sung in Kanchipuram. Several temples of Shiva all over Tamilnadu are mentioned in this poem. Thiruvotriyoor oru pa oru pagdu has ten songs sung in the temple of Thiruvotriyoor. The poem is written in celebration of Lord Shiva and the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy.

Ascetic Pattinaththar, who belonged to the medieval period, was originally a wealthy businessman with no children. He adopted a child and brought him up. One day the son left home by leaving a package for him with Pattinaththar's wife. When he opened the package he saw a blind needle and a palm leaf with a verse 'even a blind needle would not come at the end'. After reading this Pattinaththar had a sudden change. He realised the transient nature of the world, gave up everything and became an ascetic. When the king heard this news, he admired the deed of Pattinaththar, followed suit and become an ascetic under the name Batragiri. After cremating his mother, Pattinaththar seems to have gone to Thiruvotriyoor where he attained spiritual salvation. Pattinaththar's works are Koil thiru akaval with forty-seven songs, Kachchhiththiru agaval with seventy songs, Egamba malai with forty-one songs, Poduppadal with 105 songs, Arul pulambal with 377 songs, and thirty-seven songs on sacred places. His poems give us ample evidence of how he came to renounce worldly pleasures. Throughout his work he describes the unstable nature of material pleasures. Ten songs in Podu explain the cremation of the body of his mother. Batragiri's work Maignanap-pulambal contains 232 devotional songs and describes the soul's waiting for spiritual knowledge and the union with Shiva. The works of Pattinaththar and Batragiri are compiled together.

Mystic Pattinaththar is said to be one of the eighteen mystics or Siddhars who lived in Palani hills or on the banks of the Kutralam river. These men were credited with mystic powers. Legend has it that in Thiruvotriyoor some children put him under a cover while he was in a trance, but when they uncovered him they saw a Shivalingam instead of Patinaththar. His songs are found in Siddhar padalgal.

PATTU (Malayalam). Generally the word 'pattu' means a song, but in ancient Malayalam the term was used to signify a school of poetry with certain definite rules. This genre is recognised and defined in the well-known book Lilatilakam. According to the author of Lilatilakam this type of pattu is different from songs and folk lore in Malayalam which are also called pattu. Manipravala was much more popular than pattu during the period of Lilatilakam (14th c). According to the definition, only Dravidian or Tamil alphabet should be used for pattu. Sanskrit letters are to be converted to the Dravidian phonetic system. Sonants and sibilants are not to occur in pattu kavyas.

'Etuka' and 'mona' are rhyme schemes associated with the pattu school of writing. 'Etuka' is very similar to 'dvitiyaksharaprasam' in Malayalam and Sanskrit, the only difference being that the first syllable should have the same 'matra' in the former. Each foot of a stanza is divided into two halves. If the first syllable in both the halves is the same, the rhyme is termed mona. In short, the pattu school follows the Tamil tradition in prosody, rhyme and phonology. This genre should be composed in Dravidian metre and not in Sanskrit metre.

Ramacharitam, which is supposed to have been written in the twelfth century, observes all the rules of the pattu school. No other work has yet been discovered, which so fully adheres to the definition of pattu given in Lilatilakam. Hence we can infer that the pattu school must have developed considerably and gained recognition at the time of Ramacharitam.

T.G.R.P.

PATTU (Tamil) is a common name to denote all the poems which are sung or versified. Though it does not stand for a particular literary genre, it includes different varieties of poems.

Tolkappiyam uses the word 'pattu' to denote verse literature. In the Sangam period, the ten long idylls, Mullaippattu and Kurinchippattu and the eight anthologies, Paripattu, had this name. And later the ten long idylls got the common name 'pattuppattu'. Because of this, Panniru pattiyal, the treatise on poetics, includes 'pattu' as a genre.

Though classical literature did not produce much which can be called 'pattu' until a later date, it gives us certain references which help us consider it as a folk song. Kuruntokai and Melaipatukatam refer to 'vallaippattu', as a variety of songs sung while pounding grain. This is also called 'urar pattu' and 'ulakkaip pattu'. Narrinai refers to 'kuravaipattu', sung with dance.

'Ucharpattu', the swing song, occurs from Silappadikaram onwards. It is this epic which gives the very first few stanzas on vellaippattu, ucharpattu, ammanai (a ball game), kantukam (a ball game), etc., which find place later in oral literature. 'Mukuvaippattu' referred to in Silappadikaram (10-136-137) is a folk song connected with agriculture and agrarian life.

The devotional poetry of the Tamils also shows a few pattu varieties in Manikkavachakar's Tiruvachakam, like 'tiru ammanai', 'tiruppor chunnam' ('vallaippattu') and 'tellenam' (kummippattu) with oral-literary flavour.

The oral literature collections help us know about very many different song-varieties like kotankippattu, pantarappattu, rappatippattu, kurikkanan pattu, kutukutuppaikkaran pattu, otappattu, errappattu and nerumal mettukkaran pattu which are sung during work; kolatip pattu and kumaippattu which accompany amusement and child play; and lali pattu nalunkuppattu, mulaippattu and pavaippattu which accompany rituals. There are many other poems such as kuyil pattu, tumpippattu, mayil pattu, purappattu and chevar pattu which are addressed to birds. Songs with different rhythmic variations are known as chatappattu.

Other than these, there are certain pattus which relate to folk-ballads. Villauppattu and utukkaippattu belong to this variety. Kummi and ammanaippattu are also used to tell stories.

PATTUKKOTTAI KALYANASUNDARAM (Tamil; b. 1930, d. 1959), is rightly remembered as 'people's poet'. He was born in a village Chengappaduttan Kadu, near Pattukkottai in Tamil Nadu. He did not attend school but was given education at home by his father, himself a poet, and his elder brother.

Kalyanasundaram started writing poems till his premature death at the age of twenty-nine. As a rural farmer working on the fields, he wanted his message to reach the common people, a majority of whom were illiterates. He chose film songs as his medium of writing, and wrote poems with a social message. He was committed to the cause of improving the condition of the common man. His language was also suited to the theme—for instance, he used the simple and lucid style of folk poetry in his poems. What made the poet concerned was that when the country was seemingly rich and prosperous, the condition of the common man continued to be deplorable. This social awareness is the main theme of almost all his peoms, and it marks him out among his contemporaries.

PATTUPPATTU (Tamil) comprises ten idylls: 'Tirumurukarruppatai', 'Porunararruppatai', 'Chirupanarruppatai', 'Perumpanarruppatai', 'Mullaippattu', 'Maturaikkanchi', 'Netunalvatai', 'Kurinchippattu', 'Pattinappalai' and 'Malaipatukatam'. These works brought to the Sangam period a high reputation and recognition as the golden age in the history of Tamil literature.

An idyll is a short poem descriptive of some picturesque scene or incident, chiefly of rustic life with a naturalistic touch. It is not known when and by whom these poems, written at different times, were collected and grouped together.

There are in this anthology five poems belonging to the 'arruppatai' literary genre: 1) 'Tirumurukarruppatai', 2) 'Porunararruppatai' 3) 'Chirupanarruppatai' 4) 'Perumpanarruppatai' and 5) 'Malaipatukatam'. In this genre, the needy is guided to a person to solicit help from him. In 'Porunararruppatai', Porunan, the poet who is a singer of battles, is directed to go and get presents from Karikalan, a Chola King. In 'Chirupanarruppatai', Chirupanan, the poet who sings to the accompaniment of a small 'yal' (lute), is directed to receive gifts from Nalliyakkotan. In 'Perumpanarruppatai', Perumnanan, the poet who sings to the accompaniment of a big yal is directed to Ilantiraiyan of Kanchi to receive rewards. In 'Malaipatukatam', 'Kuttan', the actor is directed to Nannan, a chieftain in order to get gifts from him. In 'Tirumurukarruppatai' unlike in the rest of the arruppatai poems, a devotee is directed to Lord Murugan to be graced with liberation.

'Mullaippattu' by Napputanar deals with a lady separated from her husband who is away in the battle-field. It is the shortest poem in Pattuppattu. 'Maturaik-kanchi' by Mankuti Marutanar deals with the transcience of life. It is in praise of Netuncheliyan, a Pandya king, and is the longest poem in Pattuppattu. 'Netunalvatai' by Nakkirar has similarities with 'Mullaippattu' in its subject matter. The description of the cold season is remarkable.

'Kurinchippattu' by Kapilar is intended to teach the Arya Prince Brihatta the beauties of Tamil love poetry. This poem speaks of clandestine love. It contains fine descriptions of mountain scenery. 'Pattinappalai' by Urut-tairankannanar is in praise of Karikalan, the Chola king and his capital Kaverippattinam.

Of these ten idylls, the author of 'Porunararruppatai' is a poetess; Nakkirar has written both 'Timmurukarrup-patai' and 'Netunalvatai'; Uruttirankannanar has written both 'Pattinappalai' and 'Perumpanarruppatai'.

Terseness of expression is one of the characteristic features of Pattuppattu. These poems express pellucid thoughts in terse, suggestive words and phrases. In these poems, words are so dovetailed as to give the reader the impression of an inlaid mosaic. The graphic language used in them indicates the poets' close acquaintance with Nature. The reader is struck with the pen-pictures of hills, clouds, sea, rivers, fields, woods, and the other flora and fauna. These poets seem to be specially fond of flowers. In each of these poems, there is a surfeit of descriptions of flowers of every hue. In 'Kurinchippattu', for instance, the poet recounts in one passage as many as ninety-nine flowers of the mountainous region. Birds and other animals are similarly introduced in every poem. The delineation of beautiful landscapes, the description of the cold season and the depiction of evening are fascinating. Another noteworthy characteristic is realism, which is seen not only in the poets' account of Nature, but also in their delineation of female beauty and also in the portrayal of the life of the poeple. There is a vivid use of appropriate imagery and figures of speech like similes and metaphors. Many of the similes in these poems are simple and primitive, but there are also elaborate ones comprising more than one point of comparison. Sometimes similes within similes are also used in the poems.

Poems in Pattuppattu are important because of their historical and social values. They speak about ancient kings and chieftains, their territory, administration, capitals, bravery, generosity, their people, culture and civilization, trade, war, occupations, food, houses, arts, amusements, religious tolerance, etc. These ten poems running into 3550 lines have been admirably commented on by the celebrated writer Nachchinarkkiniyar. Of the ten, six are of the 'puram' theme and the rest on the 'akam'. They constitute, on the whole, a veritable treasure-house, revealing the life of the Tamils of a bygone age.

PATWARDHAN, MADHAV TRYAMBAK (Marathi; b. 1894, d. 1939), also known as Madhav Julian, was a poet, lexicographer, prosodist and literary critic. He was born at Baroda and spent his childhood mainly in Gujarat. He did his M.A. in English and Persian in 1918. His poetry reflects the impact of Persian literature. In June 1918 he shifted to Pune and taught briefly at the New English School founded by the Deccan Education Society. In June 1919 he started teaching Persian as well as English at Fergusson College, Pune. He rose to be a Professor of Persian at Rajaram College, Kolhapur, where he stayed till his death. He presided over the Jalgaon session of the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan in 1936. The University of Bombay conferred on him the degree of D. Litt. in 1939, for his book Chhandorachana. He died of liver cancer at the age of 46.

His contribution to literature is varied and can be classified under two heads–poetry and miscellaneous prose. His lyrics, ghazals and sonnets, longer narrative poems and translations of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam can be included under the first category. Apart from poetry his other published books are Farsi-Marathi-kosh and Chhandorachana. He strongly advocated the use of Marathi in its original flavour. He also tried to improve the Marathi script. His works include critical writings as well as analysis of literary principles.

An intense poetic sensitivity is the main feature of his poetry. His three collections of lyrics are Gazalanjali (1933), Swapnaranjan (1934) and Madhulahari ani itar kavita (published posthumously in 1940). He has written intense love poems. The sentiment of love he projects is similar to the Platonic, where the lover transcends his self. His poems reflect his social consciousness, pride in the nation and the sufferings of a lonely mind. He made some experiments with forms like 'ghazal' and 'sunit' (sonnet). Virahatarang (1926), Sudharak (1928), Tutalele duve (1938) and Nakulalankar (1939) are his longer narrative poems. Tutalele duve is a collection of sonnets. Virahatarang is a tender love-story while Sudharak is a social satire. In Nakulalankar the satirical tone becomes more biting when he criticizes the evils in literary and educational fields. Tutalele duve deals in the main with pangs of broken relationships in love. Patwardhan belongs to the school of lyrical poets.

Patwardhan translated the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam in different ways. In 1929 he translated the Rubaiyat directly from Persian, with the title Drakshakanya (1931). He also translated the English version of Fitzgerald. The fourth edition of Fitzgerald's translation was, again, rendered into Marathi by him as Madhulahari.

A collection of his critical and literary articles, mainly on modern poetry is entitled Kavyavihar (1947), which was followed by Kavya chikitsa (1964). Patwardhan's criticism has a two-fold purpose. He creates a literary taste among the common readers and bridges the gulf between the poet and the reader. He also deals with issues like 'Kavyanand' and 'rasa'. In Chhandorachana he reconstructs prosody and gives it a new base.

He brought out Farsi-Marathi-kosh (Persian-Marathi dictionary, 1925) which is useful for the study of historical documents. He wanted to make Marathi richer and more effective by bringing the language closer to the people. His speeches and articles regarding the 'Swadeshism' of Marathi language are collected in his Bhasha-shuddhivivek (1938).

Some of his poems were translated into English and were published in Triveni, an English bi-monthly from Madras. Triveni also published some of his articles on language and literature.

PAUDYAL, LEKHNATH (Nepali; b. 1884, d. 1965), considered to be the second best Nepali poet after Bhanubhakta Acharya, brought about a new era in Nepali literature.

Born at Archale, Lekhnath received his early education in Sanskrit literature from his father Durgadutta Paudyal. He was later educated at Kathmandu and Banaras. Unaware of the literary trends in the West, Lekhnath quietly followed in the footsteps of Bhanubhakta and Motiram Bhatta. While he was a student at Rani Pokhri Pathsala, a collection of Sanskrit and Nepali poems entitled Kalpadruma, edited by Durgaprasad Sharma, appeared. It contained two poems 'Shrinagar pachchisi' and 'Manasa-karsini' by Lekhnath. Two more poems, 'Viyogini-vilap' and 'Vairagya-valli' appeared in the magazine Sundari, edited by Pandit Somnath Sigdal and published from Banaras. Among his later literary works the most notable is Ritu-vichar (1934).

The tremendous pressure of the Rana regime had its bearing on Lekhnath and his writings also. While preparing text books for schools, he wrote a famous poem 'Pinjara ko sugha' (The parrot in the cage) in 1914. The poem symbolized the condition of the then Nepal under the Rana and the poem was regarded as seditious and subversive. Lekhnath actually advocated human liberation from torture and penury. Another poetic contribution Tarun tapasi, described by the poet as 'Nabya kavya', is the total expression of his philosophy of life. It is a critical survey of human civilization as viewed from the poet's spiritual standpoint.

Lekhnath was also a successful translator. Panchatantra (1927) and Abhijnana Shakuntala (1958) are his main translations. His numerous literary works appeared in such well-known literary magazines as Sundari, Gorkhali-chandrika, Sarada, Udyog and Bharati published from both India and Nepal.

PAUL, M.P. (Malayalam; b.1904, d. 1952) was born in Puthenpally, a village in Central Kerala. He took his B.A. degree from St. Joseph's College, Tiruchirapalli, and his masters' degree in English Literature. He started his career as a teacher of English at St. Thomas College, Trichur, and earned a high reputation as teacher and scholar. He served several colleges as Professor of English.

Paul made his debut as a literary critic with his Novel sahityam which he published in 1930. In 1932 he published his Khanda katha sahityam. Both are adjudged authoritative books on the two literary forms, the novel and the short-story. Before his estrangement from the church he wrote a phamplet on 'Theism'. Later, he became an atheist. He sympathised with the peoples' struggle for liberation from economic slavery. He strated the progressive literature movement in Malayalam, and was president of the Progressive Literature Forum in Malayalam. Most of the short story writers and novelists who grew prominent in the forties and the fifties were guided and inspired by him. He was the founder president of the Sahitya Pravartaka Cooperative Society which has grown into the most powerful book publishing concern in Kerala. Paul did not write much, but the essays he wrote on prose style, humour, the progressive literature movement are excellent pieces. His exposition of humour is based on the Bergsonian concept. He made a powerful plea to give prose a position at par with poetry in Malayalam literature. The guidelines he gave to prose-writers are as valid now as they were at the time he chalked them out. He was a fearless critic. He did not hesitate to expose the flaws in the works considered masterpieces by popular critics. He had the courage to criticise the works of C.V.Raman Pillai and Appan Thampuran and to recognise the greatness of Vaikkom Mohammed Basheer. Paul's Soundarya samiksha is a masterly book on aesthetics. His reputation rests partly on the leadership he gave to progressive movement and partly on his critical contribution to fiction and prose as a whole.

PAUMACHARIYA (PADMACHARITA) (Prakrit) is a narrative poem on the life of Padma by Vimalasuri. According to his own statement, he wrote it in A.D. 3, though Jacobi assigns it to the third century A.D. and K.R. Chandra to the fifth. It is a 'charita' or a 'purana', an epic poem in Maharashtri Prakrit, composed in Gatha metre, with 118 cantos comprising 8651 verses. Essentially, it deals with the lives of Padma, (another name of Rama), Lakshmana and Ravana who form the eighth trio, Baladeva, Vasudeva and Prativasudeva respectively. The whole narrative moves in the Jaina tradition, and the stories of the previous births of the characters are told in great detail.

The narrative begins in the manner of a purana with a description of the universe and the holography of Rishabha, the first Jaina Tirthankar, followed by an account of the origin of the Vidyadhara-vamsha, the Brahmana-varna, the Ikshvaku-vamsha, the Soma-vamsha, the Rakshasa-vamsha and the Vanara-vamsha. Next are given the stories of Indra, of the appointment of Soma, Varuna, Kubera and Yama as governors of four quarters, and of Vaishravana as the ruler of Lanka; of the birth of Ravana, his sister Chandranakha, and his brothers, Bhanukarna and Vibhishana, of Ravana's acquisition of super human power, his heroic deeds, his conquest of adversaries, the origin of the animal sacrifice and its abolition by him, the vanquishing of Indra; of Anjanasundari and her son Hanuman, the latter's help to Rama and ultimately Ravana's emergence as a sovereign ruler of the half of Bharatakhanda. The holography of the sixty-three illustrious persons, an account of the genesis of the Harivamsha and the story of Janaka follow. Thereafter is related the story of Dasharatha and Rama. It differs from the Valmiki Ramayana in several aspects.

Kaikeyi weds Dasharatha in a 'svayamvara'. Dasharatha is attacked by the disgruntled candidates. In the scuffle that follows Kaikeyi drives his war-chariot with great dexterity and is granted a boon. Rama's mother is Aparajita. Bharata and Shatrughna are the two sons of Kaikeyi. Sita is born to Janaka's queen. She is betrothed to Rama in recognition of his valour in suppressing the barbarous hordes who had invaded Janaka. Contrary to the original story, the bow is brought by the Vidyadharas who insist upon Sita's marriage to the Vidyadhara prince, Bhamandala who turns out to be Sita's brother kidnapped in his infancy by a celestial who was his enemy in a previous birth. Bhamandala is abandoned and, later, adopted by a Vidyadhara chief.

The story of the wanderings of Rama in the forest differs from the version given in Valmiki's Ramayana. Here Rama and Lakshmana meet kings of various places, all devotees of the Jina, make friendship with them and help them by vanquishing their enemies. Both of them accept a number of princesses offered to them by those kings. Shambuka, the son of Chandranakha (Shurpanakha of the Valmiki Ramayana). who is performing some penance in a bamboo thicket to acquire a divine sword, is killed by Lakshmana accidentally. This incident, along with the episode of the rejection of her proposal of marriage by both brothers, infuriates her and she incites Ravana to avenge her anger. Ravana abducts Sita. Some demon (Danava), in the disguise of Sugriva, wants to establish sexual relations with Sutara, the wife of the real Sugriva. Upon the real Sugriva's request, Rama kills the demon. When Lakshmana, struck by Ravana's missile (shakti), becames unconscious, he is revived by Vishalya, her bath-water being the remedy. She is the daughter of the maternal uncle of Bharata who is brought there by Hanuman and others. Later Lakshmana marries her.

After returning to Ayodhya, Lakshmana launches a war-campaign and becomes the master of half of the Bharata country. He marries a number of princesses. Rama too does the same. As usual, Sita is exiled. She gives birth to Lavana and Ankusha. Both enter into marriages with several girls. They conquer many countries. Muni Narada relates to them their previous acts, as they fight with Rama and Lakshmana. After the fire-ordeal Sita renounces the world. Then follows the initiation of various characters to the Jaina monkhood and their going to heaven or attaining the state of liberation.

The work is interspersed with sixty-three other narratives of legendary kings, stories of previous births, and didactic tales. The origin of the Brahmanas is quite an entertaining story and that of Anjanasundari has a fine social theme. Anjanasundari's sense of morals during the long absence of her husband and the nature of her pregnancy are suspected by her mother-in-law and she is turned out of the house. This story can be compared with any modern story with a social theme.

According to Paumachariya the Rakshasas and the Vanaras are not demons and monkeys, but they are human beings having their descent from the Vidyadharas who came to be so known because they were endowed with supernatural powers. They are depicted as highly civilised and as adherents of the cult of non-violence. The Rakshasa-vamsha was named after the great hero called Rakshasa of the Vidyadhara-vamsha in Lanka. The Vanara-vamsha was so known because of the adoption of the monkey-emblem by the Vidyadhara king Amaraprabha at Kishkindhipura. Vimalasuri gives a realistic interpretation even of the name of Dashamukha Ravana. His mother hung around his neck a necklace of nine gems, and as his face was reflected in them he was called Dashamukha. The poet has elevated other characters too. Kaikeyi tries to keep her son Bharata at Ayodhya, because he desired to renounce the world with his father, Dasharatha. Rama accepts a voluntary exile to maintain Bharata at home. Vali appoints Sugriva to the throne and accepts monkhood. Lakshmana kills Shambuka by accident, and there is no chopping of nose and ears of Chandranakha by him. Ravana is a devout Jaina and restores the ruined Jaina shrines. Kumbhakarna is without ugly traits. Other deviations are that all the principal characters, even Hanuman, have a large number of wives. All the main characters, including Kaikeyi and Sita and excepting Lakshmana and Ravana, retire from the world in old age and attain liberation. This is a special feature of the Jaina narrative literature. Lakshmana, not Rama, kills Ravana because Lakshmana is made a Vasudeva, and Ravana, a Prativasudeva.

PAUMASIRICHARIU (Prakrit-Apabhramsha), or Padmashri charitam, is a poetic work which deals with the story of Padmashri, the daughter of a merchant. It was composed by Dhahila in the tenth century in the Pajjhatika metre in four sandhis (cantos).

Dhahila calls himself in his work a descendant of Magh, the author of Shishupalavadha. Magh hailed from Billamala and was a Gurjar Vaisya of the Shrimal lineage. Dhahila was the son of Parshva, a poet himself, and the grandson of Taya. He was a Jaina devotee and called himself a 'Divya-dristi', i.e. a man of divine vision. On the evidence of the language of Paumasirichariu, one could suggest that the book was written some time during the tenth century, but not later than the twelfth. The poet is an adventurer in the sense that in place of a traditional he has chosen a social subject.

Though the poet calls it a religious story, it is based on a social theme depicting the jealousy and bickerings amongst the women of a household. The story moves in an atmoshpere of quarrels between women, the practice of polyandry, and the woes of the abandoned wives.

Dhanasen, a merchant of Vasantpur, had two sons, Dhanadatta and Dhanavaha. He had also a daughter Dhanashri, who became a widow early in life. She lived with her sympathetic brothers. Once she came into contact with a teacher of morals and started living a religious life. Since she spent money liberally for religious purposes, she was disliked by Yashomati and Yashoda, the wives of her brothers. They grew jealous and insinuated against her. So Dhanashri tricked them and created bitterness between them, though later she brought about their reconciliation. She lived a religious life and, after her death, was transformed into a celestial being.

In their next life Dhanadatta and Dhanavaha were re-born Samudradatta and Vrsabhadatta (Udadhidatta) at Ayodhya as sons of Ashokadatta, the merchant. Dhanashri was re-born Padmashri, the beautiful daughter of the merchant Shankha of Hastinapur. Once Samudradatta went to Hastinapur with his father and chanced to see Padmashri in a garden. Both fell in love with one another and got married.

They lived happily thereafter for many years when a mischief-making divinity created animosity between the pair, arousing Samudradatta's suspicion about his wife's character. He left her weeping, returned to Ayodhya and married Kantimati. His brother married Kirtimati. The two of them were, indeed, Yashomati and Yashoda in their previous life. Padmashri renounced the world and became a nun, but her trial was not yet over. She suffered, was censured, but ultimately emerged pure and attained salvation at her death.

The story spans over the events of two lives, but maintains the links carefully. The style is poetic, and the dominant sentiment is love in both union and separation. There are elements of pity and marvel as well. Finally, the story ends in quietude. The poet has shown deep insight into the workings of the human mind. He has manipulated real life situations very well, delineated the notions of envy, anger, grief, suspicion, hatred, etc., and employed the figures of alliteration, pun, simile, metaphor, fancy, and contrast. His language is simple and fluent.

PAVAI VILAKKU (Tamil) is a novel written by P.V.Akilandam, popularly known by his pen name 'Akilan'. Written in 1958, it attracted some critical notice, though there are critics who do not consider it one of his best novels.

The story of the novel is very simple. Thanikasalam, the hero, is a college student. Devaki, a young widow, loves him, but is rejected by him as he is to marry Gouri, his maternal uncle's daughter. When he is in a temporary job at Pudhupatti, he falls in love with a beautiful dancer Chenkamalam, but is disappointed when she marries a rich man Kumarasamy under the influence of her mother. Devaki and Chenkamalam are now his 'sisters'. He becomes a regular writer by writing about the bitter experiences in his life. He marries Gouri, loses his job, spends a few years as a teacher at Courtallam and settles down at Madras as a writer. Uma, a college lecturer in English, helps him by not only offering her aunt's first floor house on nominal rent but also by writing his stories for him. They are attached to each other and get married (with the consent of the hero's first wife and relatives). But on the very first day of her marriage she falls off the staircase, receives a severe head injury and dies with her head on the lap of Thanikasalam. She occupies a permanent place in his heart and inspires him to write ceaselessly. Akilan makes her immortal in his writing.

As a novel Pavai vilakku concentrates on the feelings that cross the minds of its major characters. At times, Akilan seems to convey his own experiences as a writer through the hero, Thanikasalam. Through the four major characters, and their separate interaction with the hero, the novelist analyses love from four different angles. Devaki is a widow denied by society the right to live; Chenkamalam is a 'Devadasi', Gouri a submissive and simple housewife; Uma a modern girl. In terms of symbols, Thanikasalam symbolises, perhaps, Tamil writing; Devaki ambition and motive; Chenkamalam art essential for its expression; Gouri its virtue, and Uma boldness to reveal the truth. In addition to the five major characters, Akilan has introduced a multitude of minor characters who are quite credible.

The development of the characters, however, is so slow that it ultimately affects the plot-construction of the novel. The hero Thanikasalam is inconsistent and his action in the story proves him to be a bundle of contradictions. Notwithstanding these defects, this is one of the most popular novels of Akilan.

PAVANADUTA (Sanskrit), is a celebrated work by Dhoyi who was one of the gems at the court of king Lakshmanasena of Bengal (12th c). Not much is known about his personal life. His name is also mentioned differently as Dhuyi, Dhoi, or Dhoyika. According to M.M. Haraprasad Shastri, he was a Radhiya Brahmin of Paladhi Gani and had Kashyapa gotra, while the genealogical works of Bengali Vaidya identify him with Duhisena or Dhuyisena. His contemporary Jayadeva, the well-known author of the Gitagovinda alludes to his titles Kavikshmapati (Kavi-raja) and Srutadhara (one who retains what he hears).

In the epilogue to his poem Pavanaduta the poet gives some information about himself. He was honoured by the king of Bengal who bestowed upon him the gift of a number of elephants, golden sticks and a 'chowry' with a golden handle alongwith a title 'The sovereign king of poets'. This shows how highly he was esteemed by his patron king who amply rewarded his poetic achievements.

He says that he has composed many interesting works. The anthologies have also preserved nearly twenty stray verses attributed to him. But unfortunately only one work seems to have survived the test of time.

Dhoyi's Pavanaduta is so far the earliest available specimen of the imitation of Kalidasa's Meghaduta. Though not a 'charitakavya', it presents an historical person, namely the poet's patron king Laksmanasena as the hero of this 'sandeshakavya'. Kuvalayavati, a Gandharva maiden living on the Malaya hills, falls in love with the king during the course of his conquest in the south, and in her love-lorn condition at the advent of spring sends him a message through the wind (pavana) blowing in the north-easterly direction over Bengal.

It has 104 verses in all. The poem ends at stanza 100, as the last four stanzas form an epilogue to his 'Shataka' (hundred verses) poem.

The itinerary of the wind is chalked out as follows: Kanakanagari (city of Gandharvas in the Malay hills, i.e. the southern part of the western ghats), Pandya country with its capital Uragapura, Setubandha at Rameshwara, Kanchipura, river Kaveri, mountain Malyavan, the Pampa lake (east of Vidarbha), Andhra country, Kalinga city, Vindhya ranges near Amarakantaka, Yayatinagari, Suhma (South-West Bengal), Triveni (Hugli dist.) and Vijayapura (i.e. Nadia, the capital of Lakshmanasena). Pavanaduta is a poem written in an elegant and easy flowing 'Vaidarbhi' style, occasionally interspersed with beautiful figures of speech.

Though an imitation of the Meghaduta, it exhibits a good deal of poetic skill. At times we find illustrations of really good poetry: e.g. the Setubandha is imagined to be a hand of the mother earth extending to Lanka to console her daughter Sita captivated by Ravana.

Verses (64-94) depicting love-pangs of the heroine are part of the finest products in Sanskrit literature. Thus the heroine with the slender waist is compared to a bow of the god of love (both held in the fist). As for her love-pangs, she is so emaciated that now she resembles the string of Cupid's bow.

The description is graphic and full of pathos. The gradual movement of the flow of the heroine's tears is vividly described. First it reaches the eyes, stops the movement of the eye-lids, kisses the cheeks and the lips, embraces the neck and sleeps on the bed of the plump breasts.

Though the influence of Kalidasa is clearly discernible in some expressions and images, Dhoyi has also introduced something new and piquant, which entitles him to the rank of a Kaviraja or a great pooet.

PAVANAN (Malayalam; b.1926), real name P.V. Narayanan Nair, is a major writer in Malayalam. He had his early schooling in the Gurukula tradition. Even later he did not take a formal degree, though he acquired mastery of Malayalam and English, besides a smattering of a few other Indian languages. He worked for two years in the army, another two years in Government service and twenty-seven years as a journalist in various publishing establishments. In 1975 he was appointed Assistant Secretary, Kerala Sahitya Akademi, and was promoted in 1977 as Secretary, which post he held until he retired in 1984.

Pavanan has been associated with a number of literary, social and cultural organisations. His travels to Russia and East European countries became subjects of two of his well-known travelogues. His literary contributions, twenty-five original works and some translations, cover a wide range of subjects such as history, criticism, sociology, culture and Indian philosophy. Kaviyum kalavum deals with the poetical works of Vayalar Rama Varma, and Subramania Bharati is the biography of the Tamil poet prepared for the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. Yukti darshanam is a voluminous work compiled and edited by him.

Pavanan will be remembered as a promoter of literature also. It was during his tenure as Secretary that the Akademi produced some of its prestigious publications including the best known Comparative Indian Literature.

He received the Soviet Land Nehru Award and the Puthezhan Award (for the best literary work) in 1980, the Prathibha Award and the Vyloppillil Award (both for distinguished service in the field of culture) in 1981 and 1984 respectively.

PAWADA (Rajasthani). The word 'pawada' is found in many states, such as Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh, Maharastra, Gujarat, Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, with some difference in meaning. In Braj Bhasha it is spelt as Panwara and means 'imbroglio', i.e. endless quarrels. In Bundelkhand it is pronounced as Panwada, suggesting an unending tale, whereas in Bhojpuri it is a folk-song sung on the occasion of child birth. In Marathi the term has been in use from the 11th century as Pawada, describing the merits, dexterity or heroic deeds of a person of distinction.

In medieval Rajasthani literature we find it spelt as Parwada, Pravad or Pawada. In Varnak samucchaya panch pandav charit rasu, Rao Jayatsi ro raso, Chhand Rao Jayatsi ru of the 15th century, we find the terms paravada and pravad used to indicate a war, though the meaning changed later to cover a saga of heroism. In Achaldas Khichi ri vachanika (composed in 1427) and Padmini charit chaupai (1589) we find it used in the form of Pravada. The etymologists have traced the origin of these words to Sanskrit 'Pravad' (eulogizing the heroes) and 'Pravrddha' (glory of dignity).

In Rajasthan the Pawadas, related to the wedding of Pabuji Rathore, are sung on 'Rawan hattha', a musical instrument, and the story is illustrated on a 'Phad' (picture curtain). Some other pawadas Mana Gujari, Sultan Nihalde, Bhatiyan ri rad, Pawada of satis, etc., are also available.

The language of the Pawadas sung by the Bhopas is simple, but full of poetical effects. In Pabuji ra pawada the story has been composed in one and the same metre which carries the unbroken flow of the rhythm throughout. The metre is without terminal alliteration.

Nothing can be definitely said about the authorship of a Pawada whether it is an individual composition or a folk song. Even if an individual wrote one at some point of time, its recital by minstrels as a folk-song gave it a wider base, amenable to alterations and assimilations.

PAYJANAM (Konkani) is a collection of poems by the eminent poet Bakibab Borkar published in 1960. It includes forty poems of various metrical patterns covering themes like love, nature, God, domestic happiness and patriotism. The collection is dedicated to the memory of old toddy-tapper Patris, who with his skill at versification made the poet realize the vast potentialities of Konkani as a medium for verse. The collection contains some of the best lyrics of the language. It begins with 'Purusha-sukta' invocation to the ancestor, here, obviously to Shanjay Gomybad. The little poem 'Payjanam' (Anklet) is an exquisite piece of poetry due to its haunting music and rich imagery. Other important love-poems are: 'Vinavani' (Entreaty), 'Vanavasi' (Solitary), 'Tuje hat' (Your hands), 'Moladik bol' (Priceless words), 'Gharaci rasnay' (The grace of my house). The patriotic poems written before Goa's liberation express an inspiring optimism. In 'Navem yug' (The new age) he says: "Goans, we are seven lakh strong, we shall usher in a new age, the hymns that lie stifled will now burst into full-throated songs". In 'Dhavajac jagvan' (Rise: soon rise.) he pleads with the Indian Flag to come to Goa's rescue. In 'Sompli rat' (The night is over) he prophesies that war will soon come to an end and the weapons of destruction will be destroyed. 'Dhanv begin pavula' (Hearken to the call) is a fervent appeal to his brethren to come and help the mother land in the hour of her need. In 'Lhan jale mhan' (The small have become great) is a hymn in honour of the heroes who laid down their lives for the sake of freedom. 'Pavitr ho Mangalwar (This Tuesday is a holy day) has a special significance: it was composed and recited on 18 June 1946, the day when Lohia sounded the clarion call of the Goa freedom struggle. Among his philosophical poems, 'Dukh konak chukana' (Sorrow spares no one) illustrates the necessity and inevitability of sorrow from references to the puranas. 'Mhajem gorum charum' (Let my calf graze) is a mystic poem in which the calf symbolises man's aspiration for self knowledge. 'Prarthana' (Prayer) and 'Jagre Raghkurayakumvara' (Awake o son of Raghu) are translations from Tagore and Tulsidas respectively. In 'Tujya pamyar' (At your feet) the poet submits himself entirely to the will of God. In 'Bhupali' (Morning prayer) there are beautiful word-pictures of nature at dawn. There are a few poems with a domestic background like 'Calyachi arth' (How to keep a child happy), 'Anandacho dis' (The day of happiness). 'Jhanjalalo khal' (A feast at Jhanjal's) is a successful attempt at alliteration. 'Bhaubij' (The day of the brother) is a delightfully touching dialogue in which the moon (Chandra) offers himself as a brother to a lady who has no brother. Sanjivani is a verse-play based on the Kacha-Devayani episode. It illustrates the emptiness of life without love. Kacha lies dying pining for Devayani whose love he had spurned. First produced as radio-play, it has a number of lyrics with a variety of rhythmic patterns.

PAYYAN KATHAKAL (Malayalam), written by V.K.N, the eminent story-teller, consists mainly of five parts, each telling a series of stories (forty-five in all) in which the central figure, whether as an observer or as a participant, is Payyan and hence the title 'kathakal' (stories). All these stories were collected together and published in 1972 by the Sahitya Pravarthaka Cooperative Society, Kottayam.

The stories represent V.K.N's successful attempt to expose the contradictions found in our social life. They hold up to ridicule the contemporary urban life also with all its hypocrisy and double standards. Entirely free from the boredom of repetition and full of short and simple sentences, they are both interesting and instructive. The author looks upon the world with a sense of pungent humour. The most significant feature of the work is its satirical element; this is what makes it remarkable and not any coherence of plot or theme.

PAYYANNUR PATTU (Malayalam) is the earliest Malayalam work known. Hermann Gundert, while engaged in missionary work in the Cannanore area, discovered this folk song in a palm-leaf bundle belonging to a friend of his at Taliparamba in 1834. The leaves were then in a soiled condition. Though Gundert tried hard he could not get the full text of the song, and therefore only the few lines transcribed by him are available now. Gundert regarded the work as valuable because of its antiquity and literary merit. His article on Payyannur pattu first appeared in the Madras Journal in 1844, which said that the copy discovered by him had only 104 lines. He has appended sixteen lines of the song to the article with meaning in English under the sub-heading 'Legend of Payyannur'.

According to Gundert, it does not belong to the Tamil-dominated songs or to the Manipravala style, and it is not influenced by either. Its language resembles that of the Vatakkan pattukal (Ballads of North Malabar). Gundert assigns the work to the twelfth century. P. Govinda Pillai, Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer and Elamkulam Kunjan Pillai, historians of Malayalam literature, assign it to a date earlier than Ramacharitam, the long metrical composition which belongs to the close of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century.

The story told in the song is very simple. Nilakesi Chettichhi of Peroor had several husbands, but did not have a child. She became an ascetic and after several days' journey arrived at Kachhil. There a merchant Nampuchetty married her and begot a son. His name was Nampusari Aran. On the forty-first day of his birth there was a feast at Payyannur. Nilakesi's brothers came there quite unexpectedly. A fight broke out in which her brothers died. On hearing this news, she went away leaving her husband and child. When Nampusari Aran grew up, he set out on a ship with some merchandise. People like Pandyar, Jonakar, Chozhiyar, and even a Greek were on board the ship. The ship passing through Ezhimala, Poompattanam, Maldipa, Tamraparni and Poovalkapattanam reached Ponmala. Nampusari sold out the merchandise and returned to Kachhil with enough gold. One day a female ascetic came and requested him to go to Payyannur to participate in a feast to be conducted by women. The rest of the story is not available.

Gundert has quoted sixteen lines from Payyannur pattu as an example of 'puranabhasha' and has made 195 references in his Malayalam-English Dictionary and Malayala bhasha vyakaranam. The style of the language used in the song is evident in the following lines:

Nalar kutikku chernorekkondar
Nattile pattina swami makkal
Thozhar pathinalum vankiriyam
Tholppippanillayi nattilarum.

The song contains a number of hints about the social and economic life of Kerala during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, particularly about sea-voyage, shipbuilding and other maritime activities. In Logan's Malabar Manual the title of the song is given as Payyannur pattola.

PEDDANA, ALLASANI (Telugu). Peddana was the foremost of the Astadiggaja poets, who adorned the court of Krishnadevaraya of Vijayangar. It is said that he was born in village Dorala in Dupadu Paragana, near Bellary, and died three years after the death of his patron. His father's name was Chokkanamatya. He was a Nandavarika Niyogi Brahmin. Though he was a follower of Advaita in the beginning, he adopted Vaishnavism at the age of about fifteen, perhaps on account of the influence of his Guru, Sathakopayati, by whose grace he could obtain proficiency in four types of poetry. Peddana might have entered the court of Krishnadevaraya in 1510. Peddana wrote Swarochisa manusambhava, briefly called Manucharitra and dedicated it to Krishnadevaraya. Harikathasara is his second poem which is not available in full. From the few verses quoted by the rhetoricians, critics opine that the stories of the twenty-one Avatars of Lord Vishnu might have been narrated in it. It is believed that he wrote some works in Sanskrit also, but even their names are not known. Kavali Venkata Ramaswami mentions that Peddana wrote two other works entitled Ramastavarajamu and Advaita siddhantamu but they are not available. His only available work, Manucharitra, is considered to be the first and one of the best prabandhas in Telugu.

Emperor Krishnadevaraya showed great respect for Peddana and not only gave him the title 'Andhra Kavitapitamaha' but also granted many agraharas to him. The verse composed by Peddana at the time of the death of the emperor displays how much he was attached to him and with what great respect the emperor treated him. The meaning of the verse is given below:

> When he met me on the way he got down from the elephant and made me sit on it giving me the support of his hand. When I was taken in a procession at the time of the dedication of Manucharitra, he lifted the palanquin with his own hands, and himself placed the Gandapendera at my feet which is a sign of great eminence, saying, "You alone deserve it." He gave me many agraharas, kokata, etc, in the regions I asked for; he used to call me Andhra Kavitapitamaha, Allasani Peddana, the Lord of poets. Not being able to go to heaven along with such a beloved Emperor, Krishnadevaraya, I still survive like a living corpse.

Once the emperor placed a golden Gandapendera in a plate and announced that any poet who could compose poetry extempore both in Telugu and in Sanskrit might take it. Peddana stood up and gave an 'utpalamalika' (a metre) containing thirty lines, half of which was in idiomatic and sweet Telugu words and the other half in high sounding Sanskrit compounds, describing the characteristic features of good poetry. It is on this occasion that the emperor, who was enraptured by his poetic excellence and scholarship, personally adorned his ankle with the invaluable ornament in an assembly of poets. Peddana was independent and composed poetry at his will and pleasure and not when anybody asked him to do so. When once the emperor requested him to write a work he replied.

> It is not possible for anybody to write works easily just because somebody asked him to do so, without having a silent solitary place, karpura and tambula (betel leaves and camphor) brought by the maiden of the beloved, rich and tasty food, a cradle to swing, intelligent people knowing what is right and what is wrong, and scribes and readers capable of grasping the ideas.

Peddana's poetic style is sweet, flowing, and full of sentiments. There is no exaggeration in the well-known saying, 'Allasanivani allika jigibigi' (the composition of Allasani Peddana is compact and charming). He is second only to the Kavitraya in the galaxy of Telugu poets. Though the characteristic features of the prabandha are found here and there in the previous poets, it is Peddana who gave it a complete and charming form and made it extremely popular.

PEDNEKAR, HIRABAI (Marathi; b. 1885, d. 1951) is famous as a pioneering woman dramatist of Maharashtra. She was born at Savantawadi, Maharashtra, in a family of artists.

Hirabai had her formal education up to the 7th class after which she engaged a private tutor to have her lessons in literature. She soon acquired proficiency in the Marathi language and literature and a working knowledge of Bengali, Hindi and English.

Singing, dancing and thus entertaining men was the profession of her community. Hirabai adopted the family profession to earn her livelihood. She was a very good singer and soon attracted a number of prominent poets, novelists and dramatists who began to visit her house frequently. Some of them composed poems on her, and one famous dramatist even modelled the heroines of his musical plays on her.

Hirabai also started composing poems, some of which were published in the prominent Marathi journals like Manoranjan and Udyan. Her humorous short story, 'Maze atma charitra' (My autobiography), published in the magazine, Udyan, was also highly acclaimed.

However, she is mainly known as a dramatist. Her first play, Jayadratha vidamabana, was published in the year 1904. It was an amateurish attempt at play writing, but her poetic compositions incorporated in this musical play were highly appreciated by the critics. Encouraged by this moderate success, she wrote her second play, Damini, which was published in the year 1912. The play was staged by the famous Lalitakaldarash Company of Keshavrao Bhosale. It was a kind of social-musical play with a very complicated plot, poetic dialogues and enchanting musical composition. This made her the first Marathi woman dramatist whose play was staged by a prominent dramatic company.

The literary history created by Hirabai did not end with her death. On the contrary, she became the focus of literary interest even after her death. The well-known writer, M.L. Varadpande, wrote a unique book in Marathi called Kolhatkar ani Hirabai. It was based on her relationship with the noted litterateur, Shripad Krishna Kolhatkar. Varadpande tried to explain how their friendship influenced their respective writings. This book created a controversy in the literary circles in Maharashtra and paved the way for frank biographical and autobiographical writings. A play was also written on a similar theme.

It was really creditable for Hirabai, a woman from a downtrodden community engaged in the business of entertainment, to be able to become a writer of some significance and inspire those around her. It may also be noted that many prominent Marathi dramatists including Kolhatkar and Gadakari took help from Hirabai in composing music for some of their compositions included in their plays. One can say that in this way Hirabai influenced the Marathi stage-music to some extent.

PEN PORTRAITS (Dogri). The earliest specimens of pen portraits in Dogri are to be found in two collections of essays published in the late 1960s, entitled Kandyari de phull (1968) by Lakshmi Narayan and Syaharan (1968) by Shakti Sharma. The pen pictures of Hotelwalah Shahji, the indecisive, wavering character of Jakko-Takke and Tarunand in the former and Channu in the latter are couched in subtle homour, and uncover different human foibles. A few essays of this type appeared thereafter in the Dogri literary journal Shiraza, and some of these, like Nilambar Dev Sharma's 'Tarunand' (different from Lakshmi Narayan's with the same title mentioned earlier), and Jitendra Sharma's 'Sher Singh Banaam Panjuram' have been published by the Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy under the title Din din jot soai (1980). The latest publication devoted exclusively to pen portraits is Champa Sharma's Goorhe dhundale chehre (1988). It contains sixteen sketches, of both female and male characters, drawn from close and empathetic observation of lower middle-class society peopled by old widows, teachers, retired servicemen, petty traders, shopkeepers and officials, in chaste and richly textured Dogri.

PEN PORTRAITS (Gujarati). Narsimharao Divetia's Smaran mukur (1926) is the first collection of the pen portraits of author's contemporaries, such as Anandshanker Dhruva, Ramkrishna Bhandarkar, and others. The pen portraits besides giving sketches of personalities also give a glimpse of the social life of the age.

Apnan sakshar ratno (1934-35) by Nanalal Kavi portrays the literary figures of Gujarati, such as Mirabai, Manishanker Bhatt (Kant), Keshavlal Dhruv, Narmad, Dayaram, Premananda and Dalpatram. These portraits had their origin in lectures delivered by the author either at the birth or at the death anniversaries of the writers. In Lilavati Munshi's Rekhachitro (1935) one finds fully developed pen-portraits. She is unbiased and therefore presents the portrayals objectively. In Kimiagaro (1935) by Yashodhar Mehta pen-pictures of persons from different regions and different fields have been presented in a fascinating style. The personalities include Hitler and Lenin, the Muslim woman saint Rabia of Basara, Netaji Subash Chandra Bose, Sarojini Naidu and Dayananda Saraswati. The author has also impartially shown the minus points of the persons portrayed. Ishwar Petlikar's Dhupsalio (1953) is a fine specimen of pen portraits of some persons, closely known to him, or of persons interviewed by him. The persons portrayed include G.V. Mavlankar, Ravishanker Maharaj, Sant Santbal and Nanabhai. Their journalistic flavour enhances the quality of the pictures. Umashankar Joshi's Hradayman padeli chhabio (1977) and Isamu shida ane anya (1986) present vivid pen pictures of great men who have made significant contribution to the cultural development of the country. Some of them are Pandit Ravishankar, Pandit Omkarnath, Harindranath Chattopadhyaya, Rabindranath Tagore, Sarojini Naidu, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, S. Radhakrishnan, Aurobindo, Ramakrishna Paramhansa, Tolstoy, Sunitikumar Chatterjee, Kakasaheb Kalelkar. Mohanlal Mehta's Vibhuti vandena is a tribute to great men, and are in a way profiles of their lives and achievements. Raghuvir Chaudhary's Saharani bhavyata (1980) depicts the traits of some prominent writers, and here with the sketches we have the author's comments also. Ramanlal Joshi's Sabdalokna yatrio (1983) offers pen-pictures of writers who have made their mark on the literary scene. Joshi has not only drawn pen-pictures but has also given all relevant information which might serve as a reference book for research scholars. It is the only book of its kind in Gujarati. Vinod Bhatt's Vinodni nagare (1979) has sketches drawn by a renowned humorist of Gujarati showing the lighter side of literary artists.

PEN PORTRAITS (Hindi). Comparatively a new genre, a pen-portrait combines the traits of 'rekhachitra' (sketch) and 'sansamarana' (memoir). In theory scholars have drawn a dividing line between the two, but in practice we find an amalgamation of them. Most of the so-called rekhachitras in Hindi are based on a writer's memories of the past contacts with a person or persons who have left an indelible impression on his mind. The titles of certain books bear testimony to this. Jagdishchandra Mathur's book, Das tasviren, which he proclaims to be a collection of pen-portraits, is about eminent persons who were closely associated with him. While drawing their sketches he not only recalls various happenings, experiences and instant reactions but also gives full vent to his feelings of admiration and reverence towards them. This makes the sketches subjective. On the other hand, the titles of Mahadevi Verma's books Smriti ki rekhaen and Atit ke chalchitra indicate that they are not merely collections of sketches but are based on the memories of persons, events and experiences deeply ingrained in her subconscious.

Two esteemed journals Hansa and Madhukar played an important role in encouraging Hindi writers to write pen-portraits. Amrit Rai edited the special issue of Hansa in March 1939 which contained pen-portraits not only of Hindi writers but also of those writing in other Indian languages, such as Bengali, Gujarati, Tamil and Telugu. Seven years later a special issue of Madhukar was brought out by Banarsidas Chaturvedi, which gave the Hindi world a rich collection of pen-portraits. In the preface to the journal, the editor even dwelt on the theory of pen-portraiture and expounded its literary elements.

It was only in the post-Chhayavad period that this genre reached its maturity and look long strides. Banarsidas Chaturvedi himself wrote more than a hundred pen-portraits, later collected in Hamare aradhya (1952), Rekha-chitra (1952) and Setu-bandha. Taking A.G.Gardiner as his model, he chose eminent Indian and foreign journalists, litterateurs, social workers, revolutionaries, politicians and even poor rural folk as his subjects for portrayal. He shows great human warmth and understanding in his pen portraits. His language is simple, and a touch of humour makes his pictures lively. At places they are surcharged with national fervour, moral values and love for Indian culture. They, however, lack brevity and compactness because at times he resorts to the style of a biographer and starts recounting details.

A staunch freedom fighter and a journalist of leftist leanings, Ramavriksha 'Benipuri' has been acclaimed as the best writer of pen-portraits of his time. His portraits are noted for their artistic quality and are drawn with rare skill and delicacy. The author has himself called his portraits snap-shots and miniature carvings on ivory. His collection, Lal tara (1938), is an art gallery of the pen-portraits of the revolutionaries of his age fighting against British imperialism. Mati ki murten (1946), written in a cell of the Hazaribagh Central Jail, on the other hand, presents portraits of the simple rural folk who for their simplicity, piety and honesty were long imprinted in the author's subconscious. Gehun aur gulab, noted for its poetic qualities, offers delicately framed portraits surcharged with emotion. The flow of language is akin to a rivulet dancing through a blossoming valley. His prose style varies with theme and mood, sometimes eloquent and impassioned, sometimes plain and homely. These pen-portraits, indeed, combine drama, memoirs and narration.

Essentially a poet, Mahadevi Verma is known as a sketch-writer for her four collections of pen-portraits—Atit ke chalchitra (1941), Smriti ki rekhaen, Path ke sathi (1956) and Mera parivar (1970). They are not pure pen-portraits but a mixture of sketches and reminiscences. She has herself termed them as 'Sansmarnatmak rekhachitra'. They are different from other Hindi writings of this category both in content and in technique. While others have chosen eminent persons from various fields of life for portryal, Mahadevi's focus is on the simple, poor and neglected people, specially the women exploited for ages by the man-dominated society. A poet, a painter, an orator and a selfless social worker, she has penned these sketches revealing several facets of her personality. Her portraits have the pictorial quality of a painter, the artistic imagery of a romantic poet, and the eloquence of an orator. Her book Mera parivar is unique in the sense that here the subjects of portrayal are not men and women but pet animals and birds which receive from her the same amount of sympathy and sensitiveness as human beings do. With their clear outlines, soft colours, pictorial prose and smooth style, Mahadevi's pen-portraits have a peculiar emotive appeal.

Mera parivar reminds us of another Hindi writer, Shriram Sharma, who, unlike Mahadevi Verma, writes about his experiences of jungle life and hunting adventures. He has given us in his books Pranon ka sauda (1939) and Jungle ke jiv (1949) life-size sketches of animals in brilliant colours which have the ability of transporting the reader to the very heart of the jungle and enabling him to experience the heart-throbbing, tantalizing moments of encounters with death in the form of lions, tigers, elephants, and even ants. His other two collections, Bolti pratima (1937) and Ve jite kaisai hain (1957), narrate in pictorial style the sufferings and agonies of the poor rural folk and tribal people. His language studded with regional words, idioms and usages, and his style of a folk-narrator make these sketches all the more engaging.

Another pioneer in the field is Kanhaiyalal Mishra 'Prabhakar' who devoted himself totally to the writing of pen-portraits, reminiscences and reportage. His Mati ho gayi sona (1959) provides some fine pen-pictures of the great sons of India both ancient and modern. In another work Dip jale shankh baje (1959) he delineates the common, insignificant, day-to-day events of life in the form of sketches. All his pen-pictures are coloured by deep emotion. Perceptive analysis of human character, simple language, unity of effect and pithy style mark his pen-portraits.

Another writer of significance was Vinayamohan Sharma who in his Rekhaen aur rang gives us some vivid pen-portraits. Besides, he discusses the theory of the genre in the introduction to his collection. He emphasizes five points: keen observation, use of pen as a camera, selection of relevant events and deeds which throw light on the personality of the subject, discreet use of imagination, and pictorial language. His own pen-portraits reveal a happy blend of these elements.

A.G. Gardiner, noted for his pen-portraits in English, has inspired at least two Hindi writers working in this field—Prakashchandra Gupta and Jagdishchandra Mathur, both scholars of English literature. Unlike many other writers they strictly adhere to the technique of pure pen-portrait. Jagdishchandra Mathur calls his Das tasviren (1971) a collection of Charit lekh, a mixture of biography and pen-portrait. Mathur, while discharging his official duties, came into contact with people of various hues - administrators, artists, actors, musicians, folk-dancers. As a student he had come into personal contact with his mentor, Amarnath Jha (Vice-chancellor of Allahabad University) and Shriram Sharma, a pioneer of the Indian Scout Movement in India. His Das tasviren includes portraits of such personalities. In them we find the exposition of the subject's life-story along with an analysis—and not a description—of the inner qualities of the hero. These are portraits of individuals which show both subjectivity and objectivity, and their language is chaste. Prakashchandra Gupta too concentrates on the subject, is brief and to the point. Besides living persons, he has chosen places and inanimate objects too as his subjects and has portrayed them with skill and delicacy. His collections are Rekha-chitra, Sketch and Nai sketch.

Other major writers, who have contributed to the development of the genre, are Satyavati Mallick, Seth Govind Das, Mahendra Bhatnagar, Sachchidanand Vatsyayan 'Agyeya', Nagendra, Satya Jiwan Verma, Kshemchandra 'Suman', Vishnu Prabhakar, Yashpal and Upendranath 'Ashk'.

Thus pen-portraits in Hindi have taken a long stride in a short period, but still it suffers from certain shortcomings. A good many writers fall back on their past memories and narrate the incidents at length, losing sense of proportion. Some of them even suffer from the malady of hero-worship, showering all encomium on the subject. Yet, in spite of these deficiencies, many of them are by and large fine literary pieces.

S.S.G.

PEN PORTRAITS (Kannada) as a literary genre have been in vogue in Kannada literature for not more than half a century, although 'Jeevana charitre' or biography is as old as Rev. Kittel's Jesus Christ (1850) and M.S. Puttanna's Kunigal Ramasastrigala charitre (1910). Surprisingly Pampa, the first Kannada poet whose work is extant, has left a pen-portrait of himself. Like biography the pen-portrait is also a branch of history and sets out to depict truthfully the life and achievements of an individual. But it is less ambitious in that it chooses to paint on a much smaller canvas portraits that are mere profiles and vignettes and not life-size pictures. They are meant to draw our attention to some significant aspect of the personality of the individual and to arouse interest in the 'human being' behind the portrait. As D.V. Gundappa puts it, they are figurettes dug out of one's memory, of men and women who, though not necessarily great, were greatly good and spread sweetness and light among people around them. Siddavvanahalli Krishnasharma's 'Kannada kidigalu', 'Deepa male' and 'Kuladeepakaru' are delightful sketches of some Kannada men of letters. His 'Vardha yatra'and 'Parna-kuti' are travelogues, but they evoke memorable pictures of Gandhiji, Kasturba, Sardar Patel, Rajaji and others. There is nothing tentative or vague in Siddavvanahalli's portrait-drawing as they are infused with an honesty of purpose, an honesty as transparent as his impeccable prose style. His short, crisp and picturesque sentences delicately poised on not more than four or five words, often suggestively dropping even verbs, fill his canvas with richly human characters. The great composer and the grand old man of the Karnatak music, Mysory Vasudevacharya's 'Na kanda kalavidaru' and 'Nenapugalu' almost immortalized the form, apart from recreating an entire epoch of the ancient musical geniuses of South India. The Acharya's innate sense of humour and humanity, his respect for tradition and values and, above all, the catholicity of his outlook, have all combined to make these books classics of modern Kannada prose. Navaratna Ramarao's 'Kelavu nenapugalu' is also inspired by similar sensibilities and honesty of purpose. Although it is intended to be a memoir and a picture of the milieu and ethos of the world of Mysore Civil Service, it is also a veritable picture gallery. Masti's long-poem, 'Navaratri', and his autobiographical 'Bhava' also throw up a number of pen portraits. A.N. Moorthy Rao's Chitragalu-Patragalu brings to life again some of his teachers and friends of the yester years. D.V. Gundappa's eight volume Jnapaka chitrashale is a monumental work, at once truthful and devoted in its aim. He has written on a vast range of human beings, picking them from all classes and stations in life. They include the Dewans of old Mysore as well as the humblest of human beings whom he knew well and with whom he lived. He makes them live and speak again, and this he does with an impassioned self-effacement, a sincerity of admiration and sympathy, a sympathy which does not involve any eschewal of judgement, all of which revealing his own integrity as man and writer. B.G.L. Swamy's Panihakalasha gopevia contains portraits of five men who worked with dedication for the Kannada language and literature: B. Venkatanaranappa, B.M. Srikantaiah, A.R. Krishṇa Sastry, T.S. Venkannayya and V. Sitharamaiah. These are portraits drawn by a young man with wide open eyes which catch characteristic ways and gestures, a young man who can admire whatever is worthy but whose critical faculty and sense of amusement are alert. Karnataka has built up a tradition of presenting felicitation volumes to those who have rendered notable service, and some of these volumes abound in vivid pen portraits. Poets like Bendre, K.V. Puttappa, G.S. Shivarudrappa and Chunnaveera Kanavi have drawn fine portraits in sonnets.

perhaps inevitable in the absence of mature and active journalism in the language. Stray pieces written in the mid-twentieth century by writers like Kedranath Latha, Vishwanatha Jha, Parvendu Choudhari and Prem Shankar Singh are of course available. Surendra Jha 'Suman' has to his credit several pen portraits of young writers, which he had written as part of his introduction to their works, though he has not yet written any independent book of pen portraits of national or international figures.

Perhaps, the most notable writers in this form are Manipadma who has written a series of portraits entitled Hunaka-sa bhat bhat chhal (I had met them), and Hansaraj (b. 1936) whose two celebrated works Bisaral-bisaral (The nearly forgotten ones) and O je kahalani (What they said, 1971) are still read with interest and curiosity.

J.M.

PEN PORTRAITS (Malayalam) The word 'portrait' means 'the likeness of a real person' or 'a vivid description in words'. Both these meanings are implicit in the now popular term 'pen portrait', which has also come to signify something more. It is not a mere verbal picture of a person but a complex literary product of the writer's endeavour to present from his own point of view and within the compass of a few pages the overall individuality of a person. Often, it is written by one who is well acquainted with the subject.

Viewed in the light of the foregoing observations, pen portraits can hardly claim to have a long tradition in Malayalam literature. The very first to attempt it seems to have been the humorist E.V. Krishna Pillai (1894-1938). Assuming the pen-name Dvijendranath Tagore, he published a number of them, mostly in the magazine, Rasikan, around 1930. Not much later, M.R. Nair (Sanjayan), a contemporary veteran humorist (1903-43), also tried his hand at pen portraits.

A decade had to go by before Malayalam litterateurs realized the potentialities of pen portrait as a literary genre and addressed themselves to it seriously.

The first series of portraits to appear in book form was Vakkam Abdul Khader's (1912-1976) Tulika chitrangal (Pen-pictures, 1945). This deals with eight distinguished literary men, viz., A. Balakrishna Pillai, Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, G. Sankara Kurup, Vaikom Muhammad Bashir, Changapuzha Krishna Pillai, S.K. Pottekkatt, P. Kesava Dev and M.P. Paul. Those who knew these men personally have certified that the protraits are faithful representations. Chirtradarsini (1946), by the same author, presents nine other contemporaries, including Kuttikrishna Marar, Ponkunnam Varkey and Lalitambika Antarjanam. This book has also earned the approbation of discerning critics. In the same year there appeared another book of the same kind, Poya talamura (The past generation), in which its author, C. Narayana Pillai (1905-82), acquaints us with eight luminaries including C. V. Kunjiraman and A. Balakrishna Pillai.

The next work of the kind is Tulika chitrangal, of which the first edition, dealing with ten Keralites including Joseph Mundassery and two non-Keralites, came out in 1947. The author, P. Damodaran Pillai (1907-80), who wrote under the pen-name Julian, deserves praise for his penetrating observations on most of the characters portrayed. But the picture of Narayana Guru as one endowed with superhuman powers has drawn some adverse remarks. Likewise, his scathing attack on Mundassery can hardly be justified. Some of his opinions about others also cannot be accepted as true to facts. In the second edition (1967), Harindranath, one of the non-Keralites, was replaced by Kainikkara Padmanabha Pillai, and Mundassery by Soorand Kunjan Pillai. The author does full justice to Kainikkara but presents a highly distorted picture of Soorand.

Ponkunnam Varkey (b. 1910), the well-known short story writer, has also enriched this branch of literature with his Tulika chitrangal (1948). Unlike most other books of this kind, this one deals with political leaders who were the author's colleagues.

We have got two collections of pen-portraits from Vallathol Vasudeva Menon (1916-68), Rangamandapam (1949) and Mararum koottarum (Marar and his associates, 1957). To the eight literary figures depicted in the first are added four more in the latter, the second part of which is made up of five critical evaluations. Together they deal with twelve personalities including such stalwarts as Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, Ulloor Parameswara Iyer and S.K. Pottekkatt. Vasudeva Menon's style is marked by sympathy, clarity and gentleness. Puthezhathu Raman Menon's Man maranjaver (Those who are no more, 1955) presents a gallery of portraits of eighteen men distinguished in various fields. Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran, K.C. Narayanan Nampyar and Nalappat Narayana Menon are among the literary men figuring in the book. What we see in it is the dexterous play of the author's skilled pen.

Perhaps the best known and most prolific writer of portraits is Tattapuram Sukumaran (b. 1922) with Pattu kathakaranmar (Ten story writers, 1953), Pattu kavikal (Ten poets, 1956) and Pattu gadyakaranmar (Ten prose-writers, 1962) to his credit. Each of the thirty portraits is the product of the author's direct observation of the concerned person combined with a close study of his literary contributions. As a result, the picture presented has an individuality and completeness all its own.

Njan kanta sahityakaranmar (The writers I knew, 1949) is a collection of thirteen portraits written by the famous critic and writer, S.K. Nair (1917-89). It is marked by the author's sense of balance, unassuming attitude and elegant style.

Sukumaran Pottekkatt (b. 1926) is the author of Vyaktimukdrakal (Imprints of individuals) which differs from others of the type in that it deals with Indian statesmen of national reputation including two Keralites, K.M. Panikker and John Mathai. The writers have succeeded in presenting them imaginatively.

There are a number of other collections published by well-known and not so well-known writers. These too have led to the overall enrichment of this literary branch in Malayalam. M.C. Govindan's (1896-1965) Mukhaparichayam, V.R. Parameshwaran Pillai's (b. 1904) Madhgurasmaranakal, K.R. Bhaskaran's (b. 1906) Janakiya mantrimar, Matassery Madhava Varier's (b. 1910) Ezhuthukarum ezhumthukarum, M.O. Joseph's (b. 1911) Bhasha premikal (5 volumes), Venni Vasu Pillai's (b. 1911) Parichayam putukkuka, M.P. Appan's (b. 1913) Smaranopaharam, T.K.C. Vadutala's (b. 1921) Vyaktimahamyam, K.C. Peter's (b. 1922) Pattu pratibhashalikal, Pavanan's (b. 1926) Parichayam, C.P. Sreedharan's (b. 1931) Sahityajivitam, Erumeli Parameswaran Pillai's (1932) Keralattile ezhuthukar (2 vols), Velayudhan Panikkassery's (b. 1934) Karur mutal kovilan vare, A.N.E. Suvarna Valli's (b. 1935) Jivikkunna sahityakaranmar (7 vols), Karuvannoor Ramachandran's (b. 1937) Jivitam planyamakkiyavar and Sadanandan Viruppukala's Padamudrakal are some of the collections.

Encouraged by the popularity enjoyed by the pen portraits, one of the leading publishers included in the recently (1978) brought out works of E.V. Krishna Pillai his portraits which had till then been lying buried in the periodical Rasikan. The very first portrait is of himself as a short story writer. The remaining sixteen are concerned with advocates, judges, journalists, doctors, educationists and men of letters, who commanded respect and wielded influence in the social circles of the day. The portraits are no doubt brilliantly drawn but can hardly be said to be unprejudiced or objective. Yet they can be read with interest and detachment at this distance of time with neither the author nor the subjects alive today to repent or protest.

Worthy of note here are just two more collections, both by eminent teachers of English and brought out in book form in very recent years: Kainikkara Kumara Pillai's (b. 1900) Avishmaraniyar (The unforgettable, 1984) and K.Sreenivasan's Margarashmikal (Guiding lights on the way, 1987). Kumara Pillai dwells on fourteen personalities, some his colleagues and all his contemporaries, with a warmth of feeling and openness of mind seldom seen among present-day writers. With occasional personal touches and autobiographical anecdotes and with their lucid yet succinct style, the protraits are highly readable. His accounts of C.V. Kunjiraman, Pattom Thanu Pillai and E.V. Krishna Pillai are particularly interesting. He does not attempt to portray the subjects fully but puts their salient traits in bold relief.

Margarasmikal also covers fifteen luminaries, with most of whom the author was well acquainted. Except two or three, no one is a well-known man of letters and only the last six are alive today. Though the author purports the book to be a collection of biographical notes, the content does not fully justify it. He is interested, and rightly so in such a book, in delineating the character and personality of each individual, including sometimes even the physical appearance. Further, the portraits are objective studies bringing out the strength and creativeness of the concerned persons and providing suggestive hints about the rivalries in contemporary society in a part of Kerala during the past four or five decades. The portraits of C.S. Venkateswaran, C. Kesavan and K.Damodaran are particularly remarkable.

It may be pointed out in conclusion that the pen-portait as a branch of prose has come to stay in Malayalam literature. Its number and variety are sure to multiply hereafter, especially in view of the fact that some periodicals have already a column reserved for it.

K.S.N.

PEN PORTRAITS (Marathi). The minor literary genre called pen-portraits has been described in various ways and has undergone changes in course of time. Terms like verbal picture, psychological portrait and character-sketch have been used to describe this genre. Of these terms, character-sketch (vyakti-chitra) has won general acceptance today in Marathi criticism.

A salient feature of this genre is that it is closer to the story. Also, the sketches themselves, which form the subject of the genre, are based on the author's experiences of real people either from the past or the present, either eminent or common. A human portrait created wholly out of the author's imagination is not termed as character-sketch. In its early stage, character-sketch in Marathi aimed at the effective portrayal of personality features or psychological characteristics. In its later stage development, however, authors started giving as much importance to the portrayal of life as to the portrayal of character itself. With this, naturally, the form moved closer to the short story.

The credit for beginning the tradition of writing pen-portaraits or character-sketches in Marathi goes to Raghuvir Samant whose pseudonym was Kumar Raghuvir. Hridaya (1932) is a collection of his character-sketches. These have the power of creating pathos in the reader's mind. The first major book in this tradition, beginning with Raghuvir, was V.D. Ghate's Kahin mhatare va ek mhatari (1939) which created quite a stir. Character-sketches included in this book are of old people, most of whom have won recognition in different fields of life. These portraits are characterised by Ghate's deep understanding of people, coupled with mastery of language and sophistication of temperament. With these qualities, the book was highly successful. Ghate's second book, entitled Pandhare kes, hirawi mane (1959), also deals with old people and is equally good. As though in imitation of V.D. Ghate, Kamalabai Deshpande based her pen-portraits in Hasara nirmalya (1944) on old women. Another example in this tradition of character-sketch is seen in Tarabai Modak's Bichari balake (1945) which describes the plight of unfortunate children. In his two books, entitled Griha ratne and Navi griharatne, Gopinath Talwalkar describes the different aspects of child psychology. S.N. Pendse, who later became a major novelist, began his literary career by writing character-sketches included in the book Khadakavaril hirval (1939).

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It was, however Vyankatesh Madgulkar who with his Mandeshi manase (1947) gave an entirely new turn to this tradition of the genre and raised it to the level of artistic stature. By portraying rural characters living a life of extreme hardship and poverty, Madgulkar also brought into focus their rural environment, and thus raised the genre of character-sketch to the status of the short-story. Following Madgulkar, Anand Yadav also wrote some excellent character-sketches in his Matikhalchi mati (1965). A major turn in this tradition came with P.L.Deshpande's Vyakti ani valli (1962). In this book, Deshpande, using his power of keen observation, depicted different types of human behaviour combining humour and pathos. This book won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1965. We find very fine character-sketches of his friends, relatives and eminent personalities in various fields of life in Deshpande's other two books, Ganagot (1966) and Gun gain awad (1975). Some other good examples of this literary form are Kokani ga vasti (1961) and Abir-gulal (1990) by Madhu Mangesh Karnik and Chehare mohre (1969) by Madhukar Keche.

G.M.P.

PEN PORTRAITS (Punjabi). This form of prose can be traced back to the writings of Gurbakhsh Singh who, in his Merian abhul yadan (My unforgettable reminiscences, 1947), delineates the character-sketches of 'Meri dadi' or Nani 'Lehla', or to the writings of Harinder Singh Rup as in Rup rekha (Outlines of beauty) under the heading 'Bebe', 'Lahori ustad', 'Nikashi da chatrik', 'Babu Ferozedin Sharaf', 'Giani Sant Singh', 'Chitrakar Nicholas Roerich' or in his book Rup rijan, under the heading 'Mubarak Singh', 'Prof. Gurbachan Singh', etc., but as a separate form of prose-writing it was established only in 1960, when Balwant Gargi published his book Nim de patte (Leaves of melia azedirach) in which he gave pen portraits of his contemporary writers, including his own. He followed it in two more collections, entitled Surme wali akh (The eye with kohl) and Kaudian wala sapp (The chequered serpent). He has written in dramatic irony which at times becomes a powerful satire. He has the courage to express frankly and with an emotional touch his feelings about his subject although sometimes he overplays his feelings and his character-sketches become caricatures. Kulbir Singh Kang is another writer of pen-portraits of which he has published three collections, Badlan de rang (The colour of clouds, 1966), Pathar likan (Lines on stone, 1975) and Pakkian ittan (Burnt bricks) in which he has given about two scores of portraits of his contemporary writers. Kang takes a balanced view and is somewhat more objective than Balwant Gargi.

Mohanjit Singh has given similar portraits in verse of Sant Singh Sekhon. Jit Singh Sital is another pen-portrait writer who has collected 22 such portraits in his Mitter Asade Saei (They are our friends). Sital's diction is poetic and at places the use of ornamental language throws his subject out of focus. Collection of twenty-three such profiles by Bhagwant Singh in his book Shanakhti parad (The identification parade) is another specimen of this form of prose-writing. He has a rather subjective way of treating his contemporaries, going into the dark recesses of his subject's mind and character. Kalam di akh (1969) is yet another such book by Karanjit Singh, although he calls this book a collection of his interviews with different writers. Though introduced pretty late in Punjabi prose, this form is becoming popular and has a bright future. At present it is confined to contemporary writers only.

Gu.S.

PEN PORTRAITS (Tamil). All major literatures excel in chracterisation. In Tamil, great works like Silappadikaram and the Ramayanam present carefully-drawn portraits of the main characters which continue to get embellished as the story unfolds itself through thousands of lines, canto after canto. Poets like Ilango and Kamban, gifted with a sense of proportion, find that they can allot only a few lines to the lesser characters; but this does not hamper their art as they are able to present the chief features of their personality in a few deft lines like a cartoonist. The portraits of Kaundi Adikal and the Pandyan king in Silappadikaram and those of Sumantiran Guhan and Kumbakaranan in the Ramayanam convey to us the, relevant traits of their character. For example, Kamban's portraiture of Kumbakarnan done in a few stanzas is excellent. Kumbakarnan feels that Ravana made a major mistake, a most regrettable moral transgression in having abducted Sita, a married woman; here he is at one with Vibhishana. But while the latter advocated the return of Sita to Rama, Kumbakarna, in tune with his spirited temperament, feels that returning Sita to Rama would bring the Rakshasa clan to ridicule. So, unflinchingly, he counsels Ravana and the rest of the clan, including himself, to go to war. He knows the Rakshasas will get defeated and he says that is the appropriate end for such transgressors. He goes to war and works havoc in Rama's ranks till he gets killed, blessing Vibhishana with all the fervour of his generous personality to ascend Lanka's throne with Rama's help and rule the country wisely, in accord with the moral law.

The tradition of presenting vivid pen portraits in literary works continued through the long centuries when minor prabandhas were composed. In Tootu works like the Virali vidu tootu and Kuravanchi pieces like the Kurralak kuravanchi, we get very picturesque vignettes of the lesser characters done very adroitly by master craftsmen who had to work on a very limited canvas unlike the epic poets.

But the pen portrait as a separate genre has had a phenomenal development only in the prose literature of this century. Only one or two relevant facets of a man's personality usually figure in a pen portrait. It is a separate literary unit (an essay on that personality). Then the author takes great care to present the foremost characteristic of the person for which he is generally known and remembered. The authors of typical pen portraits strive their utmost to focus on the most characteristic features of the personality they present. These they attempt to bring out in the most vivid manner, often with the aid of humour.

There have been good pen portraits in the past epic literature and the minor prababdha works. But the real examples of this genre were stimulated by the exciting cultural influence of the west. Subramania Bharati himself wrote a number of short poems on the greatest men and women of his time like Mahatma Gandhi, Swami Abhedananda, Sister Nivedita, Mr. Winch, V.O. Chidambaram Pillai, Dadabhai Nauroji, Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Lala Lajpat Rai and U.V. Swaminatha Iyer; though lacking in humour, these verse vignettes evoke the chief characteristics of these notable personalities through the fiery poetic power of their author and his utter sincerity.

Two writers stand out as creators of memorable pen-portraits in Tamil. U.V. Swaminatha Iyer, a great scholar in classical Tamil literature who also edited the Sangam works, reveals a native capacity to observe closely and record faithfully and brightly, the most interesting characteristics of the people with whom he came into contact in his long and eventful life. From his fluent pen have taken vivid shape men from such diverse fields as the pontiffs of the Tamil Shaiva mutts, Tamil scholars like Mahavidvan Meenakashisundram Pillai, Vidvan Tyagarasa Chettiar, Mayuram Vedanayakam Pillai and C.Vai.Damodam Pillai, academicians like Gopal Rao, relatives like his father-in-law and his father's uncle who was supported by his father all his life and the many patrons who helped him at various points in his life. An interesting portrait is that of the college peon, the archetype of all peons employed all over the country.

Swaminatha Iyer has written somewhat detailed biographical sketches of great musicans like Ghanam Krishna Iyer and Sankarabharanam Narasa Iyer. Through the latter work we gain a vivid, true-to-life image of a highly talented but penurious musician. Iyer tells how, in order to celebrate the wedding of his daughter, he approaches one of the rich land-holders of the Cauvery basin for a loan. The rich man demands a surety but the poor artiste had no asset to pledge; he says, 'I have nothing but my art; the raga Sankarabharanam is my only asset. 'The rich man, perhaps in a light vein, suggests that the musician pledge the raga Sankarabharanam. The poor musician agrees, takes the money and performs his daugher's wedding with it. The story goes on, with the musician stopping the recital of the raga in his concerts. When invited to conduct a concert at the wedding celebrations in the house of a rich man of Kumbakonam, he refuses to sing the raga, and the story of the pledge is revealed. The host himself offers him the money to pay off his debt and the musician once again sings the raga. Iyer tells this amusing story with vividness and gusto making it unforgettable as a pen-portrait.

Another writer, very gifted at presenting pen-portraits, is Namakkal Ramalingam Pillai. He is known widely as a nationalist poet; but he was truly versatile, having composed a novel and several readable essays and a great autobiography; he could paint, too, with distinction. It is in his autobiography that a large number of excellent pen-portraits are found. He describes his father in so graphic a manner that the image of an old time policeman, very sincere in the discharge of his duties, very correct in his deportment, and out of duty a warm pater familias, gets fixed in the minds of the readers. He has a heart-warming vignette of an English official who commissioned the poet to paint the portrait of his deceased child and who paid him very much more than the amount contracted for.

But his portrait of a most resourceful government official, one Mr. Naicker, is the best in this book of excellences. He describes the many situations out of which he emerges unscathed, entirely through his audacity and presence of mind. Pillai tells the story with great gusto and realism and the scene where an inimical atmosphere was converted into a very friendly one entirely through the resourcefulness of a person gets impressed on the readers' minds indelibly.

Apart from these two, Kalki (the pseudonym under which R. Krishnamurthy published much of his work) possessed a great flair for presenting pen-portraits. And, as he was editing a popular weekly, there arose many occasions where politicians, economists, leaders of public opinion, social workers, bureaucrats, artistes had to be discussed either in a favourable light or (more often) otherwise. He was capable of bringing out the most characteristic features of a person in the shortest passage of only a few words in the most effective manner. He was particularly harsh on Indians who tried to please the Biritish imperialists sycophantically.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kalki, writing under the other pseudonym. Karnatakam, produced a number of memorable vignettes on the musicians of the day. Another writer L.R.V. wrote a whole book of such vignettes, interviewing musicians, and listening to their concerts. His is not technical music criticism, his are in reality a journalist's pen-portraits, well executed, with a dash of humour. In his work he has included pen-portraits of musicians of long ago like Uthukkadu Venkatasubbiar; he has collected material for these from books and oral tradition. Su. Ra. has written a book of pen-portraits on the musical geniuses of the twentieth century. Neelam has painted portraits of nine musicians under the title Sangita navamanikal.

There are very readable vignettes showing the specific characteristics of great leaders of men like Lenin and Gandhi, men dedicated to social service like Albert Schweitzer, adventurers like Columbus and Robert Clive, Captains of industry like J.N. Tata, G.D. Naidu and N. Mahalingam, and scientists like Sir Isaac Newton and Sir C.V. Raman. On Bharati and Kamaraj there are quite a number of readable books, as also on Annadurai and Bharatidasan. The works of biographical flavour written from an entirely fresh angle on Gautam Buddha and Manikka Vachakar by Sivapadasundaram are outstanding examples of this genre.

A.V.S.

PEN PORTRAITS (Telugu). The word pen-portrait is a metaphorical extension from the field of painting into that of literature. Obviously the word should mean a quick, seemingly careless, but deft, brief sketch of a person bringing out a particular lively aspect of the individual.

Pen-portraits have been of two types: Bhava chitra (painting of an idea) and Pada chitra (word painting). In the literary field the two come together and become fused in pen-portrait. The subject is set against a person's particular social, literary or political background, and a rough sketch of the individual is painted in verbal colours.

In Telugu, quite a few writers have successfully tried their hands at writing pen-portraits. 'Visalandhramu' by Avatapalli Narayana Rao, 'Dhanya jivulu' by Acharya Ranga, the several editorials by Narla on the death of celebrities, 'Jati Velugulu' by Gottipati Brahmayya, 'Maha nayakulu' and 'Jati nirmathalu' by Thurlapati Kutumba Rao, 'Aani muthyalu' by Vemuri Radhakrishna Murthy, 'Mana panditulu, kavulu, rachayithalu' by Kovela Sampatkumaracharya, 'Charitrakandani mrita virulu' by A. Pandarinadh, 'Andhra nataka kartalu' by several writers and 'Marugupadda manikyalu' by Acharya B. Ramaraju are some of these writers and their works. Mention may be made here of the write-ups by Diwakarla Venkatavadhani of the celebrities of the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Academy. Sanjiva Dev presents memorable pen-portraits of men as well as scenes in his works.

Weeklies and monthlies in Andhra have done a bit of literary service in offering canvas for such pen-portraits in their journals. Arudra was the first to start such write-ups under the title, 'Telugu velugulu' (Andhra patrika weekly). Tirumala Ramachandra wrote in Andhra Prabha weekly under the title, 'Marapurani Maneeshi'. His series came in Andhra prabha under the title, 'Nata Ratnalu'. Nanduri Pardhasradhi attempted write-ups of musicians in Andhra jyothi weekly under the caption, 'Sa Ri Ga Ma Pa'. Andhra Pradesh monthly ran a title, 'Chaitanya Moorthulu', where several writers brought to light the lives of the many glorious sons of Andhra. C.N. Sastry (Amarendra) brought out pen-portraits of various literary giants like Munimanikyam, Joshua and Devulapalli, under the caption, 'Jnapakalu' (memories), published serially in Andhra prabha daily.

But one has to admit that this branch of literature has not attracted many writers. However, it is an undeniable fact that a book of pen-portraits serves as a powerful canvas for sketching the lives of great men from different walks of life.

PEN PORTRAITS (Urdu). In Urdu literature, the forms of short story, novel, essay, sketch, etc., came into existence under the influence of English literature. Pen portrait also appeared in the same way. Pen portrait and sketch are two different genres of Urdu literature, but both have many common features.

The writers have written about some fictitious and imaginary faces as well and have drawn such characters as have a living impact, e.g. 'Khoji' by Sarshar.

In Urdu literature, the earliest features of sketch writing can be seen in the Nikat-ulshuara by Mir Taqui 'Mir'. At some places there are glimpses of the pen portrait. As was in vogue at that time, this compendium was in Persian, but it contained criticism of Urdu poetry. The following excerpt from it may be examined for illustration:

> Nom de plume: Sauda. He is a young man of pleasant manners and habits and is cheerful and amiable in disposition. He hails from Shahjehanabad and earns his living through employment. Out of the poetical genres he writes ghazal, qasida, masnavi, qita, mukhammas and rubai very well. He ranks high among the Hindi poets and is one of those who can use their pen successfully.

Similar are the style and substance in the collection by Hakim Abdul Qasim Mir Qudrat Allah, nom de plume 'Qasim'. An illustration:

> Sabr, whose pen name is Naunahal, is a young bud of the orchard of respect and honour. His name is Mirza Ghulam

Hassan; he is a favourite of God and a selected flower in the garden of fortune and good luck. May he live long and achieve a high place in life. He is a noble young man with pleasant manners and is a fine mixture of sensitivity and equanimity.

In Chamanistan-e-shoara, Rai Lachhmi Narain writes about Lala Tek Chand 'Bahar':

Tek Chand 'Bahar' decorates the perfumed garden and beautifies the pastures of cultured subjects. He straightens the scattered tresses of 'sumbal' and refreshes the cheeks of tender thoughts with the bilingual comb of his pen. He renders more beautiful the curved eyebrows of tall beauties. He lends lustre to the sweet chirping of the dove.

In the same way Mir Hasan in Tazkara-e-shoara-e-Hindi, Asad Ali Khan 'Tamanna' in Gul Ajaib, Ghulam Hamdani Mus-hafi in Riaz-ul-fusaha and Tazkara-e-Hindi, Munshi Devi Parshad 'Bashash' in Tazkara-e-Asaar-ul-shoara-e-Hanud, and Hakim Sayyad Abdul Haee in Gul-Ranaa, occasionally present pen portraits.

One can well gauge the value of these compendiums today and the significance of their just and fearless comments on the writings of the poets. The passage of time has added colour to the pen portraits and the album is visible in relief.

In Gulshan-e-Hind Mirza Ali (nom de plume: 'Lutf') writes about Anjam:

Pen name 'Anjam', title Umaid-ul-Mulk, name Nawab Amir Khan. He had a special inclination towards wit and his temperament was deeply saturated with gaiety. He was an expert in appreciating the turn of the eye and was the Farhad of his time in the sweetness of tongue.

Muhammad Hussain Azad has presented the sketches of various poets and litterateurs in such a way that they come out alive before us. In his Darbar-e-Akbari, Nairang-e-khayal and Aabe-hayat, light has been so beautifully focused from specific angles on his characters that art-critics are all praise for him. In his introduction to Aabe-hayat, Azad himself writes, "I propose to gather the known circumstances that dominated the lives of these elders or those which were miscellaneously stated in different compendiums, and as far as possible write about them in such a way that they become eternally living portraits."

Azad has made Aabe-hayat a perfect specimen of a compendium, sketch-writing, essay-writing and pen portraiture. Even today one can read and enjoy it.

In the first volume of Bahar-e-gulshan-e-Kashmir, the authors have drawn a pen-portrait of Pandit Rattan Nath Sarshar:

Sarshar, Pandit Rattan Nath Sahib Dar Lakhnavi, son of Pandit Baij Nath Sahib Dar, was a wonderful, fun-loving, witty, humorous and cheerful person. He found a new meaning in everything and made every meaning colourful. His talk was always jocund. His smile always brightened his face. In whatever society he sat, it appeared as if a nightingale were singing there.

Pen portraiture has been attempted not only in prose but in poetry also. Zafar Ali Khan has drawn an interesting picture of Khwaja Hassan Nizami in a poem (1944). He writes:

Khwaja is a sufi, an aristocrat and an ascetic.
But he knows the tricks of the trade as well.
All his activities are in the name of religion.
But here and there is the shade of politics.
If he is successful, its secret is
That he flies the kite of world with that of religion....
When I drew this portrait Sulochna said
That Khwaja has literary darts as well in his archery
India will accept him as its leader
If he spends a few days in the British prison.

Lastly, there is a poem in which Pandit Hari Chand 'Akhtar' gives a pen portrait of Zafar Ali Khan.

Who after Zafar will sing such songs
Who will recite thumries, thappas and chobolas?
Who will grope the pockets of the faithful that are no more?
Who will return with bagfuls of donations?
The pulse beats still with the awe of beauty
Who can dare speak when addressed by him?

R.L.N.

PENA (Manipuri) is the name of a stringed musical instrument used by the Meiteis from pre-historic days. It consists of two separate parts. The kernel of a coconut is cut into two halves and the part to be used for the Pena is covered with hide. A small hollow piece of bamboo is stretched out horizontally on which is lined a bunch of hair of the horse tail. A small bridge over the flat coconut part covered with hide is used to create vibration of sound. The second part of the instrument consists of an iron rod at the top and a bunch of the same hair connects it at the base. This bow-like part when played with the bunch of hair of the other part produces a melodious sound. At the top of the bow-like part a bunch of small jingling bells is fastened which produces not only jingling sounds but also controls the rhythm. Before the use of coconut kernel, matured hard gourd, stumps of trees and bamboos are used extensively.

The typical Manipuri tune is discernible in the pena music. In the musical sound of pena there is a wave-like vibration which is very distinctive and familiar. Before the advent of Hinduism and the consequent changes accompanied with it, pena was used in ritual and ceremonial functions. In the funeral and other rituals connected with the dead the use of pena was a must. During the hey-days of the kings, the same instrument was used to waken kings from sleep in the early morning and when a king went out on a tour, a pena musician would accompany him and he would describe the journey singing to the accompaniment of the instrument. Till today Pena is used on ceremonial occasions.

Due to the use of this musical instrument in songs, a style of ballad singing, known simply as pena, sprang up. Many ballads were written and sung dealing with the exploits of kings and princes and with the heroic legends and myths of Manipur. The cycle of incarnations of Moirang known as 'Moirang shayon' are sung by muscians in the evening to the accompaniment of pena. This has been a powerful medium to educate the people and teach them the history, tradition and culture of the community. This style of singing is distinctively Manipuri and was very popular at one time. With the changing tastes and outlook in the present century, however, this style of singing is becoming less and less popular.

PENDSE, SHANKAR DAMODAR (Marathi; b. 1897, d. 1974), was a scholar, a critic and an orator. In 1908 he was expelled from school for protesting against the arrest of Lokamanya Tilak. In spite of many hardships, he obtained the degrees of Vedantatirtha (Calcutta), Shastri, M.A., M.O.L. (Lahore), and M.A. (Nagpur). He joined Hislop College, Nagpur, as Professor of Marathi. His articles 'Karmayoga ki karmasanyas', 'Shri Jnaneshani Shaivagam' and 'Rajguru Samartha Ramdas ani tyanche akshepak', serially published in Kesari and Lokashikshana respectively were favourably received and later on published in a book form. Maharashtracha sanskritik itihasa (Cultural history of Maharashtra, 1939) which gives a panoramic view of the cultural development of Maharastra spanning from the Vedic Age to the age of Ramdas, established him as scholar-critic. His doctoral dissertation on 'Shri-Jnaneshwaranche tatavainanal' (Philosophy of Jnaneshwar, 1939) reveals the range and depth of his scholarship. After his retirement, he made a valuable contribution to the study of the Bhagawat sect of Maharashtra. He was President of Vidarbha Sahitya Sammelan (1953) and of Maharashtra Sahitya Sammelan (1955). His main works are: Shri Jnaneshwarancha abhyas (A study of Shri Jnaneshwara, 1954), Vaidik vangamayatil Bhagawatadharamacha vikas (Development of the Bhagawat-cult in Vedic Literature, 1965), Pauranik Bhagawat dharma (The Bhagawat-cult in the Puranas, 1967), Maharashtracha Bhagawat dharma: Jnandeo and Namdeo (1969), Bhagawatottam santa: Ekanath (The best among the Bhagawat saints: Ekanath, 1971), Bhagawata dharma: sakshatkari sant Tukaram (Bhagawat sect: enlightened saint Tukaram 1972) and Rajguru Samartha Ramdas (1974).

PENDSE, SRIPAD NARAYANA (Marathi; b. 1913) is a distinguished Marathi novelist and playwright. In his young age Pendse had to lead a life of exemplary hardship and struggle. After doing his B.Sc in 1942 he taught in a school for a few years. Then he joined B.E.S.T. and worked there until his premature retirement in 1968.

Pendse, though known as a novelist, started his literary career with a collection of pen-portraits and short stories, entitled Khadakavaril Hirwal (1941). Some of these later on formed the nucleus of his better known full-length novels. Elgar (1949) was his first novel. It attracted the attention of discerning critics and paved the way for his later successful novels. Elgar tells the story of two friends, a Hindu and a Muslim staying together in a Konkan village. This novel was followed by Haddapar (1950), the story of a committed school teacher, who refused to serve as a cog in the machine. Then came Garambicha Bapu (1952), his most popular novel on illicit love. It depicts the adventures of a rude vagabond, who makes good and yet is denied the sympathy of the villagers, who treat him as an outcast on account of his relationship with a widow. Bapu is a lone wolf and the protoype of the heroes and heroines of his later novels like Hatya (1954), Yashoda (1957) and Kalandar (1959). Rathchakra (1962) is considered to be his master creation. This novel won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1964). It deals with the tragic adventures of a forlorn woman, forsaken by her husband and destined to fend for herself and her children all alone. It is a saga of courageous struggle of a strong woman, serialised on television in 1987.

The Pendse novel is the novel of local colour, the locality being a very small strip of Konkan land with its typical flora and fauna, and men and women. It is a small world of village folk, their habits and characteristic life-style and their culture. These novels of local colour remind one of the Wessex novels of Thomas Hardy.

In the last decade, however, Pendse wrote novels like Lavhali (1969) and Octopus (1972) which deal with life in Bombay. Lavhali, a story of middle class chawl-dwellers, is composed of entries in a diary, while Octopus, the story of a homosexual artist, his wife and their self-willed daughter, is narrated through the medium of dialogues and conversations. These novels differ from the earlier ones, in respect of the locale and style.

Pendse has himself dramatized many of his novels like Garambicha Bapu (1965) and Rathchakra (1980). His original play, Sambhusanchya chalit (1968), is a picturesque dramatization of Bombay's chawl-life. His other plays are Raje Mastar (1964), Yashoda (1965), Asa zhala ani ujadala (1969) and Chakravyuha (1970).

Pendse has also written short stories which are collected in two volumes, Yashoda (1957) and Jaumman (1969). His autobiography, Shri Na Pendse: Lekhak ani manus, was published in 1974. Recently he has published a novel called Tumbadche khot in two volumes, a saga of three generations set in a typical village in Konkan.

Whatever his output in other literary forms like the short story, the drama and the autobiography, Pendse's fame mainly rests on his novels which have a distinct local colour and flavour.

PENNIN PERUMAI ALLATU VALKKAI TUNAI (Tamil) or 'The glory of woman or life companion' is a learned treatise by the noted Tamil writer, Tiru. V. Kalyanasundaranar. Published in 1927, it is a carefully structured book divided into 13 chapters, the essays ranging from those which delve into the philosophic significance of the relationship between man and woman to those which deal with the concept of woman as mother and divinity. Each chapter has a synoptic preview, accompanied by an epigraph from a Tamil classic which captures the essence of the essay that follows and a terminal verse which sums up the chapter. Pennin perumai is a masterpiece of construction into which the author has distilled all his learning and experience.

The preface sets forth in simple but dignified Tamil the high motivation behind the writing of the book. Man and woman together constitute the world. Woman is divine because she creates life. After centuries of degradation in our society she is awakening to the light of freedom because of our contact with the West. Yet we are made to feel that there is need for a guide book like Pennin perumai which discusses with logical acumen, scholarly authority, brutal frankness and often with soaring idealism the concept of womanhood and the problems of women in our society.

Thematically, the chapters may be divided into the idealistic, the practical and the reformistic. The book begins with a declaration that the sexual distinction between the male and the female is a fundamental law of nature, and this distinction is seen in the divine sanction on the human worship of God as both Father and Mother or as Shiva and Shakti.

It is not natural physical attributes that establish the identity of a woman but her moral qualities like modesty, patience, spirit of sacrifice and service. Slightly shifting his stand on the egalitarian equation of the two sexes, Kalyanasundaranar feels that woman's possession of moral excellence puts her above her counterpart and claims with idealistic fervour that a woman without noble virtues is an exception rather than the rule. It is a short step from moral excellence to divine perfection which is the very essence of feminity.

It is but logical that the author of Pennin perumai should next think of the deplorable status of women in Indian society which might be attributed to the deprivation of their basic rights, discrimination based on casteism and untouchability. The social status which women enjoyed during the Vedic and epic periods and the age of Sangam classics was lost with the imposition of superstitious taboos blessed by the Smritis, and chastity was enjoined on the famale sex alone.

The author gives sound advice as to how to bring up girls. They should not be made to feel conscious of sexual differences, and their education should include care of the body, and knowledge of arts and religion. A repetitive motif in the book is what constitutes the glory of woman: it is a woman living on terms of equality with a man of her own choice and enjoying motherhood.

Declaring that marital union is the law of nature, the author affirms that to reject woman is to reject God and thus condemns, by implication, asceticism. He invests marriage with a sanctity by identifying the married pair with ardhanarishwara, half man and half woman. There is a touch of pathos in his rhapsody on begetting and rearing children because he was himself without child. But he looks ahead of his time in his bold views on birth control. He condemns in unequivocal terms abortion either inside or outside wedlock. Rearing of illegitimate children is preferable to infanticide. Kalyanasundaranar pleads fervently for the rehabilitation of unmarried women or 'patiyilar' (literally, women without husbands) whether they are prostitutes or 'free' women, and he holds the male community, particularly the affluent section, responsible for their moral deviations. Taking a similar compassionate view of widows, mostly victims of child marriage according to him, he pleads for their social recognition either through remarriage or employment. Pennin perumai is a controversial but a stimulating book on women and their place in our society.

PERACHIRIYAR (Tamil) was one of the distinguished commentators of Tolkappiyam, a work on grammar by Tolkappiyar. There have been five Perachiriyars in Tamil literary tradition and all of them have been commentators. Since it is in perfect accord with Tamil tradition for many who lived in different times to be known by identical names (e.g. poets like Avvayar, Pattinathar, Kapilar, etc.) it is difficult to know if all these names referred to one Perachiriyar or to more than one. To remain above disputations, these names will be treated as of separate individuals, each along with the works attributed to them-more so, when Perachiriyar is not the real name of a person but only an honorofic.

Anthireyan Perachiriyan: There is a general prefatory verse to Tolkappiyam consisting of 33 lines whose authorship is attributed to Athireyan Perachiriyar. But there is internal evidence from the commentary of Perachiriyar on Tolkappiyam itself to show that Athireyan Perachiriyar who wrote the prefatory verse, ought to have been a different Perachiriyar belonging to an earlier century. The other commentators of Tolkappiyam like Ilampuranar and Nachchinbarkkiniyar also do not refer to this prefatory verse by Perachiriyar and hence this is presumed to be a later addition.

There is another Perachiriyar, who is eulogised in 11 varying names of attributes of Shiva and is otherwise known as Mayechurar. These references occur in the commentary on Yapparungala vriddhi, another grammatical work.

There is a third Perachiriyar, the commentator of Thirukkovai, a Shaivite classic by Manickavachagar of 9th century AD. In fact, Thirukkovai is the only Shaivite classic which has been taken up for commentary.For long it was believed that Perachiriyar, the Thirukkovai commentator and the Perachiriyar who wrote the commentary for the chapter on 'Porul' of Tolkappiyam were one. Both the commentaries are works of outstanding scholarship, though varied in vision and incisive insight. But the Perachiriyar of Tolkappiyam commentary, while elucidating 'kovai' genre of poetical works in the section on poetic form (seyyul iyal) does not even once illustrate his points with selections from Manickavachagar's Thirukkovai but chooses from other Kovai works for the purpose. So the Perachiriyar of the Thirukkovai commentary must be a different person. In fact, there are other grounds also obtained internally from the two commentaries themselves like the style of writing, approach etc. to arrive at such a conclusion.

Whatever be the identity of Perachiriyar, his commentary on Thirukkovayar was a welcome contribution in the conext of his times. It is learnt from his commentary that there were earlier commentaries on Thirukkovayar before he set upon adding his, as he liberally quotes from their commentaries. He makes use of quite a number of literary and grammatical works (some of which are now lost) in his commentary which shows his knowledge of not only the Shaivite philosophy of the southern tradition from Meykandar and Arunandi but also the aesthetics propounded in Agamas in Sanskrit. He also shows equal felicity in explaining the compositional structure and contents of love poems which is what Thirukkovai is all about. However, he was more of a grammarian and scholar than a person instinctively drawn to poetry.

There is yet another Perachiriyar who is said to have written a commentary on Kurunthogai, a collection of 400 short love poems belonging to the Sangam period. Nachchinarkiniyar, another commentator who might have come on the scene a century later, i.e. in the 14th, in his introductory verse to his commentary on Jeevakachintamani (a Jaina epic by Thirutthakka Thevar, a Jaina monk) has stated that Perachiriyar had given his commentary on 380 poems of the 'Kurunthogai' collection and that he completed it by adding his own on the rest of the 20 poems. Since these two commentaries are lost, nothing can be said about them. However, since Perachiriyar of Tolkappiyam commentary has exhaustively made use of Kurunthogai poems as illustrations in his commentary, it may be granted that the commentator of both Kurunthogai and Tolkappiyam are one. If one goes by Perachiriyar's commentary on Tolkappiyam and its wealth of scholarship and deep vision, the loss to Tamil literature and scholarship is tremendous.

The fifth is the commentator of Tolkappiyam whose commentary is confined to only the third part of Tolkappiyam, 'Porul' which deals with prosody, genres of poetry that were current in his time, the subject matter of poetry and the theory of 'rasas' and so on, all of which are treated under nine sections. The commentary of Perachiriyar is available only for the last four sections, i.e. from the sixth to the ninth section. It can be safely presumed that he must have written his commentary for the whole of the third chapter, if not for the whole of Tolkappiyam and that his commentary relating to the first five sections is lost.

It is this last Perachiriyar that needs our attention and has to be talked about in greater detail. Some personal details can be gleaned from the internal evidence of his commentary. He was a Shaivite who belonged to the Chola country. He must have lived in the first half of the 14th century; and like most of the commentators in the Tamil literary scene then, he was greatly learned in Sanskrit classics and language, and was equally proficient in all branches of Tamil–prose and poetry, music and theatre.

In spite of being well-versed in Sanskrit grammar, language and literature, he was against importing norms of Sanskrit grammar into Tamil. He seems to have, in mind, Dandi alankaram, which is based on the work of Dandi, the Sanskrit grammarian who hailed from South a few centuries earlier in Pallavas' time and composed his work Kavya darshanam. He comes out strongly against rhetoric. He lays great stress on 'Ullurai' (the implied meaning). He was drawn to a natural expression of innate poetic talent rather than given to unfeeling, artificial ornamentation. In his time it seems, scholars were engaged in either grammatical works or writing commentaries on grammatical treatises, and it also seems that they were, in general, influenced by the Sanskrit grammatical theories which they were trying to incorporate into the Tamil system. Perachiriyar was perhaps rebelling against this all-pervasive tendency. He was well acquainted with the commentaries of his time and those earlier. As he proceeds with the exposition of his ideas, he makes it clear where he agrees and where he disagrees with the views of his predecessors. He spells out the names of some of the commentators and grammarians and some others he does not name. However, it is possible to identify them as Amita Saharar, Illampuranar, the author of Dandi alankaram, as these are available to us; at other places where he has named quite a number of commentators like Kadiya Nanniyar, Kakkai Padiniyar, Chiru Kakkai Padiniyar, Sanga Yappudayar, Seyyul Udayar, Nathathanar, Palkappiyanar, Palkayanar etc., a majority of whose works are no longer extant.

He propounds his ideas on prosody and genres of poetry (Seyyul iyal) in his own sutras. At many places, to explain his own sutras , he composes verses himself to serve as examples (called 'Kolu') apart from quotes from other literary works.

We learn from him that it was Agattian's (Agastya's) Agattiam which was the first seminal work of grammar and no longer extant, though a few excerpts from it are available quoted by commentators, but some of them seem spurious interpolations belonging to a later period; that Tolkappiyar's work Tolkappiyam was derivative, basing itself on Agattian's work; that Agattian's book was a comprehensive work covering all the branches of Tamil, e.g. Iyal (prose and poetry), Isai (music) and Natakam (theatre), and what was exhaustive and comprehensive in Agattian's work was given in an abridged form in Tolakappiyam in the chapter on prosody; that Tolkappiyar was the chief among the twelve disciples of Agattian; that Thahadoor yathirai (a work, no longer extant, on the epic battle between two kings at Thahadoor) was not based on a contemporary historical event, but like Perumdevanar's Bharatam, a work on the Mahabharata war, only a retelling of an old story handed down to his generation in oral tradition.

Perachiriyar was a man of wide learning and deep scholarship, thoroughly knowledgeable in all that Tamil and Sanskrit had made available to him in his time. He also seems to have been a scholar with firm views and forthright in expressing them with a touch of humour. It seems that starting from the point of Tolkappiyar, many schools of contending thoughts emerged from among Tolkappiyar's students. Perachiriyar's ideas came in the line of one school, and the other school was continued in works like Yapparungalam, Veera choliyam, etc. and commentators like Ilampuranar.

In fact, right from Tolkappiyar's time, there seems to have been three streams of thought: Tolkappiyar represented in Tolkappiyam, Avinayar represented in his Avinayam, and Yamalenderar in his Indra Kaliyam. Of these, only Tolkappiyam has survived; others which have been quoted and talked about till the 10th century have now been lost. They seem to have covered the other two areas, Isai and Natakam (music and theatre) too.

They have received great acclaim from Konkani readers. Vadal ani varem, a novel, depicting the life of a Goan priest, received two awards from the Konkani Bhasha Mandal, Goa, and the Konkani Kendra, Mapusa, where as his Gouyche Dhartarevailo received an award from the Bhasha Mandal.

A.P.S.J.

PERIALWAR (Tamil, 7th century) was one of the twelve Alwars (saints, singers and poets) who sang of their passionate devotion to Lord Vishnu. He was born at Srivilliputhur. He was named Vishnuchittan. He was a priest. It is believed that he lived for eighty years. On the basis of certain references in the Bhagavata-purana to the towns and rivers of South India, to certain practices like child marriage which are peculiar to the South, and also because of the stories of Krishna's boyhood pranks which can be traced only to the Tamil Pasurams, it is conjectured that this purana was written in the Tamil land by Perialwar. It is quite possible that Perialwar made use of the Krishna stories current in the oral tradition of Tamil Nadu in his time, for there is no recorded source even in Tamil literary history earlier to Perialwar. A parallel could be 'Nappinnai' of Tamil tradition with that of Radha of Prakrit folk lore, which was taken over by Jayadeva before it spread to the rest of India.

Perialwar has 473 songs of the Alwar Pasuram collection, Nalayira divya prabandham, to his credit. Though chronologically he came later, yet the first place is given to his pasurams in the order of prabhanda collections.

The Vaishnavite movement, as part of the Bhakti movement, was a reaction to the Jaina dominance and some of the Alwars had themselves engaged in bitter controversieswith the Jaina and Buddhist scholars/monks. And again, there is a legend that the Pandya king, hearing of Perialwar's erudition, invited him to face some Jaina scholars in his royal court and that Perialwar vanquished them in a religious debate, won the Pandyan King's admiration, and a generous reward which he placed at the shrine of Lord Vishnu. In spite of all this, there is no evidence to suggest any religious animosity in Perialwar's work. It seems that he solely confined himself to tending his garden and worshipping the Lord at the shrine. He says this in so many words in one of his padigams.

Though Brahmin ethos and colloquial speech forms permeate his songs, his deep knowledge of the corpus of literature of the Sangam times, which preceded him by several centuries in the oral tradition, is remarkable. The use to which he puts the akam tradition (love lyrics) in his works is even more significant. In this respect, he is of a class with Nammalwar, the tallest of the Alwars.

His greatest contribution is, perhaps, a new genre of poetry he evolved, 'Pillai-thamizh', wherein, padigam by padigam, he traces the growth of the child, Krishna, the naughty prankster, from his birth onwards. This also adds to the corpus of Krishna mythology which found its way into Bhagavata purana and thereafter spread to the rest of India through Vallabhacharya in the 15th century.

The physical love of the Sangam Akam tradition is sublimated and made the symbol of the devotee's spiritual quest for the grace of his Lord. Perialwar, in one of several variations of this love theme, takes on the role of a mother of the heroine, grieving over her only daughter, who has been seduced by a cowherd, and over the mental and physical agony her daughter suffers, pining for the love of that deceitful flute player. While the Alwars' taking on the role of the heroine, suffering the pangs of love for her hero/Lord, is in accord with the new convention of sublimation, the new twist given to that by Perialwar by taking on the mother's role, it is suggested, could be a reference to his daughter, Aandal, another Alwar, falling in love with Krishna and vowing that she will marry no one else but Krishna. Perialwar is not really talking of an imaginary situation but of the travails of his own household. All this is attested by Aandal's own pasurams.

And again, the treatment of Krishna as a child, apart from being an addition he has contributed to the extant puranas, and the spiritual level of sublimation it achieves, seems to have yet another aspect. The loving tenderness, the seductive intoxication, the emotional excitement with which the child's character has been drawn, make Perialwar's pasurams unique, unique as a progenitor of the tradition and unique in the company of the Alwars too. This could again be traced to his household, the emotional turmoil, and the parental agony he suffered. He had no child of his own for Aandal was on orphan, abandoned in Perialwar's garden. If one can see in his padigams the agony of losing the only daughter in marriage and again losing her soon after marriage—her disappearance into the shrine at the age of 15 in full bridal dress, one can also see the joy and thrill of rearing up that child in his 'pillai Thamizh'. He seems to have sublimated not only his agony but all the joys as well.

PERIAPURANAM (Tamil), also called 'Thiruthondar puranam', was written during the first half of the 12th century by Sekkizhar (born in Kunnathur). This work of 4,286 stanzas in vriddham metre narrates the life, time and work of 63 'Nayanmars' (devotees of Shiva) who attained sainthood by their unflinching devotion to Shiva. These devotees include poets of the Bhakti era and common citizens from all walks of life.

Sakkizhar was a minister in the court of the Chola king, Kulothunga II, who ruled roughly between A.D. 1133 and A.D. 1150 and was also known as Anabhaya. Sekkizhar's Periapuranam is a landmark in Tamil literature. Periapuranam concerns itself with the lives of Shiva's devotees. It is true the lives of the saints of those times are studded with miraculous happenings. For instance, the saint poet Sambandar is reported to have been born a prodigy, and legend has it that Parvati, the goddess, nurtured the child with breast milk and that this spurred him into composing his first song, 'Thodudaya Sevian', which records the divine vision he had. In his brief life of 18 years he is reputed to have vanquished many a Jaina scholar and composed over 1,60,000 songs. Such legends, as handed down to Sekkhizhar, are kept intact but everything else he says about Sambandar had historical basis. Possibly being a devout Shaivite himself he believed the legends to be true. Of the total of 4286 stanzas, Sekkizhar devotes 1256 verses to Sambandar and 1062 verses to Sundarar.

The Nayanmars he talks of lived in different parts of the country at different times and pursued different occupations. Sekkizhar records in minute detail the atmosphere of the time, the kind of lives led by the saints and everything else about them in the manner of a documentary film maker and a journalist. We learn from Sekkhizhar all the details about the tradition of temple worship prevalent then, and also how the present Agama-ordained rituals were just making their in-roads. When he dwells on the life of Nandanar, an untouchable farm-hand, the atmosphere of the cheri (Harijan colony) is created in vivid detail. When he deals with Thirumoolar, we find Sekkizhar expounding on the yoga with great erudition. So is the case when he deals with the Jain Shaivite religious controversies in which the Shavite debating skills vanquished the Jain scholarship. It is from Sekkizhar that we learn that the indigenous form of music, developed in Tamil Nadu from the Sangam times, had still its currency.

Periapuranam is composed in vriddha verse but when Sekkizhar records the saint-singers' visit to the shrine and the compositions they sang on such occasions, he does so with the documentation of the padigams (dacads) they sang by dovetailing the first line of the songs set in different metres (say in Kattalai Kalithurai) into his vriddam verses. Except such wealth of documentary details as we find in Sekkizhar, there is no way to know which songs were sung at which shrine and on which occasion. When he sings of war, the rhythm of his poems brings out the hoof-beats of galloping horses and the clang of armour.

Sekkizhar is a historian-biographer par excellence. Fittingly, Sekkizhar's Periapuranam and a biographical account, by a later poet, of how Sekkizhar came to compose Periapuranam, have both been added to the Thirumarai Collection (collection of sacred books on Shaivism).

PERIASAMI THOORAN, M.P (Tamil; b. 1908) was born in Erode, studied at the local Mahajana High School, and graduated from Madras University. Apart from Tamil and English, he knows Hindi, Sanskrit and Malayalam. Even as a high school student, he was influenced by Subramaniya Bharati and Mahatma Gandhi. When he was a college student, he published a monthly magazine, Pithan (1928-30), and wrote poems and stories.

As a college student, he unearthed the essays and poems of Subramania Bharati, till then unknown to the public, and later published them in one volume, Bharathi Tamil. In 1979-81, he classified the works of Bharati subject-wise and published them in eight volumes.

He took special interest in psychology and wrote many Tamil books like Kulandai ullam (1947), Parambariyam (1949) and Kumarapparuvam (1954).

In 1933, he joined Sri Ramakrishna Mission Vidyalaya and served in that Gurukulam for 15 years. In 1948, he became the Chief Editor of the Tamil Encyclopaedia and published ten volumes of the book. Then as Chief Editor, he published a children's encyclopaedia in Tamil in ten volumes and retired in 1978. In all, he has written 58 books.

He took part in Tamil Isai Movement and composed many kirtanas in Tamil.

He was honoured for his services by the Tamil Writers' Association, Children's Writers' Association and Bharati Sangam. The title of Padma Bhushan was conferred on him in 1968 by the Government of India. He was given the title Kalai Manami by the Iyal Isai Nataka Manram in 1970. The Tamil Nadu Government gave him a prize of Rs. 10,000/- in 1981 at the fifth World Tamil Conference for his contribution to Tamil literature. A number of books written by him won honour and prizes from various literary orgainisations. He is very much interested in children's literature. He still continues writing. His other works include Ilantamil (Poems, 1949), Parampariyam (Psychology, 1949), Kumarapparuvam (Psychology, 1954); Kalingarayan Kodai (Short stories, 1956), Anaiyum punaiyum (Poems for children, 1957), Mavilakku (Short stories, 1958), Kanagathin kural (Translation, 1958), Mayakkallan (Novel for children, 1961), Thuran kavithaigal (Poems, 1962), Thangac sangili (Short stories, 1962), Thagorin imperum katturaigal (ed. PERUNGADAI (Tamil), written sometime in the middle of the eighth century AD, is an adaptation of the Sanskrit work by the king of Ganga, Durvinita, a Jaina, written, it is said, sometime towards the end of the sixth century AD. This Sanskrit work was also only an adaptation of Gunadhya's Brihat katha that had appeared earlier in Paishachi language. One Kongu Velir belonging to the Kongu region of Tamilnadu is said to be the author of this adaptation. He is not known to have written anything else. This epic is set in 'ahaval' metre (blank verse), the most facile and flexible prosodic form then for longer compositions. It consists of six kandas viz., Unjai (Ujjain), Lavana, Magada, Vattava (Vatsa), Naravhana (Naravahana) and Thuravu, where the hero, Udayanan, takes to ascetic life after crowning his son, Naravanan, as king. The central character and hero of this epic is, however, Udayana in this adaptation and not Naravahana as in the earlier Paishachi and Sanskrit versions.

Of the 150 sections that told about as many 'gathas', only 100 sections narrating 100 'gathas' have survived, i.e. the first part of 'Magada kanda' and the whole of the last kanda,'Thuravu', and some fragments in the middle are lost. However, virtually the whole of the Udayana story has survived, which covers his romantic exploits as well as his exploits in the battle field constituting a major portion of the epic. This major segment is good enough to bear witness to the poetic talent and narrative skill of the author, Kongu Velir, who seems to have exploited the 'ahaval' metre very successfully to narrate a long story in a racy style and swift moving pace. No doubt, he takes the liberty of stopping the flow of events to describe in great detail a communal bathing festival during a fierce battle, or to lecture on the nuances of right tuning of a vina, or to offer leisurely running commentary on girls playing throw-ball and so on. The result of such liberties is a delight to read, and the interest in the story is never allowed to slacken. He seems to know his craft only too well. He has an excellent command of language, diction and style which vary to suit the differing purposes. In the process he also sprinkles his narrative with poems excerpted from Kural, Naladiar, etc.

The epic is important in that it throws a good deal of light on the life of the people, state of the country norms that governed polity, social customs, the kind of structure and composition of the townships they had, besides many details of music, sculpture and other arts of the time.

The pupose of the Jainas in choosing such romantic stories for the writing of epics was to endear themselves to the people with proselytization as the ultimate aim. They, no doubt, succeeded in endearing themselves to the Tamils as in the succeeding centuries more efforts in this direction followed which culminated in Jeevaka chintamani (again an epic by a Jaina monk, Thirutthakka Thevar, of the 10th century AD) which carried romanticism to its extreme. The episodes of Perungadai are referred to in Alwar hymns (Thirumangai Alwar: Siriya thirumadal) and Manimekalai (a Buddhist epic).

Perungadai must have been a very successful work at the people's level too, since as late as the 15th century there appeared an abridged version of this story called Udayana Kumara charitham, which is of course in no way a distinguished one except that it arose out of a need for a shorter version of a popular story. This work was by anonymous Jaina nuns who were known as 'Kandiars'.

PETALIKAR, ISHVAR MOTIBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1916) was a fiction writer, essayist and social activist. Born in a farmer's family in a small village in Gujarat, he did not have the opportunity to study at college. He was a keen observer of rural life and taught in a school for some years, and then took to writing as a career.

So far he has published 23 novels, 11 collections of short stories, 12 collections of essays mostly on social themes, and about 20 other miscellaneous works. Besides writing a weekly column in Sandes, a Gujarati daily published from Ahmedabad, Petalikar devotes considerable time to social service.

Janamatip (1944), his first novel, had the distinction of being introduced to the Gujarati reader by the eminent poet and critic, Jhaverchand Meghani. The novel deals with a criminal tribe of Gujarat, the Patanavadiyas.

Another book of Petalikar, published in 1944, was Gramachitro. The book consists of pen portraits from rural life, and was an instant success. Of his other novels, Mari haiya saghadi (1950), Tarana othe dungar (1954) and Rnanubandh (1963) deal mainly with marital problems. Lakhya lekha (1945), Dharatino avatar (1946), Kanku he kanya (1947), Madhata (1950) and Bhavasagar (1951) have the rural life of Gujarat as their main theme. Of all his novels Bhavasagar is considered best by many critics.

In 1959 Petalikar published a novel Premapanth in which he depicted the urban life and its problems for the first time. His subsequent novels like Yuganam endhan (1961), Jay parajay (1963), Lakshagrah (1965), Jujavam rup (1967), Setubandh (1969) and Abhijat (1971) deal with urban themes. But in these novels the social reformer in Petalikar gets the better of the critic in him. Realising this, the author decided not to write novels for some years. It was only after eight years, in 1979, that he published Parodhanum andharum, a novel dealing with the post-Independence rural life of Gujarat.

'Lohini Sagai', a short story by Petalikar, had the distinction of winning a prize in an international short story competition organised by the Herald Tribune of the U.S.A. Even in his short stories Petalikar is successful when he deals with rural life.

In 1961 Petalikar was awarded the Ranajitaram Suvarnachandrak in recognition of his contribution to Gujarati literature.

PETAVATTHU (Pali) is the seventh book of Khuddaka-nikaya of Suttapitaka (Buddhist canon). It speaks of the sufferings experienced after death as a result of sins committed earlier. It asserts thus the belief in life beyond death and that there is no escape from experiencing the fruits of one's karma, good or bad. The purpose of the book was, perhaps, to warn the lay man against committing sins, and to inculcate in the follower a spirit of charity, non-violence and love for all creatures.

Petavatthu consists of fifty-one stories in four 'vaggas'. All of them have more or less the same pattern. A Bhikkhu sees a 'peta' in some predicament and asks the reason thereof. The peta explains the action which brought about his misery.

The first vatthu (story), Khettupamavatthu, sets forth the main thesis of the book, as it were. The suffering or otherwise of a peta is linked to his reaping in a field. It exhorts him that as one sows, so does one reap in course of time. However, one can come to the help of a suffering peta by transferring the merits of good action. 'Samsara-mochaka-peta-vatthu' tells us about a woman, suffering from her misdeeds, being released by Sariputta by transferring to her the merit he had acquired.

'Nandaka-petavatthu' makes a reference to Pingalaka, a king of Surattha, who lived 200 years after Buddha's nirvana, as Dharmapala writes. This reference vouches for its late composition. However, Petavatthu was included in the canon before the Third Council, and at least parts of the work belong to an earlier period. For, one of the stories, 'Tirokutta-petavatthu', is included in 'Khuddaka-patha', the first section of Khuddaka-nikaya. The Sarvastivadins, too, had a similar compilation Pretavadana in Ksudrakagama, parts of which are extant.

1875. He was interested in English literature as well as Gujarati literature. He composed a long poem of 3158 lines on natural beauty and devotion to God during his school years, which he completed in 1873. It was published serially in the magazine, Jnanavardhak. He translated quite a few English and Persian poems. Apart from Jnanavardhak, his poems were also published in periodicals like Vidyamitra, Gul Afsana and Fursad. His poems were brought out in a collection, called Mari Majeh ane biji kavitao (1892), published by Pestonji Mistry. Under the influence of the English romantic poetry he made an attempt to start a new trend in Gujarati poetry. In those days when rhyming was a predominant characteristic of poetry, he was the first to experiment with blank verse in Gujarati. Several poets before him sacrificed the beauty of a poem in order to keep the metre alive, but he gave more importance to the spirit of the poem. Apart from writing poetry, he compiled a collection of Gujarati proverbs, the major portion of which was published in the Jnanamitra.

PHADKE, NARAYAN SITARAM (Marathi, b. 1894; d. 1978) was an eminent Marathi novelist and pioneer of the personal essay. After the death of Haribhau Apte, the father of the modern Marathi novel, in 1919, two important novelists, V.M. Joshi and N.S. Phadke, established new trends in fiction. The latter had published a bulky novel Alla ho Akbar (1917), an adaptation of Marie Correlli's popular novel Temporal Power. While at Fergusson College he was known for his scholarship. He did his M.A. (1917) in philosophy and was a popular teacher. He worked for a few years at the then New Poona College (now S.P. College), but in response to the call of Mahatma Gandhi's Non-cooperation Movement he left the college. After various short-term jobs in different places, he finally settled at Rajaram College at Kolhapur.

In the meantime he wrote biographies of two Irish patriots, Macswinni and De Valera 1923, and in 1925 accepted the editorship of Ratnakar and turned it into a distinguished magazine. In Ratnakar were serially published his two novels Jadugar (1927) and Daulat (1928). These two novels established him as the most popular novelist, taking the younger generation by storm. While his predecessors Apte and Joshi catered to the philosophical taste of the earlier generation of readers, Phadke concentrated on romanticism and youth. These two novels along with the earlier one, Kulabyachi dandi (1925), were the first romantic love stories, set in contemporary realistic setting and written in a charming and exhilarating style. While Apte's and Joshi's novels were loose in construction, Phadke carefully attended to the aesthetic texture of his novels. In no time he became a rage with the young readership, feeding it with the same heady stuff in one novel after another, Atakepar, Niranjan, Kalankshobha, Asha, Pravasi, Unmad, etc. The young lovers in all these novels faithfully follow the same boy-meets-girl formula, but the path of love does not run smooth as a rule; finally, of course, they succeed in achieving their goal. The only exception probably was Akherche band (1943) which may possibly be regarded as the first Marathi biographical novel, dealing with the life and times of Bal Gandharva. The steady flow of his novels remained unaffected till the end of his days. He was the editor of the weekly Jhankar (1940) and the annual Anjali (1951) which published his new novels. In all he wrote more than seventy novels.

Phadke was the first writer to introduce the personal essay to the Marathi readers. His first steps in this direction were rather faltering, but very soon he mastered the technique. These essays too appeared first in Ratnakar under an apt heading 'Gujgoshti'. These personal essays are the finest of their kind and for their sheer charm and grace they are unparalleled. He has quite a few collections of short stories to his credit. He has also written many plays, but none of them made any mark.

One of his books on the making of literature Pratibha sadhana (1931) deserves special mention. Laghukatha: mantra ani tantra, is his criticism of short story as a genre. He has also written an autobiography, Majhe jivan—ek kadambari (1969). Apart from this, he has written a few articles in appreciation of books, arts, sports, etc.

Phadke presided over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan held at Ratnagiri in 1940 and was honoured with the title of Padmabhushana (1962).

His main works are Daulat, Akherche band, Pratibha, Sadhana, Gujgoshti.

PHATAK, NARAHAR RAGHUNATH (Marathi; b. 1893, d. 1979) was a great scholar of Marathi literature and a notable teacher of the language. His writings cover the compositions of the Marathi saint poets, biographies, history and newspaper columns. He was educated in Pune and Indore, and worked as a teacher for a while at Nagpur and Bhandara. He also worked in newspapers for some time and retired as a professor of Marathi.

Phatak began writing from his student days. He used the pseudonyms 'Narahari' and 'Raghunathsunu' for writing short stories, novels and stray articles. These novels, Kamalini (1911), Vatsala va Abhimanyu (1912) and Sudharanecha Manu (1916) project his liberal views about society. On coming to Bombay in 1918 he joined the newspapers. Between 1918 and 1923 he worked in Induprakash and Sayajivijay as also with Navakal (1923-35). He also wrote in periodicals like Vividhdnyanvistar and Vividhvritta. Among his most popular writings of the period are the series of critical articles evaluating N.C. Kelkar's Tilakcharitra and articles on Samarth Ramdas. His Vividhvritta, written under the pseudonym 'Antarbhedi' is a collection of pen-portraits of many well-known personalities.

N.R. Phatak's books on the literature of our saint poets, namely Dnyaneshwar ani Dnyaneshwari (1947), Shri Eknath: vangmaya ani karya (1953), Samarthcharitra: vangmaya va sampradaya (1972), indicate a rational attitude towards the saints and the Maharashtrian society of those days. Phatak's biographies are also highly original. They include Nyayamurti Mahadev Govind Ranade yanche charitra (1924), Adarsha Bharatsevak Gopal Krishna Gokhale (1967) and Lokmanya (1972)—all leaders who played a key role in the reconstruction of modern India. A born historian, Phatak is in his elements in the biography entitled Yeshwantrao Holkar: Maratheshahicha akhercha advitiya swatantryaveer (1967). Equally thought-provoking is Arvacheen Maharashtrateel saha thoar purush (1951).

Phatak's lectures delivered in an inimitable style on various occasions have also been published in book form. These collections include Narayanrao Peshwe: khoon ki atmahatya? (1944), Bharatiya rashtravadacha vikas (1949), Russiache sankshipta darshan (1955), Atharashe sattavanchi shipai gardi (1958), Lokmanya Tilak, Natyacharya Kri. Pra. Khadilkar (1973) and Mumbainagari (1981). A rationalist to the core, Phatak dissected traditions and sects, hero-worship and social fads with a stern eye. He contended that it was because of excessive hero-worship and an obsessive pride in the past that people neglected the present and the future. Phatak was never afraid of advancing unconventional ideas.

He also lectured on such subjects as the Mahabharata, the Valmiki Ramayana, the history of Marathi literature, the history of the Marathas, the Gitarahasya, Sanskrit poetry and drama.

After retiring from his professorship at Ramnarayan Ruia College, Phatak joined the board of editors (Maharashtra) appointed by the Indian Government for preparing the history of the freedom movement. This prompted him to edit the correspondence of Mahatma Gandhi between the years 1915 and 1931. This collection has been published in three volumes. Phatak also worked as secretary of the committee appointed by the Maharashtra Government to prepare the Who's Who of Freedom Fighters (Maharashtra). The first volume of this Who's Who (1972), edited by him, is also well-known.

Phatak was elected President of the Vidarbha Sahityâ Sammelan at Amaravati (1937), of the Marathi Patrakar Parishad at Pune in (1941) and of the Granthalaya Parishad, Goa (1949). He was President of the Mumbai Marathi Sahitya Sangh from 1950 till his death.

PHATAKA (Marathi). 'Phatake' in Marathi is the equivalent of the 'lashing' of a whip. The saints, who were also moralists, tried to use the 'whip' or its 'lashing' as a metaphor. Medieval poets everywhere tried to use ordinary things or every day occurrences to convey metaphysical ideas through metaphors, allegories and analogies. But a 'phataka' is rather something different from these figurative exercises. What was actually said in these phataka songs was 'moral' lashing in the guise of straightforward talk with the people. A Gujarati poet of the medieval times wrote some moral essays in such biting and pungent words that they were aptly termed 'chabaka', the 'whip'. In Marathi Tukaram's direct address to his listeners, couched in satirical words, does the job of lashing the erring, but these abhangas and padas are not called phatakas. Only a latter day poet of late 18th century, who was also a writer of amorous 'lavanis' in his youth, is famous for his Phatakas. He is Ananta Fandi, who turned to utilizing his poetic talent for the moral and spiritual uplift of the common people. This metamorphosis in the poet's life was the result of Ahilyabai's request to the poet to discard the world of the Tamasha troupes and sing the praise of the lord and teach the people the truthful ways of life. A famous phataka was composed by the renowned novelist Hari Narayan Apte also which runs like this: "Mukin bichari kunin haka/Ashin mendharen banu naka" (Don't be dumb lambs to be driven over the brink by anybody).

Phataka became famous in the old Marathi forms of versification. The righteous indignation and the sincere desire of doing good to the people, along with the vigour and rhythm of the beats of the 'theka' and the 'tali' (clapping of hands) are the factors that make the phataka measure so popular and engaging. In rhythmic pace it is akin to a 'savaiyya' song in Braj bhasha.

Phataka is written in a particular 'matra vritta' which was known as 'Phatka'. This was later renamed by M.P. Patawardhan as 'Haribhagini'. The matra consists of a padma—bhringa—padma—bhringa construction, i.e. eight matras—six matras—eight matras—six matras.

N.G.J.

PHOOL NAHIN RANG BOLATE HAIN (Hindi) is Kedarnath Agrawal's fourth collection of poems, published in 1965. It contains the poet's new and old poems chosen in a way that brings out the phases of his poetic development. The poet himself writes: "As time passed, I began to understand the facts and realities of life. This understanding I have attained through struggle." All these poems reveal this struggle and the creative process in which it is embedded.

Two poems of the collection reflect the personality of the poet as well as his direct collusion with the realities of time. Every poem, in fact, is a search for reality together with a search of the poet's own self. This makes for a sense of objectivity which goes beyond one's own self. The day-to-day experiences of life give vitality to the poems. Every poem is different from the other at the level of aesthetic experience but all of them have a common element that binds them together—faith in human beings and in their dignity.

In the poems which deal with the beauty of nature we find new imagery and colours. The poet's word pictures thus acquire a certain freshness and charm. Kedarnath has also written songs and lyrics that have spontaneity and rhythmic movement. There is no effort on the part of the poet to impose form on these poems, some of which are metrical compositions while others are free verse. The poet's concentration is primarily on the content and not on the craft. In some of them the rhythm of conversational prose has also been adopted.

The collection has some of the famous poems of the poet listed under 'Vallari tum, dhoop tum, hawa tum' which depict the beauty of nature, such as 'Basanti hawa', 'Vasant', 'Khet ka drishya', 'Aaj nadi bilkul udas thi', 'Ek khile phool ne'. Poems listed under 'Aath chhoti kavitayen' such as 'Lipat gai jo dhul paon se' and 'Chilh' are well known for their sensitive images. Poems listed under 'Asthi ke ankur' such as 'Gaon ka mahajan' 'Morache par' and 'Hathaude ka git' have a sharply defined realistic element, while poems under 'Goad mein bah rahi nadi' have a satirical note. The poems on socio-political themes reveal the influence of the Marxist ideology, minus its sound and fury. The anthology, on the whole, is the work of a poet of power and delicate sensitivity.

PHUKAN, LAKSHMINATH (Assamese; b. 1894, d. 1975) is by profession a journalist of unrivalled reputation in Assam, but according to his own admission, it was literature which was Phukan's first love. He was a poet and a story teller but, oddly enough, he received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1970 for his Mahatmar pora rupkonwarloi, a work on the distinguished persons he happened to meet in his long journalistic career.

Lakshminath Phukan was the eldest son of Kartikchandra Phukan of Dergaon in the district of Sibsagar. He passed the Matriculation Examination from the Jorhat Government High School in 1914. Unable to prosecute further studies because of financial distress, he worked for some time as a teacher at the local English School and then for a year or so at the George Institution, a high school at Dibrugarh. There he came under the influence of Radhanath Chengkakati, the doyen of the Assamese journalists. On the latter's advice he proceeded to Calcutta for further studies, but, instead of going to a college, he went to the Imperial Library in the company of K.K. Handiqui, a well-known scholar and educationist of Assam. Handiqui helped Phukan publish his first collection of short stories, Mala (Garland, 1918). Phukan next met Pijushkanti Ghose of the Amrita Bazar Patrika and having served as an apprentice for a few months, he became a sub-editor of the newspaper. This entry into the field of journalism determined his future and he always remained a journalist until his retirement from the Assam Tribune in 1964. From 1918 to 1939 he worked in various capacities for the Amrita Bazar Patrika, Advance, Forward, Pioneer, Asamiya, Times of Assam and Batari. Finally he took charge of the Assam Tribune in 1939.

Phukan had been a poet early in life and some of his poems decidedly constitute the best specimens in the Assamese romantic poetry. His collection of poems, Sonali sapon (The golden dream, 1961) with thirty-five poems, reveals his love of nature and the youthful exuberance of love in different moods, a refined taste and a sense of the music of words. He is, however, remarkable for his short stories. He published as many as five collections of stories, Mala (1918), Ophaidang (1952), Maramar Madhuri (1963), Asat utphulla pran (1965) and Anande nadhare hiya (1967). Phukan's stories, which chiefly deal with the hopes, the aspirations and the hypocrisy of the middle classes, are remarkable for sharp characterisation, satire and humour. His only novel, Nisar puwati sur (The tune of the dawning night, 1973), depicts the strength of character in a maid-servant who refused to divulge the name of the person related to the family of her master responsible for enticing her and making her pregnant. She is an ugly woman detested by young men, but remains grateful to the man who gave her a son.

S.S.

PHUKAN, NILAMANI (Assamese; b. 1880, d. 1977), universally called Kaka (grandfather), was born in the town of Dibrugarh. His father's name was Lambodar Phukan who came of a well-to-do kayastha family. Nilamani went to school at Dibrugarh, passed the entrance examination with credit, and was admitted to the Presidency College, Calcutta. He soon left and went to Cotton College at Gauhati, in 1901. Finally he took his B.A. degree from Victoria College, Cooch Behar, in 1907.

He studied law for two years but did not take the final examination. Instead, he joined the George Institution, a local high school in his home town, and was for seventeen years its Headmaster. He was nominated by the Governor of Assam a member of the Legislative Council in 1921. As expected of a nominated member, he mostly supported the Government in legislative measures. As a Congress candidate he was elected to the Assam Legislative Assembly immediately after Independence.

During the period from 1930 to 1940, Phukan supported and collaborated with Ambikagiri Raichoudhuri's movement for the preservation of the identity of the Assamese people who were being overwhelmed and reduced to a minority by the continuous influx of the Bengalis from East Bengal (now Bangla Desh). In 1942 he joined the national struggle for independence and was in prison for some time.

Phukan was a noted journalist of his time. He was the editor of the now defunct magazine Alochani and later became the editor of the Assamese weekly Batari which, under his powerful editorship, was converted into a daily in 1932. In that capacity he worked until 1937 when the proprietor had to stop its publication for various reasons.

He entered the literary field practically at the age of sixty. His first literary product Jyoti-kana (Sparks of light, 1938), a collection of poems written in the sonnet form, is somewhat mystical in tone and approach. Following this publication he went on writing both in prose and in verse, until the end of his life. To his credit he has twelve poetical works of which the following are notable: Jyoti-kana (1938), Manasi (1943), Gutimali (1950), Amitra (1952), Jinjiri (1952), Sandhani (1953), Ahuti (1961), Satadhara (1962), Mara dalat kuhipat (1965) and Manasa-pratima (1971). Although in a sense he is a post-war poet, he essentially belongs to the school of the pre-war romantic poetry. His poetry reveals his mature mind and deep insight into the mysteries of life but lacks emotion. Thoughts and ideas are very often repeated in different poems.

Phukan was not only a good orator for which he was often called 'vagmivara' but was also a powerful prose-writer. His first collection of literary essays was Sahitya-kala (1940) after which a few more small volumes in prose appeared. His other prose works include Jayatirtha (1941), Chintamani (1942), Kirtanar lavanu (1973), Jagat-guru Sankarar bhaktimarga (1974) and Mahapurusiya dharma. Phukan's prose is forceful and idiomatic. His fame, however, does not rest on his prose writings which are mostly banal in theme and conventional in treatment and may not stand the test of time.

From 1944 to 1947 he was President of the All Assam Literary conference and represented India at the age of ninety at the World Peace Conference held in Berlin in 1969. For his contribution to literature he was made a fellow of the Sahitya Akademi.

PHUKAN, NILAMANI (Assamese; b. 1933), a modern Assamese poet with an M.A. in History from Gauhati University, teaches History at a college in Gauhati. Though the youngest of the imagist and formalist group of poets who had established themselves after the Second World War, Nilmani has done more than any other poet to set this trend in modern Assamese poetry. In the sixties a few young talents joined his school but his personal contribution to it remains the greatest. Nilamani has published five volumes of poems: Surya heno nami ahe ei nadiyedi (The sun, they say, comes down along this river, 1963), Nirjanatar sabda (Sound of silence, 1965), Aru ki naisabda (What more soundlessness, 1968), Phuli thaka suryyamukhi phultor phale (Towards the sunflower in bloom, 1972), and Kamit, golap aru kamit (Thorns, roses and thorns, 1975). A collection of Nilamani's verses selected by himself, has come out under the title Golapi jamur lagna (Time for the rosy berries, 1977). Nilamani has also translated a good number of Japanese poems from the seventh century till the present day and has brought out an anthology under the title Japani kabita (Japanese poetry, 1971). He has also edited an anthology of the Assamese poems of this century Kuri satikar Asamiya kabita (1977), selected by himself.

Nilamani Phukan is at the forefront of the Assamese poets of today. Influenced by the French symbolist poets as well as the imagists and formalists of the West, Nilamani emphasises the importance of the expression of personal feelings through symbols, images and suggestions. At the same time, he deals with novel ideas and excels in the subtle analyses of his experiences. This and a very subtle sensibility raise his poems to a level which is distinctly created by his art. The common themes of his poems are nature, love, death instinct and the basic loneliness of the human soul. Many of his poems show his intimate knowledge of the traditional Japanese and Chinese poetry.

Nilamani is at present the editor of an Assamese quarterly, Samjna. Earlier he was the editor of the now defunct weekly, Navayug. In 1973 he was awarded the Assam Sahitya Sabha's Raghunath Chaudhury Prize for poetry. In 1977 he received the state's most prestigious Publication Board Literary Award for his collection Kamit, golap aru kamit and, in 1981, the Sahitya Akademi Award for a collection of his poems entitled, Kavita.

PHUKAN, PRABIN (Assamese; b. 1912), a playwright of repute, has been writing plays since the thirties. He made his first appearance with two social plays, Assam Hollywood (1938) and Kal parinay (1939). However, it was only with the publication of the plays, Maniram Dewan (1948) and Lachit Barphukan (1949) that he became famous. Both of them are historical plays written on two heroes in Assam's history. Maniram Dewan was hanged by the British for his attempt to drive them away from the soil of Assam, while Lachit Barphukan, the great Ahom general, had fought the Mughals and defeated Ramsingh, a great general of Emperor Aurangzeb. Since then, Phukan has written a number of social plays including Pramod, Satikar ban (1954) and Bisvarupa (1961) which reflect his social consciousness and sensitive mind. Phukan is one of those who have contributed to the development of one-act plays in Assamese, and Tritaranga (1962) is a collection of three such plays by him.

PHUKAN, RADHANATH (Assamese, b. 1875, d. 1964); scholar and author who wrote in both English and Assamese, was educated at Government High School, Sibsagar, Presidency College (Calcutta) and Calcutta University. In 1897 he passed his M.A. in Physics and graduated in Law from Ripon College (Calcutta) next year.

Some years after he had practised law in the district court at Jorhat, he was appointed Extra Assistant Commissioner in the Assam Civil Service in 1903. Later, he became a Judge.

While he was a student in Calcutta, he used to contribute to the Assamese journals. Composed in early life, 'Kiyano pahara Asamiya hera' (O Assamese, why have you forgotten), his patriotic song, became very popular and is even now on the lips of every educated youth.

After his retirement he took to the study of Indian philosophy. Having been a student of physics, Phukan tried to explain the theory of Samkhya and Vedanta in the light of science and edited the Samkhya karika of Isvarakrishna with the commentary of Gaudapada and also the Brahma sutra of Vadarayana with a long introduction and explanatory notes. He attempted, contrary to the views of the earlier commentators, to prove that there was no basic difference in the theory of the Samkhya and the Vedanta according to him and the Samkhya also admits Brahma. He further sought to explain the cosmology and the causality of the Samkhya with the help of the theory propounded by Jeans. He also leaned heavily on Einstein in finding support for his views on the Vedanta and the Samkhya.

Besides, he wrote small monographs on the theory of rebirth and the Upanishadas and his essays on socio-religious topics were published in Assamese periodicals. For his scholarly contribution to the Assamese literature, he was awarded the degree of D. Litt by Gauhati University.

PHULAMANI O KARUNAR VIVARAN (Bengali)
See under FULMANI O KARUNA VIVARAN.

PHULANI MUTHI (Sindhi) is a collection of essays written by the well-known prose writer, Lalchand Amardinomal Jagtiani (1885-1954), and published by him in 1927. In the introduction to his book, he writes that the essays included in the collection were selected by him from his diary, which contained many more reflective essays full of profound thought. He has included only sixty-six essays in the present book, which can be easily understood by the common Sindhi reader. The writer in all humility calls his collection merely a 'phulani muthi' (A handful of pop-corns), but the work, in fact, is thought provoking and of a high literary standard. He promises to offer blooming and ever-fresh flowers at some later stage, which he actually did by writing his Sada gulab (Ever-fresh roses). It contains fine pieces of poetic-prose, having renderings from Rabindranath Tagore's Gardener, along with some original writings.

The selected essays in the Phulan muthi are on a variety of subjects, such as beauty of nature and environment, religious and ethical problems, critical evaluation of some historical incidents and personalities, instructions on health and physical exercises, inventions of science, sentiments and emotions, different patterns of social structure and psychological behaviour of human beings in different situations of life.

Lalchand's language and style occupy a unique place in Sindhi literature. L.H. Ajwani, a literary historian and critic in Sindhi, points out this aspect in appropriate words: "Lalchand Amardinomal wrote steadily for half a century Sindhi prose of a kind not attempted before. He eschewed all exotic words, phrases and images in his prose and employed only Sindhi words familiar to women and the rural folk. His diction was simple, chaste and stately, and many of his phrases were derived from Shah and Sachal. Almost every one of his paragraphs furnished to the reader proverbs and idioms which were not known to him before."

PHULE, JYOTIBA GOVINDRAO (Marathi; b. 1827, d. 1890) was the founder of the 'Satyashodhak Samaj'. He was a great social reformer and his thought and philosophy played an important role in shaping the modern Maharashtrian society. Hailing from a gardener's family, he had his early education at a Mission school in Pune. In his formative years he was attracted towards the life and work of Shivaji and George Washington. Thomas Paine's book Rights of Man influenced him a great deal. Humiliation at the wedding of a Brahmin friend proved to be a turning point in his life. He then decided to devote his life to the upliftment of the lowly and the women. The exploitation of the lowcastes and women pained him and he started his struggle against social injustice.

In 1848 he started a school for the untouchable girls. He trained his wife Savitribai to dedicate her life to the cause of women's education. He opened more and more schools to popularise his ideas of change through education. His orthodox family did not approve of it and he was driven out of the house. But in spite of such setbacks he introduced various social reforms. In 1863 he opened a home for the destitute women. Whatever he preached, he practised in his personal life too. In 1873 he founded the Satyashodhak Samaj to propagate social equality. In recognition of his great social service he was given the title of 'Mahatma' by the people in 1888.

One of the greatest social thinkers of Maharashtra, Phule wrote mainly for the propagation of social reforms. His books Brahmanache kasab (The brahmin's skill, 1869), Gulamgiri (Slavery, 1873), Shetakarayacha asud (The farmer's whip, 1883), Satsar, Vols. I and II (The essence of truth, 1885), Ishara (The warning, 1885) and Satyashodhak samajowat mangaleshtakasah sarva pujavidhi (The rituals of Satyashodhak Samaj, 1887) speak of his social insights. His book Sarvajanik satyadharma pustak (Practice of truth in society) contains some of his brilliant ideas. His only poetic work was a ballad on Shivaji and a few verses in a metrical form of 'Abhang' which he called Akhand. In his writings he attacked the concept of 'chaturvarnya' and that of heaven and hell which was traditionally a means to exploit the downtrodden and the women. To free them of this mental slavery was his aim. He aimed at a new society based on equality, justice and rationalism. He also suggested some measures for improving the conditions of farmers and workers. His comprehensive social vision made his writings meaningful and relevant to his times.

His language is simple and free from any jargon. Its appeal lies in its earnestness. In some places the emotional turbulence behind it makes it sound a bit aggressive but never loses its appeal because of its persuasive power.

PHULL BINA DALI (Dogri), the fourth novel in Dogri, was first published in 1970. It received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972. Its transcript in Gurumukhi letters was published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages in 1982. This is the first and the last novel by Satyapal Shrivatsa 'Vikal', who died of heart-attack at the time when his novel was being published.

The first three Dogri novels, Shano, Dharan te dhuran and Har beri pattan, are woven around the struggling lives of women characters. Phull bina dali has also been written in the same vein. Its heroine, Soma, has to live with her tragedies all her life. Whereas the heroines of the earlier novels are from the Dogra hills, Soma is a character living in a small town. Her life story also covers a wider span. She is widowed after three years of marriage and is turned out of the house by her in-laws because she is considered to be an ill portent for the family. She takes up the job of a school teacher and marries a colleague defying the social custom and invites criticism from the orthodox society. She silently and patiently faces the situation, though it is painful and agonising.

A special feature of this novel is its language which is full of Dogri idioms and proverbs, the vital force of which makes up for the thematically weak portions of the novel. The author has not only dealt with the problem of widow marriage, but also depicted forcefully the evil practices current in Dogra society, mother-in-law and daughter-in-law conflict, the poverty syndrome and the related problems of lower middle-class families. Although these problems do not emerge naturally from movement of the plot, and coming out as comments by the author, the behaviour of the character is not dictated; it arises naturally from the development of events.

Phull bina dali is an interesting novel, remarkable for its simplicity of narration. It marks an important stage in the development of the Dogri novel and its march towards the more mature and significant novels of Desh Bandhu Dogra 'Nutan' like Qaidi and Pyoke bhejo that followed after a decade or so. Indeed, it carried the tradition forward that was established by the first three Dogri novels.

PHURAILATPAM ATOMBAPU SHARMA (Manipuri; b. 1889, d. 1963) was a veteran educationist, scholar and Indologist. Born in a Manipuri Brahmin family, he got the Panditraj title of the Government Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Calcutta, for his scholarship in Sanskrit. The Manipuri Sahitya Parishad gave him the Govashana Shiromani title in 1948 for his profound scholarship and research in various fields. He wrote several books in Manipuri which include Meitei amasung Meitei leipak (The Meiteis and their country, 1945) Meiteigi ariba dharma (Ancient religion of the Meiteis, 1950), Manipuriya nartan (1951), Manipur sanatana dharma (1952), Manipuri pratibha (1954), Bhangi pareng (1955), Meiteigi sankirtana mahajajna (1959), etc. He translated many Sanskrit classics into Manipuri, some of which are the Rigveda, the Samaveda, several cantos of the Srimadbhagavata, the Gita and the Upanishads. Associated with the administration of the palace of Manipur that controlled Manipuri culture and customs, he was the virtual interpreter of the same for several decades. He founded his own printing and publishing house, the Churachand Press and the Visva Bharati. He was also associated with the publication of daily newspapers and weeklies like the Lalit manjuri patrika (1933) and Bhagyabati patrika (1947). An authority on Manipuri dance, he worked as a research scholar when the present Jawaharlal Nehru Manipur Dance Akademi started in the fifties of this century. Having travelled throughout the whole length and breadth of the country, he imbibed the best traditions in India which broadened his outlook. He became the President of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1960 and received the Sangeet Natak Akademi Award in 1963 as well as a life-long pension from the President of India for his profound scholarship in Sanskrit.

PICHAMURTHY, N. (Tamil; b. 1900, d. 1977) was born and educated up to the Bachelor's Degree in Kumbakonam. Later he studied law in Madras. After his award-winning story 'Mullum rojavum' (Kalaimagal, 1933), he published stories in Manikkodi. He served as the sub-editor of Hanuman and Nava India, and also as the Executive Officer in the Religious Endowment. Pichamurthy can be said to be the pioneer of the New Poetry in Tamil. In 1934 he started this experiment, influenced by Whitman's Leaves of Grass. He felt that versification could be a fetter—and he wanted to liberate Tamil poetry from the fetters of conventional prosody. He says: 'When a profound, real experience created by all these (the different emotions constantly stirred by the stimuli of the outside world), yearns to come out of the prison of mind seeking incarnation in form, it blossoms into poetry by the fusion of imagination, choice of diction and imagery. This poetry may be a simple echo of those stimuli, or blend harmoniously with them or be a critic of life ignoring them. However much we may search for it, poetry, like the breeze, defies explanation. But both can be felt. Experience is the source as well as touchstone of poetry'. (Preface to Kuyilin surithi, 1970). He links new poetry with the new prosody based on stress rather than syllable, and the stress following the speech rhythm. Some critics make a distinction between 'prose poems' and 'new poems'. Whereas in his early prose poems pauses are determined by sentences, in his later new poems as in 'Kokku' the evolution of thought determines them—and this primacy of thought over form, which breaks all fetters into a flow obeying its own rules, is the major feature of his poems. The simplicities of our prosaic experience explode into significant perceptions and this transformation is achieved by powerful imagery. The nucleus of his Vazhithunai is based on myth, but he creates his own vision of art through it. Most of his poems, including his traditional ones in Kuyilin surithi, deal with the myth of art and creativity and the march of revolution. The birds, particularly the nightingale, the stork and the eagle become symbols of poetry. Kattu vathu was his first anthology of 'new poems' (1962). Kuyilin surithi is his anthology of traditional poems.

Pichamurthy's contribution to the genre of short story in Tamil is also equally significant, and K.N. Subramanyam calls Pichamurthy and K.P. Rajagopal the twin doyens of the Tamil short story. Again he divides his short stories into three recognisable periods—the early poetic-mystical stories, the later psychological period, and the last, the most mature period of his writing. 'Watchmen' translated into English by K.N. Subramaniam and included in his anthology Tamil Short Stories (1980) belonging to the last phase, deals with a widow and a child. The boy has to play the role of a watchman for his mother because the world treats a young widow like a tank without a fisherman where everyone can fish. Besides the psychological insight, the story is remarkable for its use of the sustained metaphor. Pichamurthy's short stories run into several anthologies, Pathinettam perukku, Jambarum vestiyum, Mohini Pichamurthy kathaikal and Mankaythalai. He has also written a novellete, Kudumba rakasyam and a play, Kali.

PIDIYAWALI (Rajasthani) is the Rajasthani term for genealogical tables, especially of the princely houses of historical importance. Every erstwhile state in Rajasthan maintained its tables, and regular additions were made to them. Even persons of high ranks attached to these royal houses maintained the tables. The English word 'pedigree' is an exact synonym of 'Pidiyawali'. There has been a special class of bards in Rajasthan who professionally kept the pedigrees of their patrons. They paid annual visits to their patrons to update their records, and the patrons listened with full respect to the achievements of their ancestors. The bards were suitably rewarded for their recitations. The Charanas were another class who followed this profession, besides writing eulogies and histories, and acting as counsellors to their patrons. In fact, every house in Rajasthan that mattered had its own minstrel. These minstrels belonged to many castes and sub-castes, such as Jaga, Bhat, Bahi Bhat, Rao, Kavirao, Rawal, Motisar, Rani Manga, Dhadhi. The genealogical tables they maintained, and still maintain in many cases, are helpful in writing history, but the sad fact is that they are often distorted. The worst thing about their records is the absence of exact dates and the precise chronological order. The family priests also maintained such tables if it suited them. The kings who ruled over Delhi were also variously listed in a number of tables, giving the dates of their birth and death and rulership, even the hour of their coronation. This practice received considerable fillip from Persian historians during the Mughal period. Such genealogical tables are found in libraries and private records, and some of them have been used by historians, or have even appeared in print. The tables are also accompanied by other details in prose which are quite interesting inasmuch as they throw light on their times. Almost all the historians, including Kaviraja Shyamaldas, G.H. Ojha and Tod have given credit to them. 'Kachhawan ri vansavali', 'Rathodan ri pidhiyan' are some of the tables found in manuscript libraries.

PILLAI, CHIDAMBARAM V.O. (Tamil; b. 1872, d. 1936) was a nationalist leader and writer. After completing his school education at St. Francis Xavier High School, Tuttukkuti, he worked as a clerk in the Ottappitaram Taluk Office for some months. Later he left it and studied law, and became a pleader at the Ottappitaram Sub-Magistrate's Court. Later, he shifted his practice to Tuttukkuti. He was always on the side of the poor and the downtrodden.

He was a follower of Bal Gangadhar Tilak and made speeches criticising the British authorities. In 1908, he was accused of sedition, and sentenced to transportation for life. The High Court reduced the sentence to six years' rigorous imprisonment.

During his last years Chidambaram devoted himself to literature. He wrote his autobiography in Tamil verse. He wrote commentaries on some Tamil classics also. The following are his books: Va. U.ci : Suyacharitai (Autobiography), Pari nilayam, Innilai, Santikku margam, Meyyarivu, Meyyaram, Manampol valvu, Tolkappiyam-Ilampuranam-Eluttatikaram and Sivagnanabodham.

PILLAI, DESIKA VINAYAKAM S. (Tamil; b. 1876, d. 1954), popularly known as 'Kavimani' (gem among poets), was born in the southernmost district of Tamilnadu. Educated at Terur and Kottaru, he learnt Tamil from Santhalinga Thambiran and Tiruvavatuturai Mutt. While he was doing his Intermediate he brought out his first poetic work Alakammai achiriya viruttam.

Kavimani started his career as a Tamil teacher in an elementary school and retired as Lecturer in Tamil from Maharaja's Women's College, Trivandrum. His service to Tamil is multi-faceted, though his contribution to children's literature is considered the best. His collection of poems Malarum malaium (Flowers and garlands, 1938) is the first of its kind in the field of children's literature.

As an essayist he contributed many articles to popular journals like Chentamil. He evinced keen interest in rewriting the history of Tamilnadu, and one of his papers on 'Kantalur chalai' is significant in this respect.

Kavimani is also known for his excellent translations. He translated Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia under the title Asiya choti (1941). This work which portrays the life of Lord Buddha has nearly 1800 lines. He also translated the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam as rendered by Fitzgerald in 115 beautiful verses. Apart from these books, he translated many English poems for children which have been included in Malarum malaiyum.

Vinayakam Pillai's penchant for humour and satire is revealed in his Marumakkal vali manmiyam (The glory of sons-in-law system), serialised in the journal Tamilan and later published as a book in 1942. Contrary to the age-old practice of giving one's wealth to sons, the Vellalas of Nanchinad used to give their property to their sister's eldest son (i.e. marumakan). He dwelt on this subject in an article 'Nanchinad Vellalas', published in the Malabar Quarterly Review (1910). In Marumakkal vali manmiyam he brought out the defects of this system in a humorous vein, and it is unquestionably the best of the satiric poems in modern Tamil.

Teviyin kirttanankal (1953) is a collection of his musical compositions. It contains seventy-two pieces and was written at a time when there was an attempt to revive Tamil music in Tamilnadu.

The poems of Kavimani are very simple and rhythmic. Those written for the children have not only simple and sonorous words, but also moral teachings. He is essentially a poet of compassion and gentleness.

Kavimani's Malarum malaiyum is in fifteen parts and contains as many as 1400 poems. This work includes his poems on God, literature, nature, children, the downtrodden and society in general. Here the poet's voice is heard in many notes—pathos, humour, serenity and compassion.

Reviewing his Malarum malaiyum, K. Swaminathan says of Desika Vinayakam Pillai, "A poet of tenderness and sympathy, sensitive to the varied beauties of nature and the sufferings of the minutest living being, he is eclectic rather than rebellious, serenely afloat on a sea of calm, not buffeting against the waves of doom."

PILLAI, N.N. (Malayalam; b. 1918). Playwright, actor and director and, above all, a writer on dramaturgy, N.N. Pillai is a native of Vaikom. He worked for a few years in Malaya in the publicity department of the I.N.A. organised by Subhashchandra Bose, and returned home in 1946. He was again in Malaya for about three years. On his return in 1953, he started an art society named Visvakerala Kala Samiti, which proved a turning point in his life. He began to write and, under the auspices of the Samiti, produced play after play. Of his twenty-five odd plays, Atmabali (Self-sacrifice, 1965) won a State and a Central Government Award, and Pretalokam (The abode of ghosts, 1965) the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award (1966), and Marananrittam (Dance of death, 1967) the Kalyani Krishna Menon Award. Some of the plays were filmed also.

Pillai's Nataka darpanam (Mirror on drama, 1971) is an outstanding contribution to dramaturgy. It reveals his intimate acquaintance with the principles of dramatic writing and performance, both ancient and modern, and both of the West and of the East. His comparative study and evaluation of the oriental and occidental critics of drama won wide acclaim. He defines drama as "the art of emotion, art of imagination, and art of regimentation and concentration". He also demonstrated that Western experimental methods could be employed in the composition and staging of Indian plays.

PILLAIPPERUMAL IYENGAR (Tamil; b. 17th century) was born in Tirumankai, a village in Tamilnadu. He mastered Tamil and Sanskrit literatures. From his boyhood he was religiously inclined and had a strong faith in Vaishnavism. The sleeping deity at Shrirangam attracted him so powerfully that in his later days he was known as Azhakiya Manavala Tachar. The king, hearing of his scholarship and devotion, appointed him in his service. Story goes that one day when he was attending to his duties, he suddenly rose up, took off his upper garment and crushed it with his palms, chanting the name of Lord Krishna. Later, it was learnt that he had extinguished the fire which had broken out in the shrine at Shrirangam. The king offered him permanant residence in the temple, where he wrote Tiruvarankattu antati, Tiruvarankattu malai, Tiruvaranka-k-kalampakam and Chiranka nayakar uchal. In order to propitiate Lord Venkateshvara he also wrote Tiruvenkatattu antati and Tiruvenkata malai. Later, he wrote Alakar antati on the deity of Tirumalirunchola and Nurrettu Tirupati antati, celebrating the one hundred sacred Vaishnavite temples situated in the different parts of the country.

After the Alvars, Pillaipperumal Iyengar occupies a prominent place as a poet. His collection of eight poems, titled Ashta prabandham, is a significant work in the history of Tamil literature.

Kalampakam, which means a garland of varying flowers, is a very popular literary genre. Pillaipperumal's Tiruvaranka-k-kalampakam consists of a hundred verses in a variety of metres, written in praise of Lord Tiruvarankam. Many verses dealing with the 'akam' theme enhance the excellence and beauty of this fine piece of art.

Tiruvarankattu antati consisting of a hundred verses written in 'kattalaikkalitturai' metre arranged in the antati scheme describes the holy place, Tiruvarankam. In this poem Iyengar prays for the grace of the Lord. He advises people to give up their worldly pursuits and become servants of the Lord.

Tiruvarankattu malai is otherwise known as Koyil malai. It consists of 111 verses in kattalaikkalitturai metre. It is termed 'malai' (garland) because it is like a garland placed at the feet of the Lord. In this work again Iyengar extols the glory of the Lord, and describes the ten 'avataras' in great detail.

Chirankanayakaruchal, consisting of thirty-two verses in enchirachiriya viruttam, is in honour of the Lord of Shrirangam. It is one of the ninety-six varieties of prabandham in achiriya viruttam. Tiruvenkatattu antati consists of a hundred verses composed in kattalaikkalitturai metre arranged in antati form. It is in praise of Tiruvenkatam, one of the 108 sacred spots where Lord Vishnu made His abode. Figures of speech such as 'tiripu' and 'yamakam' embellish the beauty of the verses. Many of the verses celebrate the greatness of the Lord Tirumal. The allegory used in the poem is of a high order in the fifteen verses on akam theme and enhances the literary beauty of these verses.

Tiruvenkata malai, a prabandha consisting of one hundred verses in venpa metre, extols the greatness of Tiruvenkatam in the first two lines of each verse and the glory of the Lord of Tiruvenkatam in the other lines.

Alakar antati, another prabandham consisting of one hundred verses in kattalaikkalitturai metre arranged in the antati scheme, is on the Lord of Tirumalirunchola malai, otherwise known as Alakar koyil. The greatness of the Lord and the faith of the devotees are described in these verses. Twenty-one verses on the akam theme enrich the beauty of this prabandham. Nurrettu Tirupati antati consists of 108 verses in nerisai venpa metre arranged in antati scheme on the 108 sacred spots celebrated by the Alvars. The beauty and grace of the Lord, the scenic spots of pilgrimage and some insights into Vaishnava philosophy find expression in this work.

PILU (Punjabi). All that is known about Pilu is that he was a contemporary of Guru Arjan Dev, the fifth Sikh Guru. Two compositions of a very different kind are attributed to him: one, a collection of songs in a melancholy tone like that of a recluse or a hermit; and the other, the 'var' or the lay, of the love of Mirza and Sahiban which has no overtones of Platonic intent. Perhaps, Bawa Budh Singh is not altogether wrong in suggesting that there might be two different persons of the name of Pilu. Pilu, the hermit, is said to have gone to Arjan Dev to get his compositions included in the holy Granth, but Guru Arjan Dev did not oblige him because of his cynical attitude towards this world. On the other hand, the 'var' of Mirza and Sahiban is a tragic love story without a trace of Platonism in it. In the Platonic tradition of love in Punjabi, it is considered a story of imperfect love, while the love stories of Hir and Ranjha, and Sohini and Mahival are considered stories of perfect love. It seems that Pilu who wrote the romance of Mirza Sahiban was a different person, and he was the man given fulsome praise by two later romance writers, Hafiz Barkhurdar and Ahmed Yar, who were staunch Muslims at the same time.

The romance of Mirza and Sahiban, as narrated by Pilu, is truly the characteristic of the tragedy of romance in Punjabi life where a woman is denied the right to choose her husband independently and the choice of parents is imposed on her.

In this story when Sahiban runs away with Mirza, who is her first cousin, against the wishes of her father, the lovers are pursued by Sahiban's brothers and kinsmen, who overtake Mirza and kill him after which Sahiban kills herself.

The lay is composed in 'dohiras' and the language touches the heart of the Punjabis for its beauty of expression and depth of pathos. Therefore, the praise lavished on the poet by his two successors seems well-justified.

PINGAL (Rajasthani). Ordinarily the term 'Pingal' stands for a treatise on prosody. Scholars draw our attention to one Nagaraj Pingal who is said to have written a treatise on prosody. Some critics are of the opinion that he was none else than Patanjali, the author of Mahabhashya. Reference is also made to the myth of the serpent-king playing a trick on Garuda who wanted to learn some technical details of prosody from Pingal. The metre 'Bhujang prayat' is indicative of that mythical event. We have, in fact, a number of books showing Pingal's relation to prosody. Prominent among them are Prakrit Pingalam (13-14th c.), Lakhapata Pingal, Ranpingal, Hari Pingal, Pingal Prakash, Pingala Shiromani (all written between the 16th and 18th centuries). It seems the name of the scholar Pingal was gradually used for treatises on prosody. In course of time all poetry composed in metres explained by Pingal came to be known as Pingal poetry. This differentiation from other classes of poetry branded the language of this kind of poetry as Pingal language. Another language which was used especially by the charans in Rajasthan was Dingal which term, according to scholars like L.P. Tessitori, was coined on the pattern of Pingal and was intended to be a match for it.

Scholars like Motilal Menariya are of the opinion that Pingal stands for Brajbhasha which is an offshoot of Shaurseni Apabhramsha, while Dingal is derived from Gurjar Apabhramsha. He is, perhaps, not totally correct in branding Pingal as a mere synonym of Brajbhasha. Though the language fits in the overall structure of Brajabhasha and is governed by the same grammar, the poetic vocabulary carries the influence of Shaurseni Apabhramsha to a considerable degree. It may, therefore, be safely taken as that form of Brajbhasa which was a favourite with the poets of Rajasthan and was in use in poetical works dealing with heroism, devotion, didactics, etc. Prithviraj Raso by Chand Bardai, as it existed without interpolations during the time of Prithviraj Chauhan or immediately after his death, may be counted amongst the foremost works in Pingal. Among other important Pingal works written in Rajasthan are Vijaipalraso by Nahar Singh (19th c. V.S.), Vanshabhaskar by Suryamall (19th c. V.S.), Bhaktamal by Nabhadas (17th c. V.S.), works of Parashuram Dev (17th c. V.S.), works of Jankavi (17th c. V.S.), Jaswant udyot by Dalpati Mishra (17th. c. V.S.), Ratanraso by Kumbhakarana (18th. c. V.S.), Hammirraso by Jodhraj (18th c. V.S.), Avatarcharit by Narsinghdas (18th c. V.S.), Ranaraso by Dayaldas (17th c. V.S.), Virvinod by Ganeshpuri (19th c. V.S.), Pandav yasendu chandrika by Swaroopdas (19th c. V.S.). Saint-poets of all sects, such as Dadupanthi, Niranjani, Ramacharani, Laldasi, Vallabha sampradayi, have mostly written in Pingal. Some of these works have been pride possessions of litterateurs and devotees. Sundardas of Dadupanth was one of the celebrated poets of his age.

There was a sort of hostility between Pingal and Dingal, as protagonists of both the languages had their own pockets of influence and would not allow others to enter their field. Indications of such a jealousy were available as far back as the 16th century when Dingal was described as a masculine language and Pingal as a feminine one. But gradually the Bhats, who wrote mostly in Pingal gained proficiency in Dingal and the Charanas who were protagonists of Dingal, wrote in Pingal. This diminished the possibility of any further antagonism between them.

PINGAL SHIROMANI (Rajasthani) is a work on Rajasthani poetics by Vachak Kushal Labh, a Jain scholar, who composed it about 1579 during the course of teaching his pupil, Prince Har Raj of Jaisalmer. Some of the scholars ascribe it to Har Raj, which is not correct.

The first four chapters deal with the definitions and illustrations of Varnik, Matrik, Sankar and Dandak metres and their derivations. In the fifth chapter the author defines 'pratyayas' and also gives certain prosodic diagrams. In the sixth chapter rhetoric has been taken up. The writer discusses 75 figures of speech out of which 72 are 'shabdalankaras' and the rest three 'arthalankars'. The author has also tried to demonstrate the 'chitralankars', planned on the basis of a successive arrangement of syllables. A few of the ideographic figures have been narrated. He has also explained the methods of the preparation of 'varna kosthakas'.

The author has dicussed 'Upamalankar' at length, which we find in almost all standard works on poetics, though he has explained a few without placing them under upamalnkar. The definitions of these alankars have been borrowed from ancient and contemporary Sanskrit works citing the authorities wherever required, but the mode of interpretation is his own. Mostly he has followed the works of Jayadev and Appaya Dikshit in the presentation of definitions and examples in one and the same verse.

The seventh chapter contains the Udingala nam mala, the first work on lexicography so far available in Rajasthani language.The git prakarana deals with the prosody of Dingal gits which, according to him, was the result of inspiration gained from two Bhat brothers, Amil and Hamil, the court poets of king Akbar.

The composition suffers from some flaws like irregular chapterisation, inaccurate titles, and disparity between illustrations and difinitions.

PINGALA (Sanskrit) is the author of the rules on 'chhandas' or metre and his work is known as Pingala-chhanda-sutra. The origin and development of metres of Vedic and classical Sanskrit make an interesting study. The Vedas themselves are often referred to by the term Chhandas. Chhanda or the metre of the Vedas is one of the six traditional ancillaries of the Vedas and this technique of expression has, therefore, its origin in the Vedas. The process of hardening the metrical structure, however, went on in a slow measure as a result of the desire for symmetry.

The transition from the Vedic to classical Sanskrit, so far as metres are concerned, is not very distinct, and the question why in classical Sanskrit the use of metre came to be regarded as sine qua non remains unanswered.

The Sutra ascribed to Pingala deals with the Vedic, Sanskrit and Prakrit metres. In short, the operation of metres in the three allied forms of the languages is treated there. While the first and the second part, i.e. rules relating to Vedic and Sanskrit metres are by Pingala, the chapter on Prakrit metre is a later addition. Though Pingala has dealt with Vedic and Prakrit metres in connection with the classical Sanskrit metres, he is concerned more with Sanskrit than the other two. Hence the importance of Pingala chhanda sutra is as great as classical Sanskrit itself.

The Sanskrit metre is broadly divided into two categories—'jati' and 'vritta'. The jati class of metre, is measured by matra, i.e. the length of the sound of vowels, and the vritta class is measured by the number of syllables. Pingala adopts the system of algebraic symbols, using la for a short (laghu) and ga for a long (guru) syllable, ma for a molossus, and so on. Pingala is thus regarded as the originator of this science, though there were stray and imperfect discussions on this subject before his work. His work is commented upon by Halayudha and in the course of explaining the algebraic formulae Halayudha adds something new. Pingala's theory and discussion are partly incorporated in Bharata's Natyashastra and Agnipurana. It is interesting to note that a work called Shrutabodha on Sanskrit metre is ascribed, without much logic, to Kalidasa. It describes the formation of some metres, where the algebraic formula of Pingala has not been used. Gangadasa and many others have followed Pingala in their works on metres. Pingala ranks as an ancient sage, being sometimes identified with Patanjali. It is evident from the metres he names and describes that they are not drawn from the 'Kavya' literature which has been handed down to us. Perhaps this suggests a period of transition and points to some extinct Sanskrit texts which experimented with these metres. Some of the names of metres used by Pingala lead to the conclusion that there was a large body of erotic poetry composed in those metres, and their names were mostly derived from the moods of the heroine, for instance, 'Kantotpida' (the plague of her lovers), 'Kutilagati' (she of crooked gait), 'Tanumadhya' (she of slender waist), 'Vasantatilaka' (the pride of spring). However, these may also be purely imaginative names.

Assuming that Pingala preceded Bharata, author of Natyashastra and Agnipurana, and taking into cognizance the oblique reference to Mahabhashya in his work, he may be placed in the first century B.C.

PINGALI, NAGENDRA RAO (Telugu; b. 1901, d. 1971) was an eminent dramatist. Born at Razam in the Vizianagaram district of Andhra Pradesh, he spent the first four and a half decades of his life mainly at Machilipatnam. He joined the Andhra Jatiya Kalashala for his education and soon came under the spell of three eminent men, Mutneeru Krishnarao, Pathabhi and Kopalle Hanumantharao. He studied Telugu, Sanskrit and Indian history. Fascination for India's heritage and culture and love of freedom manifest themselves in his writings.

Nagendra Rao's flair for dramatisation came to the fore in the company of the Natarajasekhara D.V. Subba Rao. He soon became associated with Subba Rao's theatre group and wrote plays, with historical and social themes, which the famous actor produced at various centres in Andhra. The more famous of them were Vindhya Rani (1928), which owed its inspiration to Oscar Wilde's Duchess of Padua; Naraju (1929), a historical play; Maro prapancham, a social play; and Kshatrahindu which deals with a historical theme. Playlets, sketches and occasionally a short-story or two by him, found place in the columns of Krishna patrika. In spite of the fact that his plays were widely popular, Nagendra Rao was indifferent to suggestions about bringing them out in book-form. Thus two of his plays, Vindhya Rani and Naraju, are still in manuscripts.

At Madras Nagendra Rao turned to cinema. He was first introduced to the Vauhini Pictures and subsequently he was mainly associated with the Vijaya Productions. For Vijaya Productions he was a song-writer for all their pictures. He also wrote several film scripts.

In 1944 the Andhra Nataka Kala Parishad at Vijayawada honoured Nagendra Rao as a great playwright. His pictures Mahakavi Kalidasu and Mahamantri Timmarusu received state awards.

The style of his writing was crisp, clear and easy. His wit was profound; his humour only tickled and rarely hurt.

He had a sense of the ludicrous in life. His innovative use of language made him very popular as a song-writer. But his works are not available today, either because they were not published in book-form, or because of neglect in preservation.

PINGE, RAVINDRA (Marathi; b. 1926) did his B.A. in Economics and worked as an officer in the Education Department of Maharashtra for fifteen years and later as producer of Marathi literary programmes for twenty years at the All India Radio, Bombay. He has been a literary columnist for different journals in Marathi and has authored fifteen books. His three books of personal essays received the Maharashtra government awards: Shatpavali, Mokale Akash, Anand-vrat. He was elected President of the regional Marathi Sahitya Sammelan at Indore.At present he is Secretary of the literary wing of the Mumbai Marathi Sahitya Sangh, Bombay. He bagged three awards for the best novel, best short-story, and best radio-play for his works. He is widely travelled, has given many talks, and written travelogues. His other notable works are: Parashuramachi savali (novel); Prajaktachi phandi (short stories); Anandachya dahi disha (travalogue); paschimeche putra (introducing foreign writers).

PINJARE KI URAN (Hindi). A prolific writer, Yashpal wrote about 200 short stories collected in sixteen volumes. Of these Pinjare ki uran is his first collection, consisting of twenty stories which he had written while in jail. The name of the book is suggestive. 'Pinjara' (cage) stands for prison and 'Uran' means soaring—the flight of imagination which takes the author to the past. The stories are based on his past memories.

Yashpal was essentially a realist and wrote about men in society and their problems—social, economic and psychological. Therefore even in this first collection, in spite of their sentiment and imagination, the stories are related to real life. Most of them depict various problems of women, social orthodoxy and economic disparities. The subject of a few is love and romance.

Yashpal is a writer of progressive views. Even his concept of art is unorthodox. In his two stories connected with artists—'Makrila' and 'Nirash Rasika'—he resents the approach of the egoistic artists who are blind to the realities of life.

Yashpal's views about woman in society are progressive, at times even revolutionary. To him she is an exploited and tortured person because of her economic dependence on man. The stories 'Prem ka sar', 'Pahar ki smriti', 'Tisri Sita', 'Prayashchita' and 'Parai' present various problems. In the first two he shows how man out of his lust entices and betrays woman, thus forcing her to lead a life of sin. 'Prayashchita' is a tale of a young girl who at the behest of her father lives in a 'gurukul' and tries to lead a life of celibacy but is unable to suppress her sexual urge. She feels guilty and commits suicide.

There are three stories depicting economic disparity between the classes and the inhuman behaviour of the rich towards the poor. 'Karmaphala' is the story of a poor woman who, failing to find shelter in rain during a cold night, loses her child on the footpath, while a rich lady living in a palatial building cannot stand the shrieks of the bereaved mother and asks her servant to drive her away, and prays to God to punish her for disturbing the sleep of her child wrapped up in cosy quilts. 'Dukhi-dukhi' tells of a man who, due to hunger and starvation, decides to beg, and of a prostitute who is prepared to sell her body for a handful of grains. 'Dukha' presents a contrasting picture of a rich man's imaginary pain and a poor man's real grief. In a few stories Yashpal strikes at orthodoxy and superstitions.

For revealing his characters, Yashpal follows the age-old technique of unravelling them through incidents, situations, conversations, self-mortification and mental conflicts. At places he employs symbolism also. In 'Parloka', Mattu and Malli represent European colonialism and the common Indian who lives on hope. In Pinjare ki uran, which is his first collection of stories, Yashpal does not make any significant experiment in the technique of story-telling, but what strikes the readers at once is the end of a few stories. As Yashpal writes with a purpose, he keeps the central idea suspended, and when at the end it explodes the reader is shaken deep to the skin. The impact of the stories is thus quite powerful.

PIO PUTTAR (Punjabi). There is no gainsaying the fact that with Surinder Singh Narula (b.1917) the Punjabi novel moves into the realm of ideas and experimentation. Although he has written about a dozen novels, his Pio puttar (1946) is considered to be his representative creation in Punjabi fiction. It is a novel of its own kind in which Amritsar, a historical city of Punjab, has been personified as the main character, answering to the name of Hira Singh. In fact, Narula, while presenting a vivid picture of composite Punjabi culture, as it unfolds itself in Amritsar, has given a description of various ups and downs to which this city was subjected during the period. Since the writer had an emotional attachment with this city right from his childhood, he left Lahore in 1944 and went to Amritsar to settle down there. While recalling the various incidents connected with this city, as heard by him from his father, he decided to immortalise its cultural heritage through this literary creation, Pio puttar.

After settling down in Amritsar, he set out to make a historical and cultural survey of the city and took notes from the old records of the Municipal Committee. He established rapport with various writers, scholars and academicians of the city, who supplied him all the information he needed for writing the novel. Thus, while painting a beautiful picture of this city, he personified it in the form of his main character, Hira Singh, placing him in the cultural milieu of Punjab.

Narula gives the details of various historical and cultural developments of the city during the years 1895-1918, such as the incidents of Kama Gata Masu, Kuka movement, Indian freedom struggle and emergence of various social and religious organisations like Singh Sabha and Arya Samaj, etc. While describing the cultural life of Punjab, the writer has beautifully depicted various cultural values, political leanings, social convictions, superstitions and dogmas in Punjabi life through such characters of this novel as Thakur Singh and Gurdit Singh. He has also presented a very interesting psychological analysis of Punjab's joint family system, along with the sharp conflicting views of the older and younger generations, although the tradition-ridden characters of the novel submit to the values of the older generation in the end.

Pio puttar is the first Punjabi novel in which for the first time a shift from the mere narrative to characterisation in a realistic style is observed. In this fictional classic, the writer has beautifully depicted the clash of generations against the background of urban life. The author handles the material artistically and tries to build up a fictional sensibility, using western techniques.

PIPA (Rajasthani) was a saint-poet the details of whose life and time are as little known as those of any other saint-poet of the medieval period. Cunningham put the year of his birth between 1360 and 1385 as mentioned in Khilachipur ki khyat. Farquhar has mentioned 1425 as the year of his birth, while Pitambardatt Barthwal puts him between 1353 and 1403. The followers of Pipaji, however, believe that he flourished between 1323 and 1384. Parashuram Chaturvedi, on the strength of some of Pipaji's own writings, places the year of his birth between 1408 and 1418. To arrive at an accurate date it is necessary to examine carefully the Khyat and the facts mentioned therein. Nabhadas in his Bhaktamal has mentioned Pipaji as a disciple of Ramanand. Priyadas, the eminent commentator of Bhaktamal, as well as the authors of other Bhatkamalas, alongwith Anantdas, the author of Pipaji ki Parachi, has given a detailed description of his supernatural feats and included him among the twelve disciples of Ramanand. A majority of modern scholars have taken this as a fairly firm ground for bringing about a certain consistency in the varying details of his life.

It is worth mentioning that no scholar other than Parashuram Chaturvedi has tried to search for intrinsic evidence in the composition of Pipaji. Manuscripts available so far have revealed only 25 padas and 10 sakhis (couplets) which may be set to music in different 'ragas'. The earliest manuscript copied out somewhere in 1525 contains only 17 padas of the saint-poet. Two of them make a reference to Namdev and Kabir, while one of them refers to Raidas only. These two padas are also found, along with others, in other manuscripts as well. Traditionally, these two padas have been regarded as the authentic compositions of Pipaji. It may also be kept in mind that Pipaji never called Ramanand his 'guru' in any of his padas or couplets. As Kabir died in 1448 and Raidas two or three years later, Pipaji's time may safely be taken as one between 1383 and 1453. His padas are full of the spirit of submission, devotion, futility of pilgrimage, pursuit of the highest element in life, and craving for union with the eternal. His sakhis have a didactic fervour; they extol widsom and uphold the importance of the Guru. Pipaji's language is simple, unadorned Rajasthani. He occupies an emient place in the devotional literature of Rajasthan.

PIRATAPA MUDALIYAR CHARITTIRAM (Tamil), or the life and adventures of Pratapa Mudaliyar, was the first novel in Tamil, published in 1879. Written by S. Vedanayagam Pillai (1826-1889), a distinguished prose writer, novelist, poet and social activist, this is a significant novel in Tamil.

Vedanayagam Pillai wanted to import the Western literary form of the novel into Tamil. For this purpose he selected the story of a Tamil family that would provide him with ample opportunities to portray the Tamil cultural ethos. In the English preface to the novel, Vedanayagam Pillai set down his motivations and purpose: "The principal personages are the hero's mother Sundari Anni and his wife Gnanambal, both being ladies of high birth and fortune, with every accomplishment, both personal and mental, and endowed with every estimable quality that could adorn the female sex. The father and the father-in-law of the hero are uneducated native gentlemen in high life, with all their eccentricities and singularities of character. There are many subordinate characters affording examples of filial, fraternal and conjugal affection, chastity , universal benevolence, integrity, gratitude, etc. This work contains faithful pictures of the national character, domestic life, habits and manners of the people in Southern India, interspersed with many amusing anecdotes and intersting stories. I have inculcated piety towards God and pointed out the relative and social duties of life."

The novel, didactic in tone, detailing the adventures and misadventures of Piratapa Mudaliyar, narrated in the first person singular, is loosely structured, with long lectures administered with good humour. Also a number of comic interludes and anecdotes derived from folklore relieve the didactic terseness of the long dissertations indulged in by the principal characters. In structure, this novel has many similarities with the Panchatantra. A number of stories are woven into the main narrative to provide verisimilitude and to aid or abet the denouement. Some keen critics hear echoes of Samuel Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith in a reading of this novel. The success which attended this novel encouraged Vedanayagam Pillai to launch himself into his next novel, Suguna Sundari.

PISSOLLIM (Konkani) is a collection of Manohar Rai Sardessai's short poems, published in 1970. His earlier anthology Zayo zuyo (Jasmine buds, 1970) had a certain unity with an undercurrent of sadness running through them; Pissollim (Butterflies) is more varied in form and content. Along with the note of melancholy there is a satirical vein here, at times bordering on cynicism. The author reflects on love, meditates on life, has a dig at the rich, laughs at human follies and pities their weaknesses. The verses have a rhythm but no common metrical pattern. In some cases rhyme is absent, but there is an internal rhythm conveying meaning and the mood. Its alliteration and play on words make it an enjoyable reading, but difficult for translation at times into other languages. Here are a few examples: "Duddu asunui girestak bhogta dukh/Hench mhoje goribichem mhaka sukh" (The only solace I get from my poverty is that even the rich are unhappy); "Khin khin meztanach jinen nagoilo; bhuim bhuim khantanach tanen zagoilo" (As I counted the moments, life cheated me; as I was digging the earth, thirst overwhelmed me); "Sharant namvam konshamk/Ganvamt namvam monshank" (In a city, corners have names, in a village faces have names.); "Hanv mhakach sodtam tenna lok mhonttat; ho vatt chukta" (When I go in search of myself, people say, I have lost my way); "Mhajem paul kidyak oddlam? Hea rostean mhaka adaila" (You ask me why I have halted: these very roads have blocked my way); "Mollbantlea devak devllan vharun konnem dhamplem dar? Bhottak vichar" (Who has taken the gods of the skies to the temple and closed the door? Ask the priest!). What Armando Menezes said about Zayo zuyo could as well apply to Pissollim: "A precious little volume which is reminiscent in its discontinuity and epigrammatic character of Tagore's 'Stray Birds' but is otherwise entirely original and with the typical Konkani flavour." The book received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1980.

PISTOL AMA KUNDALLEI AMA (Manipuri) is a collection of twelve short stories by E. Dinamani Singh published in 1981. It won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1982. These stories deal with common, everyday themes and incidents and are told in the author's own distinctive style. He has a sense of humour as he looks at human follies and foibles. 'Maha yenshang shangare', 'Hotel ama', 'Meeting ani' and 'Gilas ahum' are stories which satirise human weaknesses. Such short stories as 'Prayagki ahing ama', 'Druta bilambita' and 'Ichel khakkraba tirtha macha macha' depict human relationship with subtlety.

E. Dinamani Singh looks at life with genial humour. To him life with all its accessories is a playhouse of so many human complexes. But he often tries to understand, appreciate and sympathise with the characters involved in these problems. His language is mildly satirical and the use of rhetorical questions in short but sharp and meaningful dialogues makes it distinctive in Manipuri.

Pistol ama kundallei ama is a landmark in Manipuri literature.

PISURLEKAR, PANDURANG SAKHARAM (Marathi; b. 1894, d. 1969) was a scholar and historian. He was deeply interested in History from his childhood. After graduation he took the teacher's training course and then studied law. He began his career as a school teacher in a small town called Bicholi. Pisurlekar had a good command over five languages, namely Portugese, English, French, Konkani, Sanskrit. He had learnt the Modi script too. Most of his published work is in Marathi and Portugese. He worked for some thirty years in the Department of Archives and Records and retired as its Director in 1961. His main stress was on methodology for preservation and maintenance of records, and he published an exhaustive index and some guidebooks in this regard. After the liberation of Goa, he took over as Director of the Centre for Historical Research at Panaji, established by the University of Bombay.

He wrote a number of scholarly articles and essays based on his research. He has some ten volumes on the history and culture of India in Portugese to his credit. His Portugese Marathi sambandh arthat Portugesanchya daptaratil marathyancha itihas (1967) is considered a scholarly treatise on the history of Marathas.

His research earned him quite a few honours and awards. The Government of Portugal honoured him with the title of the Knight of the Military Order of Santiago (1935). He was the gold medalist of the Royal Society of Bengal (1948) and the Asiatic Society, Bombay, (1953). The University of Lisbon conferred on him the degree of D. Litt. in appreciation of his valuable research.

PITCHAYYA SASTRI, DEEPALA (Telugu; b. 1894, d. 1984) was born at Bommarajupalli in Guntur district. He was initiated into Sanskrit and Telugu literature by his father. Later, he became the disciple of Tirupati Venkata Kavulu and was introduced to Telugu poetry. His acquaintance with music made him proficient in the art of reciting Telugu poetry. At the age of fifteen, he wrote a shataka titled Bhakta kalpadruma.

In 1915, Pitchayya Sastri became acquainted with Seshagiri Rao, a literary enthusiast, under whose influence he wrote Kanana prahasanam. Together they collected several ancient palm leaf manuscripts. Pitchayya Sastri also came into contact with Veturi Prabhakara Sastry, and the two of them collected innumerable 'chatuvu' poems. In the process, Pitchayya Sastry went to Nellore, settled there and published Chatupadya ratnakaram. Under the patronage of the Reddys of Nellore, he participated in several 'avadhanams', 'goshtis' and talks. He handed over his collection of manuscripts to the Andhra Sahitya Parishad.

A difference of opinion developed between Pitchayya Sastri and the pupils of Vedam Venkataraya Sastri at Nellore about the literary merits of their respective teachers. As a result, he put the several commentaries of Vedam Venkatraya Sastry to severe scrutiny and exposed the flaws in his works through books like Odarpu. He also exposed the flaws of Vedam in his commentary on Sarangadhara charitra by Chemakura Venkata Kavi and published his own commentary on that ancient work under the title Jitakasi.

At the age of forty, Pitchayya Sastri took to teaching. Meanwhile, he engaged himself in writing. He translated the Raghuvamsha and Meghaduta of Kalidasa, Dashakumaracharita of Dandi and the plays of Bhasa into Telugu. He wrote poems like 'Pranayakusumam', 'Suvarna mekhala' and 'Nellori galivana'. His works like Sahitya samiksha and Drona prashasti stand witness to his erudition and critical ability. Later, he joined the editorial board set up by the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi to edit Pothana's Bhagavata. The result of the work was Bhagavata patha parishilanam.

PIYALI PHUKAN (Assamese) is one of the outstanding historical plays of the post-Independence period. It is not the product of a particular playwright, but a joint literary venture of the Nowgong Dramatic Club, written immediately after Independence when the first flush of the joy of freedom had not died out. The play was first published in 1948, and since then two more editions have been published. The play depicts the martyrdom of Piyali Phukan, the crippled son of Bhadan Barphukan, the last Viceroy of the Ahom king at Gauhati, who invited the Burmese to invade Assam in order to wreak vengeance on his personal enemy, Punananda Burgohain, the Prime Minister of the last Ahom king, Chandrakanta Simha (1810-1818). Defeating the Burmese marauders, the British occupied Assam. The Ahom nobles could not reconcile themselves to their status of a subject under the new colonial administration of the British. Piyali Phukan, rebelled against the British. He was supported by the scions of some noble families and tribal leaders of the north-eastern region. The rebels started it by setting fire to the British arsenal at Sibsagar. The revolt was nipped in the bud by the British who arrested the ring leaders including the kingpin, Piyali Phukan. They were charged with treason and revolt against the government. Piyali Phukan was sentenced to death by hanging while the rest were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. This revolt took place in 1830. Piyali's associates were Dhenudhar Konwar, Dhananjay Gohin, Jiuram Duliya Barua, Bom Singhpho, Rupchandra Konwar, Deuram Dihingia Phukan and Piyali Barua. All of them received punishment ranging from one year to several years of imprisonment. The play introduces all those characters who conspired against the British.

The play contains seven scenes, not grouped under acts. The stages of the development of the plot are depicted in the seven scenes. The play opens with a piercing plaintive cry of a woman in a dark night in a deserted area of Charaideu, the place where the last remains of the Ahom kings are entombed. The plaintive note creates an atmosphere of supernatural awe and fear. The rows of burial tombs lend poignancy to the situation. In such a setting the conspirators headed by Piyali Phukan meet to plan their course of action against the British. The woman crying in the opening scene is only an agent of the conspirators and gathers for them information from the British camp to which she has access as a 'nautch' girl. The subsequent scenes show the activities of the rebels as well as some domestic life of Piyali Phukan, revealing their patriotism and unflinching faith in their ideal. The reactionary role played by Maniram Sadhanidar (later known as Maniram Dewan, a martyr in the 1857 rebelion), Haranath Barua and a few others is also painted side by side. The last scene in which Piyali is brought to the gallows brings out the tragedy of a physically crippled, but mentally robust man, a heroic patriot, fighting against heavy odds. The last words he speaks standing on the gallows are not only surcharged with patriotic fervour, but are equally prophetic in utterance. They continue to linger in the mind of the audience even after the curtain has dropped on the characters.

Every scene of the play is full of tension and the dramatic suspense is maintained throughout the entire play. The dialogue is both dramatic and racy, the plot well-knit, and Piyali Phukan stands out prominently against other characters. He is the guiding and moving spirit of the play and, unlike the heroes of classical tragedies, does not suffer from a tragic flaw. His only shortcoming appears to be his taking upon himself a task which is beyond his capacity.

The tragic gloom of the play is somewhat relieved by the humorous role of Narayan, the servant of Piyali, but he also dies a martyr facing bullets from the British soldiers. The play is successful both as a literary work and as a stage-play.

PIYAR JI PIYAS (Sindhi) is a novel by Gobind Malhi, who is one of the outstanding fictioneers in Sindhi, having written nearly two dozen novels and scores of short stories. This novel which was selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1973 is, of course, not the best among his works.

The plot revolves round the usual theme of a beautiful woman's vicissitudes caused by man's lustful desire to use her as a plaything. Mohini, a middle-class girl, becomes a victim of her brother-in-law's evil intention at the age of thirteen, who viciously tries to lure her to illicit relationship, but is restrained by the watchful father, Bansiram. Mohini suffers shame and humiliation, the agony of which lingers on for the rest of her life.

Next, a young man, Anand, who has participated in the 'Quit India' movement, and now in the garb of a reformer, championing the cause of women's upliftment, being neighbour to the Bansirams, comes closer to Mohini on the pretext of educating her. But when he makes advances, Mohini reminds him of being unfaithful to his wife by professing love for her. Anand wreaks vengeance on her by persuading her father through subtle insinuations about her character, and gets her married to an uncouth and ugly-looking relative of his, Heman by name, so that after marriage she could be an easy prey to his devilish designs.

Heman, on the very first night, in a drunken state, outrages Mohini, shattering her dream of bliss of the bridal night. This leaves a deep scar on her heart and her longing for real love becomes still more gnawing.

The scene that was rooted in rural Sindh, after the partition of the country, shifts to India. Parmanand, a mill-owner and a distant relative of Heman, employs him at Bareilly. Parmanand soon falls a prey to Mohini's charms and tries to entice her with the promise of bringing prosperity to the family. One night in a drunken state, Parmanand makes a criminal advance to satisfy his lust when Mohini is alone but she slaps him and sends him rolling on the ground. This costs Heman his job. They shift to Bombay and settle at a refugee camp in Chembur.

Next come two god-men. First, a sham but polished 'Dada' (in the religious sense), who masquerades behind the saffron robe of the Radha-Krishna-Spiritual-Love-Cult and entraps Mohini. She, however manages to escape. Then Jyoti Anand, a rustic Sadhu, who meets her through sheer accident. Here a strange side of Mohini's character is revealed. The Sadhu does not angle for her but Mohini, betraying a monkeyish trait, involves the Sadhu in a hide and seek game. He goes off his balance, and one day urges Mohini to share bed with him, just once. On her refusal he overpowers her, but Mohini frees herself from his clutches too, and the Sadhu leaves ignominiously.

The story ends with Ghansham Makhijani, a teacher and social reformer, who at the outset tries to blackmail her, but Mohini disarms him with wit and womanly skill.

The plot is no doubt juicy and colourful, but too long for a short novel and a bit contrived. Strangely, half a dozen men enter Mohini's life in succession and they are meticulously selected from different walks of life to show villainy of man. In a narration of 170 pages, no character reaches a take-off stage. There are, of course, quite a few glimpses in Mohini's character that endear her to the reader. The exposure of the crumbling social values and the moral erosion of society are boldly reflected in the narration.

Mohini's constant cry for real love is an enigma that eludes her throughout the novel. There is quite a lot of sprinkling of dialogue on the spirituality of love, the longing of the soul for pure love and the carnality of bodily desires. But all this is skin-deep; it does not cut much deeper into the mind of the characters playing the drama.

PLATTS, JOHN THOMSON (Urdu; b.1830, d.1904), one of the British orientalists, was born in Calcutta. When his father, Robert Platts, died in England, John was very young. After Robert's death, the family passed through stringent financial circumstances. John Platts, therefore, had his schooling in an ordinary school at Bedford. He came back to India when he was in his twenties and took up the job of a teacher (1858-59) of Mathematics in the Benaras College. Next year he was appointed in-charge of Saugor School in Madhya Pradesh. He rejoined Benaras College in 1861 on promotion. He was sent back to Madhya Pradesh as Assistant Inspector of Schools after three years, and he retired from service there in 1872 owing to ill health.

Returning to England after his retirement, he settled at Ealing and took to teaching Hindustani and Urdu. During this period he wrote A Grammar of Hindustani or Urdu Language (1874). Later, in 1880, he was appointed teacher of Persian at Oxford University.

During his tenure at the university, Platts entered the field of lexicography and compiled a Dictionary of Urdu, Classical Hindi and English (1884) which contains over 50,000 words. In this dictionary every word is first given in Persian script followed by its rendering in Devanagri and Roman scripts. After mentioning its grammatical position and genesis (wherever possible), its meanings are given in English.

His earlier work, A Grammar of Hindustani or Urdu Language, is spread over 400 pages, which he wrote after consulting almost all grammars of Hindustani written by European scholars like Cowell, Trumpp, Vullers, etc. and Indian scholars like Imam Baksh Sahbai, Sheikh Abdullah of Kanpur, Ali Asghar of Ajmer, etc. In one of his articles, Abdul Haq, a great Urdu scholar, writes, 'Mr. John Platts' Qawaide-e-Urdu was published in London in 1874. This book is doubtlessly very good.'

PLOT (Sanskrit). In Sanskrit theory we have three terms for plot—'vastu', 'vritta' and 'itivritta'. While Anandvardhana in his Dhvanyaloka betrays his fondness for the term itivritta, other theoreticians, including Vishvanatha, favour vastu and vritta. Thus in Chapter III of Dhvanyaloka, the term itivritta is employed to signify plot in an attempt to project the relation it bears to the main emotive content. Vishvanatha, again, employs the terms vastu and vritta in Sahityadarpana in order to draw the line of demarcation between different forms of drama, as also to give a comprehensive idea of the plot along with its elements, stages of development and junctures.

Rasa constitutes the centre of gravity in poetry, and the permanent mood (sthayibhava) is brought to a relishable state through a combination of the excitant (vibhava), the ensuant (anubhava) and the accessory (vyabhicharibhava). Since the plot presents the permanent mood, the excitant, the ensuant and the accessory, it is to be handled with great care by a literary artist. As a matter of fact, the permanent and the transient moods, the excitant and the ensuant, constitute the objective correlative of T.S. Eliot, the building up of which is essential for the delineation of emotion.

While in an epic poem and the heroic play (nataka), a plot familiar from tradition is to be taken up by the writer, in the lyric (khandakavya) and the 'lesser' forms of play (prakarana, etc.), he is required to invent the plot. In the terminology of Sanskrit dramaturgy the plot familiar from tradition is called 'prakhyata' and that which is invented is called 'utpadya'. The plot in Sanskrit takes two forms; principal (adhikarika) and incidental (prasangika). The principal plot is that which is connected with the attainment of the hero's purpose. The incidental plot is that where the end achieved is not what is aimed at by the hero, but serves as a means towards the fruition of his aim. The incidental action may sometimes take the dimension of an episode (pataka), as is the case with the exploits of Sugriva as an ally of Rama, or it may be a small incident like the one relating to the fisherman and the constable in Act VI of Abhijnanashakuntala.

Sanskrit dramaturgy speaks of five elements of plot, which are technically known as 'arthaprakritis'. The first is the germ (bija) whence springs the action. The second is the drop (bindu) which spreads out as oil on water, or in other words the course of the desired event which looked interrupted but is now set in motion.

The third is 'pataka' which takes on the larger dimension of an episode, while the fourth one is 'prakari', an incident of a very small dimension. The fifth is denouement (karya). Sanskrit dramaturgy describes it as the goal which, when attained, leads the course of the drama to a close. Corresponding to this five-fold classification of the elements of plot, there are five stages in plot development: beginning (arambha), determined effort (prayatna), possibility of success in the face of obstacles (praptyasha), certainty of success (niyatapti) and attainment of goal (phalagama).

Based on the parallels of such sets is a third division of junctures (sandhi) which carry in their turn the stage of action to its natural close. They are the opening (mukha), progression (pratimukha), development (garbha), pause (vimarsha), and conclusion (nirvahana), corresponding closely to the stages set out. This division of the plot into five junctures in Sanskrit theory bears a close resemblance to the enunciation of the five stages of action in Greek drama: growth, exposition, climax, resolution and catastrophe. In Sanskrit drama, where the number of acts varies from seven to ten, a single act connects itself to a part of another to represent distinct junctures.

In Dhvanyaloka, Anandavardhana discusses in detail the norms relating to the treatment of plot. It is better if the artist, he asserts, follows a current legend, since it helps maintain the principle of propriety. The artist is advised further not to ruin the effect of the plot by making incongruous inventions. If invention is to be made at all, the ingenuity should be confined to episodes, otherwise the audience will be painfully disturbed by departure from tradition. Anandavardhana's advice to posterity is that the plot should be structured in such a way that it helps the attainment of poetic experience (rasasvada), because the aim of the literary artist is to generate supra-mundane delight in the mind of the connoisseur.

PODDAR, KANHAIYALAL (Hindi; b.1871, d. 1948), born in Mathura, came of a rich family and received his early education there. His ancestors belonged originally to Churu (Bikaner) in Rajasthan. Later on, they migrated to Ramgarh (Jaipur). Though engaged in business, they were deeply religious minded and planned to build a temple of their family deity at Mathura, the centre of Krishna worship. For this purpose they shifted to Mathura, got the famous temple of Radha Govindji constructed, and settled there finally.

Kanhaiyalal was an erudite scholar of Sanskrit literature, specially its two branches, poetics and rhetoric. Besides doing business and making a place for himself in the business community he devoted his entire life to the pursuit of knowledge and service of the muses. From 1890 till his death he worked hard, writing original works and translating Sanskrit classics. Among the translations, Bhartrihari's Shataka (comprising three parts, Shringar, Bhakti and Niti), Kalidasa's Meghaduta, Canto X of the Bhagavata and Gangalahari are notable. His Hindi Meghaduta vimarsha contains a translation of the original Sanskrit work as well as a lucid commentary in readable Hindi.

It also gives a vivid description of the geographical and historical places referred to in the Meghaduta. For this work Poddar was awarded a prize of one thousand rupees.

His original work is a history of Sanskrit literature in two parts. The first part is a critical review of the Sanskrit classics from the Vedic period till the time of Agnipurana and provides a detailed account of Sanskrit poetics. The second part is a critical study of the five well known schools of Sanskrit poetics—'Rasa', 'Alankara', 'Dhvani', 'Riti' and 'Vakrokti'.

Poddar's main forte is Indian poetics and his magnum opus Kavya kalpadrum is a beacon light for scholars even today. It is divided into two parts—Rasamanjari and Alankarmanjari. The first deals with rasa (poetic sentiment), dhvani (implied meaning), power of words, poetic qualities, poetic blemishes, etc. In its long introduction to the book, the author gives his candid opinion on the poet-critics of the Ritikal as well as the critics of his own times who attempted to write treatises on poetics.

The second part, called Alankarmanjari, is an elaborate study of poetic embellishments or figures of speech. Here he gives definitions followed by exposition with illustrations of all the figures of speech. In his prefix to the book he discusses the place of alankaras in poetry, classifies them and gives an exhaustive table. He also discusses the merits and demerits of the works on rhetoric written till his times.

Besides writing these monumental books he used to contribute articles to Madhuri, the popular Hindi monthly. These articles, along with a few others, were later collected and published in a book-form, Sahitya samiksha. The total number of essays is fifteen out of which articles on a comparative study of Kalidasa and Tulsidas, Bharavi and his poetry, and a sharp retort to the charges levelled against Ramacharitmanas by Ambikaprasad Bajpeyi have great literary value.

Recognising his services in the field of literature he was presented a commemorative volume.

POETICS (Bengali). Criticism relating to literature and art forms constitutes one of the most important branches of modern Bengali literature. It can be studied under various heads: as one inspired by ancient and medieval Sanskrit texts dealing with literary criticism; as one that owes its origin to western classical texts concerned with literary and aesthetic criticism; as one that concerns itself with the indigenous artistic and literary products judged according to indigenous standards; or as one that is devoted to the building up of an aesthetic system on the basis of a comparative approach to the fundamental problems of aesthetics and literary criticism with a view to synthesizing the findings of eminent classical authors in this particular field belonging to Indian and Western critical traditions.

Translations of basic Sanskrit texts on poetics into Bengali are not as frequent and numerous as they should have been. The Bengali translation of Bharata's Natyashastra, the oldest known work on poetics and dramaturgy, has been recently undertaken by Sureshchandra Banerji and Chhanda Chakravarti but only two parts of it have so far been published. The commentary of Abhinavagupta on the chapter of Rasa in Bharata's treatise has been edited separately with a translation and exposition in Bengali by Sri Abantikumar Sanyal. The Alamkara section of Vishnu-dharmottara purana has also been edited with a Bengali translation by Pandit Siddheshwar Panchatirtha and published in the research journal of the Sanskrit College, Our Heritage. Recently an edition of Vamana's Kavyalamkara-sutra-vritti, 'Adhikaranas' I-III, has been brought out by Sri Anilchandra Basu with a Bengali translation and introduction, mainly with a view to meeting the needs of the undergraduate students studying Honours Course Sanskrit. Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka has been edited and translated into Bengali with an introduction jointly by Subodhchandra Sengupta and Kalipada Bhattacharya. Bimalakanta Mukherjee also has undertaken the translation of this classic text into Bengali of which 'Uddyotas' I and II have been published. Strangely there is no complete standard translation of Mammata's Kavyaprakasha into Bengali, though recently some editions of this important text with Bengali renderings of some of its fragments have come out. Mahimabhatta's Vyaktiviveka, one of the most difficult texts on Sanskrit poetics and a severe critique of Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka, is being translated into Bengali by Bishnupada Bhattacharya and the first part of this work has already appeared in the Sanskrit College Research Series of Texts and Studies, Calcutta. Dhananjaya's Dasharupaka, the well-known treatise on Sanskrit dramaturgy, has been translated into Bengali with notes and explanations by Sri Vishnu Basu (Jatiya Sahitya Parishad, Calcutta). Another important text on Sanskrit dramatic theory viz., Natakalakshana ratnakosha of Sagaranandin has appeared in Bengali translation with an introduction by Sidheswar Chatterjee. Two versions of translation of Vishvanatha's Sahityadarpana into Bengali, too, are available, one by the late Pandit Gurunath Vidyanidhi and the other by Bimalakanta Mukherjee. The first chapter of Panditaraja Jagannatha's masterly treatise Rasagangadhara has been translated with notes by Sandhya Bhaduri. It includes a valuable introduction by Satkari Mukherjee. Bhaktirasayana, the classic study on the nature of bhakti rasa and its primacy in relation to other emotional moods by the great Vedantist, Madhusudana Sarasvati, was translated by Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Durgacharan Samkhya Vedantatirtha, but it is now out of print. There are also editions of such celebrated texts relating to bhakti rasa as Rupagosvamin's Bhakti-rasasmritasindhu and Ujjvalanilamani with Bengali translations by competent Vaishnava scholars like Dhananjaya Das, though not all of them are easily available.

Besides translations from original Sanskrit texts on poetics, there are also separate studies of some of the basic concepts of poetics like the definition of 'kavya', the function of 'shabda' and 'artha' in poetry, the nature of poetic defects (dosha) and their classification, the nature of figures of speech (alamkara), pertaining to 'shabda' and 'artha', varieties of poetic diction (riti) and their importance, the essence of aesthetic realisation (rasa) and its classification, and other related topics which form an important section of literary criticism in Bengali. Pandit Lalmohan Vidyanidhi's Kavyanirnaya (1862) seems to be the earliest attempt in the direction of presenting a connected account of the fundamental concepts of Sanskrit poetics in Bengali. The late Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Shitikantha Vachaspati's Alamkaradarpana deserves mention in this context. Sudhirkumar Dasgupta's Alamkarachandrika, Suddhasattva Basu's Alamkara-jijnasa (1962) and Samiresh Dasgupta's Alamkara-parichaya are some of the books in Bengali dealing with the figures of speech in poetic compositions. Though the treatment of the various figures is mostly inspired by Sanskrit texts, the illustrations are frequently drawn from Bengali literature. Samskrita alamkara-shastra dosha-tattva by Abima Saha deals with the chronological evolution of the concept of dosha and its various ramifications in the history of Sanskrit poetics. Another significant work is Siddheswar Mukherjee's brochure entitled Kavya-riti giving a brief account of the concept of riti and its different types with illustrations from classicial Sanskrit literature. Similarly, Rasa-samiksha by Ramaranjan Mukherjee, Rasa-o-kavya by Harihar Misra, Bhakti raser bibartan by Chinmay Chatterji and Sanskrita sahitye hasyasara by Dilipkumar Kanjilal deserve special mention trying to give as they do a systematic and incisive presentation of the nature of 'rasa'. There are also various works relating to the nature of 'bhakti' as a distinct rasa, especially from the standpoint of Gaudiya Vaishnavism. Banglar vaishnava dharma by Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Pramathanath Tarkabhushan and Vaishnavarasasahitya by Khagendranath Mitra deserve mention in this connection.

Apart from the studies on particular topics as mentioned above in the course of the last half a century there have appeared in Bengali several important critical studies on Sanskrit poetics and principles of literary criticism from a comparative viewpoint, which should be specially mentioned in this context. Atulchandra Gupta, who was a regular contributor to the celebrated literary magazine, Sabujpatra, edited by Pramatha Chaudhuri, wrote a series of articles on some of the principal topics of Indian poetics like 'dhvani', 'riti', 'rasa', etc. His articles were collected together in a thin brochure under the title Kavyajijnasa published by Visva-Bharati. The two volumes entitled Kabya-bichar and Sahitya parichay by Surendranath Dasgupta, are also important contributions in this field and give a critical account of the various systems of literary criticism current in the different schools represented by Bharata, Bhamaha, Dandin,Udbhata, Vamana, Anandavardhana, Kuntaka, and other eminent ancient scholars. They also endeavour to present the fundamental aesthetic theories connected with the names of such profound theorists as Bhatta Lollata, Shankuka, Bhatta-nayaka and Abhinavagupta. Kavyaloka deals with the varied approaches of the ancient Indian critics and seeks to evaluate from a critical and comparative view point the ancient Indian poetic concepts like 'rasa', 'bhava', 'dhvani' etc. with the help of data available from contemporary trends in literary criticism affiliated to both Indian and western traditions. Sahitya mimamsa, a collection of critical essays by Bishnupada Bhattacharya on some of the fundamental problems of the ancient Indian poetics, most of which were originally published in the reputed Bengali journal Sanibarer chithi, was brought out by Visva-Bharati in the Visvavidya Samgraha series. The two volumes entitled Kavyakautuka and Kavya-mimamsa, also by the same author incorporating as they do detailed comparative and analytical studies of some of the most fundamental topics of poetics, deserve notice. The volume entitled Prachin Bharatiya alamkar shastrer bhumika by the same author also deserves reference in this context, as it tries to furnish within a short compass an outline of the evolution of the different schools of Sanskrit poetics.

Some classic texts of western literary criticism have also been recently translated into Bengali, and they have helped in making the educated public increasingly acquainted with the literary and aesthetic-critical traditions of the West, though much is left to be done in this field. Of such attempts the Bengali translation of Aristotle's Poetics by Sisirkumar Das with an introdcution and critical comments under the title Kavyatattva (1977) deserves notice. Aristotle's treatise has also been translated into Bengali by Bhabanigopal Sanyal under the caption Aristotler Poetics ba sahitya-tattva. Similarly, Croce's Aesthetics has also been studied and rendered into Bengali with an introductory essay by Sadhankumar Bhattacharya. Of late, Tolstoy's What is Art has been translated by Dwijendralal Nath and published by the West Bengal State Book Trust. There are still a good number of basic texts on poetics and aesthetics by great philosophers and critics of the West awaiting authoritative translations into Bengali.

Books on aesthetics, in general, comprising within its scope various forms of fine arts like drama, painting and music, etc. besides literature, are also not rare in Bengali. Art-o-sahitya by Kshitindranath Tagore, a nephew of Rabindranath, Shilpakala by Sisirkumar Mitra, Saundaryatattva by Surendranath Dasgupta, Shilpatattver katha by Sadhankumar Bhattacharya, Natyatattvamimamsa by the same author, Bharater shilpa-o-amar katha by O.C. Ganguly, Saundarya-darshan by Prabasjiban Choudhuri, Nandantattva by Sudhirkumar Nandi and Natyakala by Manmohan Ghosh are some of the notable specimens in this particular genre. But the classic treatise in this field still remains the Bageshwari lectures delivered by Abanindranath Tagore at Calcutta University. For literary grace, breadth of vision and direct intuitive grasp of the basic problems of aesthetics in general these lectures have an everlasting appeal for all serious students of aesthetics. Abanindranath's acquaintance with the principles of Sanskrit poetics is evident on every page of this work and his interpretations are always revealing, throwing some fresh and unexpected light on the fundamental problems of artistic creation and appreciation. Satyajit Chaudhuri's study of Abanindranath's aesthetic and literary theories entitled Abanindranandantattva is also a helpful and readable guide for students interested in aesthetic problems in general.

Any survey of literature with a bearing upon the poet and aesthetics would remain incomplete without a reference to the essays of Bankimchandra and Rabindranath. The principles of literary criticism, formulated by Bankimchandra in some of the illuminating essays included in his Bibidhaprabandha, were critically analysed by the present writer in a series of articles published in the quarterly, Alekhya. Rabindranath's critical writings in this field are varied and prolific and embody his total poetic and artistic vision about those subjects which relate to the creation and appreciation of literature and other major forms of fine arts. His numerous essays in collections such as Sahitya, Sahityer pathe, Chhanda, Sahiyter svarup as also the dialogues in Panchabhut are some of our classics and embody the thoughts of one of the greatest artistic and creative geniuses of the world. The critical writings of Mohitlal Majumdar collected in several volumes under the titles Sahitya bichar, Sahityabitan etc., Subodhchandra Sengupta's Sahitya-pather bhumika and Shashibhushan Dasgupta's Ghare baire sahitya chinta are also notable contributions in the field of theoretical poetics and aesthetics in general.

POETICS (Gujarati). Though in the medieval period there existed a school in Kutchh giving instructions in poetics, no work of poetics as such was prepared by the school. It is during the modern period, i.e. from the later half of nineteenth century onwards, that articles on poetics have been written. Poet Narmad (1833-1886), who had college education and had read Sanskrit as well as western poetics, made a beginning by writing about the nature of poetry on the basis of oriental and western works on poetics. His articles have been published in a book form, entitled Rasapravesh (1860). Narmad lays emphasis on the element of emotion in poetry. His contemporary, Navalram (1836-1888), has also written about the genre of poetry on the basis of Sanskrit works on poetics.

In 1919 Nathuram Sundarji (1861-1922) in his book Kavyashastra presents the history of Sanskrit poetics from Bharat to Jagannath. In 1924 Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955) translated Mammata's Kavyaprakash which is a monumental work in poetics. In an article on Mammata's conception of poetry the translator compares the western and oriental conceptions of poetry and pinpoints similarities in their viewpoints.

Ramanbhai Nilkanth (1868-1928) in his four volumes of Kavita ane sahitya has critically examined the ideas of Sanskrit and western writers on poetics and shown their strength and weakness, though one can discern his partiality towards the western writers on the subject. In the light of western poetics, he has introduced new concepts of pathetic fallacy, subjective and objective poetry, the place of emotion and thought in poetry, etc, thus widening the scope of poetics. Kavya sahitya mimamsa (1930) by Kamala Shankar Trivedi, Kavyakala (1939) by Mohanlal Dave and Kavyalochan (1951) by Ratilal Jani are historical surveys of the works of Sanskrit writers on poetics. Kavyatatva vichar (1937) by Anand Shankar Dhruv is a collection of articles on different aspects of poetics. Balvantrai Thakur in Kavita shikshan and Lyric emphasises that thought is the most important factor in poetry and other elements are secondary. Ramprasad Baxi in his book Karun rasa (1960) discusses the different types of tragic sentiments in Sanskrit poetics, giving illustrations from contemporary Gujarati poetry. Vishnuprasad Trivedi has also in his book Upayan (1939) thrown new light on some concepts like 'sadharanikaran' (generalisation) by analysing them in the context of modern theories. Umashankar Joshi in his book Kavini shraddha (1965) has presented the latest western theories of writers like T.S. Eliot, Valery and others. A similar attempt has been made by Suresh Joshi in Chintayami manasa, a Sahitya Akademi Award winner. Nagindas Parekh has also ably interpreted Abhinavagupta's conception of poetry in his book, Abhinavno ras vichar. His originality, insight and lucidity won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1970. Thus in the modern period extensive work has been done in Gujarati in the field of poetics.

POETICS (Hindi). The beginnings of Hindi poetics may be traced to the compositions of the devotional poets of the Bhakti Age. In 1541 Kriparam wrote Hitatarangini which presents a detailed analysis of rasa (sentiment) on the basis of Bharata's Natyashastra and classification of heroines on the basis of Bhanudatt's Rasamanjari. Nandadas's Rasamanjari too, that appeared in early seventeenth century, is closely modelled on Bhanudatt's work. Some other works such as Mohanlal Misra's Shringara sagar, Karnesha's Karnabharan and Gopa's Alankar chandrika, in spite of their author's scholarship and critical acumen, show the influence of classical Sanskrit works on Hindi poetics and are largely compilation of ideas drawn from ancient sources.

The next stage in the development of Hindi poetics is Ritikal (1650-1850). The most significant works of this age are Kavi-priya and Rasik-priya by Keshavdas (1555-1617). But here too the influence of Sanskrit poeticians is quite dominant. The classification of figures of speech is on the model of Dandin, while the treatment of rasa reiterates the views of the old masters. As a matter of fact in Ritikal, the poets and acharyas were preoccupied with the treatment of rasa and alankars and their works contained, in the main, subtle ramifications of the erotic sentiment. There were two different streams in poetics, one flowing from the Sanskrit masters like Bharata, Bhamaha, Dandin and Vamana and the other from Mammata and Vishvanatha, but most of the poet-critics like Chintamani, Dev, Kulpati, Bhikhari Das, Pratap Sahi, etc. have restated the thesis of Mammata and Vishvanatha.

No doubt Ritikal provides a rich harvest of critical works but these are based primarily on Sanskrit models and lack original thinking and subtlety of analysis. While the Sanskrit acharyas were basically theorists, those of Hindi were primarily poets and did not go deep into the formulation or interpretation of theories. They confined themselves mostly to exposition of simple issues and classification of figures of speech and heroines. While dealing with rasa they have not even discussed the four expositions of Bharata's famous 'sutra', and they have left out dramaturgy altogether. Moreover, they had another handicap. In the absence of prose, mature enough to explain the nuances of literary concepts, it was difficult to do full justice to critical analysis and exposition of theories.

It is with the Age of Bharatendu that the literary scene changes. New influences, specially western, enter the arena and Hindi prose acquires a more precise form fit for analysis and argument. Excessive reliance on Sanskrit poetics gave way to a study of western literary canons and we find the beginnings of a new process of change, from the old to the new, from traditional aesthetic values and critical norms to those of western poetics. As in other branches of literature, Bharatendu brought about a sort of revolution in the field of poetics too. His essay 'Natak' (1833), on the one hand, provides a fresh study of the rules of ancient Indian dramaturgy, and on the other embodies some interesting views on western dramatic theory and rules of construction. He was also influenced by the dramatic criticism in vogue in Bengali literature. He also kept in mind the changed conditions and taste of the audience which came to the theatre to witness the plays. Keeping the difference between auditory and visual poetry in mind, he stressed the importance of aesthetic evocativeness in drama. His personal experience as an amateur actor gave a new dimension to his treatment of drama which deserves more recognition than it has received hitherto. Regarding his rasa theory, he formulated it in the context of human psychology and had a dig at those who did not distinguish between subtle shades of emotion and confused the 'bhakti' rasa with the 'shanta' and the 'sakhya' with 'shringara'. He added four sentiments, 'bhakti' (devotion), 'vatsalya' (parental affection), 'sakhya' (friendly feeling) and 'anand' (bliss) to the list of sentiments.

Balakrishna Bhatt too based his views on drama with the stage and the stage-goer in mind. He asked the playwrights to probe the psyche of his characters and be aware of the spirit of the age. He asserted that drama should be realistic, it must faithfully mirror the spirit of the age, and its dialogues should express the innermost feelings of the characters. His approach to literature was realistic and he was not unduly preoccupied with classical theories. His views on rhymed and unrhymed poetry remind us of Johnson who had said that poetry could subsist without rhyme but its absence might lead to irresponsible freedom. Bhatt, however, advocated a break from conventions and pleaded for the exploration of new grounds.

The impact of the West becomes more pronounced by the time we come to Mahavirprasad Dwivedi and his Age. Dwivedi regards poetry, on the one hand, as a spontaneous overflow of feelings and on the other as a process of cathartic purgation of repressed complexes. He rejects the concept of 'art for art's sake' and looks upon poetry as an organ of moral good. His views on the role of imagination are close to those of Coleridge's. It is a faculty that not only shapes and creates but also unites and coalesces the opposite elements into one harmonious whole. He is against the flights of irresponsible fancy, and like Milton believes that poetry should be simple, sensuous and passionate. Admitting that alliteration and other verbal embellishments add to the charm of verse, he is for the poet's spontaneous expression of feelings. His views on poetic language too are revolutionary. Like Wordsworth he maintains that the language of prose and that of metrical composition should not be different. "The predominance of Brajbhasha over the poetry of the people who converse in Khariboli cannot last long." However, while Wordsworth pleaded for the language of conversation in the middle and lower classes of society, Dwivedi argued for the language of the educated society as the medium of poetic compositions.

With Mahavirprasad Dwivedi retiring from the scene, Hindi literary criticism might have got a setback but for the efforts of Acharya Ramchandra Shukla. Shukla's study of both Sanskrit poetics and Western aesthetics was much wider and far deeper than that of Dwivedi's; besides, his intellect was sharper and his insight more penetrating. While absorbing all the healthy elements of Western criticism, he held on to his moorings in the valued Sanskrit tradition. He rejected the philosophy of 'art for art's sake' and maintained that good poetry softens our passions, furthers a good cause, humanizes our heart and widens our horizon. Nevertheless, he does not underplay the quality of imaginative experience and its poetic expression. He echoes Shelley when he says that poetry helps man's soul transcend the narrow orbit of self-interest and lifts him to a plane of higher reality. When he says that poetry sublimates, consoles and sustains the human soul, he follows Matthew Arnold, and like Sanskrit scholars he concedes that poetry produces a unique pleasure but also maintains that it must be emotional. Here his views are very close to those of I.A. Richards'. His essays, 'Kavita kya hai' and 'Sadharanikaran' reveal his original thinking and deep understanding of the complex nature of creativity and communication. In his discussion of literary genres he gives due recognition to new literary forms—novel, short story and essay, though he gives the pride of place to epic.

We may not agree with all that Shukla said. His division of rasa in three categories and his exposition of sadharanikaran have not been accepted by the later critics, and his sweeping statement that 'Croce's expressionism is, in fact, only a foreign version of Kuntaka's Vakroktivad, has been challenged by many. His suspicion of various poetic movements in the West such as expressionism, imagism, impressionism and surrealism is also perhaps, not fully justified. However, his attempt to bring about a synthesis of Indian and Western theories of literature is laudable.

Neither so sharp, nor a man of such original thinking, his contemporary, Shyamsunder Das, too contributed to the synthetic approach to literature. He, like Arnold, believed that poetry is a criticism of life and said, 'The poet's function is not to preach, but to stimulate, to enliven, to inspire and to revitalize' (Sahityalochan). As an advocate of the synthetic approach, another critic Babu Gulab Rai, went a step further, observing that the poetical theories of India and those of the West were complementary to each other, and a common code of literary norms could be evolved through a rational and coordinated study of the two. With a sure knowledge of the concepts of Western psychology and Indian philosophy he maintained that the Indian theory of rasa is built on the understanding of man's primary instincts, his basic emotions and his psychological motivations.

Another critic who emerges in this phase of synthetic poetics is Laxminarayan 'Sudhanshu'. His analysis of Croce's expressionistic theory of art and his assertion that there is no dichotomy between life and art reveal his sound sense of judgement. He also maintains, like Eliot that "while writing a poetic work one must be careful not to snap the link with the past. The present is vitalised by the past." But while Eliot is an advocate of the impersonal theory of art, Sudhanshu offers a fusion of the personal and the impersonal.

With the advent of romanticism there was a shift from objectivity to subjectivity. To Jaishankar Prasad poetry is an experience of the soul; to Nirala, it is an expression of personality, an outflow of impulses; to Pant, poetry is a creation, striking a balance between the finite and the infinite; and to Mahadevi Verma, poetry is primarily a song risen from the abyss of the poet's soul, its end being truth through beauty.

For these poet-critics, imagination is different from fancy, because it is closely allied to truth, is a higher creative power, and is an agency that brings order out of chaos. Their views on poetic diction too are refreshing. Nirala advises the poet to establish an emotional relationship with the reader, and for this he is to make his language neither ordinary nor musical, but pack it with experience. He may use the old, long forgotten words or pick out the language of the slums. The only condition is that his diction must suit the context and produce the desired response in the reader. Figures of speech should not be used simply for embellishment but they must have a functional value. Pant called rhythm the "throb of experience intimately related to sound and music." These poet critics are advocates of the autonomy of art but they do not revolt against the input of morality in art.

The year 1952 is a landmark in the history of Hindi poetics. With the publication of Hindi commentary of Dhvanyaloka by Acharya Vishveshwar with a long discerning introduction by Nagendra, came a spate of works on poetics. They may be classified into four categories: (1) authoritative classical texts with commentaries, such as Vakroktijivita, Kavyalankara-sutravritti, Abhinavabharati, Kavyaprakasha and Natyadarpana. While the commentaries help the Hindi reader to comprehend the basic principles enunciated by Sanskrit theoreticians, the critical prefaces by Nagendra give some new revealing insights; (2) Translation of original works of Western poetics, again with long and meaningful prefaces, such as Arastu ka kavyashastra, kavya mein udatta tatva (Longinus), Kavyakala (Horace). Introductions to the first two are written by Nagendra, while the preface to Horace comes from Mohan Lal. They offer a penetrating analysis of the Western classics and their writers and make a comparative study of Indian and Western concepts and theories; (3) Independent critical studies such as Baldeva Upadhyay's Sahitya shastra, Ramdahin Mishra's Kavya darpana and Kavyaloka. A few works on dramaturgy such as Dashratha Ojha's Natya samiksha may also be placed in this category; (4) Ph.D. theses on various aspects of Indian poetics and books written for advanced university students.

We have several learned studies in poetics and some of them richly deserve full recognition. Of them all, because of its originality, able exposition and lucid style, Nagendra's Rasa-siddhanta (1964) merits special mention. With his profound knowledge of Western literature (including books on poetics) he has worked tenaciously at a synthesis of the aesthetic traditions of the East and the West so that a comprehensive and universal aesthetic code could be formulated. He is a writer of intellectual convictions in the tradition of Eliot, Richards and Acharya Shukla. He emphatically asserts that poetry is an expression of personality, though in the act of creation the basic emotion becomes impersonal. He agrees with I.A. Richards that the aesthetic experience is neither pleasant nor painful but a pattern of experiences. Agreeing with Sanskrit scholars, he asserts that poetic experience is the experience of a universalized or liberated emotion and what the reader achieves in the end is a state of gratification (not bliss or anand as the ancient Pandits called it). It is 'lokottar' (supra-worldly, of a higher plane) but not 'alaukik' (unworldly or transcendental). He differs with Acharya Shukla and offers some specific comments on the theory of 'sadharanikaran' (universalization), drawing support from new psychological researches.

Another outstanding scholar-critic is Acharya Hazariprasad Dwivedi. With his positive historical sense and emphasis on culture, he emancipated Hindi poetics from the bondage of rigid conventionalism. He did not consider art as a mere expression of the artist's sensibility or a product of politico-economic factors, but saw it in the larger perspective of history and culture. To him, as to Eliot, the sense of the past is a vital element, and a writer assimilates in his psyche the whole complex of philosophical and religious beliefs and tradition, welcoming a harmonious adjustment between inspiration and milieu.

Modern Hindi scholars have kept themselves abreast of the new aesthetic ideas and movements in the West. Some were attracted by psychoanalysis, while others were fascinated by the ideology of Marx. Many of them were swayed by the western influence and had few fresh or original ideas to offer. When Devaraj Upadhyay talks of Gestalt and Ilachandra Joshi of the artist's subconscious, they echo the ideas of Freud, Adler and Jung. Similarly, if Ramvilas Sharma and Shivdan Singh Chouhan argue that the aim and end of literature is the development of social consciousness, they re-state what Marx and Engels had mostly said. Some noted critics like Agyeya and Muktibodh are indebted to Eliot and Leavis and a few others of the later generation to Blackmur, Kenneth Burke and Cleanth Brooks. The twin influences of Sanskrit poetics on the one hand and of western critical thought on the other are apparent in the large body of works on Hindi poetics, but perhaps we have yet to evolve an independent corpus of critical theories which will absorb and yet transcend the received canons of poetics.

POETICS (Kannada). Though ancient Kannada cannot boast of an independent line of writers on poetics, it has produced eminent scholars, many of whom were also poets in their own right. The fact that they are indebted to earlier rhetoricians in Sanskrit does not affect their independent status in Kannada literature.

As in Sanskrit, poetics is usually termed alamkara shastra in Kannada. Alamkaras (figures of speech) are only verbal embellishments or ornamentations. The first work on poetics extant in Kannada is Kavirajamarga, which has claimed special attention from scholars on account of its historical importance, since it throws light on the 'dark age' of Kannada literature before the ninth century.

There has been a long-drawn controversy over the authorship of Kavirajamarga. It was usually ascribed to Nrupatunga, the Rashtrakuta emperor (814-878 A.D.). But recent researches establish the fact that the author was Shrivijaya, a court-poet of the emperor.

Kavirajamarga is divided into three chapters. In the first chapter the author enumerates with suitable lakshyas (illustrative verses) the possible defects of poetic composition. In writing this section the author seems to have freely borrowed from Kavyalamkara of Bhamaha (7th century); but the originality of the author consists in the application of the rules (lakshana) to suit the idiomatic expression in Kannada. The views of Shrivijaya on 'sama samskirta' (The 'tatsama' of later grammarians) and 'karakavibhakti' system (case system) in Kannada are original. His observations on the graded standards of versification and on poetry, culminating in the mahakavya and on some indigenous (deshi) forms of composition such as 'gadya katha', 'bedande' and 'chattana' are very significant.

The second chapter deals with 'dasha-gunas' (ten qualities) relating to the verbal aspect of poetic composition.

The third chapter is devoted entirely to the elucidation of 'arthalamkaras' (figures of speech relating to meaning). Kavirajamarga does not treat of rasa as an independent conceptual entity and relates it to 'rasavadalamkara'. Probably taking cue from Udbhata, he mentions shanta as a ninth rasa, which is significant. The author has added a figure of speech of his own invention, called 'dhvanyalamkara', suggestive of the dhvani theory propounded by Anandavardhana in Dhvanyaloka.

The next important author of poetics in Kannada is Nagavarma the second, who wrote Karnata kadambari and Chhandombudhi, a work on prosody. From his own statement he seems to have written Chhandovichhiti (a work on prosody), Alamkriti, a work on alamkara shastra, and Abhidhana vastukosha (a lexicon).

Kavyalokana contains five chapters: 'Shabdasmriti' (a brief treatise on Kannada grammar), 'Kavyamala vyavritti' (defects on poetical composition), 'Ritikrama' (style), 'Rasa-nirupanam' (treatment of rasas) and 'Kavisamaya' (poetic convention).

POETICS (KANNADA)

While Shrivijaya has noticed a few grammatical points which seem to be relevant in a consideration of the verbal aspect of poetical composition, Nagavarma has given us a short but self-contained Kannada grammar in the first chapter, which can be regarded as the first one on the subject. But this grammatical portion of Kavyavalokana does not seem to bear any organic relation to the subject-matter of the succeeding four chapters, which are devoted to an exposition of poetics and rhetoric.

Another important work is Udayadityalamkara, a very small work containing only seventy-two verses, most of which are in kanda metre. It is supposed to have been written by a court-poet of Udayaditya. It has no pretensions to being an elaborate text on the subject. It declares that it is meant as a primer for aspiring poets to understand the art of composing a poem. In this work the author mentions 'champu', 'bedande' and 'chattana', names of different forms of poetical composition.

The next alamkara work that we come across is Madhavalamkara, named after the author Madhava. His work, divided into three chapters, is a translation of Kavyadarsha by Dandin. R. Narasimhachar places Madhavalamkara sometime around 1500 A.D.

In Apratimaviracharite, written by Tirumalarya, a minister of Chikkadevaraja, the lakshana sutras are in Sanskrit, and the rest—the gloss (vritti), illustrative stanzas (lakshyas), an explanation of correspondence between the rule and the illustration, lakshya-lakshana-samanvaya—are in old Kannada.

Kannada kuvalayananda by Jayendra (1716-1758) is based on the Sanskrit work of the same name by Appayya Dikshita (c. 1500), which in turn closely follows Chandraloka by Jayadeva (c. 1200). Both the Sanskrit works are written for the benefit of the students of rhetoric. The next noteworthy work on alamkara is Narapati vijaya. The author is 'Aliya' Lingaraja (1823-1874). The work is a mixture of verse and prose and has three 'Ullasas' (chapters).

Chandraloka seems to have become very popular among the scholars of the day in the nineteenth century and even later. Two noted scholars, Siddhanti Sivasankara Sastri and Akkale Narasimha Sastri have rendered Chandraloka into Kannada. The portion on arthalamkaras written by K.Varadacharya in the Kannada kaipidi is based on Chandraloka.

Shringararatnakara by Kavi Kamadeva is the first work on the concept of rasa. The work is also called Rasa viveka. In this work there is a detailed treatment of shringararasa with all its ramifications such as the different categories of 'nayaka' and 'nayika', and the various kinds of body-movements and gestures. The date of the work is about 1200. Kavi Kama appears to follow Shringaraprakasha of Bhoja (c.1010-1063) in some respects.

The author's inquiry as to the origin of shringararasa is quite innovative. He says that when one is in love the feeling of 'muda' or pleasure causes the face of that person to 'bloom' or 'beam' with that feeling. This phenomenon, according to him, is shringara. Salva, author of Rasaratnakara, quotes nearly sixty-five stanzas of Shringararatnakara. Thimma of Navarasalamkara also appears to have borrowed some verses. This fact indicates the influence of Shringararatnakara on later poets.

Rasaratnakara by Salva (c.1550) is the most important work on the subject of rasa. As a matter of fact, this is perhaps the only work on the rasa theory. In this work, Salva has dealt with rasas more elaborately than Nagavarma and Kavi Kama. He has however given prominence to the treatment of shringara, probably influenced by Shringararatnakara.

Navarasalamkara is an unpublished work by Timma, the son of Rayana. R. Narasimhachar places the work around 1600. The work is also called Alamkarasarasamgraha. This is not an original work but only a collection of excerpts from well-known Sanskrit and Kannada works on the subject, particularly, Shringararatnakara of Kavi Kama and Rasaratnakara of Salva.

The next work of some importance is Rasamanjari or Shringaratilaka of Jayendra, the author of Kannada kuvalayananda. This is also an unpublished manuscript, written in prose and verse. The language and style represent the features of the early stage of modern Kannada.

Though there are casual references to the 'dhvani' theory in Kavirajamarga, Kannada kuvalayananda and Apratimaviracharite, there was no full-fledged work devoted entirely to dhvani. It is only in the sixteenth century that an explication of the dhvani theory was made in Kannada in a small work entitled Sharada vilasa. It is assumed that the author of this work is Salva, who wrote Rasaratnakara. Unfortunately only the second chapter of the manuscript is extant. From what is available of the text, there is ample evidence in the writing that the author had a sound knowledge of the dhvani theory. For more information on the subject, he refers to Kavya prakashike (i.e. Kavya-prakasha of Mammata) and Sahitya sudharnava in Sanskrit. Nothing is known about the latter work.

In the twentieth century, there was a great need for covering the whole ground of alamkara shastra in the present-day Kannada. A.R.Krishna Sastri contributed a very competent article on the subject in Kannada kaipidi. A very ambitious work tracing the history of Indian poetics which is at once a critical and comparative study based on all the available Sanskrit works is Bharatiya kavyamimamse written by T.N. Sreekantaiya. It has been a monumental work, probably the only one of its kind in any other Indian language. K. Krishnamurthy translated almost all the Sanskrit works on poetics into Kannada with informative introductions. A considerable number of articles on different aspects of poetics by eminent scholars and students of poetics have been published in various Kannada journals.

M.V.S.

POETICS (Maithili). There is hardly any book on poetics in early Maithili literature since Sanskrit works of poetics were freely used. In the twentieth century Maithili scholars translated some of the popular Sanskrit works like Sahityadarpana of Vishvanatha, Kavyaprakasha of Mammata and Dasharupaka of Dhananjaya. In course of time when English education spread over Mithila, the western principles of literature became gradually familiar to Maithili readers. But there was a difference: barring a few seminal essays of T.S. Eliot which were translated as Alochana siddhanta (1981) by Balakrishna Jha, the western ideas came through stray essays in the periodicals, and no western classics on the subject were translated into Maithili.

Sanskrit poetics has, therefore, continued to be the mainstay of poetics in Maithili in general, particularly the theory of rasa. All that the Maithili scholars considered necessary was the discussion of illustrations from Maithili literature. Among the best works of this kind are Riddhinatha Jha's Vishvabhushana (1944) and Kishornath Jha's Rasa-parichaya (1970). Riddhinatha Jha also wrote on the meanings of words in a work called Shabda-shakti-trivenika (Threefold power of words).

More extensive works were written without any pretensions of originality on the principles of poetry in general, such as Vedananda Jha's Kavya-kaumudi, Shyamananda Jha's Kavyakalpadruma and Bholanatha Jha's Shitya vidha-vimarsha (1985). Some works, however, incorporated western principles also, for example, Jayadhari Sinha's Kavyamimansa in two parts (1962-64) and Samalochana-shastra (1978) and Dinesh Kumar Jha's Maithili kavya-shastra (1981). This trend has culminated in a notable work by Shrikrishna Mishra, who has tried to establish the fundamental identity of the Western and Indian poetics by taking one eminent representative of each-Coleridge and Abhinavagupta–in a series of lectures in the Maithili Akademi at Patna.

One aspect of poetics, other than the nature of creativity, is rhetoric, and some traditional pandits have produced a number of well–chiselled works on it. The works deserving mention are, in chronological order, Chandra-bharana by Ramachandra Mishra 'Chandra', Alankritibodha by Vedananda Jha, Alankara sagara by Dinabandhu Jha and Alankara pravesha by Ramanatha Jha.

Barring Dinabandhu Jha's Alankara-sagara, all the above works are to a great extent, both in form and in content, only a replica or resume of some renowned Sanskrit treatise on poetics, such as Jayadeva Pakshadhara's Chandraloka, or Vishvanatha's Sahitya-darpana or Mammata's Kavya-prakasha. Following the Sanskrit tradition, these authors defined figures of speech, one by one, in verse and gave poems as examples. Some authors like Vedananda Jha and Sitarama Jha cited their own poems as examples composed specially for this purpose, thus bringing some originality to their treatment. Others have drawn suitable examples from various poetic works in Maithili. All these works are greatly influenced by Jayadeva Pakashadhara's Chandraloka which has reigned supreme in Mithila, perhaps because its author is believed to be identical with Pakashadhara Mishra, the great neo-logician of Mithila. Dinabandhu Jha is, perhaps, the first to realise that the tradition of giving versified definitions and poetic illustrations is only a hurdle in the smooth communication of non-poetic serious thought. He started from the simplest definition and illustration in lucid prose and went into depth step by step, summing up with discernment the views of his predecessors like Mammata, Appayya Dikshita and Panditaraja Jagannatha. Clear conception, lucid expression and wide scholarship made his work significant.

Prosody is allied to rhetoric. Lochana in his famous work Ragatarangini (c.1685) discusses song metres in early poetry, but as Govinda Jha in his work Sankshipta chhandahshastra (1960) has contended, these rules of song metres cannot apply to Maithili verse today, particularly modern verse, since it is quite often on the pattern of modern English rhythmic patterns, including free verse and blank verse.

There is a legitimate move, however, that in view of modern Western (especially English) critical works which have influenced Indian poetics of today there should be a fresh approach reflecting modern literature, especially prose. This view is justified for the simple reason that prose fiction and other forms of modern literature were unknown to the traditional rhetoricians.

POETICS (Malayalam). The pioneering attempt in the field of literary criticism and poetics was made by an anonymous author of the fourteenth century text Lilatilakam which is a unique treatise on grammar, poetics and prosody. It also shows a cross-section of early manipravala literature. It falls into eight sections (shilpas). In the first shilpa the concept of manipravala has been argumentatively analysed with necessary examples. The second and third shilpas mainly deal with the language of manipravala poetry, from a grammarian's point of view. 'Guna' (quality) and 'dosha' (fault) are the topics discussed in shilpas four and five respectively. In the discussion on the 'doshas', the author has added to the traditional list a few more. The impropriety in naming a woman in poetry is an example. Similarly in the next shilpa, a distinct 'guna', 'parimalam' is also added to the traditional list. The fact that the author's basis of study is the early manipravala literature alone has to be taken into account here.

The next one deals with verbal embellishments like prasa, yamaka and shlesha. In the last portion of this section the author compares and contrasts 'shabdashaktimuladhvani' and 'shlesha'. In the seventh chapter, thirty alamkaras are discussed and illustrated. The last shilpa is on rasa. All the nine rasas have been discussed with examples from early manipravala literature. The quatrains quoted from contemporary poetry projects the pampered tastes and leisured life of an upper class society. For example:

All breezes are not breezes;
The real breeze is the one
That bathes in the nearby river,
Dances among the growing coconut trees,
Caresses the uniquely beautiful
Body of mistress Rohini
And comes in kindness
To thrill me by blowing over me.

A panchromatic view of a poetician and rhetorician of early manipravala literature is presented in this first text on Malayalam poetics, though written in Sanskrit.

Alamkarasamkshepa (c. 1500 A.D.) of unknown authority is an outcome of a study of Sanskrit poetics. Five figures of sound and twenty-eight figures of sense have been defined in this small work. Similarly Arthalankaramanipravala (1879) of Velutteril Kesavan Vaidyar, Padadoshaprakarana of Perunellil Krishnan Vaidyar (1803-1894), Alamkaradipika of Raja Raja Varma Tampuran, Keralakaumudi of Kovunni Nedungadi (1831-1889) also deserve mention here. Keralakaumudi is more popular than the other texts in many respects. This is the text in which the Malayalam metres were defined for the first time.

After a long gap of 500 years, A.R. Raja Raja Varma (1863-1918) wrote Bhashabhushanam which was first published in 1902. Adopting from Sanskrit literature and depending on the sources in Malayalam he composed this masterly work on poetics. Alamkara, dosha, guna, shabdartha, dhvani and gunibhutavyangya are the topics dealt with in the book. In his period the poets and critics were very much concerned with the 'dvitiyakshara prasa vada' (dispute on second syllable rhyme). Raja Raja Verma was of the opinion that meaning should not be sacrificed for the sake of external embellishment. "To save two letters what nonsense the poets employ! It not only provokes anger but also deserves sympathy." Thus he criticised the advocates of 'prasa vada'. The learned author in a way rejected neo-classicism and accepted the romantic theory in literature. His works on poetics and prosody, as well as his grammar book, Kerala Paniniyam, are pioneering attempts in the field of literary studies in Malayalam. His explicatory notes on Nalacharitam attakatha, and Kantaratarkam also reflect his scholarly poetic vision. Raja Raja Varma's uncle, Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran, the author of Mayura sandesha initiated modern studies in prose.

Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayana Pillai (1878-1937) wrote critical essays on the classical poets Cherusseri, Ezhuttacchan and Kunchan Nambiar. His attempt to combine the eastern and westen traditions was effectively followed later by Joseph Mundasseri, P.M. Sankaran Nambiar and S. Guptan Nair among others. A. Balakrishna Pillai (1889-1960) gave a lead to modern writers through his writings with a formalistic and critical approach. Works of Vatakkumkur Raja Raja Varma and Ullur S.Parameshwara Iyer are evidences of the adoption of classical traditions, while Balakrishna Pillai adopted ideas from outside and inspired young writers of the first half of this century.

When we survey the study of poetics in Malayalam we come across such works as the Balalankaram (1935) by Perurkada Kochchappan, Kavita tattva nirupanam (1935) by Sardar K.M. Panicker, Sahiti sarvaswam (1954) by Vatakkumkur, Udayalankara (1955) by K.C. Narayanan Nambiar, Kavya jivita vritti, 3 vols. (1937-1953) by P. Krishnan Nair, Rasika pratnam by Attur Krishna Pisharody (1876-1964), Sahitya vidya and Bharata paryatanam by Kuttikrishna Marar (1900-1973), Sahitya vicharam and Soundarya nirikshanam by M.P. Paul (1904-1952), Kavya pithika and Prabhashanavali by Joseph Mundasseri (1901-1977), Kavyakala (1959) by P.Padmanabha Pillai, Kavya samiksha and Dhvanyaloka by E.V.Damodaran. Among these texts Sahityabhushanam by Kuttikrishna Marar deserves special consideration. It is a criticism of Raja Raja Varma's Bhashabhushanam. He upholds Mahimabhatta's theory of inference as against the theory of dhvani. Ullur, in his introduction to the book, does not approve of the view of Marar. Sahitya lochanam of P.M. Sankaran Nambiar, collected essays of Kuttipuzha Krishna Pillai, N. Krishna Pillai, and S. Guptan Nair, Navina natakadarsham by Mekkolla Parameswaran Pillai, essays by Sukumar Azhikode, M. Leelavathy and P.K. Balakrishnan are in-depth analyses of literary subjects. Articles written by N.P. Unni, P. Damodaran Pillai and K. Bhaskaran Nair, metrical studies made by scholars from Appan Tampuran to N.V. Krishna Warrior, K.K. Vadhyar, P. Kunjikrishna Menon are also valuable. Of them, 'Malayalam Poetics' by T. Bhaskaran contains a theoretical approach on the poetics of Cherusseri's Krishnagatha (15th century).

The latest Malayalam treatise on poetics is Kairali dhvani by P.K. Narayana Pillai who assessed brilliantly the wealth of Malayalam poetry through the kaleidoscope of Anandavardhana's dhvani theory. This is a masterly thesis and its dimensions are worth studying.

Natya shastra of Bharatamuni, Dhvanyaloka of Anandavardhana, Sahityadarpana of Viswanatha, Dasharupa of Dhananjaya, Kuvalayananda of Appayya Dikshita, etc. hve been translated into Malayalam. The annotations of Sanskrit classics are also relevant here. Especially the annotation prepared in Sanskrit for the Abhijnana shakuntala by the late Parikshit Tampuran and Rama Pisharody deserves particular mention. A good number of essays on literary theories have been published in books and journals and they have supplemented the study on poetics. Vedabandhu's translations of Aritstotle, Longinus, etc., and History of Western Literary Criticism by M.Achutan and K.M. Tarakan are scholarly texts on the subject. Similarly, texts on eastern poetic principles, prepared by V.S. Sharma, T Bhaskaran, etc. have also appeared in print. Interpretations of classical and modern poetical works by various authors and contributions of ancient and contemporary journals are also notable here.

Thus, it may be seen that Malayalam poetics deserves a distinct aesthetic approach, and a laudable attempt has been made by many scholars through the decades, though the search is neither complete nor comprehensive.

POETICS (Marathi). Marathi has a long tradition of works on poetics mainly because of its background of a strong Sanskrit scholarship. The following are some of the significant works on poetics. Poetics by Ganesha Sadashivashastri Lele aims at acquainting the studious students of modern Marathi poetry with the rudiments of ancient poetics. In 108 pages, Sadashivashastri briefly deals, in question-answer form, with the definitions and varieties of poetic composition, powers of words, types of hero and heroine, rasas (sentiments), gunas (qualities), ritis (styles), alankaras (figures of speech), metres and doshas (poetic defects). Sadashivashashtri's work contains explanatory short foot notes, tables and illustrative passages in prose and verse.

Rasaprabodha (The knowledge of rasa) by Balavantrao Kamlakar Makode is a concise treatise devoted exclusively to the treatment of rasa, the soul of poetry. In eleven chapters Rasaprabodha explains the concepts of rasa, its generative causes, states of bhava, rasabhasa, the mixture of rasa, the defects of rasa, types of dhvani (suggestion), and theories about enjoyment of rasa, with illustrative verses drawn from medieval Marathi poetry. The book discusses vatsalya (affection towards children), bhakti (devotion to God), and preyan (affection towards friends) as rasas, besides the usual nine rasas.

Maharashtriyanche kavyaparikshana (The examination of poetry in Maharashtra) by Shridhara Vyankatesha Ketkar is a monograph, dealing with the history of literary taste and appreciation of the medieval Marathi authors. Maharashtriyanche kavyaparikshana observes that the character of literature and social circumstances are co-related. Shivaji's age was the most productive period of medieval Marathi literature. Appreciation and production of literature are inter-related activities. The common reader is the 'Supreme Court' of literature: the literature of the lower stratum later assumes the status of the literature of the higher stratum; refinement of the literature of the 'unrefined' lends charm to national literature. Saint Ramadas preached, practised and propounded new principles of poetics which could serve as a supplement to the age-old Sanskrit poetics.

Abhinava kavyaprakasha by Ramchandra Shripad Joag aims at dispelling the present-day literary critics' ignorance of the principles of ancient poetics. Abhinava kavyaprakasha based on twenty works on Sanskrit poetics from Bharata to Jagannatha, systematically discusses the traditional topics like 'lakshana' (definition), 'prayojana' (purpose), 'hetu' (generative cause); 'vishaya' (subject) powers of words, 'rasa' 'riti' (style), 'guna' (qualities), 'dosha' (defects) 'alankara' (figures of speech) and genres of poetry, with suitable illustrations.

Kavyalochana by Dattatreya Keshav Kelkar discusses the traditional aspects of poetics in thirteen chapters spread over 400 pages. Kavyalochana states that a blending of Sanskrit poetics and western criticism should be attempted and the critic should refine the readers' literary taste. Pratibha (poetic muse) is imagination coupled with discretion; enjoyability is the touchstone of 'literary delight'; literary relish is experienced because of a work's self-dependent unity; the number of figures of speech can be reduced: the figures of speech can be regrouped and renamed; reality in literature is different from that in everyday life; the literary artist must realize his social responsibility.

Marathiche sahityashastra by Madhav Gopal Deshamukh argues that Sanskrit poetics is inadequate in that it does not recognise new trends in medieval Marathi poetry. Marathiche sahityashastra investigates the principles of poetics which underlie the works of Marathi saint-poets from Jnaneshvara to Ramdas. The main conclusions of Marathiche sahityashastra are according to the saint poets, that spiritual poetry is the highest type of literature ; that sahitya means external embellishment; purification of speech and devotion to God and denial of worldly pleasure constitute the 'aim of poetry'; that 'upama', 'shlesha' and 'varnaka' are new figures of speech; the term 'rekha' signifies the 'style of expressing sentiments'; and that rasa and bhava are inter-related and the sentiment of devotion to God is the quintessence of 'madhurya' (sweetness).

Rasavimarsha by Keshav Narayan Watave examines the ancient rasa-doctrine in the light of western psychology and aesthetics. Rasavimarsha, besides discussing the concepts of rasas, their mutual relations, the claim of the sentiment of devotion to God as an independent rasa, etc., explains the rasa-doctrine in the terminology of western psychology and thus presents the old doctrine in a modern form.

Bharatiya sahityashastra (Indian poetics) by Ganesh Trymbak Deshpande, in its first part, traces the historical development of Sanskrit poetics from 200 B.C. to A.D. 1700, connects Bharata's lakshanas with the figures of speech, and shows that Bhamaha and others do not belong to different schools of poetics but follow the established views of their predecessors. In the second part Bharatiya sahityashastra exhaustively discusses the usual topics of poetics, with appropriate illustrations tastefully translated into Marathi.

Bharatiya kavyashastrachi utkranti by Waman Keshav Lele chronologically arranges all concepts and thoughts concerning Sanskrit poetics as propounded between 300 A.D. and 800 A.D. and then critically assesses the evolution of each of them. Bharatiya kavyashastrachi utkranti concludes that the ancients aimed at perfect and beautiful composition and that poetics demanded a rigorous physical and mental exertion. The reflections on the soul of poetry began in the sixth century A.D.; poetry and other fine arts were considered integral parts of undivided human culture; the 'sound' and 'sense' of language were deemed to possess many qualities; literature observed its own 'code of conduct'.

Ramdasanche sahityashastra by B.S. Paranjape upholds the view that a literary composition full of strikingness and variety, produced with aesthetic sense and appropriateness and evincing the author's scholarship, enhances the charm of human life and, therefore, enjoys a rightful and prestigious place in the life of a nation. Poetry teaches us, softens our angularities, shows us the path of devotion, frees us from the worldly ties, dislodges duality and makes us see 'reality'. Great poets are treasures of discretion, fountains of imagination, rain clouds of nectar and storehouses of beatitude.

POETICS (Oriya). Orissa has had a long tradition of poetics which culminated in Sahitya darpana in Sanskrit, by Vishwanath Kaviraya, but the first Oriya poet who wrote a book on poetics in Oriya was Narasingha Sena. He was a poet of high order in the early part of the 16th century. His treatise on alankara was entitled Dhaga muktabali. It is divided into 17 'panchakas' and each panchaka has five padas. These panchakas can be divided into four categories, such as the division of nayika, Shringara rasa and its sub-divisions, nayaka and sakhis. The padas of the panchakas are independent by themselves, though they aim at describing one aspect of rasa or one kind of nayika. On the whole the emphasis was more on nayikas and Shringara rasa than on anything else. But the book, as it is, shows that the writer was not much interested in writing a systematic book on alankara shastra, though the book has a good range and the writer appears to be well-versed in Sanskrit poetics.

The second book of importance is Kabi kalpadruma by Jadumani Routroy (17th c.). The book is a complete work on kavya shastra in Oriya literature. It is divided into eight chapters, such as kavya, rasa, nayaka and nayika lakhyam; guna and dosha in kavya; Shabdartha; description of different seasons; description of different types of colour; different raga and laya of music; description of different types of songs and small poems; and description of different types of dances. The writer has used both Sanskrit and Oriya languages but, as can be seen, it was not confined only to poetics. It also included aspects of dictionary, change of season and discussion on varieties of colour. The models have been taken from important authors of the past like Vamana and Bharata, though in a way Vishwanatha's Sahitya darpana has almost been followed literally in many places.

The next book of importance was Rasa panchaka by Upendra Bhanja (17th-18th c.), the famous poet who wrote three books specially dealing with the subject-matter of kavya shastra. The books were, Chitra kavya bandhodaya, Rasa manjari and Rasa panchaka. The first book gives detailed descriptions of 'bandhas' (puzzle knots) like Sarpa (serpent) bandha, Gada (mace) bandha and Ratha (chariot) bandha, etc. The second book has five chapters which describe similes, alankaras and chhandas etc, which were generally used by poets to write kavyas, particularly in the Riti kavya period. The third book is divided into panchakas and in each the poet refers to five types of poetry, such as chhanda, chaupadi, chautisa, dhaga and beli. Besides, detailed accounts of nine rasas have been given along with references to different types of nayakas and nayikas. Books like Sahitya darpana, Rasa tarangini and Kavya prakasha were Upendra's models. Following Upendra and influenced by him was Rasa muktabali by Gadadhara Narayan Bhanja of Keonjhar. The work was divided into five chapters and was in the form of a conversation between Radha and Lalita.

The tradition continued in the 20th century and some more important recent books are Alankara bodhodaya by Basudeva Sudhal Dev, Alankara tarangini by Kulamani Das, Alankara parichaya by Bhabagrahi Mishra, Alankara sahityara krama vikasa by Govind Chandra Udgata. Most of these books rely on Sanskrit models though there are frequent examples from Oriya.

The tradition of writing books on poetics which started in Orissa in the 13th century by Vidyadhar has continued till today, though the most important work has been Vishwanath's Sahitya darpana which has throughout centuries continued to provide illumination and ideas to Oriya writers on poetics.

POETICS (Prakrit) in its widest sense embraces the sciences of all poetic art; and is called Sahitya shastra or Alamkarashastra. The term 'alamkara' in Sanskrit stands for the principle of poetic beauty itself, which in its general sense can be called the science of criticism. Poetry is the earliest literature in India but as science of poetry, poetics developed later. The most ancient basis of alamkara literature is very simple. Prakrit writers follow the older tradition of poetics. They have thrown light on gunas, alamkaras, ritis and rasas. They have also propounded various theories and definitions of alamkaras as well as of dhvani. A classification of figures of speech that has been accepted by all alamkarikas is based on sound and sense.

There is a long tradition of poetics in Sanskrit literature. Most critics, such as Rudrata, Anandavardhana, Abhinava Gupta, Dhanika, Dandi, Bhojraja, Ruyyaka, Mammata and many other eminent alamkarikas have quoted in their works passages from Prakrit poetry with all its beauty and art. It is worthy of note that Sanskrit critics do not mention the name of any of the Prakrit alamkarikas with their schools.

Unfortunately, it seems that the Prakrit works of poetics are lost. The single manuscript of Alamkaradarpana (alankaradappana) is available. It is still unpublished. The copy of the manuscript is dated 1104 A.D. which shows that the text is earlier than the eleventh century. It comprises 134 verses. Though its author is unknown, there is evidence that he was from a Jaina family. In the very beginning of the text he invokes Jinavani (Shruta devta). The work deals with the theory and definition of poetry, purpose of poetry, figures of speech and their illustrations. It is a work full of quotations from Parkrit poetry.

POETICS (Rajasthani) is concerned with the vast bulk of oriental theories which may, for the sake of convenience, be studied under the following heads: Alankar (rhetoric of shabda and artha, i.e. word and meaning), Dosh (flaws), Gun (ingredients of treatment), Vritti (style of description), Rasa (aesthetic feeling), Dhvani (suggestiveness), and Riti (pattern of rules). Under the last category some of the theoreticians mention Nayak-Nayika-Bheda also, i.e. principles describing the kinds and qualities of men and women, mainly in the context of love.

Rajasthani has been largely dependent on classical treatises for all these details. Though the Jain scholars, who were responsible for writing and preserving almost the entire Rajasthani literature of the past, were quite conversant with these theories, the bigger lot of minstrels was mostly trained in the traditional, hereditary way. Though we hear of Charan 'pathashalas' training the poets in poetics, they were too few to cope with the demand.

Poets like Isharadas (16th c.), Durasa Adha (16th c.), Prithvi Raj (17th c.), Bankidas (19th c.), Ganeshpuri (19th c.), Narasingdan (19th c.), Muraridas (20th c.) were certainly duly educated in poetics and allied branches. The rhetoricians, prosodists and lexicographers, of whom there are over a dozen names, also deserve the credit of being skilled theoreticians. Some of the important works in the field are Kushallabh's Pingai shiromani (16th c.), Jogidas's Haripingal prabandh (16th c.), Hamirdan's Pingal prakash and Lakhapat Pingal (18th c.), Mansaram's Raghunath rupak gitan ro (19th c.), Udairam's Kavikulbodh (19th c.), Harikrishan's Rup dip pingal and Adha kisan's Raghubar jas prakas. All these works mainly deal with prosody and have defined, with illustrations, the various metres in use. In a secondary manner they have touched on the 'Alankaras' (figures), 'Doshas' (flaws), 'Rasas' (aesthetic feelings), 'Ukats' (manners of address) and 'Jathas' (repetitive forms).

The only one alliteration, but most important at the same time, is 'vainsagai', that is, the fraternity of syllables. It is a sort of 'shabdalankar', defined in classical treatises as 'vrittianupras'. But 'vainasagai' excels shabdalankar in the sense that it is treated as an essential quality of all poetry, enhancing its beauty by sound-effect. Moreover, it is used in more than ten ways, thus expanding the scope of its play, resulting in the added splendour of the outward form.

'Ukat', the manner of addressing 'git', is restricted to the composition of Dingal commemorative songs, 'sakh ri kavita'. As a git is either to be addressed by the poet to the hero, or to his readers or listeners, or to his own self, or by some one else to a third person, principles regarding manners of address are laid down. Scholars have classified these address-forms into five different kinds, each form having its own subdivisions.

'Doshas' or flaws of poetic composition are eleven in all (1) 'Andh' (blind) flaw occurs when there is an ambiguity as to who is addressing; (2) 'Chabakalo' (spotted) takes place when words of more than one language are mixed up; (3) 'Hin' (deficient) is observed when the peculiarities related to the hero are not mentioned which creates confusion in identification; (4) 'Ninang' (out of sequence) take place when the description is not in a consecutive order; (5) 'Chhand Bhang' (breach of metrical arrangement) is apparently a deficiency of 'matra' in a metre (6) 'Jatvirodh' (caste-hostility) denotes the mixing up of the stanzas of different kinds, (7) 'Apas' (imperceptibility) means the supposed intricacy of composition which is too difficult to be understood; (8) 'Nal cheda' also relates to loss of sequence; (9) 'Pakhatut' (use of non-standard language) records use of non-standard language along with the standard one; (10) 'Baharo' (inaudibility) stands for ambiguity of meaning and also for obscene and rude vocabulary; (11) 'Apangal' occurs when the rhyming terminations result in inauspicious words.

'Jatha' or 'Riti', is a sort of repetition of expression which, otherwise regarded as 'Punarokti Dosha', is treated as an art of style by the rhetoricians. Muraridan in his Jaswant jasobhushan (20th c.) has called 'Marawi Riti', a style adopted in Marubhasha. Udairam in his Kavikulbodh has mentioned the number of Jathas as twenty-one, but the actual names are only eighteen, as given by him. Kisana Adha has mentioned only eleven of them.

As the majority of Rajasthani poets were more concerned with git they concentrated on prosody only. They neither needed nor had the requisite ability to go deep into the principles of 'dhvani', 'rasa', and 'vritti' or other subtle theories of poetics as discussed by classical Sanskrit scholars.

Raw. S.

POETICS (Sanskrit). Poetics is a systematic theory of poetry. It defines poetry and its various forms, and discusses the principles that govern the creation of poetry. Rhetoric and aesthetics, too, are closely associated with poetics. So is literary criticism. What is now called Sanskrit poetics also covers the areas of rhetoric, aesthetics and criticism. 'Sahityavidya', 'Kavyamimamsa' and 'Alamkarashastra' are the terms in Sanskrit which approximate to the western term poetics. The first two terms were used as early as about 900 A.D. by Rajashekhara in his treatise, Kavyamimamsa. The last term is comparatively more modern. Gopendra Tippabhupala (c.15th century A.D.) in his Kamadhenu, commentary on the first two sutras of Vamana's Kavyalamkarasutravritti, suggests that the discipline of poetics is called 'Alamkarashastra'. Ramasubramany Shastri (mid-19th century) wrote Alamkarashastravitasa, using the term in the sense of poetics. Among modern scholars, H. Jacobi was perhaps the first to popularise the term Alamkarasashtra in the sense of poetics.

The history of Sanskrit poetics covers a period of eighteen hundred years from Bharata (c. 2nd century A.D.) to, say, Ramasubramanya Shastri (middle of 19th century), mentioned earlier. Before Bharata the hints at the theory of poetry may be discovered in the Sama Veda, Yaska (5th century B.C.), Panini (4th century B.C.), Kattayayana (3rd century B.C.) and Patanjali (2nd century B.C.). The Sanskrit treatises on poetics are simply astounding in respect of their number, magnitude and scope.

It is significant that the first work extant on poetics is Bharata's Natyashastra which is professedly a work on dramaturgy and deals comprehensively with the performing arts–drama, dance and music, but certain ideas that specifically belong to the Sanskrit poetics with the hints of a possible theory emerge out of the Natyashastra. Poetics in India, therefore, rose out of dramaturgy and offers an analogy with Aristotle's treatment of tragedy, a form of drama, as the greatest form of poetry.

The large number of books on poetics written in Sanskrit maintain varying degrees of difference in respect of the topics dealt with. These topics may be summed up briefly. (1) Purpose or purposes of poetry for the poet and the reader: the purposes, generally recognised, are acquisition of fame, wealth, wisdom and delight. (2) Qualities that make a poet capable of composing literary works: they are generally enumerated as 'pratibha' (inborn creative talent), training, learning and practice. (3) Definition of kavya (i.e. creative literature): in Sanskrit poetics word and meaning are generally recognised as the body of poetry, and some element like rasa (aesthetically experienced emotion or aesthetic relish), or dhvani (suggestive element), or riti (style), or vakrokti (deviant utterance), or auchitya (propriety), is recognised as its soul. (4) Power of word for conveying its primary, secondary, and suggested meanings and power of sentence for conveying its total meaning: questions are raised with regard to the real import of a word for a class or an individual, and other epistemological matters of the sort. (5) Classification of poetry: on the basis of the degree of appeal poetry can be classified as the best poetry (i.e., Dhvani), the mediocre (i.e., Gunibhutavyangya), and the inferior (i.e., Chitra); and on the basis of external form Gadya (prose), Padya (verse), Mishra (mixed), Drishya (visual, or dramatic), Shravya (audible or nondramatic). (6) Details: the particulars elucidate poetry in a dramatic form. (7) Gunas (qualities): these are qualities which qualify the word and meaning, their number, nature and relationship with Rasa. (8) Doshas (literary blemishes): they are classified as belonging to Pada (word), Vakya (sentence), Artha (meaning), Rasa (contextual sentiment), etc. (9) Ritis (diction or style). (10) The term Vrittis has various meanings and may refer to the vrittis of drama such as Bharati and Kaishika or those of an Anuprasa (i.e. figure relating to assonance) such as Nagarika and Upanagarika. (11) Alamkaras (figures of speech): such elements embellish writing. (12) Various features of poetry like Pravritti, Paka and Lakshana are also discussed. (13) Rasa and its varieties are explained. (14) Kavisamayas (literary conventions).

The treatises deal either with all or some of them. Accordingly, the Sanskrit works on poetics may be divided into several groups: (i) those dealing with most of the topics, including dramaturgy, e.g. Shringaraprakasha, Sahityaratnakara, Sahityadarpana, and Prataparudriyal; (ii) those dealing with most except dramaturgy, e.g. Kavyadarsha, Kavyalamkarasutravrittti, Kavyalamkara (of Bhamaha, Rudrata and Vagbhata), Kavyaprakasha and Rasagangadhara; (iii) those dealing with only dramaturgy and rasa, e.g. Dasharupaka, Rasarnavasudhakara, Natakachandrika, but the Natyashastra forms a class by itself as it deals with dance and music as well; (iv) those dealing only with Alamkaras (figures of speech), e.g.

Alamkarasarasamgraha, Alamkarasarvasva, Kuvalayananda and Chitramimamsa; (v) those presenting only a particular theory of poetics, e.g. Dhvanyaloka, Vakroktijivita, Vyaktiviveka and Auchityavicharacharcha; (vi) those dealing only with the powers of words, e.g. Abhidhavrittimatrika, Vrittivarttika, Shabdavyaparavichara; (vii) those dealing with Rasa alone without any treatment of dramaturgy, e.g. Shringaratilaka and Rasatarangini; (viii) those dealing with a particular topic more exclusively e.g. Rasamanjari dealing with Nayaka-Nayikabheda, i.e. varieties of type characters, and Bhaktirasamritasindhu and Ujjvalanilamani, both dealing with Bhakti rasa alone; (ix) those meant only for refuting the views of earlier theorists, e.g. Kavyaprakashakhandana and Chitramimamsakhandana; (x) those offering practical guidance to poets in respect of metres, Kavisamayas, and the like, e.g. Suvrittatilaka and Kavyakalpalata. Besides such regular works on poetics, there are also commentaries, e.g. Abhinavabharati on Natyashastra, and Lochana on Dhvanyaloka which, because of their assessment of the great dramatic and rhetorical moment, may be given authoritative status in poetics.

Among the traditional writers, Samudrabandha (c. 1300), while commenting on Alamkarasarvasa of Ruyyaka, divides the authorities of Sanskrit poetics into five schools: the Alamkara, Riti, Vakrokti, Bhukti, and Dhvani schools. Modern scholars like P.V. Kane and others have also categorised them as a number of theories and schools. It is, however, difficult to assign a theorist exclusively to a particular school, but a general classification may be made: (1) Rasa school had its most notable exponents in Bharata and Vishvanatha who consider Rasa as the soul of poetry. (2) Alamkara school had its theorists in Bhamaha, Dandi, Udbhata and Rudrata. None claims Alamkara as the soul of poetry, but all appear to emphasise the importance of Alamkara. In the words of Bhamaha, "Even the charming face of a damsel does not shine without ornaments." (3) Riti school had Vamana as its foremost representative who recognised Riti (style) as the soul of poetry. (4) Anandavardhana (c.850 A.D.) was the founder of the Dhvani school and Mammata its most notable exponent. Anandavardhana thought Dhvani (i.e., suggestive element) was the soul of poetry. This school recognised Rasa as the most important element of poetry. (5) Vakrokti school was propounded by Kuntaka who maintained that Vakrokti (i.e. deviant utterance) or a striking statement was the soul of poetry. In fact, Kuntaka assessed the whole scheme of Dhvani in a different context and with a different connotation, and also recognised the importance of Rasa. (6) The theory of Anumiti was propounded by Mahimabhatta who claimed that what had been called the suggested meaning in poetry was actually derived through a process of Anumiti (i.e. inference). Mahimabhatta opposed the concept of Dhvani, but recognised Rasa as the soul of poetry. (7) The theory of Auchitya was propounded by Kshemendra, viewing Auchitya (i.e. propriety) as the soul of poetry.

It is difficult to determine the proper affiliation of a theorist to a school. For instance, Rudrata, an exponent of the Alamkara school, also recognised the paramount importance of Rasa. Ruyyaka titled his work Alamkarasarvasva, but in fact he was a staunch follower of the doctrine of Dhvani.

Sanskrit poetics is mostly concerned with the principles of criticism, but applied criticism is not totally absent in Sanskrit. It has been in existence in several ways: (i) as references made to individual works and particular passages from those works along with comments for illustrating various literary elements; (ii) as comments given on existing literature in commentaries on theoretical works; (iii) as comments made by authors of literary works with regard to merits and demerits of other writers, e.g. Bana's observations in the introductory verses of Harshacharita; (iv) as anonymous floating remarks, sometimes quoted in the commentaries, e.g. the observation "Upama Kalidasasya, Bharaverarthagauravam, Naishadhe padalalityam, Maghe santi tryogunah," which points out that upama (simile) is the most salient feature in Kalidasa's poetry, the meaning of a word in Bharavi, the delicate artistry in Naishadha and the presence of the three in Magha. The Samaveda and the grammatical treatises of Yaska, Panini, Kattayayana and Patanjali may once have formed a part of this applied literary criticism.

Sanskrit poetics does not seem concerned with the social utility of literature but decidedly with the morality of the individual. This is warranted by the fact that ethically undesirable ideas are denounced as contributing to the blemish called Anauchitya (i.e. impropriety). While conceding that literature should be instructive, Sanskrit poetics claims that to give delight is the ultimate aim of literature but it is a delight approved by a sense of the moral values. Moral perfection, achieved through literature, is also a means to that end. It qualifies the individual to attain Moksha, which is a state of supreme bliss, and the aesthetic relish accruing from the realisation of Rasa is on a par with the supreme bliss.

POETICS (Sindhi). Though complementary to literary criticism in its present-day extended sense, poetics is not exactly a part of it. For, literary criticism concerns itself with the literary works themselves and poetics is a philosophical activity within the former's orbit and deals with the analysis and judgement of concept regarding poetry of literature.

Since the Sanskritized Sindhi works could not survive the Muslim rule in Sindh, there is no trace of any indigenous system of poetics having been in vogue in Sindhi until the first quarter of the twentieth century. It may be observed that when the Sanskritized Sindhi language reached a definite stage of development, the Persian life and letters, owing to the peculiar geographical and political conditions in Sindh, started showing their influence on it. This explains why in Sindh before the partition of the country in 1947, very few of the literary principles based on Sankrit poetics formed part of the Sindhi teaching curricula, and there were no Sindhi standard books dealing with various aspects of Kavyashastra and the Sindhi dictionaries remained devoid of the requisite terminology. What showed itself was the Perso-Arabic poetics in its rudiments.

The Perso-Arabic poetics talked of two concepts, in the main, of 'fasahat' (lucidity which arises from the appropriate use of words) and 'balaghat' (suggestiveness which combines the quality of 'fasahat' with the added one of presenting a whole gamut of feeling in a few words), and judged all the literary works by them. The derivative and dilettante Perso-Arabic poetics for Sindhi also referred to the twin concepts of 'takhayyul' (imagination) and 'mahakat' (depection of inner feelings under outer stimuli) which were western in their origin.

It was in 1923 that H.M. Gurbaxani evinced some kind of acquaintance with the indigenous poetics in his introduction to the Shah-jo-risalo, Volume I. In 1953, J.K. Bhavanani made an earnest effort to revive our interest in Sanskrit poetics and Indian prosody by bringing out his book Chhanda sug'andh. In it, he wrote cursorily about the principles of Chhandashastra and made a passing reference to the subjects of 'bhava', 'rasa' and 'alankara'. L.H. Ajwani characterised Bhavnani as the pioneer in the field.

In independent India, the literary principles based on Sanskrit poetics came to form a part of the Sindhi teaching curricula for Higher Secondary as well as university students. For such students, Motilal Jotwani published Alankara ain chhanda in 1962. A short book on the subject, it opens up in Sindhi for the first time in centuries of the Persian influence the four aspects of Kavyashastra, viz., 'rasa', 'alankara', 'dhvani' and 'chhanda'.

Around the year 1970, Motilal Jotwani published a series of articles in Sindhi, studying the Sindhi Sufi poets Shah Abdul Karim and Shah Abdul Latif from the point of view of Sanskrit poetics. About the latter, he said, among other things the Sufi poet Shah Abdul Latif's Risalo involved all the significant emotions and not only pity and fear, as in Aristotle. The Shah-jo-risalo awakens the erotic, the comic, the frightful, the disgusting, the tender, the tranquil, etc. The poet universalizes (sadharanikarana) his own emotions, depending on his 'kalpana'(imagination) and 'samavedana' (sensibility) which organise 'bhava' (emotion) and 'vibhave' (objective correlative).

In Sindhi, J.K. Bhavnani deals with these concepts at a greater length in his Panja ganja: Bharati sahitya siddhanta (1973). As the title of the book Panja ganja (literally meaning "Five treasures") suggests, it bares open the five treasures of Natya shastra, Rasa shastra, Alankara shastra, Sahitya shastra and Chhanda shastra. Throughout his book, the author has given English equivalents of various Sanskrit terms, which have also been adopted by other Indian languages, he having done so for the Sindhi language. He has not omitted a few Persian equivalents which he could find in that tradition.

At present, the study of the indigenous Sanskrit poetics has attracted a good number of Sindhi scholars in India and drawn the attention of some of them in Sindh (Pakistan) too.

POETICS (Tamil). In ancient Tamil, the word 'nul' refers to grammatical work only. The tradition of writing grammatical work is to teach not only the grammar of language, but also the grammar of poetic creation and its tradition and convention. The oldest grammatical work, Tolkappiyam, belongs to this tradition and 'porlalikaram', the third division of Tolkappiyam sets the rules and regulations of poetics and rhetoric. The first two chapters 'Akattinai Iyal' and 'Purattinai Iyal' deal with the major themes of poetry mainly based on the concepts of 'akam' and 'puram'. Tolkappiyar classifies 'akam' poetry, love poetry or 'poetry of the inner world' into the seven types. The first is 'kaikkilai' (poetry of unrequited love) and the last 'peruntinai' (mismatched love). Of the seven types, 'the middle five' i.e, 'mullai', 'kurunchi', 'palai', 'marutam' and 'neytal', are the subject or theme of ideal love poetry of that time. Here 'mullai', 'kurunchi' etc. not only represent the topographical classification of land but also indicate the human feelings set in the time of union, separation and so on. He talks about the elements of love poetry in the order: 'mutal' (the first things - time and place), 'karu' (the native elements - food, work, flora and fauna etc) and 'uri' (the emotional aspects of human love).

Tolkappiyar speaks about the poetic conventions and tradition of 'akam' and 'puram' poetry. In akam according to him, the name of the person should not be mentioned and poetry should be in accordance with the tradition of 'ulakiyal valakku' and 'natakavalakku', the mundane usage of world and literature or drama, and it should be true to the mental perception of the creative world of the poet and the reader. In contrast to akam, puram poetry is about the 'exterior or the public life of the people'. During later times, the old Tamil akam tradition, enunciated by Tolkappiyar and illustrated by Sangam classics had almost been forgotten. New traditions had crept in due to the natural influence of time and also due to the aggressive influence of Sanskritic traditions. And in the medieval period it was felt necessary to have separate grammars on each aspects of Tamil poetics independently. As we have grammars like Yapparungalam and Yapparungalakkarigai exclusively for 'yappu' or prosody, it was also felt that there should be separate grammars on 'porul', i.e. content of poetry. Iraiyanar's Kalaviyal and Narkaviraja Nambi's Akapporul only deal with the several aspects of love, both pre-marital and post-marital, and formulate rules for akam poetry. In a similar way, Purapporul Venbamalai (13th c.) deals with the theme of puram poetry.

In 'Meyppattiyal', the sixth chapter of 'Porulalikaram', Tolkappiyar talks about eight kinds of 'suvai', taste or enjoyment of mental pleasure, and formulates his theory of 'meyppatu' or 'rasa' as a part of poetics.

In 'Uvamaviyal', the seventh chapter of 'Porulatikaram', Tolkappiyar speaks of only 'uvamai' as a base of all rhetoric in thirty-eight sutras. The first sixteen deal with explicit comparison (simile) while the rest deal with indirect comparison in the name of 'ullurai', the concept of suggestion. After Tolkappiyam several scholars were actively involved in elaborating the concept of 'uvama' or 'upama pirapancha' into many figures of speech and writing grammatical works exclusively for rhetoric on the basis of Sanskrit grammatical works of Alamkará shashtra. The word 'ani' in Tamil refers to figure of speech or alamkara in Sanskrit. Perachiriyar, the commentator of Tolkappiyam strongly opposes the introduction of rhetoric in the name of 'uruvagam' or 'rupaka'. Generally, he is aganist the school of rhetoric based on the Sanskrit tradition and he says that the concept of 'uvamam' itself covers all kinds of similes enumerated in the works of rhetoric.

However, sometime after Dandi composed his Kavyadarsha in the court of Rajasimha Pallava (680-705), the study of 'ani' was again taken up and there were two grammarians, Puttamittranar in the court of Virarajendra Chola (1063-1070) and a Tamil Dandi in the court of Kulottunga II (1133-1150), adapting the work of Sanskrit Dandi. Puttamittranar deals with 'ani' in the last sections of his five-fold grammar Virachotiyam, called 'Alamkarappatalam', where he deals with thirty five 'anis' or figures of speech in 30 quatrains. His work was not popular. But Dandi's Tamil work Dandiyalamkaram achieved immediate popularity which it enjoys till today. Here also he deals with 35 anis divided into three chapters, general, on sense and on sound.

Alamkara through sense is porulani and alamkara through sound or words is sollani. Of the two, it is of course porulani that impresses the reader and conveys the sense emphatically, enhances the poetic value also and raises the writing to the level of art through its poetry. In his chapter on sollani, Dandi deals with the subject under four heads—repetition, difficult verse, solecism and impropriety. We have many features of sollani illustrated in the hymns of earlier saintly singers like Tiru Jnanasambandhar and these could have inspired Dandi to deal with the subject elaborately and separately. In fact, he uses one verse from Sambandhar to illustrate one of his sutras. Dandi has himself provided the illustrative verses for his subject, most of which he has himself written in praise of his patron, the Chola king.

The most familiar form of sollani (alamkara through sound) is pun (shlesha in Sanskrit and, sledai in Tamil). A large number of long poems with 100 verses on this sledai pattern have been written by many writters even up to the present day. The sledai or double meanings is here effected in separating several conjoined words, into separate distinct words to render the two meanings. They have afforded an interesting exercise to semi-scholars in de-linking the joined words to arrive at the double meaning.

The concepts of Dandi have been further enlarged by another great writer of the seventeenth century, by name Tirukkurukai Perumal Kavirayar, in his Maran alamkaram where he developed the individual figures of speech (ani) to hundred. He was a great devotee of Namalvar, and has written his treatise and its illustrative verses in his praise. The work is no doubt valuable but it has never been popular. The author has studied Dandi's Kavyadarsha but his work is an original one.

Three other treatises in translation up to the end of the ninteenth century claim our attention. Kuvalayanandam by Appayya Dikshita has been transalated by two different writers - one, Manikkavachakar in the 'sutram' metre in the eighteenth century and two, Minakshisundara Kavirayar in the 'kalitturai' (quatrain) metre by the last quarter of the ninteenth century. Chandraloka of Jayadeva was transalated by Muttusvami Aiyangar in 126 sutras (printed 1909).

These are merely attempts at expressing Sanskrit thoughts in the Tamil language, and they do not give any illustrative verses.

Srinivasaraghavachari, who was one of the editors of the second Kuvalayanandam (printed 1895), himself wrote a Dandi alamkara saram (a concise Dandi alamkara printed 1898) with many fresh illustrative verses of his own. P.S.S. Sastry translated Dhvanyaloka in sutra form and published it with his own Tamil commentary in 1944. These two are important contributions on the subject in modern times.

During the unsettled days of western militancy in Tamil Nadu, there arose a few short poetic treatises enumerating various objects which can be used by poets as objects of comparison to the parts of a woman's body; in this period patronage for poets was at a low ebb and when poets indulged in low poetry to please the petty chiefs and earn their livelihood, these short treatises were written to help such poets in rhyming and alliteration; the books were called Uvamama sangraham.

POETICS (TELUGU)

POETICS (Telugu). Surprisingly and quite significantly too, the first work on poetics in Telugu is incidentally the first treatise on grammar by the first poet of the Telugu language. Andhra Mahabharatam, a free rendering of the Mahabharata (Adi, Sabha and a part of Aranya parvas) in Telugu verse by Nannaya Bhatt (11th c.), is the first known literary composition in Telugu, and Andhra shabda chintamani composed in 88 'arya' metres in Sanskrit is a pioneering work by the same poet in the field of the philosophy of language and literature which we may call poetics. This work dealing with the formation, purification and circulation of words with special reference to literary expression in the formative stage of Telugu literature brought Nannaya Bhatt the credit of being known as 'Vaganushasana' (the ordainer of speech). His concept of 'prakriti' and 'vikriti' in the context of Telugu language and his classification of Telugu vocabulary into two thought-provoking categories, 'Kala' and 'Druta' prakritaka, are significant contributions to the study of language. Telugu is thus singularly fortunate in having a founder-writer and an analyst of artistic expression in one and the same personality.

In the prologue to his poetic composition, Andhra Mahabharatam, he formulates for himself and his successors the essential components of any creative writing. According to him, a pleasant and palatable style of narration coupled with a substantial content sustaining and sophisticated enough to prove worthy of the software and couched in captivating and communicative language is the essential equipment of a poet or a creative writer. Himself being a treasure-house of ideas and a fountain of spontaneous expression, the founder-poet of Telugu literature spells out these ideas in the form of poetic maxims like 'Prasanna katha kalitartha yukti, akshara ramayata and saramati' which later became guidelines for thousands of poets who succeeded him during the past one thousand years of Telugu literature.

It was, however, Elakuchi Bala Saraswathi (17th c.) who brought to light the Andhra shabda chintamani of Nannaya by writing a detailed commentary on this work in Telugu. It is said that Bala Saraswathi used to teach grammar and poetics to his pupils on the basis of Andhra shabda chintamani and his commentary, popularly known as Balasaraswateeyam, was an outcome of his experience as a teacher. He analysed the Sanskrit verses into convenient aphorisms and explained the significance of each one of them giving appropriate illustrations from Telugu classics.

Another scholar, Kakanuru Appa Kavi of the same century, also translated the text of Nannaya into Telugu in verse form. This is a free rendering of the original text with several new points added and amply illustrated to make it an independent work on poetics. This Telugu rendering, popularly known as Appakaveeyam, contains five chapters–the first four devoted to poetics and the last one to grammar. The author proposed to extend the scope of this work further but could not do so. But it can be said with confidence that Appakaveeyam is one of the most comprehensive treatises on poetics in Telugu till the seventeenth century and continues to guide the students and scholars even today as a handbook on Telugu poetics. In 1924 Vavilla Ramaswami Shastrulu published a book combining the two texts Bala Saraswateeyam and Appakaveeyam for the benefit of scholars and students of Telugu poetics.

More or less a contemporary of these two scholars, another scholar, Ahobala Pandita by name, wrote a detailed commentary in Sanskrit on Andhra shabda chintamani. This commentary is mostly based on Bala Saraswateeyam and also another Sanskrit commentary on the same text by a Sanskrit scholar called Atharvanacharya of the thirteenth century. What Balasaraswathi was to Nannaya, Ahobala Pandita was to Atharvanacharya whose commentary on Nannaya's treatise known by the titles Athatvana karika and Vikriti vivekam came to light only through Ahobala Pandita. This work of the Pandita presents a scholarly and comprehensive account of the subject covered by all his predeccessors, but being in Sanskrit it could not become so popular as Balasaraswateeyam or Appakaveeyam in Telugu reading community.

Thus the pioneering work of Nannaya Bhatt in the field of grammar and poetics attracted the attention of scholars and writers for nearly six centuries and provided inspiration to the poets and 'poeticians' for centuries almost till the beginning of the present (twentieth) century. Katana (13th c.), a contemporary of the famous Telugu poet Tikkana, also wrote an independent work entitled Andhra bhasha bhushanam in 190 verses in Telugu. But the main thrust of this work is grammar and not poetics. The first comprehensive work exclusively on poetics in Telugu is Kavyalankara chudamani of Vinnakota Peddana (15th c.). This work deals with almost all the essential components of poetry or a literary composition like rasa, alankara and chhandas (metre). Peddana composed his own illustrations to explain his theory, and in this respect this is entirely an original exposition on the subject in Telugu and incidently the first of its kind. It was Peddana who established for the first time that Telugu was derived from Sanskrit.

Jakkana (1380-1460) wrote two books Chhandodarpanam and Rasabharanam—the former dealing with prosody and the latter with rasa. Another poet, Anantamatya, also of the same period, wrote similar books on prosody and poetics. The titles are also the same. Anantamatya based his Rasabharanam on Sahitya darpana and Kavya prakasha in Sanskrit. His original contribution to poetics in general was that he discovered an acceptable and convincing relationship between shringara, bhakti and vatsalya. He did not touch 'guna' or 'dosha' in his work. Gourana, also of the same period, wrote Lakshana dipika in Sanskrit.

Annamacharya (1424-1503), the famous saint-composer of devotional music, is also said to have written a treatise on devotional music called Samkeertana lakshanamu in Sanskrit. Though this work is not available now, China Tirumalaiah, the grandson of Annamacharya, makes a mention of it and also of a commentary on it by his father Peda Tirumalaiah. If this book is discovered, it may be a valuable contribution to the advancement of this special branch of poetics.

Kavijanashrayam by a famous poet Vemulavada Bhimana was there in existence even prior to the composition of Kavyalankara chudamani by Peddana. But neither Peddana nor Anantamatya seems to have been influenced by Bhimana, though Appakaveeyam shows clear evidence of the impact of Ananta's Chhandodarpanam.

Kaviloka chintamani by Tatambhattu (15th c.) and Kavijana sanjeevani by Muddaraju Ramaiah (16th c.) are also valuable contributions to poetics in Telugu. Telugu scholars usually refer to works on poetics as 'lakshana granthas' and those who specialise in poetics are called 'lakshanikas'. Another name for poetics in Telugu is 'alankara shastra'. It is strange that 'alankara' (figure of speech) was given so much importance while naming the discipline of poetics, even though Panditaraja Jagannatha, the most outstanding exponent of poetics among the Telugu scholars, advocated 'rasa' as the most important component of any creative writing in his time-honoured work, Rasa gangadhara. Another significant feature about poetics in Telugu is that this discipline reached its height in the seventeenth century when Panditraja Jagannatha also flourished and brought fame to the entire Telugu world through his profound scholarship and memorable work in the field of poetics.

One of the most celebrated Telugu poets of the sixteenth century, Ramaraja Bhushana alias Bhattu Murthi also composed a monumental work on poetics in Telugu entitled Kavyalankara chudamani. Though this book resembles Peddana's work in title, it is entirely different in content. This closely follows the Sanskrit text Prataparudriyam of Vidyanath in theoretical part, but the illustrations are all original compositions of Bhattu Murthi. Here also there is similarity between the two texts. The illustrations given by Vidyanath are all in praise of his patron Pratapa Rudra while those given by Bhattu Murthi sing the glory of his patron Narasa Raju. That is the reason why this work, though named Kavyalankara chudamani by the author is popularly known as Narasa bhupaleeyam. The subject matter of this work is kavya, rasa, guna, dosha and nayaka which also form a part of the Sanskrit text, but the Telugu version omits the portion on drama. Composed by an eminent writer of his time, this work on poetics is deccidedly the most authentic, enlightening and delightful in purport and presentation.

Sarva lakshana sara sangraham by Kuchimanchi Timmakavi (18th c.) and Ananda rangarat-chhandamu by Kasturi Ranga Kavi (18th c.) are two major works which promoted thought on poetics beyond the seventeenth century. These works discussed, among other things, the definition of poetry, the purpose of writing and the purport of literature. Pedakomati Vema Reddy, well-versed in both literature and music, made a significant contribution to the field through his two works Sahitya chintamani and Sangeeta chintamani. Late in the nineteenth century, Medapalli Venkata Ramanacharyulu (1862-1943) presented a historical account of the several works brought out in Telugu on poetics in his book Alankara shastra charitra.

In the twentieth century, several scholars contributed to the enrichment of thought on this discipline through translations from Sanskrit as well as original works in Telugu. Special mention should be made of Vedam Venkata Raya Shastri, Komarraja Venkata Lakshmana Rao, Chilukuri Narayana Rao, Manaalli Ramakrishna Kavi, Jammalamadaka Madhavarama Sharma, Divakarla Venkatavadhani and P.S.R. Apparao. Apart from these scholars, some of the creative writers also tried to express their original ideas on the subject with a coordinated vision, combining modern outlook with traditional wisdom. The first among them was perhaps C.R. Reddy whose Kavitva tatva vicharam opened up new area, finding new poetic norms and reviewng standards of literary criticism. The impact of the west and the quest for the basic Indian character of Indian literature traversed almost on parallel lines and the young writer of Telugu language like any other Indian writer has evolved for himself a composite culture of words, their meaning and power.

I.P.R

POETICS (Urdu) is largely based on Perso-Arabic poetics, but a strong hint of Sanskrit aesthetics is also apparent. It must, however, be understood that this poetics does not deal with quite the same questions as western poetics does. Certain questions which dominate western poetics hardly figure in Perso-Arabic and Sanskrit literary theory. Questions like "Is poetry truer than history?", "Is poetry an imitation or representation of reality?", "Is poetry useful to the community?" were apparently not considered relevant by Urdu poetics and its progenitors. Urdu poetics is more interested in the ontology of poetry: it inquires into the nature of words and metaphorical expressions, and investigates the semantic and formal "ornaments" of poetry.

Broadly speaking, Urdu poetics is divided into four disciplines : rhetoric or discourse (bayan); invention (bad'i, also called 'm'ani' or "meaning"); prosody (aruz); rhyme (qafiya). The study of "discourse" investigates metaphor and many other kinds of indirect comparison, as well as the simile. Judging from the fine and intricate distinctions that have been made, metaphor and simile occupy a central place in the system. The concept of "invention" shares some features with and may in fact have borrowed them from the Sanskrit notion of 'alankara'. Inventions of meaning are generally based on subtle wordplay, while those of form are more concerned with sound and even with the appearance of the words on the page. The fact that bad'i is also called m'ani shows that the effects of invention are not merely on the surface, but go deeper and affect the meaning. Prosody studies metre with an amazing exactness and detail. Based on Perso-Arabic prosody, Urdu prosody differs from it chiefly in its narrower universe of theoretically permissible metres. The theory is, however, realistic enough to recognise that an absolute definition of a metrical line is not possible. The study of rhyme explores the question of which sounds can rhyme with which. It occasionally relaxes restrictive Perso-Arabic rules, and at other times seems to be more restrictive than its paradigm.

Urdu poetics is truly aesthetic in nature; it is 'classical' in its love of conventions and in its attention to the theme (mazmun) in terms of its freshness or other qualities of expression and formulation. This poetics does not pay principal regard to the theme's edifying propensities. Several centuries of poetic practice saw the development of a number of descriptive-cum-evaluative concepts and notions which are not to be found in the Perso-Arabic model. The influence of the Indian environment is perhaps more apparent here than elsewhere in Urdu poetics. The 'tazkira' (descriptive list of poets) developed into a distinct genre. Poets described in the tazkira were also evaluated, even if somewhat summarily or vaguely, in the light of the new notions and concepts. Unfortunately the advent of western thought led to the desuetude of this critical vocabulary. Terms like "creation of meaning" (m'ani afarini), "creation of theme" (mazmun afarini), intellection or abstraction (khayalbandi) and the untranslatable 'kaifiyat' are no longer comprehensible to most modern critics.

The first major statement on poetics in Urdu is by the Old Urdu (Dakhani) poet Mulla Vajhi (1556-1660). In his long poem Qutab-o-Mushtari (1609-10), he devotes a section to 'a comment on poetry'. Apart from a brief Urdu preface by Mirza Rafi Sauda (1713-1780) of Delhi, there was a hiatus of nearly two hundred years before Insha (1757-1817), a Delhi poet living in Lucknow, wrote his Darya-e-latafat (1801), a witty and highly original treatise in Persian on Urdu linguistics, grammar and prosody. Next came the Urdu translation (1847) by the Delhi scholar Imam Bakhsh Sahba'i of the Persian Had'aiq-ul-balaghat (1768) with examples drawn from Urdu, rather than the original Persian and Arabic. But times were changing, and western ideas were soon to dominate the scene.

The first sustained pronouncement, which also proved to be the most influential, was that of Altaf Husain Hali (1837-1914). In the 'Muqaddama' (Introduction, 1893) to his Divan, Hali tried to describe the nature of poetry in what he thought were western terms. Largely unacquainted with English, he misunderstood a throw-away remark of Milton's and based his poetics of simplicity (sadagi), realism (asliyat) and passion (josh) upon it. He developed an ideal of 'natural poetry' by which he meant one shorn of what he considered imaginative and linguistic excesses. He also developed a concept of 'imagination' somewhat similar to that of Coleridge, though apparently uninfluenced by him. He called for an essentially didactic poetry capable of contributing to the common good.

S.R.F.

POETRY (Assamese). Early and Medieval Period: Assamese poetry covers a long span of time, from about the tenth century to the end of the eighteenth of the Christian era, with a break of two barren centuries immediately after the period to which the earliest recorded literary specimens belong. This barren period covers the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; no recorded or written document belonging to this period has come down to us. The possibility of the existence of folk-poetry during this period cannot be totally ruled out but, as it was orally transmitted, such composition must have undergone linguistic metamorphosis brought about by the speech habits of the succeeding generations. An unbroken line of poetry can be traced from the beginning of the fourteenth century to the advent of the British in the third decade of the nineteenth when the modern Assamese literature begins.

Medieval Assamese poetry is predominantly religious in tone and texture. The period of composition of the mystic songs of the Sahajayani Buddhists, whose dates are assigned between the tenth and twelfth centuries, is regarded as the starting point of medieval Assamese poetry. The language of these songs or lyrics, representing the latest phase of Apabhramsha, in fact, preserves not only the earliest formative stage of the Assamese language, but also the linguistic characteristics of other Indo-Aryan languages of eastern India. This proves that the 'Charyagitis' were composed at a time when Assamese, Bengali, Maithili and Oriya had not started their independent courses of development. The Buddhist songs, containing fortyseven pieces composed by twenty-four siddhas which deal with Sahajayani Buddhist beliefs, tenets and philosophy couched in an allegorical or symbolical language, not only reflect the contemporary lower stratum of society, but also contain flashes of imaginative expressions revealing the poetic sensibility of the composers.

In the course of the two successive centuries, the Assamese language seems to have developed fully in its independent path and attained status as a competent medium for literary expression. Sanskrit which had served until now as the only literary medium came to be gradually replaced by Assamese from the fourteenth century onwards. During the two succeeding centuries if literary works were composed, they are now irrecoverably lost. During the fourteenth century and the early part of the fifteenth, poetical compositions of a few poets could manage to survive the onslaught of time. The works of Hema Saraswati, Kaviratna Saraswati, Harivara Vipra, Rudra Kandali and Madhava Kandali belong to the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. Towering among them, Madhava Kandali, styled as Kaviraja Kandali, enjoying the patronage of King Mahamanikya in the mid-fourteenth century, translated into elegant Assamese verse the Ramayana of Valmiki as retained in Eastern India. Madhava Kandali justified his honorific title, Kaviraja, with his scholarship, poetic ability, mastery over words and his power of conjuring up desired atomosphere and situations. He is mainly responsible for creating a poetic style with his admirable blending of spoken words with Sanskrit words and mixing also contemporary local colour with that of Valmiki's time. He is said to have translated the entire epic but only the intermediary five cantos are now available. Next to Madhava Kandali, Harivara Vipra appears to have been a poet of considerable power with adaptations from Jaimini Bharata in three kavyas, Babrubahanar juddha, Lava-Kusar juddha and Tamradhvajar juddha, all dealing with heroism of the youthful characters like Vabruvahana, Lava, Kusa and Tamradhvaja who confront such veterans as Arjuna and Rama. Another poet of the fourteenth century was Hema Saraswati translating or adapting from the epics and the Puranas. The principal metres of the medieval period, viz., pada or payara, duladi and chhabi, have been continually used in their verses.

While these poets of the pre-Shankaradeva period resorted entirely to the narrative style, the Vaishnavite or the Shankarite age is remarkable for introducing varied forms of literature including drama and prose narratives. As regards forms the Vaishnavite poetry may be broadly classified into (i) narrative poetry and (ii) lyrical poetry. It can also be further classified into (i) translations, (ii) adaptations, (iii) compilation, and (iv) original works. The latter classification will be more helpful for covering all types of literature.

During the Vaishnavite period, which had roughly started in the last quarter of the fifteenth century and continued unabated to the end of the seventeenth, the main channel of poetry was no doubt religious in tone, inspiring devotion to God ('bhakti') and depicting His divine and supernatural sports and exploits. Another characteristic of the poetry of this period, as of the previous period, was that themes and stories were derived from the epics and the puranas and some of them were translations or adaptations, the rest original works or compilations from various Sanskrit sources.

The original works can be subdivided into (i) devotional lyrics and (ii) kavya. The trend of expressing a poet's devotional sentiments as well as of writing poems dealing with some incidents of the divine incarnations' mundane sports and activities had gained popularity from the pre-Shankarite times but the extant written specimens belong only to the period beginning from the early part of the fifteenth century. Some of these lyrical verses or songs set to classical ragas form an integral part of the narrative kavyas dealing with the glorification of the snake-goddess Manasa. These works known as pachali depict the power of Manasa, as she destroys the happiness of those who refuse to worship her, or bestows on her devotees all forms of human happiness. The conflict between the merchant-prince Chandradhar, a staunch and uncompromising devotee of Shiva, and the vicissitudes of his fortune, is narrated in detail. This type of poetry with an admixture of lyrics (songs) and narratives was made popular by four poets: Durgavara, Mankar, Pitambara and Narayanadeva, the last being better known as Sukavinarayanadeva. They were contemporaries of Shankaradeva but they remained outside the domains of Shankara's influence. Some aspects of the contemporary society were sharply focussed and the erotic and the pathetic sentiments predominate in their works. Lyrics, independent of the narrative kavyas, however, came into existence as one of the main genres in the hands of Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva. This new form of lyrics, because of its sublime theme, nobility of expression and intense devotional tone, is called Bargita or great song. These songs, besides showing the transitoriness and fleeting nature of our life and existence, also depict the varied sports and activities of the child Krishna in the company of cowherd boys and his demeanours as a pampered child towards his foster mother Yashoda. Other writers, who followed the two great reformers, composed more than a thousand songs in imitation of the Bargita almost on the same line.

The original works, besides the three Manasa cycle of kavyas, composed by Mankar, Durgavara and Sukavinarayana, include the vadha-kavyas or the heroic kavya mainly composed by Rama Saraswati (c. 1540-1620), a junior contemporary of Shankaradeva. There are about fifteen such kavyas the authorship of which is ascribed to Rama Saraswati. Heroes of these kavyas are the five Pandava brothers who, while roaming in forests during their exile, had to confront oppressive asuras or danavas, leading to the death of the latter. The Pandavas, with the help of Krishna, rid the world to a great extent of tyranny and oppression and helped establish peace and happiness. This species of kavyas is mainly concerned with description of battles depicted in minute details. Some of the adapted kavyas like the Rukminiharana, Balichalana, Amritamanthana of Shankaradeva, Rajasuya of Madha-vadeva, Kumaraharana and Vritrasuravadha of Ananta Kandali (1530-1600), Shakuntala-kavya of Kaviraja Chakravarti (1670-1750) are full of poetic descriptions and remarkable for bold characterisation, occasionally reflecting the social life of the Assamese. The 'Harana-kavyas' deal with the love and abduction of mythological maidens like Rukmini, Usha and Subhadra. Another type of the erotic kavya is connected with the Sufi stories of medieval times written by Kutban, Manjhan and other Sufi poets, stories which probably got circulated in Assam after the advent of Ajan Pir (17th c.) who is credited with the composition of a large number of zikars of Sufi leaning. The poets who composed Mrigavati-charita, Madhu malati and Chandravali on the basis of Sufi stories were Hindus but, except the stories depicting the heroes in pursuit of their beloved, no trace of Sufism is noticed; rather the conventional Vaishnavite precepts and exhortations, uttering 'Harinama', are frequently seen. These are the works of the eighteenth century.

Compilation works mainly deal with the devotional verses translated from different Sanskrit devotional works and puranas on different aspects of the Bhakti cult. Notable works of this category are Nama-ghosha of Madhavadeva, Ghosha-ratna by Gopal Misra and Bhakti-ratnavali, originally compiled by Vishnupuri, but rendered into Assamese verse by Madhavadeva. There are a few more minor works of this nature in verse.

Another type of original works is the hagiographical literature in verse which deals with the lives and activities of Vaishnavite reformers and preachers particularly Shankaradeva, Madhavadeva and Damodaradeva. These biographies of saints and preachers, known generally as 'charitras', exhaustively depict their characters and religious activities with a certain amount of exaggeration and the element of the supernatural. Although occasional flashes of poetry are to be met with in them, they generally lack poetic elements. Dynastic histories of the medieval kings known as 'rajvamshavalis', though not as abundant as 'charitras', are nevertheless an important branch of medieval poetry.

Lastly, we must mention folk poetry, orally transmitted from generation to generation in our account of traditional poetry. This includes ballads, both historical and legendary, songs composed and sung by womenfolk on the occasions of marriage or for propitiating the goddess of pox and measles, lullabies, the Bihu songs sung during the Bihu festivals heralding the new year and the harvesting season, songs used in capturing and taming elephants, songs used while rowing boats or during boat-races, and other songs depicting joys and sorrows, festivals and ceremonies, historical or legendary incidents, involving persons like Badan Barphukan, Jaymati, Nahar Deva, Jana-gabharu, Phul Kowar and Mani Kowar. These not only bespeak of the innate poetic sensibility, the aesthetic and appreciative capacity of the unlettered folk, but also reflect the unsophisticated life of the rural Assamese society in both its beauty and its ugliness.

MODERN PERIOD: The nineteenth century witnessed an upsurge of literary activity in almost all the Indian languages, mainly due to the impact of western learning and the rise of a new consciousness. The forms and contents of the literature of the middle ages gave way to the new experiments inspired by the study of English literature. The approach to life became more human than spiritual. The western ideal of liberal humanism began to influence our literary pursuits although writers, especially the poets, did not fully cast aside their spiritual urge. Both found expression in the new poetic forms. This may be due to the fact that the renaissance was partial in India as it was confined to the educated elites only and did not reach the grassroots. Had the awakening been total and all-pervasive, our outlook on life and the world would have been completely secular.

The advent of the British was greatly responsible for creating a new middle class in Assam. Assamese students from this background went for education to Calcutta, which had become the nerve-centre of political and cultural activities. They studied English literature and learned much from Bengali literature as well. Madhusudan Dutta, Bankimchandra Chatterjee, Rabindranath Tagore and other prominent Bengali writers of the day inspired them.

Such developments led to the flowering of the modern Assamese poetry. Bholanath Das, in imitation of Madhusudan Dutta, wrote narrative poems and lyrics. He and Ramakanta Chowdhury are regarded as pioneers of the Assamese modern poetry. Bholanath's lyric poem 'Megh' (cloud) still haunts the reader for its sincerity of feeling and vividness of imagery. In a series of poems Kamalakanta Bhattacharya exhorted the Assamese people to give up their lethargy and inertia. His poems lack poetic merit but assert the sincerity of his feelings.

Then came the Jonaki era. Jonaki was a monthly magazine which was first published in Calcutta in 1889. It was edited by Lakshminath Bezbarua, Chandrakumar Agarwalla and other young students from Assam with a sincere effort to enrich Assamese literature in all its aspects. They centred round this magazine and made it the mouthpiece of their new venture. Chandrakumar Agarwalla, a remarkable poet, contributed a lot to modern Assamese poetry. He was romantic in spirit and wrote lyrics, ballads and sonnets. With sources of poetic inspiration in man and nature, he saw beauty only as a manifestation of life. Lakshminath Bezbarua, the great Assamese writer, was not only a prolific prose writer and a humorist but also a significant poet. In some of his poems he expressed his patriotic feelings beautifully. Pastoral love was one of his favourite themes. Both Agarwalla and Bezbarua wrote elegies and had the knack of using folk language from ballad poetry. And Hemchandra Goswami composed a few poems of rare artistic qualities. The poets of the Jonaki era brought to Assamese poetry a secular humanistic and liberal consciousness and paved the way for expressing individual feelings in a new technique and later poets emulated them. Though this new mode is undoubtedly linked to the nineteenth century western and Bengali literature, it can safely be said that the Assamese poetry of this period has also a distinct local colour.

The poets of the post-Jonaki period contributed to the monthly magazine, Awahan, published in Calcutta and it was greatly responsible for the emergence of a new generation of poets. During the days when nationalistic sentiments moved the nation to rise against the British, the movement had a great impact on several poets. Ambikagiri Roychowdhury, Prasannalal Chowdhury, Nalinibala Devi, Binanda Barua and several others wrote poems with a patriotic zeal. Ambikagiri's love lyrics and mystical poems deserve special mention because they still haunt our imagination. Mystical trend is also evident in the poems of Durgeshwar Sarma, Mafizuddin Ahmed Hazarika, Nalinibala Devi and Parbatiprasad Barua. Poets like Jatindranath Duwara, Ratnakanta Barkakati, Anandachandra Barua, Ganesh Gogoi and Debakanta Barua composed poems on romantic love. Debakanta's love had a more sensuous and earthly aspect, whereas in others it was Platonic in spirit. Patriotic fervour in the poems of Jyotiprasad Agarwalla and Bishnuprasad Rava is subdued by a kind of internationalism. To sum up, the poetry of the post-Jonaki period was mainly concerned with materialism in the human world, although spiritual and mystical experiences found expression in some cases. It is not wrong to say that some of the poets made no conscious effort to master technique. Towards the end of this period poetry came to suffer from a lack of depth and imagination, the atmosphere became dull and static, and Assamese poetry tried to breathe new and fresh air.

The Second World War brought world-wide disaster, brutality and degradation of human values and Assam also felt the agony. The young Assamese poets saw some of the miseries and sufferings of the people with their own eyes such as the sad memory of the famine and communal killings in Calcutta which haunted their minds. The revolt in the Indian Navy and the adventures of the I.N.A. stirred the hearts of the Assamese poets. Moreover, they became acquainted with the works of Marx and Freud and also with the new literary movements in Europe. This was the time when the Japanese and Chinese literatures were read and discussed by the poets and this acquaintance with world culture naturally widened their mental horizon. Hem Barua's book entitled Adhunik sahitya was greatly responsible for this broadening of outlook.

A new monthly, Jayanti, was started in Guwahati by some young writers, who had become disillusioned with romanticism and came to favour a realistic approach to the problems of life. Some of them turned to Marxian aesthetics and wrote social poetry and some remained pragmatic and initiated a neo-romantic approach to art. Poets who were inspired by the Marxian ideology were Hem Barua, Bhabananda Dutta, Amulya Barua, Keshab Mahanta, Birendrakumar Bhattacharya and Biren Barkakati. Hem Barua's poems are distinguished by their simplicity and lucidity, his images are concrete and familiar and taken from real life, and his adoption of Eliot's technique was partly successful. Socially conscious as he was, his poems reveal a robust optimism and an impassioned love for the people but in his later poems a pessimistic tone is discernible although they still manifest his humanitarian outlook. Among other things, Bhabananda and Amulya had broad vision and stood for a more effective humanism. Bhabananda died early in life and Amulya was killed in Calcutta in the communal riots of 1946. Moheshwar Neog also made some successful experiments in form and technique.

The new poets including Hem Barua wrote for a new magazine called Ramdhenu, edited by Birendrakumar Bhattacharya. The new monthly was a great inspiration to the writers and poets and moved on to fresh fields and new pastures in matters of technique and content. The new venture in Assamese poetry is, to a great extent, an outcome of the influence of Eliot and of the continental poets with a symbolist trend and the poets were familiar with the poetry of Baudelaire and Mallarmé. All such influences led to a neo-romantic trend with greater individualism in Assamese poetry during the nineteen-fifties and sixties. The search for social values also continued with varying measures of success and poets like Hem Barua, Birendrakumar Bhattacharya, Ram Gogoi, Keshab Mahanta and a few others dealt with social themes and exhibited an originality of technique in some poems. Those who can be called neo-romantic are Nabakanta Barua, Ajit Barua, Nilamani Phukan and Bhaben Barua. They have a distinctly personal idiom which reveals sparks of talent in their poetry and Nabakanta Barua deserves special mention for his experiments with technique and also for the depth and gravity of his verses. Nilamani Phukan's poetry is remarkable for picturesque presentation, wide range of feeling and economy of expression. Other poets of this category are Mohendra Bora, Homen Borgohain, Hari Barkakati, Dinesh Goswami, Bireshwar Barua, Nirmalprabha Bordoloi, Hiren Bhattacharya, Hirendranath Dutta and Harekrishna Deka. These poets could re-create their distinctive poetic experience, language or form, but all such preocupations were based on an elitist concept of serious poetry which grouped them together. There were no doubt exceptions, but the number was quite small.

The beginning of the nineteenseventies witnessed a new social awareness among the younger poets. The poetic tradition of the Jayanti era again came into the picture, probably for some historical reasons as the Naxalite movement, though it failed, was creating a tremendous stir in the younger poets. Moreover, sensitive poets left their ivory tower, acquainted themselves with the never ending tale of woe and poverty, developed on the tradition of the Jayanti, and created a kind of social poetry tinged with irony, pathos and hope. Poets like Rabindra Bora, Rabindra Sarkar and Abani Chakravarti deserve special mention. They wanted to stand against alienation and its expression, refused to accept it as a modernist conception of life and poetry and began to think that the age of Eliot and Pound was over. Instead, the younger poets saw great possibilities in Neruda, and in the African and South American poetry.

Towards the end of the decade another group of young poets emerged, who tried to recognise the pressures, the contradictions and the fertilizing influences of different and more variagated experiences brought about by a developing society. The poets who deserve mention are Sananta Tanti, Jyana Puzari, Samir Tanti and Rafiqul Hussain, as they have shown promise. By contrast, Anubhav Tulasi, the youngest of them, seems to have developed a tone which is predominantly individual and romantic, and Mohankrishna Mishra, another promising poet, is inspired by the future one awaits. Among others who have shown promise are Jatin Borgohain, Rajen Bordoloi, Dilip Talukdar, Archana Puzari and Nilimkumar.

Many more poets are now emerging and poetry magazines are published in different parts of Assam. Poetry lovers think that poetry movements should not be confined to the towns and cities only, but it should flourish even in the countryside. If such conviction is translated into action and if the poets remain true to art and society, we can anticipate a bright future for Assamese poetry.

POETRY (Bengali). The early and medieval period of Bengali literature is said to cover about five hundred years from the thirteenth century to the end of the eighteenth. Though no recorded literature has come down to us from the thirteenth century, Bengali literature is said to go back to that time because some of the legends and narratives which took literary shape in the subsequent centuries had been orally transmitted from that time.

During the fourteenth century we come across a popular form of the Krishna legend written in the form of folk-drama. It was the work of one Ananta Badu Chandidas who is supposed to be the earliest poet of Bengal. His work is known as Srikrishna-kirtan. It is written in the form of verse dialogues which were probably sung by the characters: Krishna, Radha and Barai or an old woman. The only manuscript of the work that has been recovered is in incomplete form. It also contains some couplets of Jayadeva's Gita-Govinda rendered into early middle Bengali..

From the fifteenth century the Bengalees took to rendering Sanskrit classics like the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata-purana into Bengali verse but did not attempt literal translations. Sometimes they abridged and adapted from the originals or only translated the ideas for catering to the need of those readers or listeners who were ignorant of Sanskrit.

In 1480 Maladhar Basu completed his translation of the two cantos of the Bhagavata-purana, known as Srikrishna-bijay, which was held in high esteem by Chaitanya, the founder of Vaishnavism in Bengal. Cantos X and XI of the Bhagavata-purana contain episodes from Krishna's birth in Vrindavan to his death after the great battle of Kurukshetra. It is not a literal translation of the original because some extra-Bhagavata elements like the names of Radha and others occur in it.

The most popular work of the age is the verse rendering of Valmiki's Ramayana into Bengali by Krittibas. Though nothing is definitely known about the actual time of his advent, from the many autobiographical statements which he made it appears that he was born during the first half of the fifteenth century. Krittibas was the most widely read author in the middle ages. His popularity continues to the present day, because his work has become a part of the ritual life of every Bengali home. This work, as it exists today, has been to a great extent modernized through constant interpolations down the ages.

After Krittibas several other poets translated the Ramayana, but their fame did not spread beyond the region where they lived. Shankar Chakravarti Kavichandra, who flourished in the district of Bankura during the seventeenth century, is credited with a version known as the Vishnupuri Ramayana. He introduced in the story episodes from local sources. There was at this time a woman poet known as Chandravati. She had considerable poetic talent though her popularity was confined to East Bengal where she was born. Her Ramayana exists in oral form among unlettered women of the area.

The earliest translator of the Mahabharata is said to be a man named Sanjay. There is nothing we know for certain about him, but he must have written during the fifteenth century because there is no trace of Chaitanya's influence on his work. It seems that he painstakingly rendered into Bengali almost all the 'parvas' of the great epic. Next to him came Kavindra Parameshwara. He is known to have translated the Mahabharata during the sixteenth century under the patronage of Paragal Khan, a Muslim general in the army of Nawab Hussain Shah, the Sultan of Bengal. This translation is known as Paragali Mahabharat. After the death of Paragal Khan, his son, Chuti Khan, took up his rank and position and he also patronized the project.

But the most popular translator of the Mahabharata was Kashiram Das (17th c.). It is believed that he could not complete the work and after his death his nephew, who was equally talented, finished it in his name.

The age of the translation of the classics into Bengali came to an end with the advent of Chaitanya, the founder of the Bengal School of Vaishnavism. Chaitanya was born in 1486 when Hussain Shah was the Sultan of Bengal. At an early age Chaitanya became a great scholar of Sanskrit grammar. He married early but his wife, Lakshmi Devi, died prematurely. Within a short period he married Vishnupriya. But the young scholar could not settle his mind to worldly life. One night when he was only about twenty-four years of age, he left his widowed mother and young wife and received initiation into ascetic life. For the following six years he travelled very widely from one place of pilgrimage to another and ultimately settled down at Puri in Orissa where he died in 1533 at the age of forty-eight.

The life of Chaitanya naturally inspired his disciples some of whom were scholars and poets of high order. They took upon themselves the task of writing his biographies. Prose was yet unknown in Bengali literature and everything used to be written in verse. Therefore, Chaitanya's biographies also began to be written in the confessional verse form. Thus, in Bengali, biographical works in verse supplanted the hackneyed translations of the classics. Some of the biographies were written by very close associates and direct disciples of Chaitanya himself on first-hand information. Some were also written on the basis of information supplied by the direct associates of the geat religious reformer.

Of these biographies two are the most authentic and scholarly. They are Chaitanya-bhagavata of Brindaban Das and Chaitanya-charitamrita of Krishnadas Kabiraj. They were written in the sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries respectively and are regarded as sacred by the Gaudiya Vaishnava community.

Owing to the influence of the religion of love, faith and devotion of Chaitanya, Bengali literature developed another aspect during the medieval period. This was the Vasishnava lyric poetry popularly known as 'padavali'. Before the advent of Chaitanya the lyrics of Jayadeva's Gita-Govinda, written in a metre more akin to Bengali lyrics than Sanskrit, were known to the people of Bengal as also the lyrics of Vidyapati of Mithila. From the biographies of Chaitanya we come to know that Chaitanya used to patronize them and sing them himself in his daily prayer. Thus his disciples took to developing this aspect of Bengali poetry. Within a short time after Chaitanya numerous Vaishnava poets appeared, some of them of high literary talent. Murari Gupta, Narahari Das and a few other poets were contemporaries of Chaitanya. Poets like Dvija Chandidas, Ramananda Basu, Balaram Das, Basudev Ghosh also made fruitful contribution. There was a well-known poet named Govindadas Kaviraj who was a great scholar and the most successful imitator of Vidyapati in language and style. Jnanadas, a seventeenth century poet, was the most successful imitator of Dvija Chandidas. Sometimes the language of the padavali was a mixture of Bengali and Maithili. The mixed language is known as Brajabuli wrongly taken for a dialect of Braja of Mathura.

During the entire medieval period a form of narrative poetry popularly known as 'mangal-kavya' was written. It originated earlier than the Vaishnava lyrics and survived till the end of the eighteenth century when the Vaishnava lyrics were already defunct. It glorified the local gods and goddesses, mostly the goddesses of a malignant nature, as opposed to the beneficent character of Krishna or Vishnu of the Vaishnavas.

The earliest mangal-kavya seems to be the Manasa-mangal in which a popular legned of the serpent-goddess Manasa and a merchant named Chand has been retold in great detail. Numerous poets from the pre-Chaitanya age to the eighteenth century wrote Manasamangal in different parts of Bengal in different periods. Next in importance comes Chandimangal. One of its poets was the greatest poet of the mangal-kavyas. He was Mukundaram Chakravarti. He appeared in the sixteenth century and completed his work in the first decade of the following century. Chandi is the goddess presiding over the beasts of the forests but she is not the Chandi of the puranas. There are two episodes in the Chandimangal. In the second episode the goddess is responsible for the welfare of the household and she also has nothing to do with the Chandi of the puranas. The third major mangal-kavya is the Dharmamangal. It deals with an episode connected with the primitive sun-god (worshipped by the Dom community of West Bengal) glorified in great detail. Annada-mangal of Bharatchandra Ray, the most popular poet of the medieval times, was completed in 1752, only five years before the Battle of Plassey.

The mangal-kavyas were the literary vehicles of the Shaktas as opposed to the Vaishnavas of Bengal, but they always had an earthly flavour.

During the eighteenth century Bengali lyric poetry took a new turn. It retained its devotional character, but manifested a shift from the Vaishnava cult of Radha and Krishna to the Shakti cult or the cult of the Mother goddess Kali. The lyric poetry of the age was known as Shakta padavali. Ramprasad Sen, a saint-poet, was the pioneer in this kind of poetry.

MODERN AGE:

The medieval period came to an end with the advent of the English and, with the spread of English education towards the middle of the nineteenth century, the Modern Age began. At the early stage there was a tendency to write new poetry in English. Before the second quarter of the century was over two alumni of the Hindu College, Kashiprasad Ghosh and Shashichandra Dutta, produced some verses in English, which were published in important journals and newspapers. There was a third student of this college who was so determined to distinguish himself as a poet in English that he adopted Christianity, went over to Madras, and married a British girl. He was Madhusudan Dutt, later Michael M.S. Dutt who, as fate would have it, eventually became the first and one of the best poets of the modern Bengali literature. When Dutt saw that his lyrical production in English could not help him to win a seat in the gallery of the British poets, his attitude to his mother tongue slowly changed. He had been, in early life, a lover of Bengali poetry, but now he became aware that it was not good enough in comparison with the robust and vigorous poetry of the West.

In a spirit of bravado Madhusudan started writing Bengali verse, but there were three almost insurmountable difficulties before him. The Bengali language was soft and domestic and not many interesting subjects were there for it to pick up, neither from the present nor from the known past, becuse the metre in use, though musical, was too fluid for them. Madhusudan, a lover of the ancient and modern European literature and a genuine admirer at heart of his native literature as it was, skilfully skipped over the barriers and forged diction, theme and metre for an entirely new kind of verse. For the diction and style of his poetry he drew upon the inexhaustible source of Sanskrit and went for embellishment to his advantage from his knowledge of Greek, Latin, French and Italian poetry. The new poetic diction appeared unconventional but its vigorous novelty soon overcame all resistance. For the theme Madhusudan went to the epic stories of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. As for the metrical difficulty, it was his genius that enabled him to break the flow of the native 'payar' metre and, at the same time, do away with both rhyme and rigidity. He invented the blank verse in Bengali, and won for it the necessary independence from metre. He wrote five works of poetry: Tilattama-sambhav (1860) and Meghanad badh (1861) are in the epic style; Birangana (1862) has a lofty lyric stance and Brajangana (1861) is a collection of lyric poems in rhymed verse moulded in his own way. Chaturdash-padi kabitabali (1866), a collection of a hundred sonnets, is written in unrhymed and free payar metre. These sonnets were mostly written when the poet was living in France.

Madhusudan's Meghanad-badh is regarded as his masterpiece and a young skilful rhymester, Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903), who was the first commentator of Meghanad-badh, followed it in writing Britrasanghar (1875-1877), also a longer "epicling", but he did not follow rigidly the metrical innovation of Madhusudan. Hemchandra was followeed by Navinchandra Sen (1846-1909) who produced a still longer "epicling", a trilogy in fact, on the theme of Krishna as told in the Mahabharata: Raibataka (1886), Kurukshetra (1893) and Prabhash (1896).

At the time when Madhusudan Dutt had just started on his literary career there were attempts at romantic lyricism by his friends who had their education in Sanskrit and English. The first in this group of romantic poets were Dwijendranath Tagore (1840-1926) and Beharilal Chakravarti (1835-1894). Dwijendranath Tagore translated Kalidasa's Meghadutam into Bengali verse (1860) and the work was highly appreciated. He appears to be the first among the Bengali literary men to appreciate the poems of Derozio. He translated the dedicatory sonnet from the latter's work which was a tribute to the poet's motherland, India. Dwijendranath and his friends took special interest in narrative romances. Dwijendranath did not stick to poetry and often strayed into philosophy and religion. Nevertheless he has left us his Swapna-prayan (1875), an allegorical poem of high conception and noble execution.

Like most of the contemporary writers of verse in Bengali, Beharilal Chakravarti followed the path of Iswarchandra Gupta, but under the influence of his friends like Dwijendranath Tagore and Krishnakamal Bhattacharya he stopped copying Iswarchandra and soon developed a metre with a rhythm of its own. Beharilal's poetry was essentially romantic and he succeeded in finding a new and promising path for Bengali poetry. His best works are Bangasundari (1875) and Saradamangal (1880).

Dwijendranath was the leader of a literary and cultural group whose mouthpiece became a monthly magazine called Bharati founded in 1877. Dwijendranath was its editor for the first few years. Devendranath Sen (1855-1920) at first followed the path of Madhusudan but soon altered his approach and became the most significant poet after Beharilal. He was emotional in domestic love as well as in Vaishnava devotion. His poems are collected in several books such as Ashoka-guchchha (1901), Golapa-guchchha (1911), Parijata-guchchha (1911), etc.

The Bharati circle produced two remarkable women poets. They were Swarnakumari Devi (1854-1924), a daughter of Devendranath Tagore, and Girindramohini Dasi (1855-1932), a friend of Swarnakumari.

Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) emerged as a powerful but obscure poet by the middle of the ninth decade of the century. He was an admirer of the poetry of Beharilal, but followed his own line dictated by his learning and passion. From the very beginning he was fond of music, and it was music as well as the emotional intensity of the Vaishnava lyric that directed, though vaguely, his poetical leanings from the very start. Rabindranath like Madhusudan created a poetic diction (or dictions) of his own but unlike Madhusudan's, Rabindranath's diction grew up slowly and steadily instead of exploding like fire-works. Rabindranath's poems developed full signs of maturity long before the end of the decade and he proved himself to be the most outstanding master of diction and metre with the publication of Kari o komal (1886). His influence spread quickly and, although he could not be imitated easily, his spirit modified the poetry of his contemporaries writing romantic poetry. Akshaykumar Baral (1830-1919), Kamini Roy (1864-1933) and Govindachandra Das (1855-1918) may be mentioned, besides Devendranath Sen, as his most notable contemporaries. Govindrachandra requires special mention inasmuch as his poetry is reflective of the atmosphere of his native land, East Bengal. Also his treatment of love, unlike that of any other Bengali poet, was definitely sensuous.

Early in the last decade of the century Rabindranath was placed at the head of the management of the family estate by his father. As the bulk of their landed property was in Central Bengal, Rabindranath had his headquarters there. The change of environment brought about a change in the poet's attitude to nature and man. His poetry acquired a tone of nostalgic longing for simple and peaceful life. His understanding and sympathy encompassed nature and man and everything.

This spell of rural peace and contentment was broken by the partitions of the estate and Rabindranath returned to Calcutta. Then he was caught up in the whirlpool of political agitation. Rabindranath produced some inspiring and vigorous songs that thrilled the people in Calcutta. Politics soon tired him and he was tired of city life too. After the death of his father he moved his headquarters to Santiniketan where he had started a school for the young boys. Now he wrote lyrics which were as good as, if not better than, songs. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1913.

In the first two decades of this century no new poet of note emerged except one, Satyendranath Datta, who was a skilful metrician, and avoided the trend of emotive poetry. Just about the time of the death of Satyendranath Datta, Kazi Nazrul Islam became famous with a couple of poems embodying a boisterous vigour and vehemence. Subsequently Nazrul emerged as a writer of love poems and patriotic songs and also as a singer.

Soon after the end of the First World War a group of young writers, influenced by the new trends in European literature which emphasised realism, started writing in a tone different from one current in Bengali poetry still dominated by Rabindranath Tagore. The monthly magazine, Kallol (1923), founded by Gokulchandra Nag and Dineshranjan Das, was the main organ of this group of young rising poets. They were mostly young men, and some of them from Dacca. Another poet, Mohitlal Majumdar, who had a dislike for Rabindranath's poems, was critical of the young poets such as Premendra Mitra, Achintyakumar Sengupta, Buddhadev Basu, Ajitkumar Datta and Bishnu Dey. These younger poets, however, were drawn back to the later phase of Rabindranath when he had changed the course of his poetry and taken to free verse and prose diction.

Kallol died before the end of the decade but young poets from Dacca and Calcutta were steadily going ahead. There appeared a new magazine for them financed by a rich rising poet, Sudhindranath Datta (1901-1960) who had a deep knowledge of Sanskrit, English and European poetry. The magazine, Parichay, brought to light the poems of a not very young but rather shy poet, Jibanananda Das (1899-1954).

With the death of Tagore and with the end of the Second World War political thought came to affect Bengali poetry. After the war politics played a crucial part in moulding poetic sensibility. The young poets of the earlier decades were no longer young but they were still prolific. A few not so young poets made their mark in the fifth decade of the century. One was Amiya Chakravarti. Among the younger generation of poets, Sukanta Bhattacharya (1925-1947), sworn to communism, was a very promising poet.

To sum up, the partition of India and Bengal and the changing social and economic set up which had been decaying since the days of the second world war have created a different mental as well as domestic placidity for the Bengali middle class, and a growing imbalance is reflected in contemporary Bengali poetry. Tagore had exhausted all possible directions of metrical and rhythmical verse and used prose for a vehicle of poetic thought. He had provided for the post-Independence Bengali poets their own vehicle for poetry, and it made writing poetry an easier task. Added to this is the introvert tendency in their poetry to use personal experience, though as isolated images for a Jigsaw Puzzle. As a result such poetry is all riddle and no sense to the readers. Nevertheless, a few poets have produced some outstanding poems. Contemporary Bengali poetry is, by and large, lyrical in expression of love and experimental in structure. The poets who have by now established themselves with characteristic styles of writing are Niren Chakravarti, Arun Mitra, Shakti Chatterjee, Shankho Ghose and Alokranjan Dasgupta.

POETRY (Dogri). Rising from a long tradition of rich and varied folk-songs, the Dogri poetry written in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries grew in the courts of the Rajas of the Punjab Hill States, Kangra, Nurpur and Jammu. Some of the compositions belonging to this period have been retrieved in the poems of Manakchand (16th c.), Gambhir Rai (17th c.), and Devi Ditta (18th c.). There were also some people's poets, mostly composers of devotional songs, like Mayadas and Raghubirdas in the late eighteenth century and early nineteenth. Then there were about half a dozen poets of the nineteenth century, including Gangaram and Lakkhu, who carried the tradition forward to the early twentieth century, in the poems of Ramdhan, Ramprapanna Shastri, Santram Shastri, Mehta Mathradas, Hakam Jatt, Mulraj Mehta, Baba Kanshiram and Hardutt. Their work shows greater social awareness and condemnation of social evils (as in Hardutt's poems), finer delineation of sentiment of love and the problems of daily grind (as in Ramdhan's poem Chandai di chandani, patriotic fervour (as in Baba Kanshiram's poetry), besides the usual fare of devotional and descriptive verse.

With the publication of Guttulun in 1944 by Dinubhai Pant, a new phase in Dogri poetry starts, a phase of modern consciousness, awareness of inner contradictions in society based on caste and class, with concomitant social tensions, injustice and exploitation. The past feudal elements as well as the new emerging values and urges find expression in Dinubhai's poetry. Patriotism is the dominant theme in Dogri poetry written for quite a few years after 1947, as seen in the work of the twelve poets of Jago Duggar, the first anthology of Dogri poetry, published around 1950. Gradually the poetry of patriotism gave way to the poetry of new social realism. Yash Sharma, Vedpal 'Deep', Ramnath Shastri, Kehari Singh 'Madhukar', Krishna Smailpuri, Parmanand 'Almast' and Shambhunath Sharma broadened the horizons of Dogri poetry. Love for Duggar and Dogri and repudiation of orthodox values became the recurring themes, and new imagery and verbal melody marked the new compositions. Fifties saw a considerable expansion and emergence of a number of poets in the field of Dogri poetry. Raghunath Singh Samyal exploited fully the resources of Dogri in his poems on conventional themes. Swami Brahmanand Tirth enriched Dogri poetry with five volumes of mystical and vedantic verse in simple, rhythmic speech. Ramnath Shastri, Dinubhai 'Pant', Shambhunath, Tara Smailpuri, Krishna Smailpuri, Kehari Singh 'Madhukar', Vedpal 'Deep', Mohanlal Sapolia, Yash Sharma and Onkar Singh 'Awara' wrote some of their best poems on a wide range of subjects during this decade. Two young poets, Padma Sachdev and Charan Singh, who composed first class poetry, also joined the band of Dogri poets during this period. One finds greater attention to craftsmanship and weaving of new imagery in the best of the poems here, and Dogri ghazal modelled on Urdu ghazal appears on the scene. A Dogri Ramayana in verse by Shambhunath Sharma also appeared during this period.

In the sixties and the seventies some of the poets mentioned above brought out their works written during the 1950's in book form and also added new compositions such as Madhukar's Sahitya Akademi Award winning book Mein mele ra janun (1976) and Padma Sachdev's two new selections Tawi te chananh (1976) and Nheriyan galiyan. Several new poets appeared after 1960, some significant, some mediocre, and many sub-standard. Significant Dogri poets who have made noticeable contributions during the last two and a half decades are Ramlal Sharma (4 volumes of poems and ghazals), Narsingh Dev Jamwal (3 volumes of poems), Ashwini Mangotra (2 collections of poems, ghazals and a long poem), Shivram 'Deep' (4 collections, including a Sahitya Akademi Award winner Gamlen de cactus), Jitendra Udhampuri (6 volumes, including an epic Bawa Jitto, and the Sahitya Akademi Award winning volume Ik shahr yaden da), and Kunwar 'Viyogi' with his Sahitya Akademi Award winning long poem Ghar. From Himachal Pradesh, about a dozen poets including Gautam 'Vyathit' have made substantial contribution to Dogri-Pahari poetry. Even political leaders like Karan Singh and Lalchand Prarthi have added their bit to this growing corpus, the former a few bhajans and the latter a few poems of patriotic sentiment.

Dogri poetry forms the largest chunk of Dogri literature in terms of publications. It dominated literature till 1960 and it continues to occupy a prominent place even now. Within the orbit of Dogri poetry, Dogri ghazal, which developed special characteristics of its own, has of late drawn more practitioners. Besides, some new trends have also appeared, such as publication of long poems, including epics like Prakash Premi's Bedan dharati di, Jitendra Udhampuri's Bawa Jitto and Gyan Singh Pagoch's Nyan and Mattangashram, poems expressing individual sensibility as in the works of Padma Sachdev and Jitendra Udhampuri, and introduction of modern consciousness with an intellectual element and complex imagery, as in the works of Om Prakash Sharma 'Sarathi', Shivram 'Deep' and a few others.

POETRY (English). Indian English or Indo-Anglian poetry, as Indian poetry written in English used to be called (and, occasionally, 'Indo-English' too) is quite distinct from 'British Indian poetry', i.e., poetry written by the British serving in India, on Indian themes. 'Indo-Anglian' poetry is poetry written by the Indians in English. This was called strange adventure by some critics. But its emergence was only a question of time in a country in which the language of administration, of law courts, of higher education and of important business was English. It followed, as a nationwide result, the steps taken by government and by big industry.

Nevertheless, poetry written by the Indians in English was in the nature of an 'adventure' and it bore the marks of 'adventure' on its countenence throughout its career. Language lives on the lips of the people who speak it and have spoken it since birth, either as their mother-tongue or as their regional language. The Indian English speaker and writer has, no doubt, intimate associations with the English language. They are, however, associations which belong to English as a second language. For, the 'Indo-Anglian' does not belong to the nation as a whole but to a speech-community that is English, as a community that treats English as language belonging to it. Such a community may do what it likes with English. The language will, nevertheless, remain English. It may develop into American, Australian or Canadian types, but it will remain English. For, the speech-community in America, Australia and Canada has inherited the privilege of ownership even in a remote region— that of setting up its own usage norms and changing the vocabulary and even the syntax and morphology of the language according to its linguistic predilections. The Indian English writer does not have this privilege. He has to follow the standard of correct usage prevailing in one of the source countries. The situation will not change even if he remains for many years in the midst of an English speech-community as Conrad and Khalil Gibran did. He cannot escape isolation from the warmth of the living language and a certain commitment to the artificiality or classicality of a world-language.

It is under such limiting conditions, therefore, that the Indian English poet produces his poetry in English. Toru Dutt excelled in her line because she steered clear of complexity. Had she, at any stage in her brief life, attempted to be complex and philosophic in her writing, the language would have betrayed her. Sarojini Naidu knew her limitations and worked, as it were, on a few inches of chosen ivory. It is to the credit of Aurobindo that he dared to make the English language the medium for a kind of substance to which the language was inhospitable, and that he succeeded in communicating this recalcitrant material by exploiting to the full the 'classical', if not the 'living' resources of the English language.

The Indian English writer can make a major contribution to the poetry in English, but only in a distinctively Indian way. He can build up his own Indian themes, myths and legends and Indian symbolism and imagery. He can mint his own idioms and phrases, without offending the usage of the resource-country. He can frequently contribute creatively to the literary substance of the language, infrequently to its vocabulary and usage, but not at all to its morphology, syntax and phonology. In other words, he has to treat English, because of his intimate associations with it and its global prestige, almost as he would a classical language, preserve its anatomy and add only to its flesh and blood.

Derozio (1807-31) was the father of Indian English poetry. He was half Indian, half Portuguese. But as a teacher of English at the Hindu College, Calcutta, since 1828 he inspired a number of young Indians with a love of the English language and literature. Indian poetry as such was still traditional in its substance, style and rhythm. Even when there was an attempt at departure, there was hardly any notion of 'modernity'. The earliest impact of the Indian Renaissance was experienced in Bengal. But the impact of the English literary movement was registered in Indian English poetry from its very inception in 1828.

Indian English poetry was born under a Romantic star. It learned to lisp in the manner of Byron and Scott in the verse of Derozio in his The Fakeer of Jungheera, a metrical tale (1828). His poems were collected together and published by the Oxford University Press only in 1923. Henry Louis Vivian Derozio died young. He left some impressive poetry behind him like Chorus of Brahmins and Song of the Hindustan Minstrel. He also left a band of literary disciples remembering whom was a pleasure to him, for he said about them: 'And then I feel I have not lived in vain'. He was intensely patriotic:

> If thy notes divine
> May be by mortal wakened once again,
> Harp of my country, let me strike the strain.

His love of social reform and free thinking were taken up by some of his disciples.

Kashiprasad Ghose (The Shair and Other Poems) and Guru Charan Dutt (School Hours, 1839) were his average literary disciples. Rajnarain Dutt came later (O Singer, 1841). Michael Madhusudan Dutt, who pioneered modern Bengali poetry, wrote during the first half of the nineteenth century. His Captive Ladie (1849) narrates the story of Prithviraj and Samyukta in the manner of Scott's verse romances. But his sonnet on Satan is beautiful, though it is not a sonnet really but a poem in fourteen lines. Soshee Chandra Dutt was a minor poet of this period of beginnings who lived till 1886.

The third quarter of the century (1851-75) showed that Indian English poetry was flourishing. The Dutt Family Album (1870) continued the line of the four Dutts of the earlier quarter and contained the work of the following poets: Govin Chunder Dutt, father of Toru Dutt; Hur Chunder Dutt (Fugitive Pieces, 1851); Greece (Girish) Chunder Dutt (Cherry stones, 1881) and Omesh Chunder Dutt. All of them wrote competent verse. Greece Chunder was the most gifted of them. Omesh also was good at narration.

Ram Sharma (Nobo Kissen Ghose, 1837-1918) is another genuine, if unequal, poet of the period. The mystic in him is fairly eloquent in poems like 'Anahat Chakram' and 'Bhagobati Gita'. But his satirical poems like 'Scribblerus' sound somewhat journalistic for lack of sustained refinement and emotional precision in its phrasing.

The deeper tone and accents of Romanticism were caught by the poets during this period. In poems like 'Romance' and 'Wordsworth' Govin Dutt was the first to introduce the introspective manner. The longer poetical romance continued to be cultivated. But there were also ballads or 'lays' in the manner of Macaulay on legendary and historical themes. 'Lay' became a favourite word during the next period, as with Toru and R.C. Dutt. The glorification of domestic virtues, which was a Victorian trait, also appealed to these poets.

The last quarter of the nineteenth century was a remarkable period for Indian English poetry. Genuine lyric poetry and lyrical narrative poetry, both of the Romantic and Victorian type, came fully into their own

now. Some remarkable collections of lyrics and of narrative poems were published:

A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields (1878) by Aru and Toru Dutt; Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan (1885) by Toru Dutt; The Lyrics of India (London, 1886) by Dwijendralal Roy; Lays of Ancient India (London, 1894) by R.C. Dutt; Songs to Myrtilla (1895) by Aurobindo; Love Songs and Elegies (1898) by Manmohan Ghose; The Golden Threshold (1905) by Sarojini Naidu; and The Quest Eternal (London, 1936) by Brajendranath Seal. The first two parts of The Quest Eternal were completed in their present form in 1893.

Of these poets, Toru Dutt, Manmohan Ghose, Aurobindo and Sarojini Naidu have been major names. R.C. Dutt is a competent and graceful writer and metrist. Brajendranath Seal is likely to be regarded as a good scholar-poet. D.L. Roy is a pleasant minor poet and Tagore and Vivekananda are lofty names associated with Indo-Anglian poetry. There are minor poets like B.M. Malabari (The Indian Muse in English Garb, 1876); C.N. Vesuvala (Courting the Muse, 1878); A.M. Kunte (The Rishi, 1979); T. Ramakrishna (Tales of India, 1896) and J.M. Tagore (Flights of Fancy, 1881).

While the other poets of the period continued the Romantic or Victorian style and some others (like Malabari) even harked back to the reflective manner of Gray or Goldsmith, even the satrical tradition of Dryden and Pope, Manmohan Ghose, Aurobindo and Sarojini Naidu, who spent their impressionable years in England when the 'Decadent' poets dominated the scene, reveal the influence of this trend in their early poems. Aurobindo very soon outgrew the manner and blazed a new trail in poetry which many were to follow.

The first quarter of the twentieth century produced a number of poets who continued to write in the Romantic and Victorian manner of their predecessors, like N.W. Pai (author of the romance in blank verse, called The Angel of Misfortune, 1905), Menezes, N.V. Thadani, Nizamat Jung and a few others.

Others carried forward the mystical tradition. P.P. Meherjee (Poems in prose, 1927), T.L. Vaswani, Ananda Acharya with his Snow-Birds and other collections, Puran Singh, Harindranath Chattopadyaya (he was also a communist and a humanist in some ways and has more than twenty collections of poems to his credit, The Feast of Youth, 1918 being the first), K.D. Sethna and others.

But a few of the Indian English poets of this period responded to the new trend that was now perceptible in English poetry—Georgianism. Robi Dutt (with his Echoes from East and West, 1909), Joseph Furtado, P. Sheshadri, G.K. Chettur and S.K. Chettur have caught the spirit of Georgianism. G.K. Chettur was an Oxford graduate and his collections of poems are interesting to read.

More and more competent verse was written as years passed, though genuine 'makers' were few and far between. The second quarter of the twentieth century yielded a richer harvest than the first. There are numerous writers and one can only pick out the more salient names and identify the tendencies. T.P. Kailasam, S.R. Dongerkery, Adi K. Sett, V.N. Bhushan, R.R. Shreshta, M.Krishnamurti and others continue the humanistic trend. Nolini Kanta Gupta, Dilip Kumar Roy, J. Krishnamurthi, Nirodbaran, Purohit Swamy (mentioned more because of his association with W.B. Yeats than for the intrinsic merit of his The Song of Silence) and others carry forward the mystical tradition. The Georgian manner of writing is clearly perceptible in the verse of Beram Saklatvala, in F. Kabraji's A Minor Georgian's Swan Song and others.

New trends can also be identified. The 'Progressive' manner of the thirties is seen in some of the poems of Saklatvala, Appal Swamy and Humayun Kabir. Another group, consisting of poets like Manjeri Iswaran and P.R. Kaikini who used to write in the Romantic tradition, gradually changed over to modernist techniques. Others like Nilima Devi, B. Rajan, R.R. Shreshta and B.Dhingra, who had a love of compact expression and modernist techniques from the very beginning of their career, reveal new developments in this field.

T.P. Kailasam's Little Lays and Plays; B. Saklatvala's Poems, 1933 and Devouring Zodiac, 1945; R.R. Shreshta's The Stratagem of Isis and Other Poems, 1934; B. Dhingra's Mountains, 1939; F.Kabraji's A Minor Georgian's Swan-Song and Manjeri S. Isvaran's The Neem is a Lady and Other Poems may be said to be distinguished collections of poems published during the second quarter of the twentieth century.

The third quarter of the century saw the further strengthening of modernist as well as neo-symbolist trends. Poets like Paymaster and Adi K.Sett continue to write in the well-established tradition. V.C. Dutt, Jibanand Das and Karan Singh continue the humanistic trend. P.S. Nahar, Themis, Romen and others carry forward the neo-symbolist or mystical line. Modernists found a good publishing centre in P. Lal's Writers Workshop. Lal's own first collection Love's the First was published in 1962. But his Workshop published a number of other poets: Monica Verma, Leslie de Noronha, Deb Kumar Das, Pradip Sen, and several others. Nissim Ezekiel's first collection was Sixty Poems (1953), Kamala Das's Summer in Calcutta, (1965), A.K. Ramanujan's The Striders (1966). They distinguished themselves, each in his or her own way. Keshav Malik who was the editor of the Indian Literature for a few years, Mary V. Erulkar, Shankar Mokashi Punekar and others have also done good work.

Pritish Nandy, whose first collection of poems, Of Gods and Olives came out in 1967, has published several collections of poems, translations and anthologies. His selected poems contained in Riding the Midnight River (1975) give an idea of the variety of the style and substance of his poetry. Arun Kolatkar's Jejuri (1976) was awarded the Commonwealth Poetry Prize. Shiv K. Kumar; R.Parthasarathy (Rough Passage, 1977); Pranab Bandyopadhyaya (The Days Between); Sitakanta Mahapatra (Old Man in Summer); Hemant Kulkarni (He is a distinguished Kannada poet and has published late in English Driftwood from the Beach); Meena Alexander; Keki N.Daruwalla; Anna Sujatha Modayil; Gieve Patel; Mukund R. Dave; Gauri Deshpande and others have been augmenting the tradition of Indian English poetry.

We do not have to say that the history of Indian English poetry is a series of dutiful responses to whatever impulsions came to it from English poetry—Romantic, Victorian, Decadent, Georgian, Modernist and so on. In a way, this is true of all Indian poetry, all Indian literature as such, for Indian literature, including Indian English, was busy absorbing modern literary forms, trends and movements from the West.

But even when it did so, Indian literature and Indian English with it had a rich Indian content. Once the forms, the romance, the ballad, the lay, the song, the lyric, the sonnet, the elegy and the ode were assimilated, unqualified authenticity and consummate self-revelation became possible along with an Indianness of theme, as in Toru Dutt's 'Our Casuarina Tree.'

Apart from the Indo-Anglian poet who had a love of India, of spirituality, Indian metaphysics and Indian myth, legend and history, there was the other type that believed in humanism and directed its laughter against crudeness and superstition. It gains in volume as we near our own times.

There were major political changes in the Indian scene during the twentieth century. The Indian National Congress had already been founded. The partition of Bengal, the terrorist movement, Swadeshism, the First World War, the advent of the Gandhian epoch in 1921, all had their impact on Indian literature. Patriotism became a passion with the Indian English writer too. Indian English poetry, like the rest of modern Indian poetry, is Indian first and all else afterwards.

With the dawn of Independence, India has established cultural contacts with the United States and with the Commonwealth countries like Australia and Canada. It is already having its effect on our academic courses and on our creative writing in English. Since 1947 India has embarked on a career of cultural exchange with untold possibilities throughout the world.

Innumerable Indian English boats have capsized in the sea of English poetry. Some of them were no more than paper-boats, hardly carrying any merchandise other than the writer's own impatient longing for fame. But this is not to deny the intrinsic value of a good deal of Indian English poetry. Some of it can even be regarded as a dynamic contribution to world poetry.

There are two worlds with major themes of poetry. One consists of Nature, Love, Man and the heritage of Man, including myth, legend, history and the fine arts; and the second consists of metaphysical longing, devotion, mystical contemplation and spiritual illumination. Reflective and introspective poetry acts as a bridge between the two. Aurobindo reveals himself as a master in all directions, particularly in Savitri. But other poets, Romantic as well as Modernist, have produced remarkable lyrics of Love, Nature, legendary beauty, mystical insight and the poetry of satirical and ironic laughter. The Indian English poets have also made a significant contribution to the development of the poetic form. They have made the epigram their own, as seen in Tagore's Stray Birds (1917), Ananda Acharya's Saki and Lawrence Bantleman's Haiku Variorum. Tagore's Gitanjali made the form of the prose-poem popular. Ananda Acharya, Puran Singh, P.R. Kaikini, Purohit Swamy, K.S. Venkataramani and others cultivated it.

Another innovation which has yet to come into its own is Aurobindo's theory of quantitative metres and his use of them in lyrics and long poems and in The Ilion. He uses the rhymeless form of the hexameter in The Ilion.

Indian English poetry, like the Indian English fiction, has established itself as a genre which has made significant contributions to literature read in the English-speaking world. In writings like those of Aurobindo it has made unique contributions expressing the very soul of Indian culture. This is perhaps the best that a second language literature can do. Compared with the poetic achievements in the modern Indian languages, Indian English poetry reveals a certain limitation in range and variety, like the 'leaves coming to a tree' without the 'flower and fruit' on the branches at the same time. There will always be a minority of 'Indo-Anglian' poets, belonging to a small speech community in India, not necessarily Anglo-Indian, writing with such 'first language' ease and naturalness, comparatively speaking, as distinguishes it in its own limited way. (I do not think they dare make their own contributions to morphology and syntax except in a sub-standard way or as 'outlandish' usage). But the major trend will be that of presenting a distinctively Indian substance in English or creating outstanding Indian writing in the English language.

POETRY (GUJARATI)

POETRY (Gujarati). The first glimpses of Gujarati poetry were visible in the form of verses quoted by Hemchandrasuri (1088-1172) to illustrate grammatical rules of Apabhramsha in the last chapter of his treatise Siddha Hema shabdanushasan. These verses represent floating as well as written poetry of the time and are mythological, religious, didactic, erotic as well as heroic in nature and indicate well-developed forms of poetry. This Apabhramsha was called 'Gurjar' or 'Prachin' Apabhramsha, which was the common language of Gujarat and Rajasthan. The period from 1150 to 1450 represents the old Gujarati literature. Most of this literature was in verse. The main forms of poetry of this period are 'Rasa' and 'Fagu'. Other forms are 'Barmasi', 'Chhappaya',. 'Vivahalu', 'Chhhanda' and 'Prabandha.'

Most of the extant works of this period are written by Jain saint poets. They depict religious tenets and virtues of Tirthankaras and preceptors. Works of non-Jain poets are rare, not because such poets did not flourish, but because their works were not preserved. Works of Jain poets were properly preserved in temples in the best traditions of the sect. Works of non-Jain poets, though less in number, are more noteworthy for their non-sectarain nature and high poetical value. The best amongst these works, 'Vasantvilas' (early 14th c), by an unknown poet, is a typical love poem about separation and fulfilment of love-desire. The manuscript of this poem contained the paintings in Ajanta-style, which reflect inter-relation of arts and rich tradition of pure art forms in the cultural life of Gujarat.

Most of the works of poetry traced so far are fiction-oriented. Hamsauli (1371) by Asait is a fantastic story of the successive lives of a couple. Sadayavatsa charita (1410) by Bhim is also fictional poetry, indicative of the richness of imagination and creative urge for pure literature. Ranamallachhanda (1390) by Shridhara, Sandeshkarasa (12th c.) by Abdurrehman, Hansaraj Vachharaj chaupai (1355) by Vijayabhadrasuri and Vidyavilas pavadu (1429) by Hiranand are specimens of fiction-oriented poetry of considerable merit.

Medieval period from 1450 toi 1850 is known as Bhakti period also, because the prominent subject of the verse of this period is devotion to Lord Krishna. Main forms of poetry of this period are lyrics: 'Pada', 'Chhappa', 'Garbo', 'Garbi', 'Akhyana', 'Katha', and 'Padyavarta'. The last three are fiction-oriented forms. The most prominet poets are Narsimha Mehta, Mirabai, Akho, Premanand, Samal and Dayaram.

Narsimha Mehta (1414-1480) was a Vedantic poet in his philosophical lyrics, seeking knowledge of the Supreme. In his Bhakti poems, the intensity of devotion makes him feel as if he were a Gopi in love with Lord Krishna. His devotional lyrics of 'Premlakhana Bhakti' rank him with Surdas, Vidyapati and other devotional poets of India.

Mirabai (1498-1547), the greatest poetess of western India, has enriched Gujarati poetry also by her melodious lyrics of devotional love and dedication towards Lord Krishna. The bhakti cult in Gujarat is influenced by her lyrics.

Akho (1591-1656) expounded Advaita philosphy in his various works, mainly in Akhe-gita, Panchikaran, Anubhavbindu and hundreds of 'chhappas' (epigrammatic stanzas). He was a reformist also in a sense that he despised religious hypocrisy and blind faith as well as social evils. Though he advocated knowledge of the Supreme, he wrote devotional lyrics which could have come only out of the realization of the Supreme.

Premanand (1636-1734) is the most popular and successful poet of the time. Though primarily an 'akhyana' poet, he excels in love, pathos and humour. He betrays the rare genius of a lyrical poet in devotional passages in Dashamaskandh.

Samal Bhatt (1690-1769) is primarily a story-teller but his epigrammatic stanzas depicting worldly wisdom, and his didactic maxims in romantic stories like 'Madanmohan', 'Simhasanbattishi', etc., composed in verse, entertained the masses.

Dayaram (1777-1852), the last of the minstrels of the age, was 'Shuddhadaiti Vaishnav' by conviction and his poems profess this faith dogmatically. His devotional love lyrics, called Garbi, betray an inherent poetic genius, and he is still popular amongst the Lord Krishna devotees.

Bhalan (1485-1550), founder of 'Akhyana' form of literature, wrote lyrical poems in devotion to Lord Rama. Jain poets continued to narrate the lives and sermons of Tirthankaras and Acharyas. Lavanuasamaya, Nayasunder, Gunavinaya and Samasyasunder are noteworthy amongst them.

The saint poets of the Swaminarayan sect also flourished during this period. Muktanand Swami (1761-1830), Nishkulanand Swami (1766-1846), Brahmanand Swami (1772-1832) and Premaskhi (1766-1855) are foremost amongst them. The saint poets of the Kabir sect also made their appearance in this period. Bhansaheb, Morarsaheb, Khimsaheb, Trikamsaheb and Dasi Jeevan still have a profound influence on the religious faith of the masses of Gujarat.

With the advent of the British rule, political and social awareness achieved new dimensions. People became conscious of the social evils, religious bigotry, blind faith and lack of education. Amongst the awakened few, who led the society, were poets like Dalpatram and Narmadashankar. They heralded a new era in modern Gujarati poetry.

Dalpatram (1820-1898), as a poet, was not very different from Samal Bhatt of the previous era in his style and content. Most of his poetry depicts worldy wisdom. But some of his poems like 'Bapani Pimper' exhibit the spirit of new poetry.

Narmad (1833-1886) was the true spirit of the renaissance. As a reformist, he wrote numerous poems on reforms. But his greatest contribution lies in creating an awareness towards poetry. He wrote innumerable poems on love and nature, imitating Wordsworth.

In the year of the publication of the grand novel Sarasvatichandra (1887), Kusummala, a collection of poems modelled on Wordsworth and Shelley, by Narasimharao Divetia, a scholar poet, was published. Kusummala, though influenced by English poetry, set a new trend in lyrical poetry.

Govardhanram Tripathi (1855-1907), the author of Sarasvatichandra, wrote an elegy, 'Snehamudra', on the death of his wife. It is an allegorical poem depicting his concept of love and duty from a philosophical point of view.

With this started an era of scholarly writing which, as against the previous era, was a period of reconciliation of the cultural values of ancient India and the new thought of the West.

Manilal Nabhubhai (1858-1898), a profound scholar of Sanskrit and philosophy, was an Advaita Vedantin by conviction and a Sufi by spirit. His poems on ghazal form, included in his collection Atmanimajjan, are unique in this respect.

'Kant' whose real name was Manishankar Ratnaji Bhatt (1867-1923), was an agnostic. His search for personal religion led him to embrace Christianity, but then he was torn between faith and affection towards relatives. The agony generated by his tension found expression in his 'Purvalap'. He introduced a new form of poetry, 'khandkavya' which, though story-oriented, is a perfect medium to express internal conflict. He excels in the depiction of pathos and in metrical craftsmanship.

Sursinhji Takhtasinhji Gohel 'Kalapi', (1874-1900), a prince-poet, is loved for his romantic ghazals in the Sufi tone. Torn between love and duty, he expressed his emotions in ghazals and khandkavyas. He experimented with the epic in his long heroic poem Hamirji Gohel.

Namalal Kavi (1877-1946) was a great lyricist and a lyrical dramatist. He experimented with vers libre in his new found 'apadyagadya', developed first in his Vasantotsav, and then in his lyrical dramas such as Jaya-Jayant, Indukumar, etc. His ideology of platonic love and marriage had a profound impact on the young masses of the time.

Balvantrai Thakore (1869-1952) influenced Gujarati poetry to the core in both diction and content. He propounded the theory that the best poetry was that which was thought-oriented. He introduced run on line in Sanskrit metres, by placing rhythms in tune with the thought of the poem, and not as per fixed places required by the structure of the metre. This had a strong impact on the poets of the next generation.

Other noteworthy poets of the age are Khabardar, Botadkar, Lalitji Hari Harshad Dhruv, Balashanker Kantharia, Mastkavi, Sanchit, Jatil, Sagar, Gajendra Buch, Manikant, Dolatram Pandya and Bhimrao Devetia.

With the appearance of Mahatma Gandhi (1869-1948) in the arena of national life, the very approach to literature underwent a great transformation. Gandhiji insisted on simplicity of language. His addresses and articles on varied subjects, from religion to handicraft, as also on socio-political subjects, had a wide and far reaching influence on the life-pattern and thinking process of the entire nation. The Gandhian ideology and programme became the prime subject of literature. Nationalism, realism, sympathy towards the downtrodden dominated the minds of the young poets of the age. The influence of socialism was also a powerful undercurrent. But in spite of the purposefulness of creative activity, the aesthetic value of literature never dwindled because of the profound impact of Rabindranath Tagore on writers of this generation. It also lifted parochial nationalism to universalism.

The leading poets of this era are Sundaram (b.1908), Umashankar Joshi (1911-1988) and Snehrashmi (b.1903). The main traits of their poetry are sympathy towards the downtrodden, intense patriotism, aspiration for freedom, humanism, realism, thought-oriented emotion and experiments with diction. The poetry of Sundaram in Kavyamangala and Vasudha is purely Gandhian in ideology, sometimes tending towards socialism. Later it under went a metamorphosois under the influence of Aurobindo. His poems in Yatra tended to express the metaphysical experience of the supramental. The poetry of Umashanker Joshi in Vishvashanti and Gangotri is in tune with the poetry of Sundaram in Kavyamangala, but takes a new stride in Nishith reaching heights of pure aestheticism. A poet of universality in Vishvashanti, he now tries to realise the beauty of the Supreme manifested in nature, but in spite of high imagination, he is well-entrenched in solid realism. His poetry in Abhijna tends towards surrealism and expresses the frustration and alienation of man in the industrial junk. His experimentation in drama in verse in Prachina and Mahaprasthan is noteworthy. Snehrashmi is a steady poet, never diverting from faith in Gandhian ideology and the well-being of mankind. His main contribution lies in the introduction and acclimatization of 'haiku' in Gujarati poetry.

Jhaverchand Meghani (1896-1947) was described by Gandhiji as a national bard because of intense patriotism in his poetry. Many of his patriotic poems like 'Koino nadakvayo', 'Chhelli salam', 'Chhellokatoro', 'Soona samdarni pale', 'Shivajinun halardun' and 'Kasumbino rang' were sung before the masses during the Independence movement. His poetry in Yugvandana bears the mark of socialism.

Other noteworthy poets of this era are Ramnarayan V. Pathak, Krishnalal Shridharani, Sundarji Betai, Badarayana, Mansukhlal Jhaveri, Deshalji Parmar, Karsandas Madek, Pujalal, Prajaram Raval, Patil, Indulal Gandhi, Govindswami, Mukund Parasharya, Jyotsana Shukla, Jayaman bahen Pathakji, Premshanker Bhatt, Tansukh Bhatt, Kusumakar, Ramnik Aralwala, Nathalal Dave, Svapnastha, Sudhanshu, Harihar Bhatt and Devji Modha.

The post-Independence literature runs in two streams. The first is an extension of the literature of the Gandhian era, with less of Gandhian ideology and more of an emphasis on individual sensibility. Poetry in the earlier era was committed to a cause but the new stream was committed to itself and to aesthetics. During the decade before Independence, many events like the Second World War, nuclear attack on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Quit India movement and even the partition of the country affected the poets, but nothing could move the poets of the new generation to express the emotions of the masses as powerfully as poets of the thirties had done. Hence it is said that the poets of the fifties were introverts more interested in expressing their own inner experience than their social commitment. Deep anxiety, intensity of pain and unfathomable disappointment are the prime subjects of the poetry of the new generation of poets. They are more concerned with the perfection of form and choice of words. They do not indulge in experimentation of metres, but are more inclined to elegance in diction and subtlety of expression.

The second stream emerged in the second half of the fifties. Unlike the first it is committed and untraditional, and subordinates content to form and meaning to words. It does not care much for harmony, and does not hesitate to depict disharmony in the world in disjuncted diction. From realism it transcends to surrealism and is influenced by the philosophies of Sartre, Freud, Baudelaire, Camus and Ezra Pound. Existentialism and Surrealism in communion with nihilism and futurism form the essence of modern world poetry, and so is the case with the new wave in Gujarati poetry. Imagism, symbolism, structuralism and formalism have affected the fabric of form and diction of the new-wave literature. It has come as a reaction to the feeling of alienation due to urbanization and industrialization in which an individual has lost his identity.

These two streams are not totally independent of each other. Poets of the first stream have adopted some of the tools of the second. Sometimes its sensibility is also influenced by the latter, as is evident in the later poetry of Umashankar Joshi and Niranjan Bhagat.

The prime poets of the first stream are Rajendra Shah (b. 1913), Niranjan Bhagat (b. 1926), Priyakant Maniyar (1927-1976), Hasmukh Pathak (b. 1930), Nalin Raval (b.1933), Jayant Pathak (b.1920) and Ushanas (b. 1920). The poetry of Rajendra Shah is an extension of Balvantrai Thakore in sonnets and of Nanalal Kavi in lyrics. But his distinguishing characteristics, as revealed in his poetry in Dhavni andolan, Shant kolahal and numerous other collections, are splendid depiction of nature, perfect deployment of metres, and Sanskritized but graceful diction. Niranjan Bhagat started with the romanticism of Kant and Nanalal along with the classicism of Balvantri Thakor in depicting nature and love in the poems of Chhandolaya and other collections, but disillusionment and isolation brought him very near to the second stream, as is evident form his poems in Pravaldvip. These poems show the influence of the Waste Land of Eliot on the one hand and of Baudelaire's Tableaux Parisiens on the other. It depicts the morbidity, monotony and frustration of people in a metropolis. Priyakant Maniyar, reminds one of the lyrics of Dayaram of the medieval period and of Nanalal of the modern times in his Pratik and Ashabda ratri but transforms himself into a new-wave poet in the poems of Prabal gati with his surrealistic sensibility and imagery. The poetry of Hasmukh Pathak in Nameli sanj and of Balin Raval in Udgar is more inclined to modernism than to traditional poetry. Both of them are experimental poets. Cynicism prevailed in the poems of Nameli sanj but the inner force of humanism saves the poetry of Hasmukh Pathak in Sayujya from a total loss of faith in the well-being of man. Nalin Raval is more inclined towards aestheticism, hence there is transparency of images and grace in his diction. Love of nature, nostalgia of native village and faith in the well-being of humanity are subjects dear to Jayant Pathak as is evident in his Murmur, Sanket, Vismaya, Sarga etc. Nature, love, devotion, family-life, urban and rural milieu are the varied subjects of Ushanas's poetry. Grass and sunlight are his most favourate images. His diction is Sanskritized, and his vision thought-oriented and prone to surprise. Nature has been revealed as a perfect sensuous entity in his poems in Prasun, Nepathaya, Ardra, Spand ane chhand and other collections. In Vyakul Vaishnav the poet reveals himself as a devotional poet, and in Shishulok his parental love finds an expression. Prithvine pashchim chehre represents his genius for the expermentation of the second stream of modernity, but his conviction in human values is totally unperturbed by its philosophy.

The poetry of Makrand Dave (b. 1922) has a mystic tone. The pseudo-devotional lyrics of Harindra Dave (b.1930) and Suresh Dalal (b. 1932) are very popular, but the essence of the their poetry is the expression of pain and despair of muffled lives in metropolitan cities. In spite of these themes their search for beauty is unrelenting.

Other notable poets of this stream are Prahlad Parekh, Harishchandra Bhatt, Balmukund Dave, Venibhai Purohit, Pinakin Trivedi and Hemant Desai.

The traditional ghazal form acquired a new vitality from the revival of mushaira. In the pre-Independence period Shayada and Borkar popularized this form and in the post-Independence era, Ghayal, Ghani Dahinwala, Mariz, Shunya Palanpuri, Ratilal Anil, Sheikhadam Abuwala, Mahendra 'Samir', Jamiyat Pandaya, Amin Azad, Manhar Choksi, 'Nazir' Dekhaiya, Kismat Qureshi and Asim Randeri have nourished this form in the midst of experimenation.

The second stream of poetry in general is influenced by Suresh Joshi (1921-1988), more by his criticism than by his creative writings. He interpreted the philosophy of Sartre, Freud, Baudelaire and Camus, and their influence on continental literature, and propagated the theory of modernity in literature. According to the main principle of modernity, when a poet, because of psychic distance, is 'dissociated' with sensibility, even a mighty theme may fail to evoke full creative response. Meaning is embedded in form. Real creativity does not rest with the event, episode or emotion on the surface, but it penetrates the reality, dissolves it, finds its mental parallels, which in turn is manifested in images, myths and their juxtapositions. Being honest to his own conviction, Suresh Joshi cancelled his first collection of poems Upajati because its diction was traditional. In his subsequent poetry in Pratyancha and Itara, he has depicted dehumanisation, loss of identity as an individual being, and disgust with the modern civilization of the metropolis. Social life and even nature have turned hostile. This he has expressed in non-metric diction with non-traditional employment and juxtaposition of images and myths.

Even the grotesque and the obscene has been depicted without hesitation in the new-wave poetry as is illustrated amply in the poems of Gulam Mohammad Sheikh. Labhshankar Thakar (b.1935) is another prominet experimentalist. His sensibility has been expressed in innumerable variants with free associations of strange images and myths. The poems in Manasni vát, Mara namne arwaje and Boom kagalman kora are illustrative of his experimentation with new poetry. Sitanshu Yashashchandra (b.1941) gave a decisive surreralistic turn to poetry in his Odysseusnun halesun in which he depicted the diversities of life at the level of the subconscious mind with the help of free association of images and myths. Chandrakant Sheth (b.1938) gives a call to discard the flat, traditional language and seeks self identity in a helpless and adverse world in his poems in Pavan ruoeri and Ughadti diwalo.

Ravaji Patel (1939-1968) and Manilal Desai (1939-1966) have left marks of their individuality on modern poetry. Both were possessed by agony of death. Both had nostalgia for rural life. Hence there are fascinating and fresh pictures of nature's beauty along with despair with life in their poetry.

Other experimental poets are Harshad Trivedi, Aniruddha Brahmabhatt, Dinesh Kothari, Chandrakant Topiwala, Mahesh Dave, Indu Puvar, Manhar Modi, Abdul Karim Sheikh, Prabodh Parikh, Madhu Kothari, Manjo Khanderia, Yashvant Trivedi, Sudhir Desai, Ramesh Parekh, Anil Joshi, Joytish Jani, Yosef Mackvan, Pavankumar Radheshyam Sharma, Panna Nayak, Vipin Parikh, Mafat Oza, Harikrishna Pathak, Shrikant Shah, Vinod Joshi, Jayendra Shekhadiwala and Manilal Patel.

A new trend in experimental lyrics developed with colloquial and folk rhythm with the sensibility of the new stream, and in constrast with the traditional lyricists-Priyakant Maniyar, Harindra Dave and Suresh Dalal, the poineers of this trend are Anil Joshi, Ramesh Parekh and Jagdish Joshi.

The ghazal form also went through the process of transformation. Its concept of the content is now totally changed and any subject under the sun or any sensibility of man is the subject of this poetry. Its diction too discarded the traditional vocabulary and adopted new images and new patterns of 'radifs' and 'kafias'. The pioneers of this experimentat are Adil Mansuri, Rajendra Shukla, Chinu Modi, Ramesh Parekh and Manoj Khanderia who were followed by Bhagvatikumar Sharma, Manhar Modi, Javahar Baxi, Shyam Sadhu, Mudul Choksi and many others.

POETRY (Hindi). Early and Medieval Phase : Early Hindi poetry has come down to us mostly in the form of bardic chronicles, through there were other pioneers also such as the Siddhas, the Naths and the Jain poets. The royal bards under the liberal patronage of chieftains wrote panegyrics on the love and chivalry of their masters and the splendour of their courts. The language they used was not modern Hindi, but an amalgam of words from Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha and local dialects. In the list of these bardic chronicles the first to come is Kumarpal Charit by an anonymous poet. It is a free adaptation of an original Prakrit poem written by Hemchandra. It is followed by Bisaldeva raso, Prithviraj raso by Chand Bardai, Alhakhand by Jagnik, and Hamir raso by Sharang Dhar. Though these works have been criticised for being excessively panegrical, they present various aspects of contemporary life too. If the stream of devotional poetry, specially of Nirgun (Formless) Bhakti, can be traced back to the poetry of the Naths and Siddhas, the various metres and poetic forms employed by the poets of the Bhakti and Riti periods were used by the poets of the 'Adikal', the earliest phase of Hindi literature.

The poetry of this period is not confined to the valorous deeds of the kings, as the appellation 'Viragathakal' suggests. We have at the same time secular poetry, the witty compositions of Amir Khusrau presenting life in riddles, and songs of Vidyapati mixing devotional spirit with erotic sentiment.

A new development in Hindi poetry occurred with the growth of the Bhakti movement. This movement was partly an outcome of interaction with Islam and partly a revolt against the cold intellectualism of Brahmanic philosophy and the rigid formalism of rituals. It also interacted with the liberal philosophy of Sufism. As a consequence of religious revivalism, poets started writing in vernacular. There were two streams of these poets: the Nirguna poets who believed in a formless and abstract God, and the Saguna poets who believed in a personal God with attributes. The most important among the poets of the Nir-gun stream was Kabir (c. 1398-1518), a disciple of Ramanand. Perturbed by the injustice perpetrated on the weaker sections of society, reacting sharply to ostentation in life, and distressed by hostility between the Hindus and Muslims whose wrath he had already incurred, he rejected the doctrine of incarnation, condemned idolatry and rituals, and insisted on love and unostentatious worship of God. Another saint-poet who carried the torch of light and love and had a band of devoted disciples and even initiated an order of worship (Sikhism) was Guru Nanak. Other poets who followed in the wake of Kabir and Nanak were Raidas, Dadu, Maluk and Sundardas, a few of them belonging to the lower castes. The philosophical thought of the Nirgun poets is non-dualistic (Advaitvad), and they used the terminology of yoga and metaphysical symbolism in their poetry. These poets were concerned as much with the social welfare of the common people as with their spiritual enlightenment. Catholicity and humanism mark their compositions and their language is the language of conversation among the lower and middle classes of society. As most of these poets travelled far and wide in the country, their language acquired words from local dialects. Their poetry is without embellishment and a few verses are even obscure, but their amazing boldness and utter sincerity appeal to the heart at once. Their biting satire, sharp epigrams and naturalness of rhythm make a direct impact on the people. Their poetry,especially that of Kabir, influenced not only the Hindus and the Muslims of their times, but even such men as Rabindranath Tagore and Mahatma Gandhi and the progressives of today.

Parallel to the poetry of saint poets ran another stream, the poetry of the Muslim Sufi poets living in eastern Uttar Pradesh. The most famous among them were Jayasi, Kutban and Manjhan. They believed that God could be attained through love. On the one hand they were acquainted with the traditioin of Hindu love and on the other hand with that of the Persian 'masnavis'. Therefore they composed long narrative love poems (Premakhyan) in the masnavi style and their subject was the earthly romance of a king or a prince travelling, in quest of his beloved, across the frontiers of his kingdom, facing hazards of journey and fighting the adversary, his rival in love, either defeating him or sacrificing his own life. The object of these poems Padmavat, Mrigavati and Madhumati was not only to entertain the readers with romantic tales of love and chivalry but to communicate an allegorical and philosophical meaning. The love of the prince for the princess stands for the love of the soul for the Highest Soul, and man-woman relationship is described in a manner that elevates the reader from the sensuous plane to an idealistic height. The interaction between folk poetry, Sufi philosophy and the ecstatic experience of the poets, makes these poems fascinating. As pure poetry too these romance are of high quality. Descriptions of natural beauty and scenes of battles and market places; delineation of human emotions—whether pangs of separation or filial love or zeal of a warrior to fight for his master; and use of apt figures, particularly similes and metaphors, make these works absorbing reading. These romances are written in Avadhi with an admixture of Persian words and local idiom. The other points of significance about this poetry are: (i) Though there is enough erotic element in these poems, they rarely violate the norms of Platonic love; (ii) These poets, the majority of them Muslims, depict in a picturesque style the social milieu; (iii) They tend to bring about a true integration of Hindus and Muslims, a task which even Kabir had found difficult to accomplish.

The Saguna school of poetry is divided into two sub-categories—Rama-bhakti kavya and Krishna-bhakti kavya. The cult of Krishna-worship had very old beginnings, and we come across beautiful verses on the love of Radha and Krishna in the Gita Govinda of Jayadeva in the twelfth century. In Bengali the Krishna hymns appeared in the 14th century and in Gujarati in the 15th century, and Vidyapati sang his songs in Maithili.

The Krishna Cult: The Bhagavata religion had its metaphysical foundation in the philosophies of Ramanuja, Nimbarka, Madhava and Vallabha. The spread of the worship of Krishna, however, owed most to Vallabhacharya. A brahmin from South India and born at Banaras, he installed an idol of Krishna at Govardhan in the Braj region and made it the centre of his school. He was succeeded by his son Vitthalnath (1515-1585) who played an important role in inspiring the Hindi poets to write Krishna-bhakti poems in Brajbhasha. The credit of founding the celebrated 'Ashtachhap', a group of eight poets, also goes to him. Of these Surdas and Nandadas have carved a niche for themselves in the galaxy of bhakti poets.

The Brajbhasha poets culled a number of episodes from the Bhagavata-purana and moulded them into exquisite verse. They painted Krishna as a child, a playmate and a lover. All nuances of love and passion, trysts and ecstasy have been delicately portrayed by them. As poets they were not concerned with the show of poetic skill but with the expression of joy springing from devotion to the Lord. Krishna to them was a Supreme Deity from whom all creation came as a sportive emanation. Radha and the other Gopis stood for human souls seeking Parmatma (God), and they prepared to offer their whole self in the pursuit. So there is a mystic yearning in these episodes. The poets sublimated the sensuous to the level of the suprasensuous and thus attempted a synthesis of the sublime and the sensuous.

However, this poetry would be remembered not for its philosophical content and spiritual sublimation but as pure poetry. It is not cut off from the life and environment in which the poets lived. The poets wrote either in folk forms or in popular musical modes (sometimes classical). Their language is very near the colloquial and the language of common conversation, and their style is unstrained and not a product of erudition. Their ability to create word pictures or etch out images and similes is astounding and their intensity of feeling unquestionable.

As lyricists these poets added several 'ragas' and made many innovations. For example, Nandadas introduced folk metres and folk tunes. His language at places is ornate, like that of a jeweller. Besides writing detached verses, he wrote larger works too, of which Ras panchadhyayi is well-known. Mirabai, a poetess of Rajasthan, is famous for her graceful and melodious verses. Many of these poets were, indeed, poets of high merit, and it was because of the excellence of their poetry that Brajbhasha remained long the chief poetic language of Hindi.

However, there is a dark side of the picture too. At places the poets used an exotic language and employed a highly sensuous imagery in their verses. It led the poets, specially those of the Ritikal, to indulge in the erotic in a most vulgar language.

The Rama Cult: The Ramayana of Valmiki has been the source of inspiration for poets who wrote epics as well as detached verses on Rama. The Bauddha and Jain works, however, gave a turn to the original story and used it as a plank for moral teaching. There are different versions of the Rama story in Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. In the south if the Alwars wrote devotional poetry, in the north Raghvacharya and Ramananda concentrated on the devotion to Rama. Most of the Hindi poets of the Rama cult owe their inspiration to these two Acharyas.

Though there have been poets like Vishnudas, Agradas and Ishwardas who wrote on Rama, it was Tulsidas (1532-1624) whose Ramacharitmanas is the magnum opus of the cult. It has been the most potent work in making Vaishnavism the accepted cult of a vast majority of Hindus in the North. Like other leaders of the Vaishnava movement, Tulsidas accepted the teaching of the Vedanta but tempered it with a belief in a personal God and identified Him with the incarnation of Rama. There are poets like Surdas of the Krishna cult who are perhaps superior to Tulsi in poetic excellence and lyrical charm, but the veneration in which Tulsi is held both as poet and as religious teacher is unsurpassed. By emphasising that Rama and Shiva are two entities of the same God, he tried to resolve the conflict between the devotees of the Rama and Shaiva cults. Other literary works of Tulsidas are Gitavali, Kavitavali, Dohavali and Vinaypatrika. He wrote in both Avadhi and Braj and had a command of all styles of contemporary poetry—narrative, lyrical, descriptive and didactic.

Tulsidas's personality among the poets of the Rama cult was so overpowering and his works so exceedingly magnificent that other poets in the Rama bhakti tradition were just awe-struck. He eclipsed them all. However, there are a few poets who may be mentioned for historical record, e.g. Nabhadas (Bhaktamal), Priyadas (commentry on Bhaktamal), Hridaya Ram, Pranchand Chauhan and Madhavadas. In Ritikal, the crystal stream of Rama kavya which was based on the lofty ideals of Rama's character, got sullied by the drain-waters of amorous poetry.

Ritikal is the next period of Hindi poetry (1650-1850); it is also known as 'Shringar-kal' and 'Alankarana-kal'. The last appellation is suggestive of the emphasis the poets laid on art and craft in poetry, while Shringar-kal indicates the dominance of the erotic sentiment in the poetry of this period. The most widely accepted term, however, is 'Ritikal' which streamlines the accent on poetics, rhetoric and prosody during this age. The poets and scholars attempted to systematize the art of poetry and determine the canons of poetic composition, and explain them by illustrative verses. Since most of the illustrative verses are love verses based on the erotic sentiment, the bulk of poetry is written in detached stanzas (muktak). Other subjects delineated in this poetry are eulogy of patrons, devotion to the Lord, and didactic sermons. The works of saints like Darya Sahib, Shiv-Narayan and Sahjo Bai, and the allegorical love tales by Sufi poets like Kasim Shah, Nur Muhammad and Sheikh Nazir are, as a matter of fact, in continuation of the devotional poetry of the Bhakti-kal.

The historical poetry written by poets like Bhushan, Sudan, Jodhraj, Bankidas, etc is in the tradition of the bardic poetry of the twelfth century. Though eulogizing their patrons for chivalry and valour in hyperbolic language, there is sincere feeling and genuine concern of the poets for their country and religion. Among those who wrote didactic poetry (Niti-kavya), Rahim, Vrinda, Girdhar Kaviraya and Dindayal Giri are the best known.

Scholars have classified Riti poetry written during this age into three heads: (1) Riti-baddha: poems in which a poet gives the definition of some rhetorical concept and then illustrates it with his verse. Nagendra calls such poets Ritikavi or Acharya kavi; (2) Riti-siddha: poems in which a poet does not preface a verse with the definition of a rhetorical concept but implicitly illustrates it; (3) Riti-mukta: poems which are free from stylistic strait-jacket. These verses are mostly love poems. In the first category the prominent names are Keshav (Kavipriya and Rasikpriya), Matiram (Lalit-lalam), Dev (Bhav-vilas), Jaswant Singh (Bhasha-bhushan), Bhushan, Murlidar, and Ramsahay. In the second category we have poets like Bihari, Beni, Rasanidhi and Pajvesa. The poets of the third category were romantics in the sense that they did not allow the stringent rules of rhetoric to clip the wings of their imagination. The important poets of this stream are Ghananand, Alam, Thakur and Bodha.

The Riti poets have been classified variously but the two main branches are (1) 'Sarvangnirupaka', those who defined, explained and elucidated all aspects of poetry—rasa, figures, and prosody, (2) 'Vishistangnirupaka', those who touched upon some specific aspect—rasa or figures or metres. However, their contribution as Acharyas is insignificant because most of them were essentially poets and scholars who hardly thought deeply or with originality on the problems of poetics. They largely translated into vernacular what they found in the master works of Sanskrit poetics.

The Riti poets have been severely accused of being excessively rule-bound, or for their erotic abandon. This is only partially true. If we look at miniature paintings in the couplets of Bihari, the excellence of Matiram's similes and the purity of his language, the ornate style and poetic craft of Dev, and the power of the heroic verse of Bhushan, we will concede that Riti poetry has a pride of place in the history of Hindi poetry.

S.S.G.

MODERN PHASE: By the end of the third quarter of the nineteenth century, the process of change in Hindi literature from the medieval to the modern, accelerated with the inflow of western ideas and values of life, became apparent. Bharatendu era (1867-1900) ushered in this change. The most dynamic of the pioneers was Bharatendu Harishchandra who not only himself attempted almost all the genres—poetry, drama, essay, etc.—but also gathered around him a galaxy of litterateurs, Premghan, Pratapnarain Mishra, Jagmohan Singh, Radhakrishna Das, Ambika Datt Vyas, who wrote under his guidance. It was Bharatendu who shaped the future course of the Hindi language and literature.

For some time there was a conflict between the feudal outlook and the new awakening. The poets respected the glorious heritage, but were also conscious of the new awakening. Therefore, we find currents of devotional and erotic poetry running parallel to those of nationalism and pragmatism. Every aspect of life—political, social, cultural and economic—became the concern of the writers now. After a long period of strife and disorder people heaved a sigh of relief under Queen Victoria's rule and wrote benedictory verses lauding her reign. But soon they were disillusioned and were able to identify the forces responsible for the misery of the people. Bharatendu wrote: 'The British rule has provided all comforts and facilities of life, but alas, the wealth of the country is slowly slipping away to a foreign land.' Naturally, there was an upsurge of national feeling.

The writers of this age were drawn from various strata of society and could write about the problems of the people with personal knowledge. Moreover, they wrote not for the elite and the rich but for the vast populace. They supported social reforms like widow-marriage, intercaste marriage, and equal status for women in society. In literature, the writers did not feel shy of making new experiments in the field of genres, metres and diction. They tried new patterns for the first time in Hindi. We come across short poems, very much like short essays in verse. Rejecting the traditional metres, they wrote in the style of folk-songs, such as 'holi', 'kajari' and 'lavani', and humour and satire gave a live tone to their verses. Full of ironical and humorous twists, the enigmatic verses of Bharatendu and his fellow poets may be classified into three groups—parodies, elegies and satire. They have a bite, and force the reader to introspect.

Their contribution in the field of poetic language is also commendable. To a language which had suffered decay for over half a century and had become stagnant, Bharatendu and his colleagues brought a new virility. They refined its texture, using words and idioms from local dialects and sister languages. In the use of poetic language they followed the dictum prescribed by Horace; 'Try to be exact without being vulgar, and be precise without being pedantic.' Their diction is in harmony with the content. By writing some of their poems in Khariboli, they could foresee that the medium of poetic expression had to be changed.

The pace of development was accelerated by Acharya Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, and his monthly Saraswati became a vehicle of rapid growth. Both by precept and by practice he showed the path along which the Hindi language was to move, and brought about a qualitative change in Hindi literature. By giving information about the neighbouring countries like Japan, Ceylon, China and Russia, and by acquainting readers with the Soviet ideology, labour organisations, and struggle of the African people against racial exploitation, Dwivedi was able to persuade the people to look around and liberate themselves both from the foreign yoke and from social evils.

Dwivedi and his colleagues, Nathuram Shankar, Gayaprasad Shukla 'Sanehi', Ramnaresh Tripathi, Rai Deviprasad Purna, Gopalsharan Singh, Hariaudh, Maithilisharan Gupta and Shridhar Pathak reminded the people of their rich heritage. Maithilisharan's Bharat bharati is the most representative work of the period which enthused the masses. Almost all these poets wrote on patriotic themes. Equally conscious of social weaknesses, they denounced ritualism, hypocrisy, animal sacrifice, caste system and other evils, and asked the people to bring about social reforms. 'Sanehi' stressed free and compulsory education. Maithilisharan Gupta and Hariaudh pleaded for the dignity of woman. If Urmila in Saket is ready to lead an army against Ravana, Radha in Priyapravas reminds us of Florence Nightingale, serving the sick and the feeble.

The poets of the Bharatendu era had paid scant attention to nature and depicted it in the traditional way; the poets of the Dwivedi age looked at nature's beauty from close quarters and recognized its soothing effects. Shridhar Pathak, Ramnaresh Tripathi, Hariaudh and Ramchandra Shukla wrote on different aspects of nature. In some of their verses there are mystic suggestions, but on the whole these poets were concerned only with the external beauty of nature and lacked grandeur of conception and vividness of execution. Nature was not yet a mightly living force to them.

The poets of this age took a more rationalistic view of God and religion. Their Rama and Krishna are social reformers—leaders born to make this world better.

Their humour and satire are not so effective as they were in the preceding age, but the stream did not dry up fully. The poets hit at dandyism and the blind mimicry of the west.

The most important contribution of Dwivedi is that he rescued the poetic language from the mire of confusion. Khariboli was still in a nebulous state. Owing to a large number of neophytes, writing had become a kind of patchwork, teeming with solecisms and awkward usages. With his clear vision and marvellous capacity for organisation, Dwivedi worked heroically to impose order on this chaos. It was due to his efforts and the zeal of the poets who worked with him that Khariboli soon developed into an effective medium of poetic expression.

The bulk of Hindi poetry written in this period is in the form of long narratives on episodes of Indian history and mythology. However, some stray, self-contained verses and lyrics were also written. As regards metre, they employed not only conventional metres but also Sanskrit and Urdu metres. They also used folk-songs like lavani and kajari, and some of them—Shridhar Pathak and Maithilisharan Gupta in particular—occasionally used the blank verse too.

Though the Brajbhasha poetry had lost its eminence by now, it did find a few talented poets, such as Jagannath Das 'Ratnakar' and Satyanarayan 'Kaviratna'. In his anxiety to enrich Hindi literature Dwivedi got the literary works of other languages—English, Bengali and Sanskrit–translated into Hindi.

The poetry of this period has been often criticised for its didacticism and matter-of-fact style. The charges are true, but while passing a final judgement we should keep in mind the historical perpective. The Dwivedi age was, indeed, a bridge between the Bharatendu age and the Chhayavad period, and we do have some glimpses of the glorious drawn that was to follow soon.

Chhayavad (1920-1930). This period witnessed events of far reaching importance both in the national and in the international spheres. The horrors of the First World War, the rise of capitalism, the growth of technology, the Russian Revolution—they all intensified the freedom stuggle at home and had their impact on Hindi poetry. The poets broke away from the accepted norms of form, technique and poetic judgement. The failure of the freedom struggle and the resulting despair in personal life forced the poets to turn introvert. Contact with the Romantic poetry of England also paved the way for the new upsurge and the opening of the flood-gates of new trends. The poets gave expression to their intense feelings. Most of their lyrics depict fellings associated with love, hopes and frustration, joy and grief, thrill and disappointment. They also made use of fresh imagery and mode of artistic expression. Jayashankar 'Prasad' in his Ansu and Lahar, Sumitranandan Pant in Pallav and Granthi, and Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala' in his Anamika gave expression to their feelings and aesthetic experience in a language hitherto unknown to Hindi readers.

The chhayavadi poets made innovations in their style and technique also. Overwhelmed by its subtlety and novelty Acharya Shukla mistook chhayavad for a special style of Hindi poetry. The variety of poetic forms such as lyrics, sonnets, odes, elegies, long poems in blank verse and epic is amazingly rich. The poets gave up measured metres and rhymes, introduced a new kind of blank verse based on articulated word arrangement, and in their hands Khariboli was moulded into a perfectly chiselled and elegant poetic language. It acquired a new power and plasticity capable of expressing various shades of meaning, and approximated to Brajbhasha in melody and musical effect. The four master poets of chhayavad are Prasad the pioneer, Nirala the prime innovator and iconoclast, Pant the foremost exponent, and Mahadevi the consummate singer of love and compassion.

Two other cross currents ran parallel to Romantic poetry. One is the national cultural stream led by Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Balkrishna Sharma 'Navin' and Ramdhari Singh 'Dinkar'. Though their poetry is the poetry of passion and romantic temper, it is noted for its broad national and social consciousness and intense desire to free the nation from slavery. These poets are rebels in a way. The other stream led by Harivansh Rai 'Bachchan', Narendra Sharma and 'Anchal', is marked by the spirit of love and abandon. These poets are uninhibited in their expression of love and are sometimes called secular lyricists.

Pragativad (1936-1942). In the mid-thirties chhayavad, as a poetic movement, started losing strength. it turned into stylized poetry since it tended to ignore the harsh realities facing the country. The onslaught of World War II, the growing momentum of the freedom struggle in the country, the success of the Russian Revolution—all brought in a new awareness of social and historical reality and under its impact a new poetic sensibility developed. There was a clear shift in themes and diction. Even the eminent poets of chhayavad, Pant and Nirala, could not remain insensitive to the new wave. Pant in his Gramya came to terms with the experiences of country side in a neo-romantic vein. Nirala in his pungent, satric and rugged style described the woes of the lowly and the downtrodden of society. These poets were followed by Kedarnath-Agarwal, Nagarjun, Ramvilas Sharma, Rangeya Raghav and Shivamangal Singh 'Suman' in whom the voice of 'Pragativad' (progressivism) became more explicit. Unfortunately, in a number of poets this stream turned into a doctrinaire and sloganistic school and its influence started fading. However, the movement was significant since it provided a social dimension to creative art.

Prayogvad: Pragativad and Prayogvad (Experimental movement) started about the same time, and in the beginning they interacted closely too.

Many poets were common to both the trends. The name 'Prayogvad' was given derisively to this movement by some progressive critics, and it is a misnomer because the trend is not merely confined to experimentation in form and technique of poetry. As a matter of fact the subject of their poems—personalised emotion, tension of modern life, personal struggle and suffering, stark realities of life—led them to make new experiments in the sphere of language, diction and imagery. New realms of experience

The movement started with the publication of Tar saptak (1943), a collection of poems written between 1938 and 1943 by seven poets—Muktibodh, Girijakujmar-Mathur, Nemichand Jain, Bharat Bhushan Agrawal, Ramvilas Sharma, Prabhakar Machwe, and Sachidanand Vatsyayan 'Agyeya'. The poems of Tar saptak were a break from the past—a landmark, indeed, in modern poetry. Their writers were on a quest, in search of identity. They wanted to portray man in his entirety, focus on his destiny in the contemporary context, and discuss relevance of life in the larger dimensions of time and space. They tried to evolve a diction close to the spoken word, experimented new lyrical patterns, and used imagery not as an embellishment but as a vortex of emotional experience. Here figures and images were not like cherries tastefully arranged on a cake, but they were the very essence of emotive language.

Nai Kavita: The experimental poetry continued to develop, and the corpus of poems written after 1947 came to be called Nai kavita by the second generation of poets. The protagonists of Nai kavita believe that every moment in life is significant and every emotional experience is true. To them man is not important because of his social status and moral ideals but because he is an ordinary man with earthy joys and sorrows, attractions and repulsions. Equally important is the environment in which he is born because it shapes his mind and temperament.

Sincerity of experience and realistic approach born of rational attitude towards life characterize Nai kavita. The poet, conscious of the suffering experienced by society, assimilates it and then projects it into his poems. He is not content with visionary idealism, nor does he offer ready-made solutions to the problems of life. Some poets like Agyeya have written poems on both urban and rural life. Some others have expressed their sensibility and emotional experience, related primarily to city life (Shamsher Singh, Girijakumar Mathur, Dharamvir Bharati, Kunwar Narayan); a few others have dealt with the rural ethos. If Madan Vatsyayan is concerned about speedy industrialisation, Thakurprasad Singh depicts the life of the Santhals. However, almost all of them have focussed on the despair and frustration of the middle classes. Muktibodh, through his fantasies, has depicted the life of disenchantment and frustration. For these poets, form and content are co-terminous. By drawing images and symbols from common life, using mythology in new contexts, and exploiting words and idioms of common parlance, new poetry has acquired great freshness and vigour.

In the poems written after the sixties the tone of discontent and rejection of old values is still louder. Dehumanization, violence, permissiveness, city culture, degradation prevalent in society, and anti-establishment protest have come into sharp focus. The reason is that the dreams the people cherished for two decades were hardly realised. Out of the mood of disillusionment was born a sense of revolt against establishment. The reaction showed itself in two ways: (i) some like Rajkamal Choudhary adopted the nihilistic approach and their poems deal with sexual perversion and morbidity; (ii) others had a constructive approach and showed a clearer understanding of the social, political and cultural reality. Their work has greater social relevance. Dhumil's Samsad se sarak tak is a pointer. Among the young poets Liladhar Jugari, Padmadhar Tripathi, Vijaydev Narain Sahi are important names.

Various appellations have been given to poetry written after the sixties - 'Kavita', 'Atikavita' and 'Aswikrit kavita'. There is hardly any depth in much of this poetry. Every group, holding a new placard, wants to come into limelight and become a torch-bearer.

Let us now examine the charges levelled against Nai kavita. The first is that the new poets have borrowed and imitated foreign ideologies and models. There is some truth in the allegation. A few poets under the influence of existentialism wrote cliche-ridden, repetitive poetry. A few others in an attempt to cover the insincerity of their feeling adopted the technique of new poetry merely as a fashion and employed vague, far-fetched and obscure expressions. But, by and large, Nai kavita did prove that the poets had the capacity to absorb new ideas and new modes of expressions. Nai kavita is not a slavish imitation of the west, but is rooted in the soil and culture of the people.

POETRY (Kannada). The earliest specimen of Kannada poetry is found in the stone inscriptions of Karnataka, the first of them being the Halmidi inscription of about 450 A.D. Metres like the vritta and tripadi have been employed in the verses found in these inscriptions.

Kavirajamarga, the first extant literary work in Kannada, has references to poets and prose-writers of earlier times, but nothing more about them has been discovered so far.

Pampa (AD 902), the first of the 'Ratna-traya' (three gems), and the author of Adipurana and Vikramarjuna vijaya, inaugurated the age of epics in Kannada. Adipurana narrates the past lives and the present life of Vrishabha Deva, the first of the twenty-four Tirthankaras. Vikramar- juna vijaya has been acclaimed as Pampa bharata because it is an adaptation of the Mahabharata. Pampa's narrative skill, erudition and felicity of language had a profound influence on the Kannada poetry for the next period.

Ponna (AD 950), the second of the Ratna-traya, succeeded Pampa. Among his four works, Shantipurana, Bhuvanaika Ramabhyudaya, Gatapratyagata and Jinaksharamale, only the first and the last are extant. Shantipurana is an epic in 'champu' style on the life of Shantinatha, the sixteenth Tirthankara.

Among the poets who followed, Nagavarma (c. 990) is significant for Karnataka kadambari, an adaptation of Banabhatta's Kadambari in Kannada. The major works of Ranna, the last of the Ratna-traya, are Ajita tirthankara purana tilaka and Gadayuddha. Ranna's power of characterization, the power of his language and his dramatic skill set him apart from others.

The other noted writers of the old phase of poetry in Kannada are Durgasimha (b. 1031) who wrote the Panchatantra in Kannada, Nagachandra (b. 1100), the author of Ramachandracharita purana, Kanti (b.1100), the first poetess in Kannada literature and Nayasena (b.1112), the author of Dharmamrita.

Old Kannada poetry was elitist and was accessible to the learned only; the ordinary people had no share in it. As opposed to this, the main features of the medieval poetry are its simplicity and mass-orientedness. The change in the general attitude to life that took place in the twelfth century was also reflected in literature. Although this poetry was also charged with religious fervour, the emphasis now was on right conduct, purity of thought, word and deed, and doing one's work, high or low, in a spirit of total surrender to God. The champu form which originated from Sanskrit lagged behind and native forms like the vachana, satpadi, sangatya and the Prakrit ragale came into vogue. On the whole literature changed with respect to matter, language and metre.

Though the vachanas were composed as early as the eleventh century, they developed as a full-fledged form of literature only in the twelfth century. The 'vachana' literally means 'saying'; it is neither prose nor verse, but has features common to both the genres. Basaveshvara, the leader of the Virashaiva movement, and hundreds of his followers composed vachanas. Basaveshvara is the most prominent vachana composer, the other important poets being Devara Dasimayya, Allama Prabhu, Akkamahadevi and Siddharama. It is a unique phenomenon that ordinary men of various trades and castes busied themselves with the vachana composition.

The period of vachana literature is followed by that of the 'ragale'. Harihara is the greatest name in this genre. He belonged to the end of the twelfth century and the beginning of the thirteenth century. Harihara has written more than a hundred ragale works about Shiva's devotees. Celebrated personalities like Basava are the heroes of his stories. The vachanas were both lyrical and reflective; there was a return to the narrative form. But now the hero was not the mighty warrior-king endowed with virtues but the devotee engaged in spirtual pursuits.

Raghavanka (b. 13th c.), a contemporary of Harihara, is perhaps the first poet in Kannada to have composed in the 'shatpadi' metre. Harishchandra charitra, Siddharama charitra, Somanatha charitra and Viresha charitra are his works in the vardhaka shatpadi. Of these, the first two are superb works. In Harishchandra charitra is expressed a rare vision—'Truth is Hara (God), Hara is Truth.'

There are some other Virashaiva poets belonging to the same period. Kereya Padmarasa composed a philosophical work, Dikshabodhe, in the ragale metre. Sananda charitra is a work composed in various shatpadis by Kumara Padmarasa. Palkurike Somanatha wrote some ragale poems.

Bhima Kavi wrote the famous Basava purana in bhamini shatpadi during the latter half of the fourteenth century. Padmananka (b. 1385) wrote Padmaraja purana in vardhaka shatpadi. Kumudendu, a Jaina poet of the second half of the thirteenth century, composed in various shatpadis, Kumudendu Ramayana, according to the Jaina tradition.

The period extending from the twelfth century to the fifteenth is called the Basava age and the literature of this period is sometimes referred to as Virashaiva literature, since most of the poets belonged to this faith.

The most important writer of the fifteenth century is Naranappa or Kumaravyasa (b.1400). The period beginning with him is called the Kumaravyasa age. Karanataka Bharata kathamanjari composed by Kumarvyasa in bhamini shatpadi is an epic equally loved by the learned and the laymen. Though it is based on the Mahabharata, its originality is undisputed. It splendidly expresses the devotional (bhakti) spirit of the age. Lord Krishna is the hero of this epic . While he dominates the narrative, other characters are not dwarfed but are vividly realized. Kumaravyasa is also a master of language. In a word, his work stands supreme.

Torave Narahari or Kumara Valmiki (b. 1500) imitated Kumaravyasa and composed Torave Ramayana in Bhamini shatpadi. Kumaravyasa's Bharata which runs only up to the tenth Parva was continued by Timmanna Kavi (c. 1510) although without much success. Chatu Vithalanatha (c. 1530) composed the Kannada Bhagavata in Bhamini shatpadi. Lakshmisha (c. 1550) is a superior poet who composed Jaimini Bharata, an excellent collection of stories. While the Sanskrit source is dominated by the puranic temperament, Laksmisha's work is predominantly poetic. The other major works of the age are Chitrabharata and Nandimahatmya written by Gopakavi (b. 1600) and Bhagavadgita by Nagarasa (c. 1650).

Like the vachana literature, 'dasa' literature which begins in this period is one of the precious treasures of Kannada. The first one to write in this tradition was Narahari Tirtha (13th and 14th centuries). The Dvaita philosophy propounded by Madhvacharya informs this literature. Several Haridasas have composed musical kirtanas in large numbers. They preach devotion, renunciation and right observance. Shripadaraya (b. 1500) and Vyasaraya (c. 1525) have composed many good kirtanas. Among the dasas, Purandaradasa (c. 1484) and Kanakadasa (b. 1488) are noteworthy from the literary point of view. Besides kirtanas, Kanakadasa composed Ramadhanya charite, Nalacharitre, Haribhaktisara and Mahanatarangini. Of these Nalacharitre is a popular poem noted for its beauty and the Haridasas strove to bring philosophy to every heart and home; they stressed right conduct and integrity. They were also composers and gave Kannada a treasury of songs.

Jagannathadasa who lived around 1775 composed kirtanas and a philosophical work, Harikathamritasara. Govinda Vidya's (17th c) Kanthirava Narasaraja vijaya is an important historical work.

Anubhavamrita of Mahalingaranga (1675) is another significant work propounding the philosophy of Advaita.

Literature favouring Vaishanava religion was produced during the time of the Mysore kings. Several works related to the Vaishnava faith were composed under the patronage of Chikkadevaraja (17th c). The king was himself a poet and it appears that he wrote Chikkadevarajabinnapa and Gitagopala. Chikkupadhyaya composed prolifically in various metres; but his works do not have much literary value. Singaraya's Mitravinda Govinda is the first extant play in Kannada; it is, in fact, an adaptation of Harsha's Ratnavali. During this period Hannamma composed Hadibadeya dharma, a work describing the duties of a wife. Helavanakatte Giriyamma (b.1750) composed Chandrahasana kathe and other poems in sangatya metre.

There are many Virashaiva writers during the period. Shunyasampadana belonging to this period is an unusual collection of vachanas, reaching heights of mysticism. Tontada Siddhalingayati has composed some notable vachanas.

A number of other poets enriched Kannada poetry in the three centuries beginning with the fifteenth. Deeparaja (b. 1400) has written Sobagina sone in sangatya and translated Amarushataka from Sanskrit. Of the seven works of Nijaguna Shivayogi (b. 1500), the most important is Viveka chintamani; this is a rare work comparable to an encyclopaedia. Nijaguna has composed songs also. Muppina Sadakshari and Sarpabhushana Shivayogi continued this tradition.

Lakkanna Dandesha (c. 1425) has written a voluminous work Shivatatva chintamani which outlines Virashaiva philosophy. Virashaivamrita purana by Gubbi Mallanarya (c. 1475) is also a work of similar nature. Soundara purana by Bommarasa (b. 1450), Trisasti puratana charitre by Suranga (b. 1500), Bhavachintaratna by Gubbi Mallanarya, and Cheramakavya by Cheramanka are all in Vardhaka shatpadi and narrate the lives of Virashaiva luminaries. Another branch of this kind contains Prabhulingalile by Chamarasa (c. 1430), Amalapasava charitra by Singiraja (c. 1500), Bhairaveshwara kavya by Kikeri Nanjunda (b. 1525), Mahadeviakkana purana by Channa-basavanka, Proudharayana charite by Adrisha, Chennabasava purana by Virupaksha (c. 1585), Gururaja charitra by Siddhananjesa, Kathasutraratnakara by Santalinga Deshika, and other shatpadi works. Of these the most noteworthy work is Prabhulingalile; this is an excellent poem depicting the life of Allamaprabhu in a symbolic manner. Ramanatha charitra by Nanjunda (b.1525), containing the story of Kumara Rama, is a purely historical poem and occupies a special place in Kannada literature. Mention may also be made of Bhikshatama charite by Gurulingavibhu.

An unforgettable name in the Kannada of this period is that of Sarvajna (17th c). His tripadis contain cryptic messages of philosophic wisdom. In many places Sarvajna has been didactic but in a poetic manner. He has been compared to Vamana of Telugu and Tiruvalluvar of Tamil.

In Jivandhara charite by Bhaskara (15th c.) written in Bhamini, we see an imitation of Kumaravyasa. Of the many works by Kalyanakirti (15th c.), Jnanachandrabhyudaya is noteworthy. In Tripuradahanasangatya by 'Sisumayana' (16th c.), the story is narrated allegorically. Anjana charite is another work written by him. Mangarasa, the third (16th c.) composed Nemijinesa sangati, Jayanripakavya, Samyaktva kaumudi and other works, in shatpadi, while Sangatya Salvabharatha is authored by Salva (c. 1550); this is the Bharata story according to the Jaina tradition.

Ratnakara Varni (16th c.) is another famous poet. His Bharatesha vaibhava is an excellent work in the Sangatya genre. The reconciliation of 'yoga' and 'bhoga' is the achievement of this poem. This contains a touching portrayal of family life. Rajavali kathe by Devachandra is a prose work of some historical significance. The one hundred and fifty years following Sarvajna and Shadakshardeva was a comparatively barren period. Mudra manjusha by Kempunarayana belonging to the early nineteenth century and Shri Ramashvamedha by Muddana belonging to the end of the same century are two noteworthy works, containing the characteristics of the period of transition from the old to the new. Muddana's call to do away with verse and his extolling prose was indeed prophetic. He wrote Adbhuta Ramayana in prose and Ramapattabhisheka in shatpadi metre.

Modern Kannada poetry was ushered in by B.M. Sri kantaiah's English gitagalu. This is a collection of poems translated from English and was published in 1921. Even before 'Sri' published his work, there were scholars who translated English poetry into Kannada, some of them being H.Narayana Rao and S.G. Narasimhachar. But because they used the old metrical forms they did not exert the influence that 'Sri' did.

Since he formulated new rhythms in English gitagalu, his work became a guide for future poetry in Kannada. English gitagalu contains some of the famous poems of the English romantic poets like Wordsworth and Coleridge. This collection achieved novelty in subject matter, language and metre. It inaugurated the age of lyric in Kannada.

In the history of modern Kannada poetry two periods can be identified : pre-Independence period and pos-Independence period. The poetry of the first stage is called Navodaya or romantic poetry, while that of the second stage is called Navya (new) poetry. Between these two stages, there is an interim stage called the 'pragatishile' or progressive stage but it affected fiction more than poetry.

Though the poets of the Navodaya (Renaissance) period were influenced considerably by the English romantic poets, their real foundation was the Indian tradition. That the seeds of romanticism exist in the Indian tradition itself is a fact to be taken note of. This cannot be said, however, of Navya poetry in which there is a greater measure of imitation. The freedom struggle of India served as a background to the Navodaya poets. Irrepressible faith in life and a strong faith in a transcendental power characterised the Navodaya poets. They were neither escapists nor cynics.

Navodaya poetry flourished in all the lyrical modes such as the ode, the elegy and the sonnets but narrative poetry and the epic strain were also not absent. All aspects of life, all feelings and moods found a place in it.

Srikantaiah also wrote some independent poems; these can be found in the collection Honganasugalu. Panje Mangesha Rao wrote some independent poems even earlier than Srikantaiah. In Gilivindu of Govinda Pai, who wrote in the early Navodaya period, the old Kannada usage is very conspicuous. Golgotha and Vaisakhi which portray the last days of Jesus Christ and Buddha respectively are two important works by Pai. D.V.Gundappa's feelings of devotion and dedication are expressed in his collection of poems, Nivedana. He has a compact, scholarly style and has a bias for old metrical forms. His Mankutimmana kagga is a work as popular as Sarvajna's verses; the extent of experience depicted in it is surprisingly large. Srinivasa (Masti Venkatesa Iyengar) wrote both lyrics and narrative poems. His poetry exudes tranquillity and gentleness; the culture of the land is especially portrayed in his poems. His Navaratri is a unique work, somewhat like Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. His Sri Rama pattabhishekha is also a notable work. Cheluvu and Tavare are two collections of Srinivasa's lyrics. T.N.Srikantaiah was one of the first poets to write love songs in Kannada; Olume is his collection.

Kuvempu (K.V.Puttappa), Ambikatanayadatta (D.R.Bendre) and P.T.Narasimhachar are three leading names in Kannada Navodaya poetry. Kuvempu is a poet known for his extreme romanticism; no one else described nature's beauty as he did. A definite 'vision' informs all his poetry. The richness of his lyrics is evident from several collections like Kolalu, Paksikasi Agnihamasa and Navilu. Kuvempu's genius reached its climax in Sri Ramayana darshanam, an epic which is one of the greatest achievements of Kannada literature. This work won the author the Bharatiya Jnanpith Award. The poetry of D.R.Bendre too possesses a singular power. It absorbs the essence of folk poetry and contains the portrayal of the life of ordinary people. Bendre's power of imagination is fabulous. Uyyale, Gangavatarana and Nadatile are among the collections of his poems. His Nakutanti received the Jnanpith Award. P.T.Narasimhachar is a poet known for his reflective nature. His poems have a musical quality; the style is a bit difficult. Some of his collections are Hanate, Ganeshadarshana, and Rasasaraswati. All these poets are of a spiritual frame of mind.

V.K. Gokak is both a Navodaya poet and a herald of Navya poetry. His poetry is a combination of intellectualism and spiritualism. Some of his collections of poems are Payana, Ugama and Higgu. V.S. Sitaramaiah, whose collections include Drakshi dalimbe and Nelalu belaku is a poet who emphasises human relationships. K.S. Narasimha Swamy is a popular poet who has depicted the joys of conjugal life. While the romantic element predominates in such collections as Mysore mallige and Airavata, he took to the Navya mode later. G.P. Rajaratnam's Ratnana padagalu is an interesting experiment , where the world is described through the eyes and language of an inebriated man. His Purusha sarasvati is a satirical work which deserves mention. Madhura Chenna (Nanna Nalla), Sali Ramchandra Rao, Kadengodlu Shankara Bhatta (Nalme), Isvara Sanakalla, Simpi Linganna, S.V. Paramesvara Bhatta, Narayana Samgama, B.H. Sridhara, Siddayya Puranik, Kayyara Kinnanna Rai, S.R. Ekkundi, D.S. Karki, M.V. Sitaramaiah and Gangadhara Chittala are some others who wrote in the Navodaya tradition. R.R.Diwakar, Kuvempu, S.V.Ranganna, S.V.Parameswara Bhatta, Siddayya Puranik, N. Prahalada Rao and others have used the old vachana genre as a medium of expression in this century. Both for range of experience and for volume of vachanas Ranganna's Rangabinnapa deserves to be mentioned. Besides the vachana form Paramesvara Bhatta has successfully employed tripadi and sangatya metres. The limericks of Dinakara Desai have their own charm. It may be said that Navodaya poetry has not declined but is still alive. There is a blending of Navodaya and Navya traditions in Channavira Kanavi and G.S.Shivarudrappa.

After Independence, the Navya school made its appearance. It was influenced by western poets like Eliot, Pound, Auden and Dylan Thomas. Disillusionment, a feeling of not belonging anywhere, a sense of a loss of culture—all these were actually reflected in its poetry. But perhaps the navya-ness in Kannada poetry did not come about as the result of a historical necessity but out of a love of experimentation. The main drawbacks of Navya poetry is its ambiguity. It is a paradox that this poetry is quite distant from society. But its positive points are complexity of experience, unveiling of the subconscious mind, use of symbols and images and powerful employment of language.

It is said that Navya poetry was born in the Natyotsava of Pejavara Sadashiva Rao. Gokak's Samudra gitagalu is one of the most significant poems of the period. However, M. Gopalakrishna Adiga may be called the chief exponent of Navya poetry. Adiga who composed in the Navodaya fashion in the beginning gradually became discontent with that mode, and proclaiming that the smell of the earth must again emanate from poetry embarked upon a new mode. Chandemaddale is his first attempt in this direction. Adiga is acutely conscious of the Indian tradition of poetry. At the same time, there is also an element of obscurity resulting from excessive intellectualism. The charge of obscurity applies also to the Navya poems in K.S.Narasimha Swamy's 'Silalate'; nonetheless, the picturesqueness, tenderness and sweetness of his poetry are fascinating. His Tereda bagilu is a superb collection representing contemporary poetry. The navya-ness of Gokak's poetry is, perhaps, limited to the technique of expression.

Sex is the main subject in the poems of B.C. Ramachandra Sharma in his collection Elu suttina kote. Technique is everything in A.K. Ramanujan's poetry. K.S. Nisar Ahmed is vocal in his poetic expression. The poetry of Chandrashekhara Kambar and Channana Watikara has the gusto of folk speech, whereas satire dominates Chandrashekhara Patil. U.R. Ananthamurthy, K.V. Thirumalesh, P. Lankesh, K.V. Rajagopal, Sumatindra Nadig, Chandrakantha Kusanur, Lakhsmi Narayana Bhatta, B.R. Lakshamana Rao, Srikrishna Alanahalli, H.M. Channaiah, Subraya Chokkadi, Giraddi Govindaraj, Bhagyalakshmi, H.S. Ventakeshwara Murthy and many others have added new dimensions to Navya poetry.

Of late a new school of poetry called Dalita (down trodden) poetry, has emerged as a protest against both the Navodaya and Navya schools. Its stand is essentially a social and not a literary one. Holemadigara hadu of Siddalingaiah is an example of this kind of poetry. The future of this poetry, which is largely inspired by indignation and which easily succumbs to explicitness, is yet uncertain.

POETRY (Kashmiri). Jayalal Kaul, in his Studies in Kashmiri, divides Kashmiri poetry into four periods. The early period up to 1555, the middle period from 1556 to 1752, the late middle period from 1753 to 1925, and the early modern period from 1926 to 1947. This periodisation is based neither on literary movements and their particularities as intrinsic to Kashmiri poetry, nor on any recognised convention, but it coincides with certain historical divisions. With the exception of the modern period, which takes off directly in terms of content as well as form from the events leading to Independence in 1947, and marks a decidedly radical departure from the traditional, such a periodisation is completely arbitrary. The years 1656, 1753, 1926, etc. do not signify any major literary event or even the conception of one. A simpler division would be to term the period up to 1500 as the early period, 1501 to 1800 as the middle period and 1801 to 1930 as the early modern period. The modern period, which really took off in 1947, can be discerned in its embryonic form in the period from 1930 onwards. This periodisation is also nearer the convention followed in linguistic and literary studies as such. Among the early examples of poetry written in a language closely resembling Kashmiri are Mahanay prakash by Pandit Shitikanth and Banasura katha by Bhattavatara. Mahanay prakash is a composition of 94 verses, each verse being a quatrain. Banasura katha is based on the original fable contained in Harivamsha purana. Besides the above-mentioned, there are references to Sukha-dukha charitam by Ganaka Prashasta, Jain prakash, a play on king Zain-ul-Abidln by Yodha Bhatta and Jain charit, a biography of the king by Nathasoma. Of these, only Ganaka Prashasta's didactic poem is extant. These texts can be safely dated between 1400 and 1475. George Grierson observes that "the language is old and belongs to the period when Prakrit in its Apabhramsha stage had just merged into the language that finally became the Kashmiri of the present day". Interestingly, the greatest poetess of Kashmiri, Lal Ded, and her junior contemporary Nund Rishi (Lal Ded predates the above period slightly) wrote in a highly developed, chaste Kashmiri without any trace of the Apabhramsha whatsoever. The royal chronicles continued to be written in Sanskrit around the same time and till much later. Quite clearly, George Grierson's observation as also later corroborative work, is not entirely tenable. Lal Ded (1335-1376) is simply the greatest poet of the language. She was a practising yogi, in the indigenous Kashmir Shaiva tradition. Her poetry, written in aphoristic quatrains called 'vakh', while mystic in content, has classic poetic quality and masterly diction. She is universally acknowledged to be a saint by Kashmiris. She is an authentic 'all-time-great' poet, easily in the company of great Indian poets. Nund Rishi (1377-1438) wrote poetry primarily in the 'shrukh' form, a quatrain metrically different from vakh, and was directly influenced by Lal Ded. He is the patron-saint and founder of the 'Rishi' order of mystics.

The middle period (1501-1800) saw Persian taking over as the court language. A disproportionately large part of the poetic output was also in this language.

Maulana Yakub Sarfi Ganai (1529-1594), Khwaja Habibullah Naushehri (1555-1617) and Mirza Akmal-ud-Din Kamil (1642-1717) wrote poetic treatises mainly in Persian while continuing to write songs in Kashmiri. This is partly attributable to the fact that poetic forms of Persian like 'Masnavi' were not fully assimilated and indigenised as was done by the later poets. Masnavi and marsiya forms passed through a transitional phase of assimilation when the famous masnavis of Persian were rendered into Kashmiri verse translation, sometimes embellished with extra-textual songs in the typical prosody of expanded vakh or vatsun, during the period of sufi poets. These forms were fully assimilated as late as the first half of the nineteenth century, with originals from Maqbul Shah Kralwari and others. Marsia is a vibrant, though cloistered, poetic tradition with a long continuity of several hundred years.

The chief contribution of the middle period is the 'lol' lyric. It is a short poem, organically a unit, with a refrain. It is consciously written for music and has secular human emotions as its theme. This , in essence, is the beginning of the romantic tradition in Kashmiri poetry. (Lol means love and longing in Kashmiri). Most of these lyrics are of unknown authorship and have been handed down the generations orally. However, two celebrated poetesses, Habba Khatoon and Arnimal, undoubtedly belong to this tradition. Habba Khatoon (c. 1550), born Zoon, became the consort of King Yusuf Shah Chak according to legend. Her separation from the king provided the language some memorable lyrics of longing which, alongwith similar pinings of Arnimal (d. 1800) the deserted wife of the Persian writer Munshi Bhawanidas Kashru, became immortal. These lyrics are written in varied metres and different rhyme schemes. A number of them, however, exists as two or three quatrains with the fourth line of each quatrain being the refrain. This is the early vatsun, an indigenous form attributed to Habba Khatoon.

The 'vakh' continued to be written during this period. The most important contribution was made by the Rupa Bhawani (1625-1721).

A significant poet of this period in the mystic tradition, who chose not to write in the vakh form, is Shah Gafoor (c. 1750). Shah Gafoor was a sufi poet. The sufi poetic tradition in Kashmiri is not in conformity with orthodoxy in the strict sense. There is a long tradition of this poetry (down to the present times) which, while employing specific religious terminology, is wholly secular in nature.

The early modern period (1801-1930) saw the assimilation of Persian poetic forms like masnavi and ghazal, the development of the Lila lyric and the continuation of the sufi tradition. Mahmud Gami (d. 1855) brought to Kashmiri poetry the ghazal form. Though modelled closely on the Persian original, the use of medial rhymes and assonance makes his ghazal nearer the lol lyrics stylistically than the original form would have been. He also wrote traditional vatsun. In some of these vatsuns, he has used a variable refrain. He wrote original compositions in the 'roph' folk song style and occasionally 'naat' (eulogium) prayer hymns, etc. He also wrote eight masnavis, mostly abridged or adapted translations of Persian originals. Maqbul Shah Kralwari (1820-1875) wrote some other masnavis besides his famous love romance Gulrez. The masnavi, under the influence of the patronage that Persian received, was widely written during this period chiefly in its 'razmia' (combat), 'bazmia' (love) and occasionally 'hazlia' (satiric) sub-forms. Among the masnavi poets, the more important ones, with their major work given parenthetically, are Prakash Ram (Ramavtarcharit), Lachhman Raina 'Bulbul' (Samnama, Nal-o-Daman), Waliullah Matoo (Heemal), Abdul Ahad Nazim (Zain-ul-Arab), Amiruddin Kreeri (Samnama, Khavarnama), Wahab Parey (Shahnama, Sultani), Mohiuddin Miskeen (Zeba Nigar, Sohni Mahiwal), Azizullah Haqqani (Jauhar-i-ishq, Derveshnama).

Rasul Mir (d. 1870) is the prime lyricist of Kashmiri. He deliberately eschews mystic allusions and accounts of distant crusades. He is intimately familiar with the ghazal form and brings a unity of expression to it. His poetry has a sensuous, romantic air about it.

The sufi poets of this period include Karim Buland, Momin Sahab, Shah Oalandar, Shukur Rishi, Rahim Sahab, Niama Sahab, Rahman Dar, Wahab Khar, Ahmad Batwari, Waza Mahmud and most importantly Shamas Fakir (1843-1904). Shamas Fakir was a practising mystic besides being one of the most original of the sufi poets, set apart by his pure diction and great profundity.

Parmanand (1791-1874) and his school represent the 'Lila' group of poets. The Lila lyrics are hymns in praise of the lila (frolic or play) of personified God, usually Krishna. They are primarily devotional poems using religious imagery. They have a feel of the mystic allusions of vakh and the narrative quality of masnavi. Stylistically, they may be in the masnavi distich form of vatsun quatrain inclusive of refrain. The more important contributions in this area, besides those of Parmanand, are by Prakash Ram (d. 1885) who wrote the Ramayana in Kashmiri in the masnavi style, Lachhman Raina 'Bulbul' (d. 1898) who wrote a masnavi on the sacred syllable 'Om' called Omnama and Sri Ram Gita in the vatsun form, and Krishna Razdan (d. 1925) who wrote the long narrative poem Shiva parinay, besides many shorter lila compositions. Parmanand, besides serveral shorter poems, wrote three long narrative poems Shiva lagan, Radha svayamvara and Sudamacharit in the vatsun stanzaic form. The modern period in Kashmiri poetry does not have defined contours as to its beginning, in spite of the fact that 1947 was a turning point for Kashmiri poetry in terms of content as well as form. This has to be understood in the context of Kashmiri having a highly developed and refined poetic idiom over a period of six hundred years. Indeed, even contemporary Kashmiri poetry, though naturally reflecting contemporary concerns, is culturally, linguistically and aesthetically in continuity with this tradition. It is a seamless whole.

Within this referential framework, the contribution of two poets is so significant that the entire period can be divided into two sub-periods of two dominating poetic presences.

The sub-period 1930-1947 is the period of Ghulam Ahmed Mahjoor (1885-1952) and 1947 onwards is the era of Dinanath Nadim (1916-1988) whose influence is still noticeably evident in contemporary poets. Mahjoor, after earlier attempts in Urdu and Persian, started writing in Kashmiri after 1918. Apart from continuing the lol tradition, he and Abdul Ahad Azad (1903-1948) gave Kashmiri poetry an individual identity through the concept of 'Kashmiriyat', which is quite manifest in their work. Zinda Kaul (1884-1965), popularly known as Masterji, wrote poetry in the 'Bhakti' tradition of Parmanand and Krishna Razdan. The mystic poets Ahad Zargar and Samad Mir continued the sufi tradition which is also discernible in the poetry of Amin Kamil (b. 1924) and Ghulam Rasool Santosh (b. 1929).

Dinanath Nadim revolutionised Kashmiri poetry. He has left an indelible imprint on the entire body of modern Kashmiri poetry and indeed literature as a whole. He is a bold innovator who introduced blank verse, free verse, dramatic and interior monologue, sonnet (both Petrarchan and Shakesperean), haiku, neo-impressionism, opera, etc. It is his content, however, which dictated the need for new forms. He made a radical departure from classicism and brought to Kashmiri poetry the concerns of poetry and the poet. Interestingly, while doing away with traditional lexical constructs and symbol systems, Nadim is very much a part of the unbroken poetic idiom the Kashmiri has. He creates his own constructs, a new set of symbols. But these are not part of other linguistic cultures. He only adopted forms while relying on his tradition and a rich word-hoard for poetic strategies. Nadim, singly, brought Kashmiri poetry in step with the literatures of the country. Nadim naturally influenced all his contemporaries and the subsequent generations of poets. Among his contemporaries are Mir Ghulam Rasul Nazki (b.1909), Mirza Arif (b.1910), Ghulam Nabi Firaq (b.1922), and Abdul Rehman Rahi (b.1925) who is a major poet in his own right. While Amin Kamil made significant contribution to the ghazal form alongwith Firaq, Nazki wrote in the rubai form.

The next generation of poets is represented by Santosh (b.1929), Muzaffar Azim (b. 1934), Motilal Saqi (b.1936), Ghulam Nabi Khayal (b.1936), Chamanlal Chaman (b.1937), Motilal Naz (b.1937), Ghulam Ahmed Gash (b.1942), etc., while the younger contemporaries include Ghulam Ahmed Aajir (b.1945), Rafiq Raaz (b.1952) and M.H. Zafar (b.1953), etc. All of these poets are working within the continuum of tradition, whether old or recent. Some other major voices are Nazir Kulgami, Vasdev Reh, Mohiuddin Gauhar, Rosul Pompur, Fazil Kashmiri, Iqbal Faheem, etc.

Interestingly, in a language encriched by a galaxy of poetesses through the age, there has been a virtual drought of feminine voices throughout the modern period.

POETRY (Konkani). There must have been Konkani poetry before the advent of the Portuguese as is evident from the Konkani song written by Namdev (14th c.) and the writings of Krishnadas Sharma. There is mention of a poem on 'Passion' by Gaspar de S. Miguel (16th c.) Thanks to the zeal of the missionaries, by the 19th century Konkani had a considerable body of hymns, the best known of them being 'Riglo Jesu Molyanto' (Jesus entered the field) by Joaquim de Miranda. The semi-literary folk-song 'Mando' which flourished during the 19th century contains some good poetry. Ligorio da Costa, Carlos Trinidade and Arnaldo Menezes are some of the early composers.

Hindu devotional poetry flourished among the Konkanis of Kerala during the last decades of the 17th century with Sant Appayya, Raghavdas, Jogavva and Avadi. The tradition is kept up to this day by Smt. Kamalammal, Narahari Prabhu and Suhas Dalal. Manjeshwar Govind Pai (1882-1963), the poet-laureate of Karnataka occasionally wrote in Konkani.

With his Sadyavelim Fulam (Flowers in the desert, 1946), Bayabhav (real name Kashinath Sridhar Nayak) started the revival of poetry. He had the fire of emotions, the maturity of experience and high technical skill. In his Painjanam (Anklets, 1960) Bakibab Borkar is seen primarily as a lyricist dealing with great themes of love and destiny. He was keenly alive to the events around him. Sasaya is his Sahitya Akademi award-winning collection of poems (1981). Manohar Rai Sardessai with his Gomya Tujya Mogakhatir (For your sake, O Goa, 1961) brought picturesqueness and simplicity to Konkani poetry. R.V. Pandit experimented boldly and successfully with free verse and described the plight of the downtrodden. His Dorya Gazota received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979. Pandurang Bhangi in his Distavo (Vision 1974) gives well-chiselled and highly introspective verse. Sankar Ramani's poetry is both melodious and picturesque.

Madhav Borkar is terse and abstract, yet appealing, Ramesh Veluskar is original in his sensuous pictures of nature. Prakash Padgaonkar is highly lyrical though didactic, while Shivanand Tendulkar is deliberately non-conformist and makes use of bold imagery. Padgaonkar received the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Hanv Monis Ashvatthomo (1986). C.F.D. Costa is well known for his originality of ideas and the wealth of images. Maridas (Anthony D' Souza) has a rich vocabulary and uses alliteration with a happy effect. J.B. Morais is both subtle and delicate. His Bhitorem Tufan received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1985. Yashvant Kelekar, Uday Bhembro, Gajanan Rajkar, Sankar Bhandari, Haradatta Khandeparkar. Jess Fernandes and Olivinho Gomes are poets full of promise. Vijayabai Sarmalkar brings a delightfully delicate feminine touch to Konkani poetry. Pundalik Nayak brings unusual vigour of thoughts and words. Suresh Borkar with his 'abhang' like poems introduces religious mysticism, so does Vithaldas Prabhu whose poems have in addition a haunting melody. A.N. Mhambro and Manohar Rai Sardessai who have made a mark as satirical poets have also written poems for children. Though some young poets today are attracted towards abstract poetry, most of the Konkani poets do express the dreams and aspirations of the common people and boldly comment on their social and political condition.

POETRY (Maithili). Maithili literature is rich in all forms of poetry. The earliest 'charya' songs are only the beginning of a genre of religious poetry practised by a number of successive poets. The charya songs, in fact, vitalised the lyric tradition.

Vidyapati followed Jyotirishvara and Umapati, but overshadowed all Maithili poets in the brilliance of his metaphors and similes and in the grace of expression and higher flights of poetic fancy. One simply marvels at the sweep of his imagination. His contemporaries and successors include Amritakara, Kanshanarayana, Govindadas and Vishnupuri. In Maithili poetry Vidyapati is like Kalidasa, and Govindadasa is like Magha. Govindadasa is more concerned with diction than with feelings. He is erotically devotional.

The lyrical tradition had its culmination in Harsanatha. From the 18th century onwards a new style made its appearance in the writings of Nandipati and Manabodha. The popular taste was aptly met by Manabodha. The lyrical tradition was carried forward by Bhuvana (Asadha and Smriti-kana), Ishanatha Jha (Mala), Arsiprasad Singh, Surendra Jha 'Suman', Upendra Thakur 'Mohan' and Kashinatha Misra 'Madhup'. Bhuvana is the harbinger of a new type. Some of these lyrics remind us of the famous lines of Shelley ('Our sweetest songs are those that tell of the saddest thought').

In epic we have great variety. Manabodha's Krishnajanma, Chanda Jha's Ramayana, and Lal Das's Rameshvaracharita Ramayana may be compared with the mahakavyas of any other language. Raghunandan Das (Subhadraharan), Badrinatha Jha (Ekavaliparinya) and Tantranatha Jha (Kichakavadha) follow the convention of Sanskrit epics. Chanda Jha was the first to compose a mahakavya in the true sense of the term and his influence on later poets was immense. As a narrative poet, Raghunandan Das rises to olympic heights. Badrinatha Jha is unique in matters of rhetorical excellence. Tantranatha Jha brings elemental feeling to great heights. Sitarama Jha (Ambacharita) also distinguishes himself as a master of epic poetry. Kashinath Misra 'Madhup' (Radhaviraha) and Lakshmana Jha (Ganga) also deserve mention. Dinanatha Pathak's Chanakya is a distinguished mahakavya. Its diction and imagery are forceful. The poet has great mastery over rhythm, and his style is quite powerful and effective. Sitayana of Baidyanatha Mallick 'Vidhu' is a major contribution to Maithili epics and also marks a healthy deviation from the regular mahakavyas. Kedaranatha Labh (Lakhimarani and Bharati) portrays great Maithili women, and these two works are rich in rhythm and diction and may be taken as representatives of the short epics (khanda kavya) of modern age.

Under the impact of English and other contemporary Indian literatures, the Maithili poets began to try their hands at sonnets, odes, lyrics and literary ballads. The influence of Marx, Freud, Sartre and Camus and other thinkers became progressively marked in their poetry. Blank verse and 'muktaka' acquired a great prominence at the hands of Sitarama Jha. Maithili poetry also served a patriotic purpose in our century.

Surendra Jha 'Suman' (Payasvini), a poet of superior sensibilities, is unique in many respects, especially in his choice of words, description of seasons and alliterations. Madhup offers us a series of original comparisons. Arsiprasad Singh is excellent in his songs. Vaidyanath Misra 'Yatri' (Patrahina nagna gacha) is bitter and tender, pathetic and satirical. His images are born of true experience, and some of his expressions defy translation. Upendranatha Jha 'Vyasa' in his Sanyasi and Patana has used chaste diction. Rajkamal Choudhary (Vichitra, and Swaragandha), though influecned by the philosophy of existentialism, has remained true to the soil. Swaragandha adds a new dimension to modern Maithili poetry. New poets are realistic and are not bound by any convention. Raj Kamal used polished and chaste diction. Ramakrishna Jha 'Kishun' (Atmanepada), Mayananda Misra (Dishantar), Somadeva (Kaladhvani), Kirtinarayana Misra (Simanta), Nachiketa (Kevyo vadanti and Amritasyaputrah), Gangesha Gunjan (Ham, ek mithya parichaya), Jivakanta (Nachu he prithivi), Ramanand 'Renu' (Antatah) and Hetukar Jha's Chetika are some of the important works of modern Maithili poetry. Raghvacharya is a well-known revolutionary poet. Patriotic notes run through the poems of Sitarama Jha, Kanchinatha Jha 'Kiran', Vaidyanath Misra 'Yatri', Chandranatha Misra 'Amar', Arisprasad Singh, and Jainarayana Jha 'Vineet'. Brajkishore Varma 'Manipadma' is a poet of nature. Virendra Mallik has made a mark in blank verse. Among the modern women poets, Ilarani Singh (Vindanti) is prominent. She represents the metaphysical aspect of life. Shephalika Varma, Nirja Renu and Shanti Suman have also written some good poems in recent years.

Among the most popular and common type of poetry is 'Tirhuti'. Other popular forms are 'Samadouni', 'Lagni', 'Chaitavara', 'Malara', 'Yoga', 'Uchiti', 'Sohara', 'Chaumasa' and 'Barahmasa'. 'Nachari', 'Maheshvani', 'Gosaunika Gita' and 'Vishnupada' are devotional poems. This lyrical poetry has been handled by Umapati, Vidyapati, Nandipati, Chanda Jha, Saheb Ramadasa, Gananath Jha, Vindhyanatha Jha, Kalikumar Das and others. Parmananda Datta tried a new technique in 'Maheshavanis'. All aspects of love are unfolded in 'Tirhuti' and 'Samadauni'. These lyrics are, indeed, quite moving and melodious.

POETRY (Malayalam). The earliest written specimen of Malayalam poetry is Ramacharitam (The story of Rama) usually placed in the twelfth century AD. Earlier to this, however, were such works as Silappadikaram (Work concerning anklet) written by natives of Kerala in the then prevalent mixture of Tamil and Malayalam spoken in the land prior to the actual individuation of Malayalam; but the oral tradition of folk poetry is perhaps older than all written traditions of Malayalam poetry. These songs couched in folksy language were on several themes and perhaps itinerant bards popularised them. Thus there are songs on deities of particular temples, on temple rituals and festivals, on the deeds of heroic persons; there are also songs connected with certain professions and songs for the sake of entertainment. Folk-songs that have been collected by researchers in our time fall into two groups, geographically speaking. These are named the Northern songs and the Southern songs respectively indicating the Northern areas and the Southern areas of Kerala as the regions of their origin. The deities on whom there are a number of folk-songs are Kali, the Goddess, and Shasta, the protecting hill-god. Sometimes the singing of the songs is associated with brilliant ritualistic diagrams drawn in front of the temple.

The exploits of heroic figures have also been subjects of several folk-songs. Among the heroes described and praised in the Northern ballads are Aromal Chevakar, his sister Unniyarcha and her son Aromunni; of equal fame for brave deeds were Otenan, a member of the Tacholi family, and his nephew Chantu Komappan. Stirring indeed are the ballads about these heroic persons.

Ramacharitam belongs to the class of Malayalam poetry known as 'pattu' (song) of which the characteristics are mentioned in Lilatilakam, a fourteenth century definitive work on the features of poetry. According to it only Dravidian sounds should be used in songs. Two prosodic conventions called 'etuka' and 'mona' were used and specific metres were employed in the composition. Ramacharitam observes these rules. Consequently Sanskrit words were adapted to the Dravidian. Ramacharitam was written by a poet by name Cheerama and this is about all we can say of its author. There is one view that he was a king of the state of Travancore by name Sri Vira Rama Varma (1195-1208).

The Ramacharitam type of poetry written in Malayalam, heavily mixed with Tamil forms, continued to be written in the centuries after that text. Ramakathappattu (A song on the story of Rama) by Ayyippilla Asan of the fifteenth century was one such. This too was based on Valmiki's Ramayana. More significant work belonging to the category of pattu was written by members of a gifted family of poets known as Kannassans or Panikkars of Niranam. Kannassan was probably a surname which the family carried from the days of a distinguished predecessor of that name. Three distinguished poets from this family contributed to Malayalam poetry in the fourteenth century. They were two brothers, Madhava Panikkar and Shankara Panikkar, and their nephew Rama Panikkar. Madhava Panikkar wrote a translation of the Bhagavadgita in Malayalam—one of the earliest translations of the religious text in any Indian language. Sankara Panikkar's work was Bharatamala, a rendering of the Mahabharata. The gifted nephew Rama Panikkar rendered the Ramayana into Malayalam—a work which is widely known as Kannassa Ramayanam. There are also some more works to his credit.

In Ramanujan Ezhuttacchan, poet, saint and social reformer of the sixteenth century, we have the greatest poet of Malayalam gifting to the language his rendering of the Adhyatma Ramayana (not Valmiki's text), Mahabharata and perhaps also part of the Bhagavata (a debated question now). These translations in modern Malayalam with the least mixture of Tamil and in a style that is contemporary by our standards revolutionised Malayalam poetry, and their religious content and fervour changed the life of the Hindus of Kerala. Ezhuttacchan was an Advaitin who popularised the Vaishnavite movement in Kerala. There are also a few independent poems like Harinama kirtanam (A song with Hari's names) which too became everyday religious literature for the Keralities. To Ezhuttacchan is credited the style of expounding a text through the words of a singing bird. The style is called 'kilippattu' (bird-song) and mellifluous Dravidian metres are used in it. Though, in one view, Ezhuttacchan should be taken as the starting point of modern Malayalam poetry, he could also be considered an ancient and mediaeval Malayalam poet for the reason that he represents the perfection of the pattu literature in which class a good deal of ancient and mediaeval poetry in Malayalam falls.

An excellent specimen of poetry in Dravidian metres is also found in the work Krishnagatha by Cherusseri Nambudiri (1560-1660). Written in simple, everday language, with poetical ornaments like simile used in plenty and with felicity, Krishnagatha is one of the monumental poetic works in Malayalam on the story of Krishna.

Another great poet who contributed to the bhakti movement in medieval Malayalam poetry is Punthanam Nambudiri. His Jnanappana (Song of divine knowledge) is full of passages that have become household expressions. Punthanam's skill in capsuling sublime philosophical truths in the most simple and colloquial language has perhaps no parallel in Malayalam poetry.

Malayalam poetry up to that time belongs to the category of poetry written in the Dravidian metres though there were linguisitic variations. There was, for example, difference between works in the proportion of the Tamil-Malayalam mixture. The Niranam poets did, indeed, use Sanskrit sounds. Ezhuttacchan used a good number of Sanskrit compounds and his language eschewed the Tamilisms so common in a work like Ramacharitam. As for Krishnagatha its everday language is a source of its beauty.

During the period in which the poetry mentioned above flourished another type of poetry was also being written. This was poetry in Sanskrit metres in a language which was a close mixture of Sanskrit and Malayalam. This language and the poetry written in it were both known by the name 'manipravalam', the word 'mani' (ruby) in the compound standing for Malayalam and the word 'pravalam' (pearl) standing for Sanskrit. The mixture of Malayalam and Sanskrit went deeper beyond the level of vocabulary and Sanskrit suffixes were often used to form words from Malayalam stems.

There are some early incomplete specimens of this kind of poetry belonging to the thirteenth century. Such are three works Unnichchirutevicharitam, Unniyatichar-itam, and Unniyachicharitam, respectively the stories of Unnichchirutevi, Unniyati and Unniyachchi, three beautiful women, probably harlots. To the fourteenth century belongs Unnunilisandesham (A message to Unnunili), the most beautiful among manipravala poems. As the name itself indicates it is a work of the type of Kalidasa's Meghaduta (The cloud messenger). It is a message sent by a separated lover to his beloved. The messenger in this poem is a prince.

A number of manipravala works were on secular and sensuous themes. Love is the theme in several of them. Often the heroine was a courtesan. The Vaishikatantra (The art of harlotry, 12th c.) indeed codifies the rules of the game in the words of a mother to her daughter. Chandrotsava (Festival of the moon), a work of the fourteenth century, gives a good picture of the social respect which hetaera enjoyed in those times, the kind of people who patronised them and the life and style of those concerned.

While thus a number of works of the manipravala kind revolved around beautiful women, there were also works with a religious theme and outlook. There were several works which praised the deities of particular temples and were written for that purpose. There were also works like Bhasharamayana champu (A champu on the Ramayana in Malayalam, 15th c.) which has some exquisitely beautiful manipravala poetry.

The manipravala poetry flourished to such an extent as to require its own rule-book and we have a technical work called Lilatilakam (14th c.). In it is made a comprehensive study of manipravala with rules and commentary in Sanskrit and examples quoted from extant manipravala works.

Another form of poetry which originated roughly around the middle of the seventeenth century is 'attakkatha', literally 'a story for enactment'. Though basically intended as a source-book or script for the theatric form of Kathakali, attakkatha developed as a full-fledged branch of poetry. The language employed in them was manipravala, with a predominant use of Sanskrit. For their subject matter, the attakkathas mainly exploit the epics, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. Among a vast repertoire of attakkathas, the most prominent ones are Kottarakkara Tampuran's adaptation of the episodes from the Ramayana, Kottayattu Tampuran's Bakavadham, Kalyanasaugandhikam, Krimmiravadham and Kalakeyavadham, Irayimman Tampis' Kichakavadham, Dakshayagam and Uttarasvayamvaram and Unnayi Varier's Nalacharitam. Among these Nalacharitam stands in incomparable isolation, because of its literary excellence and theatrical potential.

Curiously, another major branch of literature called tullalkkatha is also the contribution of the visual art form of tullal. The pioneer of tullal was Kunchan Nambiar (18th c.) who rebelled against the classical tradition of ornate, high-brow poetry. Nambiar wrote over forty tullal poems, characterised by simple diction and genuine humour. Though he took the plots of his narrative poems from the puranas, he gave a local colour and setting to his stories. Nambiar was a humorist par excellence - he exploited all the modes of the comic from light banter to severe invective. Some of his important tullal poems are Kalyanasaugandhikam, Ghoshayatra, Syamantakam and Sabhapravesham.

After the age of Kunchan Nambiar, Malayalam poetry seems to have passed through a dark age. The rejuvenation came with the arrival of Kerala Varma Valiakoil Tampuran. This was also the period when Malayalam just came under the influence of western literature. This may be termed as the neo-classical age in Malayalam literature.

Kerala Varma Valiakoil Tampuran made his contribution primarily to the field of prose, but he also tried his hand at several forms of poetry like attakkatha, champu, kilipattu and sandesha kavya. His Mayura sandesham (Message through a peacock) is his most significant contribution to Malayalam poetry. This poem started a new trend, with several other poets attempting to initate the poetic convention. Valiakoil Tampuran and his nephew A.R.Rajaraja Varma (1863-1918) were inheritors of the old as well as the new; the former stuck to classicism in his poetry, but took to western models in his prose, while the latter absorbed the new features of western-model romanticism both in his lyrical poetry and in his non-rhetorical criticism. A direct expression of the dissatisfaction with the traditional, classical mode came with the tendency called 'Rajarajavarma prasthanam' which rebelled against the 'dvitiyakshra prasa' (rhyme in the second syllable) in all the four lines of a verse. During the same period, there were also other tendencies in Malayalam poetry, like the 'pure' or 'simple' Malayalam movement led by the Venmani poets and the writers of the Kodungallur royal family.

The Modern Era:

The modern era in Malayalam poetry is sometimes said to begin at the turn of this century when in the wake of a cultural and political renaissance a romantic revival came about in Malayalam poetry. V.C. Balakrishna Panicker (1890-1915) with his 'Oru vilapam' and 'Vishvarupam' achieved a great breakthrough in Malayalam poetry. For decades to come the lyric became the dominant mode of poetic expression. The personal elegy, the description of nature in terms not used before, the use of word pictures natural to the context of the poem, the subtle evocation of a mood by collocations less literary and more original than required by prosody—these began to find greater acceptance with the readers, if not with the scholars. The arrival on the scene of three gifted poets, Kumaran Asan (1873-1924), Ulloor Parameswara Iyer (1877-1949) and Vallattol Narayana Menon (1878-1958), electrified the whole atmosphere and their combined efforts established the romantic mode once and for all. This was a kind of modernization in the sense that it liberated the mind from the hold of traditional and neoclassical literary beliefs and practices. The full tide of western influence affected not only poetry, but all other forms of literary expression too. English education, the popularity of newspapers, the production of text books on the new model, the adoption of new genres like the novel and the short story, not to speak of the essay and the literary review, the impact of western ideas, and the socio-political movements of the times seemed to lend support to the changes that were taking place in poetry. The gradual rejection of forms like the mahakavyas, sandeshakavyas, and group compositions of narratives or riddles or chain-poems confirmed the influence of the new trends.
